Thus haue we sufficiently declared the amitie and association, that in times past wee haue had with the Romans. About this time it came to passe, that the estate of Syria was sore troubled vpon the occasion that ensueth. Cælius Bassus one of Pompeies partakers, laid an ambush for Sextus Cæsar and slew him, and seizing vpon his army, vsurped the gouernment: whereby there arose great warre nigh Apamea. For Cæsars captaines marched out against Cælius, with great force both of foote and horsemen, to whome Antipater sent his sonnes with a power to second them (in remembrance of the benefite he had receiued at Cæsars hands) supposing it to be an act of iustice, that the murtherer should be punished for his so hainous offence. Now whereas this warre continued a long time, Marcus came and succeeded Sextus. Meane while Cæsar was slaine by Cassius and Brutus in the midst of the Senate, after hee had commanded three yeeres and six months, as it is expresse in an other place.

After Cæsars death, the brand of ciuill war began to flame, and the greatest men of Rome traualled the one this way, the other that way to gather men of warre. But Cassius came into Syria, with an intent to take the army that was neere to Apamea: and hauing leuied the siege he drew both Bassus and Marcus to be of his faction; and traualling from Citie to Citie, he gathered a number of souldiers, and much furniture, and imposed huge tributes: but especially he afflicted Iewry, and exacted of that countrey more then leuen hundredth talents of siluer. Antipater seeing the state in so great feare and trouble, committed the exaction of the two parts of this money to his sonnes; the other hee commanded to be assigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, and the other part vnto another. Herode first of all gathered that which was commanded him in the countrey of Galilee, and for this cause was greatly beloued by Cassius: for hee being prudent and discreet, thought it no small policie at that time to win the Romans good will by other mens expence. Vnder the other gouernours the Cities were let to sale, together with their inhabitants: and amongst them these foure were the chiefest, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Cassius sold the people thereof to them that would give most. Furthermore, Cassius was so much transported with choler, that hee had slaine Malichus (so much was he moued against him) if Hircanus had not restrained his furie, by sending him one hundredth talents of his owne money by Antipater. But as soone as Cassius was departed out of the countrey of Iudæa, he practised Antipaters death, supposing that his cutting off would assure Hircanus state the more strongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his resolution; for hauing an inkling L thereof, he got himselfe on the other side of Iordan, and assembled an armie of souldiers both Iewes and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politike and subtil fellow) denied stoutly that he had intended any treason, purging himselfe with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had neuer any such intent, especially for that he saw that Phasaelus held Ierusalem, and Herode had an army at command. And in the end, perceiuing the difficulty wherein he was, he reconciled himselfe to Antipater, & they agreed at that time that Marcus gouerned Syria: who perceiuing that Malichus began to raise troubles in Iewry, resorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had slaine him, had not Antipater by earnest request obtained his life.

Malichus poysoneth Antipater.

Cassius and Marcus make Herode gounour of Coe-lo Syria.

Vt imprudent Antipater saued Malichus to his owne mischief: For when Cassius and Marcus had assembled their army, they committed all the charge into Herodes hands, and made him gouernour of Coelosyria, and deliuered him great forces both of foot and horse, and ships by sea: They promised him likewise the kingdome of Iudæa, after they had finished

A shed the war, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Cæsar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power determined to make him away; and hauing corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whome both of them celebrated a feast) hee made him away by poyson, and afterwards assembling many men of warre about him, hee made himselfe maister of the Citie. When Herode and Phasaelus vnderstood of the traitorous conspiracy attempted against their father, they were grievously incensed against Malichus. But hee denied all, and in especiall abiured the intent or practise of the murder. Thus died Antipater a iust and vertuous man, and such a one as deerely loued his countrey. But Herode, who was his younger sonne, incontinently resolved to reuenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army against Malichus: But Phasaelus, who was the elder, determined to circumuent him by policie, for feare B least he should raise a ciuill warre. He therefore accepted of Malichus iustificacions, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no such sort sought Antipaters death, and only intended his fathers monument and funerals. Meane while, Herode resorting to Samaria, and finding it in desperate estate, restored the same, and pacified the dissensions that were amongst the inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a feast) hee came to Ierusalem with his men of warre. Whereupon Malichus being afraid of this his access, periwaded Hircanus that hee should not permit him to enter into the Citie: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alleading for pretext of his defence, that amongst the holy people it was not lawfull to intermix a troupe of polluted men. But Herode made small reckoning of them that brought him this newes, and notwithstanding this command entred the Citie by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater as his especiall friend; but vnder hand he prepared a guard for his owne safetie. Notwithstanding it was thought meet by Herodes friends, to take no notice of this his dissimulation; but to make a shew for their parts that they were wel affected towards Malichus.

CHAP. XX.

Hereupon Herode certified Cassius of Antipater his fathers death, who knowing very well D of what conuersation Malichus was, wrote backe vnto Herode that hee should reuenge the death of his father: besides, hee sent secret letters to the captiues that were in Tyre, commanding them to aide and assist Herode in that so iust execution which hee intended. After therefore that Cassius had taken Laodicea and the inhabitants of the countrey came together, bringing with them crownes and siluer to present him, Herode expected that Malichus in that place should receiue his punishment: but he entring into suspicion of some like practise, at such time as they drewe neere vnto Tyre in Phoenicia, attempted farre greater things. For whereas his sonne was an hostage in Tyre, hee entred the Citie with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to returne into Iudæa. After this, vsurping vpon that opportunitie which hee had by reason of Cassius troubles (who hastily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined E to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himselfe Lord of the countrey: but God disappointed his vniust purposes. For Herode being a man of ripe iudgement, incontinently discovered his pretence, and sent one of his seruants before, as if vnder purpose to prepare a banquet, because he had told him before time that hee would entertaine all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the captiues to command them to issue out with their daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth and meeting him neere vnto the shore of the Citie vpon the sea coast, stabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that thorow amaze he waxed speechlesse: and finally being much moued, hee demanded of Herodes men, what accident had happened, and who it was that had slaine Malichus? Whereof F when they certified him, and how nothing was done without Cassius commaund: hee answered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traytour to his countrey. See heere how Malichus was iustly punished for the wickednesse hee committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was departed out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Iudæa: for Felix, who was left in Ierusalem with an army, marched forth against Phasaelus, and all the people were in armes. For which cause Herode speedily repaired to Fabius, gouernour of Damasco, and intending to succour his brother, was preuented by a sickness: so that Phasaelus obtaining the victory by by his owne forces against Felix, enclosed him vp in a tower, whence afterwards hee dismissed G him vnder composition. Whereupon hee presently and gricuously rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of diuers benefites which he had receiued by him, hee had giuen aide vnto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time reuoked, planted garrisons in diuers fortresses, and namely in Masada, which was the strongest of them all. As soone as Herode therefore had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of diuers places that he held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods.

Ptolomey Mennus drew vnto him by force of his money Aristobulus, sonne the young Antigonus, who had gathered a power, and hired Fabius, and was likewise drawne by Ptolomey, vnder titles of consanguinitie and adoption. With him ioyned Marion (whom Cassius had made Gouvernour in Tyre:) For this man hauing occupied Syria by tyrannie kept garrison therein: Marion also invaded Galilee, which confined his countrey; and hauing seized three strong fortresses therein, hee kept garrisons in the same. Herode also marching forth against him, dispossessed him of them all; and graciously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing benefites on some of them for the loue hee bare vnto their citie. And that he done, he came and encountered with Antigonus, and fought with him, and ouercame him before he had scarcely entred on the marches of Iudæa, and draue him from thence. When he was come to Ierusalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crownes: for already was hee inserted into Hircanus family, for that by promise hee was his sonne in lawe; by which meanes, he had more willingly undertaken his defence, for that hee was to marry Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whome hee begat three sonnes and two daughters. Before her also had he married a wife of his own nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest sonne.

CHAP. XXII.

Herode meeting with Antonius in Bithynia, giueth him a great summe of money, to the ende he should not giue eare to those that would accuse him.

Antonius and Cesar hauing overcome Cassius neere vnto the Citie of Philippi; Cesar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Bithynia, Embassadors resorted vnto him from all parts: Thither also repaired certaine principall men among the Iewes to accuse Phaelus & Herod, saying, that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authoritie of the kingdom. But Antonius greatly honored Herod, who came vnto him to answer those accusatiōs that they had imposed on him: for which cause they that were his opposites could obtaine no audience: for Herod had bought that priuiledge from them with his money. As soone as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the high priest and all our nation presently sent an Embassage vnto him, with a crowne of golde; requiring him that hee would write vnto the provinces, that the Iewes whome Cassius had taken prisoners (contrary to the lawe of armes) might be set at libertie, and that their countrey (which was taken from them in Cassius time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demaunds which the Iewes had propoed, were reasonable, wrote backe presently to the high priest Hircanus and the Iewes; and sent an edict also to the Tyrians to this effect.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to Hircanus high Priest and Prince of the Iewes; Health. If you are well, all goeth well. I and mine armie are in perfect estate. Lysimachus the sonne of Pausanias and Ioseph the sonne of Mennus, and Alexander the son of Theodore your Embassadors, came vnto me to Ephesus and haue renewed the same Embassage which they heretofore brought to Rome, and at this present likewise they haue duely and faithfully acquitted themselves of the Embassage which they present in the behalte of you, and your nation, by giuing vs to vnderstand what affection you beare towards vs: In that I esteeme you for our friend, sith I am giuen to vnderstand how friendly you haue behaued your selfe towards vs both in words and deeds, since we haue

A haue had any knowledge of your good and honest conuersation and pietie. For at such time as our aduersaries and enemies of the Roman nation spoiled all the countrey of Asia, and without regard of their othes spared neither cities nor temples; we haue opposed our selues against them, not onely for our priuate respect, but in the quarrell of the common weale, to the intent to punish the authors of such offences committed against men, and of such impieties perpetrated against God: for which wee suppose that the sunne hath in a manner obscured himselfe, by beholding with vnwilling eyes what an hainous offence was committed against Cesar. But wee haue gotten the vpper hand of these impious enterprises, which are fallen vpon Macedonia; as on the countrey and ayre, from whence proceede such detestable and vngracious desleignes: and wee haue likewise cut off the course of their desperate resolution, which made them encounter vs neere to Philippi a citie of Macedonia, where wee seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with mountaines as if it were with wals, as far as the sea, in such manner as the passage was barred vp, as it were with a gate, had not the gods giuen vs way by resisting their vniust exploits, & furthering ours. Brutus likewise compelled to fly to Philippi, where being inclosed by vs, he suffered the like ruine with his confort Cassius; and since they haue been punished as they deserved, me seemeth that we are seized of peace, and that Asia hath had repose from warre, and all the bodie thereof is relieved from a grievous maladie, by the meanes of our victory. For which cause remembering vs of you and your nation, to the end to increase your good fortunes, we wil bethinke vs of that which shall be commodious for you: and we haue already sent letters from city to city, to the intent that if any one among you, eyther captiue or free man, haue been sold to the vtmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that army, they may be set at libertie. And our will is, that you make vse of the bountie which we bestow vpon you, both in our selfe as in Dolabella's right, forbidding the Tyrians to molest you and commanding them to restore all that which they haue taken from the Iewes in goods or possessions. As for the crowne which you sent me, I accept the same.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the gouernors, Senate and people of Tyre: Health. I haue bene informed in Ephesus by Hircanus embassadors (who is high priest and prince of the Iewes) that you haue seized their countrey, & spoiled the same; at such time as our aduersaries held that province. But in as much as we haue undertaken the warre for the Empire, and that in defence of right and pietie, we haue punished these ingratefull, disloyall and perfidious persons; our wil is, that you suffer our allies to liue in peace: and as touching that which you haue obtained by our aduersaries, our pleasure is, that you restore the same to those that are dispossessed. For no one of them hath obtained either province or army by the consent of the Senate; but haue rauished them by force, and afterwards bestowed them on those who haue been ministers of their impieties and iniustice. But since they haue been punished according to their deserts, we requite that our allies may enioy their owne, without any impeachment: and if you holde any places at this present, which belong to Hircanus prince of the Iewes (that were seized since the time that Caius Cassius by vniust warre invaded our provinces) restore them vnto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him from the possession of his owne. And if you haue or pretend to haue any right in them; at such time as I shall repaire to those places, it shall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we wil so iudge as that our allies shall receiue no wrong.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the gouernors, Senate, and people of Tyre: Health. I haue sent you my edict, which my pleasure is that you carefully looke vnto, and that you register it amongst your publike records in Romane and Greeke letters, and set it vp in writing in an open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumuir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for their publike affaires, hath declared, that Caius Cassius during the troubles, by the assistance of his soldiers, hath rauished another mans province; and hath in like sort spoiled our allies, and hath ransacked the nation of the Iewes, who are friends to the people of Rome; and for that by our valour we haue repressed his insolence, by our edicts and iudgements we will correct his offences: to the end that all things may be restored to our allies, and that all what foules hath been sold & appertained to the Iewes (whether they be prisoners or possessions) be restored to their masters, to the end that each man may be at libertie as he was before; and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure is, that whosoever disobaieth this ordinance, he may be punished. And he that shall be convicted to haue disobaied the same, he shall be punished according to his desert. He wrote to the like effect to the Sidonians, Ammonians, and Arabians, all which we will insert in a convenient place, to the end that account the Romans made of our nation:

After this, Antonius retired himselfe into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meete him neere vnto Cilicia, and entangled him in her loues. At that time also, one hundredth of the chiefeft reckoning among the Iewes came once againe in embassade to him to accuse Herode, and his adherents: who to this ende had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala like wife vnderooke the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied vnto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the Citie of Daphen, hee demaunded of Hircanus, which of both the parties gouerned the common-weale best: who returned him answer, that they, who were on Herods side were most studious of the weale publike. Antonius (who long since had borne good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitalitie that hee had receiued with their father, during the time that Gabinus was in Iudæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affaires in Iudæa: And to this effect wrote he his letters and committed fourtene of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herode belought for their liues, hee had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soone as they returned from their Embassade, they could not containe themselves in quiet, but returned once more vnto Antonius to the number of one thousand, to the citie of Tyre where Antonius sojourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herode and his brother, who commaunded in that place) ordained that the Embassadours of the Iewes should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innovation; where contrariwise hee confirmed Herodes gouernment. At that time Herod, who walked by the sea side, came vnto them, aduising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to giue ouer their appeale, for feare least some grieuous misfortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gaue no regard, certaine Iewes and inhabitants of that citie, all at once ranne vpon them, who slue some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their countrey, euer afterwarde contained themselves and liued in quiet, thorow the feare they had conceiued. But when the people ceased not to exclaime and protest against Herode, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that he commaunded all those whom hee held prisoners, should be flaine.

The yeere after, Pacorus the kings sonne, and Barzapharnes a prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. And about this time died Ptolomey the sonne of Mennæus; and his sonne Lysanias raigned in his steed, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the sonne of Aristobulus; who obtained this fauour at his hands by the counsaile and sollicitation of a certaine prince of great authoritie and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Parthians make war in Syria to restore Antigonus son of Aristobulus to his kingdom.

After this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to giue them one thousand talents of silver, and five hundredth women, if so bee they would depriue Hircanus of the kingdom, and restore it vnto him, and withall put Herode and his friends to death. Yet did he not deliuer them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians led their armie into Iury to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the sea coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolemaidans receiued him into their citie. He sent a troupe of horsemen into Iury to discover the estate of the countrey, and to giue succours to Antigonus. The chiefe of these horsemen was the kings butler, who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certaine Iewes (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) toyed themselves with Antigonus, & were prepared with him to invade his enemies, hee conceiued some hope that he might by their meanes reduce a certaine part of the region vnder his gouernment, which is called Drymar; and certaine of his wel-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to presse forward as farre as Ierusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they addresse themselves to assault the kings palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was main-

Pacorus chiefe of the Parthians entering the citie perswadeth Phasaclus to go embassadour to Barzapharnes.

Atained in the market place, the young men repulsed the enemie, and draue him into the temple. Which done, they sent certaine armed men into the houses neere adioyning, to guard them: but the people rushing in vpon them and seeing they were destitute of aide, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this iniquitie of theirs was presently reuenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, slew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily assaults betwene both parties, the enemies expected vntill such time as the people (assembled from all parts of the countrey) should repaire to Ierusalem to celebrate the feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the temple, both armed and vnarmed, who seized both the temple and the Citie; except the kings house onely, which Herode made good with a few men of war. The wall thereof did Phasaclus his brother keepe. But Herod with a companie of his followers sallied out vpon the enemie, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, hee put diuers thousands of them to flight, wherof some retired themselves into the Citie; other some into the temple; the rest into a certaine bulwarke neere at hand. In this battell also Phasaclus shewed no little valour.

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians came into the Citie with some few horsemen at Antigonus request, making shew that he came to appeale the sedition; but the effect and scope of his coming was, to obtaine the Soueraigntie for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phasaclus was come out to meete with him, and had curteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to go Embassadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite vnder this pretence to surprise him. Hee suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded, notwithstanding that Herod misliked the course; who knowing the perfidious maner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assaile Pacorus, and to assault and oppresse his forces, when they were come vnto him. Naithelesse Hircanus and Phasaclus vnderooke this Embassade, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundredth horsemen, and ten of those whom they call free men) conducted the Embassadours. Now as soone as they came into Galilee, the gouernours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meete them: Barzapharnes also at the first gaue them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with presents; but anon after, hee began to practise treacherie. For Phasaclus & his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adioyned the sea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus had promised one thousand talents, and five hundredth virgins to the Parthians, hee began already to suspect the Barbarians. For a certaine friend of his had given him an inkling.

That there were treasons intended against him that verie night, and that his lodging was priuily beset with a guard. And surely they had bene surprised, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Ierusalem) should bee seized of Herode, fearing least hee hauing an inkling of their disaster, should betake himselfe to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was set about them: For which cause there were certaine of Phasaclus friends, who counsailed him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his horse and flie from thence: and amongst the rest Osilius was most earnest, who had wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that roade hard by to further their flight) at that which they pretended. But Phasaclus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his brother Herod in danger, but repainging to Barzapharnes he told him, that hee did him wrong to vse these sinister practises against them. For that if hee had need of money, he was more likely to receiue it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howsoeuer he wrought, it was an intolerable iniurie to put Embassadours to death, who came vnto him vnder pledge of his honour, and had no wayes offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things, protested by an oth, that no one point of that which he had suspected, was true; but that he was onely troubled with false surmise: whereupon he presently departed to Pacorus.

CHAP. XXV.

The Parthians lead away Hircanus and Phasaclus into captiuitie.

As soone as he was departed, certaine of the Parthians tooke Hircanus and Phasaclus prisoners, who mightily detested their perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent vnto Herod, & who had commandement given him to entice and traine him without the Citie walles, and afterwards to apprehend him. But Herod was forewarped of this treacherie, by certaine messengers (who were sent by Phasaclus to giue him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemie in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addressed himselfe to Pacorus (and those in greatest authoritie among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters : who subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that hee should doe well to repaire with them without the wall to go and meete those messengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet bene seized by their aduersaries, but came to certifie him of Phaëlas good estate. But Herode gaue them no credit, because hee was already other wayes aduertized of his brothers suprilall, and had also farre greater suspition of the Parthians by the solicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom hee had married. And although the rest made no account of her aduertisements, yet Herod gaue credit vnto her for that shee was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policie to make open assault vpon such a man) they deferred the whole matter vntill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their differents, Herod came vnto them, who rather giuing credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his aduersaries, as soone as it was night concluded to make vie of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those vncertaine dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause hee fled with those men of warre which hee had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister & his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) & her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her younger brother, with all their family and traine, he departed into Idumæa without suspition or suspicion of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or yron-hearted, who seeing such a pitifull spectacle could not be moued to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their country with tears & complaints : and that which I was worse, to leaue their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or rediess.

Herode commeth his friends in their flight.

Herod seeing his mothers chariot ouerturned is ready to murder himselfe.

Herod retiring towards Massada is assailed by the Parthians.

The Parthians spoile the citizens of Ierusalem, and destroy Masada.

But Herod mastered these mistortunes by his inuincible courage, and for that hee was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted euery one of them whom he met in the way to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrowe, for that by such meanes they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and securest conseruation depended: whereupon they for their parts induoured themselves to digest their griefes, according to Herodes exhortation. Meane while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himselfe, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which ouerturned and had almost slaine her; yea so much did this casuallie terrifie him (for feare least the enemy in pursuit should surprize him during these delays) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himselfe, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and stayed the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them & leaue them subiect to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his owne priuate interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions hee was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these wordes, which were spoken vnto him, as also for that he was ouertured by the multitude of those, who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking vp his mother, and doing her all the seruice that the time permitted, he followed on his way; and with the speediest and neerest meanes he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada; where in the way, hee oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwayes with victorie from them. The Iewes also were not in peace with him during this his flight; for scarcely had hee trauielled sixtie foulds out of the Citie, but that they assailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victorie, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto thorowe necessitie, but like a discreet, well furnished and valiant souldier. So that in the verie place where hee obtained that victorie against the Iewes (after such time as he was made king) he builded a most sumptuous palace, and neere vnto the same a citie which he called Herodium. Whilest hee remained at Bessa (a borough of Idumæa) Ioseph his brother came forth to meete him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no souldiers in pay, and the Castle of Massada (whether he pretended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause hee sent away many to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better dispatch of their iourney, he furnished them with victuals. As for himselfe hee tooke with him his most able souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the Castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their traine, to the number of eight hundred or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corne, water and other provisions necessarie, he went vnto Petra the chiefest Citie of Arabia. As soone as it was day the Parthians lacked all that which appertained to the Citizens of Ierusalem; and amongst other things they spoiled

A spoiled the palace; notwithstanding they meddled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to some three hundred talents. They left diuers other things behind them also that appertained to Herode, and especially that which had been transported into Idumæa by his mature providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the spoile of the City, but they foraged all the countrey round about, and rased Masada a very rich City. Thus Antigonus, brought backe into his countrey by the king of the Parthians, receiued Hircanus and Phaëlas that were prisoners: yet was he vehemently displeased, because the women had escaped, whom according to his promise he intended to haue deliuered with the money: and fearing least Hircanus thorow the fauour of the people should be reestablished in his kingdom (who was then prisoner in the custody of the Parthians) he cut off both his eares, depriviing him by that meanes from enjoying the priesthood. B any more, by reason of that maiime, because the law commandeth that they who are in that dignitie, should be found in all their members. But Phaëlas is to bee admired for his great courage at this time: for understanding that hee must needly die, hee was no waies dismayed with death, but that which he held most miserable and dishonourable was, that he must needs dy by the hands of his enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not dispatch himselfe by other meanes, (because he was bound and chayned) he knockt out his owne braines against a stone, and so ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in such a desperate estate) depriviing his enemy of that power which he intended to practice in tyrannizing over him at his pleasure. It is said that the wound beeing very deepe, Antigonus sent priuily surgeons to cure him; and that vnder colour of healing him, they should put poison into the same, where through he might die. C But before Phaëlas gaue vp the ghost, he vnderstood by a certain woman that his brother Herod had escaped from his enemies: for which cause he ended his death with farre greater cheerfulness and constancy, seeing that he left behind him such a man, as would reuenge his death, and punish his enemies. But Herode was no waies discomforted with the greatnesse of those aduersities which enuironed him round about, but was the more whetted on to finde out new inuentions, and to aduenture dangerous attempts. For he went vnto Malchus king of the Arabians (to whome before time hee had shewed much curtesie) hoping to receiue the like of him in this time of his great necessity, and to draw some money from him either by loane or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleased him. For being ignorant of his brothers death, hee endeouored him selfe to raunsome him speedily from his enemies, by paying his raunsome D (which amounted to three hundred talents) and for that cause he led with him the sonne of Phaëlas, who was onely seauen yeeres olde, to leaue him in pledge amongst the Arabians for the summe that was demanded. But certaine messengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the kings behalfe to retire back againe, for that the Parthians had enioyned him that he should neither receiue nor retaine Herod. And this colourable pretence vied hee, because hee would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perswaded by the aduice of the greatest in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themselves masters of that treasure that Antipater had committed to their custodie. Herode answered them, that hee repaired not into their countrey to giue them cause of any trouble, but onely to consult with him about certaine matters of great importance touching his owne estate, and that after wards he was resolved to depart, and withdraw himselfe into Egypt as secretly as might be possible. Hee returned therefore to a certain temple, where hee had left diuers of his followers; and the next day hee came to Rhinocura in which place he heard tydings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himselfe of his ingratitude, and speedily sent after Herode, but he could not ouertake him: for he had gotten farre onwarde of his waie, and was already arrived in post neere to Pelusium: where being denied his passage to Alexandria in those ships that were there, he addressed himselfe to the magistrates of the place, who highly respected and honoured him, and sent him to the Citie where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithstanding could she not perswade him to remaine with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithstanding the winter and those greuous troubles that at the very same time afflicted Italie, as it was reported.) Embarking himselfe therefore to saile into Pamphilia, he was tossed with a most cruell storme; so that with great danger at last he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempest to cast into the sea a good part of his substance. There met hee with Sapphus and Ptolemy two of his indeared friends. Hee found also that the City of Rhodes had suffered much miserie by Cassius warres: and although his means were very scant, yet profited he them in what he might, and caused their walles to be repaired, notwithstanding that by so doing, he greatly hindred himselfe. After that, he caused a little frigote to bee built, and embarked himselfe with his friends to repaire into Italy, and arriued at Brundisium, and from thence went to Rome. The first to whom he discovered his misfortunes, was Marcus Antonius: to whom he reported all the occurrences in Iudæa, and how his brother Phasaelus was taken by the Parthians and slaine; and how Hircanus was imprisoned with him. The manner also how they had established Antigonus king, vnder promise to giue them one thousand talents, and fūe hundred of the fairest women, whom he intended to choofe out of his owne race. Lastly, how he stole away by night, and rescued them; and escaping his enemies hands, had afterwarde endured many paines and miseries. Furthermore, that his friends were in great danger, and left besieged; for which cause hee had sailed by winter, and despised all dangers, onely to seeke for assistance at his hands, on whom depended his hope, and last refuge.

CHAP. XXVI.

Herode is made King of Iury by the Romane Senate.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 23. al. 25.
Antonius loved Herod, & hated Antigonus.
Cæsar Augustus Herods friend.

Antonius hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herode, had compassion of his misery (bethinking himselfe of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subiect to no lesse casualties) and the rather was hee induced to doe him good, both in remembrance of the friendship hee had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certaine summes of money, if so be hee were made King by his meanes, as he had beene before time declared Tetrarch. But that which most moued him hereto, was the hatred which hee bare to Antigonus, whom hee accounted to be a mutinous man, I and an enemy to the Romane fortune. On the other side Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Ægypt in his fathers seruice, as also because of the good hospitality and kindnes that he had shewed him in all things; as in especiall to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected towards Herode. Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought forth Herode, and after they had prayed him, and recited the benefits which the Romane had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romane enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romane he had received the kingdome from the Parthians. Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian war, it were not amisse that Herode should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the loue and affection which Antonius bare vnto Herod, was, that hee not onely obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for neuer thought he that the Romane would grant that dignity vnto him, who were wont to refuse that honour to those of the kings blood; and therefore hee intended to haue demanded it for his wiues brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander Herode afterwarde put to death, as it shall be declared in place conuenient) but also for that within the terme of seauen dayes, he sent him out of Italy with the vnexpected titles of his felicitie.

As soone as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued forth, leading Herode betweene them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates went vp into the capitol to do sacrifice, and to place there this deciee the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods raigne Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundred eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the yeare wherein C. Domitius Caluinus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Meane while Antigonus besieged those that were in the castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Ioseph Herods brother that was within, and two hundred of his friends, had concluded to flie vnto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malechus had repented himselfe of the fault he had committed against Herode. But whilest they stood vpon these tearmes, God powred downe a huge raine on a certaine night, that in short time filled their cisternes in such sort, as that they had no more necessity to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water betell them by Gods providence, they made a solemn vow to their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus soldiers after such a manner, sometime in open field, sometime by covert assault, that they slue a great number of them. At that time Ventidius a Romane captaine was sent into Syria to driue the Parthians from thence, & after their departure he arriued in Iury, making shew that he would assist Ioseph: but in effect al his pretence was to draw draw money from Antigonus. Being therefore encamped nere vnto Ierusalem, and hauing drawn sufficient money from Antigonus, he retired himself with the greater part of his forces: and to the intent his deceitfull dealing might not be discovered, he left Silo with a companie of his soldiers: who likewise was honoured by Antigonus, for feare least he should be cause of some new trouble before such time as the Parthians, whose coming he expected, should yeld him aide.

CHAP. XXVII.

Herode that Herode was come from Italy by sea to Ptolemais, and that he had assembled no small number of souldiers both strangers and his own countymen, he marched forward against Antigonus, and passed thorow Galilee. Silo and Ventidius also gaue him assistance in this action, hauing received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they should assist Herod to recouer his country. But Ventidius was employed in appeasing the troubles that were raised in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo hee kept in Iudæa, hauing beene corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the country, the more & more increased his forces; and all Galilee (except a very few) submitted themselues vnto him. Whilest therefore hee marched forward towards Massada, (being urged thereunto in that hee was to relieue his parents that were besieged therein) the Citie of Ioppe would not graunt him passage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: so that it behoued him first of all to ruinate the same, to the end he might leaue no retreat or place of rescous for his enemy on his backe; if so be he made towards Ierusalem. Vpon which occasion Silo laying holde, & slodged his armie and made thitherwarde: whom when the Iewes did pursue, Herode sallied out with a small company, and put them to flight, and saued Silo, notwithstanding he fought very coldly and cowardly. Afterwarde being seized of Ioppe, he hastened onwards to deliuer his friends that were besieged in Massada; but part of the inhabitants submitted themselues vnto him for the friendship they had borne vnto his father; an other sort of them, for the honour that they bare vnto him: the rest admitted his gouernment in acknowledgement of those benefits they had received from them both. But the greatest part was thereunto moued by the hope they had conceiued of their new elected king, and the confirmation of his gouernment. Thus by these meanes was his army mightily increased.

Whilest thus he marched forward, Antigonus seized those places that were fittest to lay ambushes in, or to fight at aduantages by the way (notwithstanding that by those meanes and stratagems he did but small or no hurt at all to his enemy: so that Herode raised the siege, & discharged his friends out of the Castle of Massada: and after he had taken the fort of Refsa he approached Ierusalem being attended by Siloes army, and by diuers Citizens of the Citie, who were afraid of his power. And when as he had pitched his camp to the westward of the Citie, those that kept the warch and guard on that side, shot their arrowes and cast stones against him: diuers likewise trouped forth and fought hand to hand against those that were planted there: For which cause first of all Herode caused proclamation to be made round about the walles, signifying vnto them that he resorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the conseruation of the city, without intent of reuenge or memory of any wrongs that his priuate enemies had offered him, promising his most free pardon to all those whoeuer had hainously offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this answer (turning his speeche to Silo and the Roman soldiers) that contrary to all iustice they gaue the kingdome to Herode, who was a priuate man, and an Idumean (that is to say, a halfe Iewe) whereas it hath beene a custome to bestowe the same on them that are of the line of the Priests. For albeit at that present they were displeased with him, for that hee was seized of the kingdome by the meanes of the Parthians, and had reloued with themselves to dispossesse him; yet that there were diuers others of that royall race, who might be made kings according to the law, who haue now waies misdeemed the themselves towards the Romane; and moreover there are Priests, who should not be iustly and vprightly dealt withall: If they should be deprived of that honour which appertaineth vnto them. Whilest they debated the matter after this manner betweene them, and grew to hot and iniurious taunts the one against the other, Antigonus commaunded his men to assaile those that were nere vnto the wall: who shooting manie arrowes with great courage against them, draue them easly from the tower they kept.

The yeare of the world, 3927, he foretold his birth 37. Silon subor- with some of his souldiers to take an occasi- on to depart from Ierusalem. Herod procured and furnished the army with victualls and abundant munition.

Antigonus sendeth out souldiers to supply Herodes with victualls.

The Romans sent to their garrisons to winter.

Robbers.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and overcometh them, & bringeth all Galilee vnder his subiection.

Antigonus refuseth to victualle the Roman army.

Ventidius sendeth Silon to warre against the Parthians.

At that time Silon gaue manifest prooffe that he had been corrupted by money: for he subor- G ned diuers of his souldiers, who cried out that they had want of victualls, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requested that they might be placed in some convenient gar- risons to winter in, for that the places round about the Citie were desolate; because all necessaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and wasted by Antigonus souldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; so that each of them prepared themselves to dislodge. But Herode importuned and cried out vpon the Caprains and Souldiers that were vnder Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Cæsar, Anthony and the Senat of Rome had fed thither: That for his owne part hee would giue order that they should haue abundance and foison of whatsoeuer they demanded: and incontinently departing from them (after he had presented them with this request) he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight: for hee H caused an incredible quantitie of victualls to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them come, wine, oile, carrell, and all other such prouision from Iericho, to the end that from that time forward the souldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof; so that he incontinently sent men thorowout the countrey, who might intercept and surprize the purueiours and victualers. Who following Antigonus commandement, assembled a great number of souldiers neere vnto Iericho, and encamp in the mountaines, elyped and watched those that brought the victualls. Meane while Herode laie not still, but tooke with him tenne companies, five of Roman souldiers, and five of Iewes, with whom he intermixed some forraigne souldiers, with some fewe horsemen, and came to Iericho; where being arriued hee seized the towne, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whome I five hundred with their wiues and children were retired into the tops of the mountaines, whom hee tooke, and afterwards set at libertie: but the Roman souldiers, entring into their houles, & finding them full of all sorts of moueables, they spoiled the same. And the king hauing left a gar- rison in Iericho, returned to his owne place, dismissing the Roman army to goe and winter in the countreies lately surrendred vnto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also purchased this fauour at Silons hands by store of bribes, that part of his army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to currie fauour with Anthony.

Whilest thus the Romans liued in all abundance and bare no armes; Herode would not bee still, but sent his brother Ioseph into Idumæa, with one thousand footmen, and foure hundred horse; and him selfe resorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who be- K fore time were departed out of Massada. After this hee went into Galilee to surprize certaine castles which were held by Antigonus garrisons, & being arriued at Sephoris (during a great snow) after that Antigonus garrisons were departed out of the foresaid castles, hee found great abundance of all sorts of necessarie munition. And there hauing notice of certaine theeuës, who inhabited in caues, he sent a troupe of horsemen, with three companies of footmen, against them: whom he commanded to doe iustice on those robbers (now the place where they kept, was not farre from a borough called Arbela:) and forty daies after, hee him selfe with all his army resorted thither. Now whereas the enemy issued out against him with a hardy resolution; the left wing of his Squadron retired and fainted; but hee comming on with his maine battell put them to flight, who were already almost masters of the field, and made thole of his followers that fled, L to turne their faces; and to pursue their enemies as farre east as the flood Iordan: who fled some of them by one way, some by another; so that hee drew all Galilee vnder his subiection, except those that inhabited and held the caues. Hee distributed money also amongst his souldiers, and gaue each souldier a hundred and fiftie drachmes, and farre more vnto their chieftaines; and afterwards sent them to winter in garrisons neere at hand.

About this time Silon and his captaines, who had passed the winter in the said garrisons, came vnto him for that Antigonus would no more furnish them with victualls: for he gaue them main- tenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding thole that dwelt round about them to spoile the countrey, and afterwards to retire themselves into the mountaines, to the end that the Romans might be destitute of necessary maintenance, and by that means might bee consumed M with famine. Herode gaue Pharorus his youngest brother the charge of that prouision, commanding him to inclose the fort of Alexandria with a wall, who speedily brought a passe, that the souldiers had all sorts of necessaries at commandement: hee redified also the fort of Alexandria on which had beene laide desolate. About this time Anthony loorned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who hauing sent for Silon to accompany him against the Parthians, did put all charge him to assist Herode in that warre: and afterwards to excite the prouinciall confederates

The yeare of the world, 3927, he foretold his birth 37. Herod & Rufinus, cha. 15. Herod leadeth his souldiers against those theeuës that held the caues: Herod leueth downe his souldiers from the top of the mountaine in cofers.

A certaine old man killeth his wife and teauen of his sons, and at last casteth him selfe headlong from the rocke.

Herod retireth toward Samaria to fight with Antigonus.

Herod punisheth the rebels in Galilee. Ventidius overcometh Pacorus and the Parthians in battell.

Macharas killeth many Iewes.

Herod resoluing to depart to Antonius, and to accuse Macharas is reconciled by him, and lea- ueth his brother to Ioseph with an armie behind him.

A to further his war. But Herod dismissing Silon and his company to follow their destinated wars with Ventidius, did in his owne person lead out his souldiers against those theeuës that liued in dens. Now these caues were situate in the most highest and inaccessible mountaines, impregnable thorow narrow pathes, enuironed with sharp rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited secretly, with all their families. King Herod caused a certaine number of cofers to be made, fastned to yron chaines, which he caused to be let downe by an engine from the top of the mountaine (because it was neither possible by reason of the steepnesse of the hill to ascend the same from beneath, neither from above to creepe downward against them.) These chests were filled with souldiers, armed with great hookes to draw these theeuës vnto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottom. But the vse of these cofers was dangerous, for it was necessary to let them downe an infinite depth into the caues, especially for that the theeuës had necessary munition among them: notwithstanding where they had gotten down, none of the theeuës durst peepe out of the mouthes of their caues, but feare constrained them to hold themselves quiet. But a certaine souldier, hauing girt his sword by his side, and taken hold of the chaine with both his hands whereto the coffer was fastened, slidde downe as farre as the entry of the caue: & being displeased that no one issued out, hee shot diuers arrowes at those that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hooke he drew those vnto him who resisted him, and tumbled them downe headlong from the steepy rocke: which done, hee rushed in vpon those that were within the caue, and slew many of them, and afterwards returned and rested him selfe in his cofer. Diuers hearing the grones of those that were wounded, were surprized with teare C and despaire of their life: but the nights approach was the cause that the matter was not fully achieved, and many of them (receiuing notice of the kings free pardon by a herald) submitted themselves. The next day they renewed and continued the same manner of fight, and diuers issued out of their cofers to fight vpon the outward entrances of the caues, into which they cast fire, which (for that there was great quantity of wood in the caues) did quickly burne. Within these caues there was a certaine olde man apprehended, with his wife and seauen sonnes: who being required by them that he would suffer them to go & submit themselves to their enemies, took vp the entry of the caue, and as his sons advanced themselves to issue out, hee slew them, vntill such time as he had massacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when he had cast their dead bodies downe the rockes, he threw him selfe downe headlong after them, preferring death D before seruitude. Yet before his death, he reuiled Herod in bitter words, and vbraided him of his obscurity and ignoble race: and although Herode (who sawe all that which had happened) stretched out his hand vnto him and promised him pardon; yet would he not respect him; and by this meanes were all these caues entered, and the theeuës therein taken.

Now when the king had established Ptolomey captaine ouer the souldiers in that region, hee retired him selfe into Samaria, with six hundred horsemen, and three thousand footmen, with a resolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrel. But Ptolomey had but very slender successe in his gouernment: for they that before time had troubled the countrey of Galilee sallied out vpon him, and ouerthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Marishes and vnaccessible places, where they robbed and spoyle all the countrey. But Herode returning and E setting vpon them punished them: for he slew some of them, and the rest were constrained to fly into strong places, where he besieging them and entring their fortresses perforce, slew the men, and destroyed their fortifications: and hauing brought this rebellion to an end, hee condemned the Cities to pay him the summe of one hundred talents. Meane while, Pacorus was slaine in warre, and the Parthians were discomfited with him; which was the cause that Ventidius sent Macharas to succor Herode with two legions and 1000. horse, and that by the commandement of Antonius. But Macharas was drawn by Antigonus, who corrupted him with money: and notwithstanding Herods contradiction & disuasion, yet resorted he vnto him, alleging that he did it to looke into his actions. But Antigonus suspecting his sodaine approach, entertained him not; but caused him to be darted at and driuen thence, giuing him to vnderstand by his entertainmēt, F what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceiued plainly that Herode had giuen him good counsaile; and that him selfe had misdone in misbeleeuing his aduice: for which cause he returned to the City Emaus, and slew all those Iewes whom he met withall in the way, whether friends or enemies: so highly displeased was he at that which had hapned. Herode fore moued hereat, came to Samaria resoluing with him selfe to poste vnto Antonius to complaine of these aggressiues; considering that he had no need of such associates, who did him more harme then his enemies; whereas of him selfe he was able to make good his warre against Antigonus. But Machabes halted after him, requiring him to stay, and to travel no further on that journey; or if he might not be diuerted, he prayed him to leaue his brother Ioseph behind him, who might with them make warre against Antigonus. By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Machabes, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Ioseph behinde him, with an army; charging him no way to hazard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Machabes. As for himselfe he halted toward Anthony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a Citie situate neere vnto Euphrates) hauing with him an army of his associates both horsemen, and footmen. When Herod was arrived in Antioch, he found diuers men assembled there, who were desirous to go & seek out Anthony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for fear least certaine Barbarians should set vpon them, and kill them in their journey: these did Herod assure, and offered himselfe to be their guide vpon the way. Now when they came to their second baire, some two dayes journey off of Samosata, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred vp the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certaine horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in couert vntill such time as the passengers had recovered the Plaine. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some five hundred horsemen, suddenly charged Herod who was in the reeward; when as therfore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troupe that was about him incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers and whetted them on to the fight, hee wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turne their faces, and to fight; so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The king also pursued them so long, vntill at last hee recovered that which had been taken by them, which was a certaine number of sumpter horses and slaues. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountered him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and ouercame them; and killing diuers of them, he secured the way to those that folowed after, who al of them acknowledged him for their preseruer and guide.

When he drew neere vnto Samosata; Anthony sent out his army in goodlie array to meete and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soone as he came to Anthons presence, he entertained him kindly; and after hee had heard that which had befallen him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his vertue, and did him great honor, as to him whom a little before he had raysted to a royall dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendered the fort of Samosata to Anthony, and vpon this occasion the warre was ended. Whereupon Anthony committed the prouince with the army to Sossus; and after he had commanded him to succour Herode, he departed into Aegypt. Sossus therefore sent two legions of souldiers before into Iudaea to succour Herod, and afterwards hee followed with the rest of his army.

In the mean while Ioseph died in Iewry on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herodes commandement, which hee gaue him at such time as he repaired to Anthony, hee tooke to him five companies of souldiers which Machabes had left him; and marching towards Iericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his tents vpon the mountains: And for that the Roman troups were but newly leuied, & consisted of those men who were vntained in the warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Coelosyria: the enemies hauing aduertisement hereof, assayed and surprised him in certaine places of disaduantage, where there was a hot skirmish betwene them, in which Ioseph died, fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for sixe companies of them were slaine. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off Iosephs head, which Phaeroras his brother ranfomed for the price of fifty talents. Which done, the Galileans revoluing from their gouernours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that diuers commotions and troubles were raised in Iewry. Machabes he fortified the Castle of Geth. This misfortune of Iosephs was reported to the king, in a certain suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the tidings, had already conceived some suspicion and feare, grounded vpon certaine dreames, which gaue him certaine intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition; hee arrived neere to the mount Libanus, where hee tooke about 800. men with him, and a Roman legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolemais; from whence he departed with his army by night, & crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were ouercom by him, and shut vp in a fort, from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assayed them by breake of day: But being vnable to offer them any preiudice, by reason of the indisposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages neer adioyning. But when Antoni

Herod besiegeth Ierusalem.
Herod repairth to Samaria to marrye Alexander daughter.

A second legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were dismayed, and forooke the same by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Iericho, with an intent to reuenge his brothers death; and being encamped neere vnto the same, he banqueted and entertained the chieftaines of his army; and after the feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himselfe into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loued the king: for the roofof the house where he had solemnized his feast fel down without hurt to any one whomsoever: for no man was left within it. Whence it came to passe, that each one perswaded himselfe that Herod was beloued by God; considering he had auoyded so great and v unexpected a perill.

The next day, sixe thousand of his enemies came downe from the toppes of the mountaines to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans, and their forelorne hope chased Herods souldiers with darts, and stones, who was himselfe also hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some souldiers, intending thereby to signifie vnto his enemies, that he had more men of warre then he needed. Pappus drew neer to Machabes the Roman captain: and as touching Herod he tooke five cities by force, and put some two thousand of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (hauing set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus; who was encamped in a borough called Isanas. Diuers that came from Iericho & Iury, submitted themselves to Herode, who drawing neere the enemy (who marched forward with great hardinesse) fought with him and ouercame him, and being inflamed with a great desire he had to reuenge his brothers death, he pursued them that fledde and shut them euen within their borough. The houses were incontinently filled with men of war, and diuers fled and hid themselves vpon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the roofes of the houses were beaten down, and he saw that all was filled with souldiers, whereby diuers were slaine by stones that were darted at them from aboue, and afterwarde cast and kild them by heapes: which was the most grieuous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those warres, to see an infinite number of bodies hidden one vnder another amidst the rounes of the houses.

This exploit of Herode did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected farre more worse fortune at his hands: For a man might haue seene them flie awaie in heapes; and had not a sodaine and forcible tempest fallen vpon them, the triumphant army of Herode had incontinently entered Ierusalem with assurance of victorie, which had made a final end of all that warre. For, Antigonus each day bethought him how to fly away, and to forsake the city. But for that it was already growen darke, Herod commaunded his souldiers to refresh themselves; and for that he himselfe was wearie, hee entred into his lodging to bathe himselfe: in which place he ouerwent a mighty misfortune, from which hee escaped by Gods prouidence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one only seruant to attend him) at such time as he bathed, there were a certaine number of armed enemies hidden in that lodging, who were fled thither for the feare they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the first amongst them issued with his naked sword and got the doore; and after him the second; and the third no lesse armed, without offending the king, for the feare that they had of his presence: and content to escape in their owne persons, without the preiudice of other men. The next day he sent Pappus head to his brother Phaeroras, who was slaine by his owne sword in reuenge of the iniury offered to Ioseph. When the tempest was done, he departed from thence, and approched neere to Ierusalem, and encamped neere vnto the Citie. This was about the third yeere since he was created king at Rome: and encamping himselfe in the place which was (as he thought) fittest for battery; he addressed himselfe towards the temple side, resolving to batter and make breach in that place in like manner as Pompey had done before him. Hauing therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he builded towers thereon by the assistance of many workemen; and by meanes of a great quantity of wood, which he caused to be cut down round about the place; and hauing pointed such men as were of ripe iudgement to ouersee these works, he left his army well prouided, and resorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus sonne to whom he was betrothed, according as I haue heretofore declared.

After this marriage was solemnized, Sosius repaired thither thorow the country of Phoenicia, & hauing first of all sent his army thorow the continent, he himself also resorted thither with many aswell footmen as horsemen: thither also repaired the king from Samaria, with no small army, to annexe himselfe with the olde bands: for hee had about thirtie thousand men. All these assembled themselves together neere vnto the walles of Ierusalem, and planted their siege nigh vnto the wall of the city that extendeth towards the northward. The army contained eleuen legions of footmen, with sixe thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came fro Syria. Of this army there were two generals, namely Sosius, who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod: and Herod himselfe, who made war for himselfe, with an intent that hauing dispossessed Antigonus (who he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) he himself might be king in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Iewes that were within the enclosure of the walles (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the temple of the Lord, and wishing all good happe and successe to the people, namely, that God would deliuer them from all dangers: and spoiling all prouision without the city, that was either behooeful for the vse of man or beast, by their secret thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of relief and victualls. Which inconuenience Herode so well preuented, that he forestalled their meanes of theft, and laide ambushes in place conuenient to cut them off. As for victualls he sent his footmen to fetch his prouision from farre; so that within a very little space they had abundance of all that which was necessary in the campe. He erected also with no lesse carefullnes three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of workmen: for it was sommer time, and neither was the aire incomodious, or negligence of the workmen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards hauing raised their engines vpon them, they battered the wall, vvith as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within; who for their parts vsed al the cunning that might be possible to defend themselves, and by diuers sallies set fire vpon the enemies engines; and burnt not onely those that were halfe made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessity draue them to handle strokes, they shewed no lesse valour then the Romans courage; but they were inferior vnto them in skill and martiall discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten downe, they builded vp a new, and countermined against those mines that were made by the enemy; so that they fought vnder ground hand to hand. Thus vsing despaire rather then courage, they sustained the war to the vttermost; yea notwithstanding they were besieged by a great army, and pressed by famine and want of victualls: for the yeere wherein the siege was continued, was the seauenth, in which the earth was vnnanured, which by vs is called the yeare of rest. But finally twenty chosen souldiers first of all mounted vpon the wall; and after them one of Sosius Centurions: for the first wall was taken in the fortieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were neere vnto the temple: which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Iewes. When the outward part of the temple, and the lower part of the city were taken, the Iewes fled into the temple, and into the higher towne, for feare they had least the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices vnto God: and they sent embassadours to their enemies, to require that it might be lawfull for them only to bring in certain beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their king granted the, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves & yeeld vp the places. But perceiving that his opiniõ failed him herein, & that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soueraignie in Antigonus, he gaue the assault, and tooke the City by force: where all things were incontinently filled with murders, in that the Romans were displeased because they had so long time continued the siege; and the Iewes that were on Herodes side enforced themselves vtterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party: so that continual slaughters ranged & raigned euery where, both in porches, & in the houses whereinto they entered: Neither did the religious reuerence of the temple saue those suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but that without all compassion both olde and young were slaughtered: Neither did their murdering hand spare or refraine from women; nay not so much as from young infants. And although the king besought and requested them to forbear them, yet no man gaue ouer, but all sorts of per-

A persons were murdered by them, without respect either of sex or age. Antigonus inconfid-ence of that estate wherein hee had beene, or the fortune and disaster that at that present attended him, came downe from the tower and humbled himselfe on his knees before Sosius seate; who hauing no compassion of the change of that estate wherein he sawe him, outragiously scor-ned him, calling him Madame Antigonus: yet left hee him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but fast bound for his further assurance. But Herode was busied in deuising how he might moderate his associates and straglers, after hee had had the vpper hand ouer his enemies: For the strangers swarmed into the Citie by heapes, and got onely into the Temple, but also into the Sanctuarie. Hee therefore exhorted some, and threatned other some, and restrained the rest by force of armes; and hee was more troubled at that present in begging a Conquerour, then if he had beene conquered: for that those things that were not lawefull to be seene were beheld by prophane men. He preuented likewise the spoile of the Citie, as much as in him laie: Beseeching Sosius most instantly, to preserve it to the vtmost, asking him if the Romans would leaue him king of a desert, after they had voided the Citie of men and goods? Allredging furthermore, that hee esteemed the gouernment of the whole world of no valew in regarde of the life of one of his Citizens. Sosius answered, that it was reason that the pillage should bee giuen to the Souldier, who had borne the hazard of the siege: wherunto Herod answered, that hee would satisfie euery man out of his owne treasure: and by this meanes, hee ranfomed the rest of the Citie by fulfilling those his promises: For hee gaue manie mightie giftes vnto euery one of the Souldiers, and by proportion vnto the Captaines; but C aboute all thee royally rewarded Sosius; so that euery one of them departed verie rich in siluer.

This calamitie hapned in the Citie of Ierusalem, in the yeere wherein Marcus Agrippa and and Canidius Gallus were Consuls, which was in the hundreth, fourescore and sitt Olympiade in the third moneth, on the dayes wherein the solemne fast was celebrated; as if this affliction had iumpt together in one issue and instant with that of Pompeius: for on the same day had the same Citie been taken twenty and seauen yeeres before. Sosius offered a crowne of golde vnto God, and afterwards departed from Ierusalem, leading Antigonus prisoner with him vnto Anthony.
But Herod fearing least if Antigonus should be kept by Anthony, and sent to Rome, hee should debate his title with him before the Senate by protest that hee was descended of the royall line; whereas Herode was but a Plebeian and common person: and that although he had of-D fended the Romans, and thereby might not deserue to bee King; yet at least his children, who were of the princely line, were not to bee denied their title: Herode I say, fearing these things, wrought so much by force of his money with Anthony, that he cauled him to put Antigonus to death; so that at that time Herod was truly deliuered from all feare. Thus ended the estate of the Asmoneans, after 120. and sixe yeeres. This family was famous both for their nobilitie, and also by reason of their Sacerdottall dignitie, and for the noble actions and exploitcs, which their ancestors had achieved for our nation; but they lost their authoritie thorow their mutual factions; which soueraignie was deriued to Herod Antipaters sonne, who was ignoble by birth, and of meane friends; who were subiects and vassals to kings. See here what we haue receiued from our

Ierusalem being taken by Sosius and Herod, Antigonus is healed by Anthonies commandement. Herod maketh away all his chiefe friends.

The birth of the world, 3930 before Christs birth

Herod preferreth his favourites, & killeth his enemies. The Pharisees honoured by him. Pollio his reprover of Herods tyranny.

IN the former booke I have declared how Sosius and Herode tooke the Citie of Ierusalem by force, & with it Antigonus prisoner: now will we also declare that which hath subseqently followed: for after that Herode had obtained the absolute government over the whole land of Iudaea, he advanced all those among the common people, who favoured his proceedings: as for those who were opposed against him, there passed not a day wherein some one or other of them suffered not punishment. But amongst the rest, Pollio the Pharisee, and Sameas his Disciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the siege of Ierusalem, they counselled the inhabitants to receive and entertaine Herod: for which cause he respected them accordingly. This Pollio in times past (when Herode was found guilty of death) foretolde Hircanus and the rest of the Iudges in way of exprobration, that being absolved by them he should one day justifie punishment on them all. Which prediction God in proceesse of time approved by the event: no sooner therefore became he master of Ierusalem, but hee gathered together all the rich household stuffe that was in the palace; and furthermore having spoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this meanes levied a great sum of golde and silver, he sent great presents to Anthony and his friends. Moreover he condemned five and thirtie of Antigonus principall and noblest favourites to death, setting straight watch about their doores, that none of them might be carried out vnder colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewise were troden vnder foote: and all the gold, silver, or jewels that was to be found amongst them, was carried to the king, and converted to his vse, so that there was no end of these miseries. For the covetousnesse of the conquerour (whole greedy and thirsting desire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on

A on whatsoeuer was theirs. And for that it was the seventh year, it necessarily came to passe that the land was left vnmanured: for wee are forbidden to sowe in this yeare. Anthony having taken Antigonus prisoner, resolved to keepe him in prison vntill the time of his triumph: But after he had received tidings that the nation of the Iewes were ready to innouate and rebel, and continued their good affection toward Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceived against Herode, he concluded with himself to take his head from him at Antioch: For the Iewes could scarcely containe themselves. Strabo of Cappadocia testifieth no lesse in these words. Anthony having brought Antigonus the Iewes to Antioch, caused his head to be cut off; and was the first among the Romans that hath caused a King to bee beheaded in this manner: supposing that the Iewes might neuer otherwise be induced to change their opinions, and receive Herode: yet this opinion of his was not answerable to equitie. For notwithstanding whatsoeuer impulsion he might devise, yet could they not be induced to call him King: in so high estimate and account he'd they their former king. But Anthony supposed that that infamy would obscure his renown, and lessen the generall hate that they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

As soone as the high Priest Hircanus (who was prisoner among the Parthians) heard that Herode had taken possession of the kingdome, hee returned backe vnto him, being deliuered after this manner following. Barzaphanes, and Pacorus princes of the Parthians had taken Hircanus, who was first high priest, and afterwards king, and with him Phasaelus Herodes brother, and led them away prisoners with them into their owne country: Phasaelus not able to endure the dishonour of imprisonment, and preferring an honourable death before a reprocheful & ignominious life, murdered himselfe, as I have heretofore declared.

CHAP. II.

How Hircanus dismissed by the Parthians, returned unto Herod.

Hirantes king of Parthia, vnderstanding how nobly Hircanus was descended, who was brought prisoner vnto him, entertained him graciously: and for this cause drew him out of prison, permitting him to conuerse in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Iewes, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no lesse then their high Priest and King. The like also did all they of that nation inhabiting as farr as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that hee was aduertised that Herode was possessed of the kingdome, hee transferred his hopes another way, beeing of his owne nature tenderly affected towards his friends, expecting that one day Herode would requite him for that hee had deliuered him from death wherunto he was condemned, and in danger likewise of the penalty and punishment. Hee began therefore to consult with the Iewes as touching his iourney; who in waite of duetie and loue came to visite him, and who besought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all seruice and honour: assuring him that he should in no lesse manner be respected among them, then their high Priest and King; yea in farre higher regard then hee might any waies be in his owne country, by reason of the maime hee had in his body thorow Antigonus tyranny: alleading that kings do not ordinarily call to their remembrance those pleasures that they haue received in their infant fortunes, because that with their estates they change both their manners and inclinations. But notwithstanding all these or such like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawne from the desire he had to repaire homeward. Herode also wrote vnto him, that he should requite Phraates and the Iewes that inhabited his kingdome, in no sort to enuie his felicity, in that he should partake with him both in dignitie and royaltie, alleading that the time was now come wherein he might acknowledge the benefites he had received, by being heretofore nourished and preferred by him. With these letters he sent Samaralla likewise on an embassage to Phraates furnished with great & rich presents, endeavouring by that meanes to winne him, that hee in no sort should hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had so highly deserved at his hands; yet were not his protestations answerable to his pretence. For inasmuch as he gouerned not with that vprightnesse, which became a iust king, he feared least some alteration might befall him, according to his demerites: for which cause he sought to get Hircanus vnder his power, or at leastwise to dispatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perswaded the Parthian to dismisse Hircanus, and the Iewes to furnish him with money sufficient to beare his expence in his iourney, he received him with all honour. In common assemblies he gaue him alwaies the highest place, and in the time of

of festiuals, he made him alwaies sit downe before him; and the more closely to deceiue him, he called him brother, endeavouring himselfe by all means wholly to extinguish in him all colour & cause of suspicion of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any waies further or promote his cause, and yet by these meanes occasioned he no small sedition in his owne family. For carefully providing least any one among the nobilitie should be established high Priest, he sent to Babylon for a certaine man of base condition called Ananel, and gaue him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew sodainly displeased, not being able to endure that outrage. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was king Aristobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautiful who was called Aristobulus; the other was Mariamme, who was likewise faire, and married to Herode. Shee was sore moued and highly displeased to see her sonne so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Priesthood: for which cause she wrote vnto Cleopatra by the means of a certaine Mufition, beseeching her to beg the high Priesthood at Antonius hands for hir sonne. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suites, a certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Iury about certaine of his affairs, & who had seene Aristobulus, fell in loue with him by reason of his beautie: and being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariammes admirable beautie, hee openly protested that he accounted Alexandra a happie mother in her children: and desiring to this effect with her, he perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius, for that if hee should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing, wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures vnto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderful, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendered of no mortal fraine, but by some diuine power, labouring as much as in him lay that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill becomming him to send for Mariamme, who was married to Herode, and desirous likewise to auoid Cleopatras suspicions, wrote vnto Herod that vnder some honest pretext he should send Alexandras sonne vnto him (with this addition, if it might not seeme troublesome vnto him.) Which matter when Herod vnderstood, he thought it no waies incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a faire young man, and little more at that time then sixteen yeeres old, and so nobly borne: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that, was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without feare of punishment in regard of his greatnesse and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the young man should but onely depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with warre and troubles, for that the Iewes pretended alteration in government, and sought to inuocate by preferring a new king. When as therefore he had in this sort excused himselfe vnto Antonius, he resolved to entertaine both the younger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreover his wife Mariamme did continually importune him to giue the priesthood to her brother, alleging that by that honour he might preuent the occasion of his trauell. For which cause assembling his friends together in counsell, he greuously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the kingdom: and that by the mediation of Cleopatra, shee laboured to dispossesse him of the foueraignty, to the intent that her sonnes by Antonius means might gouerne in his stead. Which practice of hers was so much the more vniust, because shee deprived her owne daughter of that honour wherein she was intreated, and raised vp troubles likewise in that kingdom which hee had conquered with great trauel, and extreme danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgot that which was past, and forgave those wrongs the had vraged against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindness & courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore, he gaue the high priesthood to young Aristobulus, alleging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was vnder yeeres.

After that he had thus seriously and consideratly discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and the consistorie of his friends; Alexandra almost beside her selfe, not only throw the ioy she had conceiued by this unexpected good fortune, but also for the feare she had to be suspected, began to defend her self with teares & protestations, saying that all whatsoever shee had either practised or done, was to prefer her son vnto the priesthood whom the law dishonored; but as touching the kingdom that shee had neuer pretended, neither would (if so be she should be presented therewith) receive the same, thinking her selfe for the present sufficiently honoured both for that the law Aristobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receiue, in that he was lifted red vp in dignitie about the rest. Being therefore overcome by those merits, shee accepted willingly the honour for her sonne, and shewed her selfe obedient in all things, requesting him that if shee had committed any thing rashly and thorow inconsideration of passion, either in respect of her children, or in vnbridled cariage of her tongue, hee would be pleased to pardon her. After these debates and interchangeable discourses on either side, they shooke hands the one with the other, in token of a more fixed and vnfaigned friendship then was before, burying (as they then pretended) all euill suspicion or cause of vnkindnes.

CHAP. III.

B Herode preferreth Aristobulus, his wife Mariammes brother, to the Priesthood; and afterwards putteth him to death.

Ereupon Herode took away the Priesthood instantly from Ananel, who was not that countriman borne (as wee haue heretofore declared) but was borne amongst those Iewes that inhabite & were planted beyond Euphrates by the Assyrians. For diuers thousand Iewes inhabite the countrey of Babylon, & from thence rooke he his originall also, being otherwise of the race of the Priests, & intirely affected toward Herode for a long time before, with whom he had familiar acquaintance. Hee had preferred him to this honour at such time, as he was made king; & degraded him likewise to appeale the troubles of his familie, demeaning himselfe herein contrary to the law of the countrey: for whereas any one hath once been installed in that degree, he is neuer to be displaced. The first that transgressed this ordinance was Antiochus Epiphanes, who dispossessed Iosuah, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The second was Aristobulus, who took it away from his brother Hircanus, & vsurped it himselfe. Herode was the third, who gaue the priesthood to Aristobulus establishing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this meanes supposing that he had found out a remedie to appeale the discords of his family, hee notwithstanding all this liued not without suspicion what euent would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, least demeaning her selfe in such sort as before time shee had done, shee should seeke occasion hereafter to raise new troubles. He commanded her therefore to containe her selfe within the royall palace, and to doe nothing of her owne authoritie. Besides that he had appointed certaine intelligencers, who should diligently obserue that nothing should be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exasperated her hate and encreased the same against Herode; for being full of feminine pride, hee disdained to see her selfe thus wrongfully suspected, desiring rather to suffer any thing, then to be deprived of the liberty of free speech; and vnder colour to be honoured, to liue continually in seruitude and feare. Whereupon shee sent certaine of her trustie friends to Cleopatra to complaine, & lament vnto her the importable miseries of her present estate; requiring her, according to her power, to giue readie and speedy reliefe. Whereupon Cleopatra lent her worde, that both shee and her sonne should resort vnto her into Egypt, with as great secrecy as might be possible. Vpon which aduice and the allowance thereof, shee practised this policie. Shee caused two coffins to be made, such as men were wont to bury the dead in, in which shee hid both her selfe and her sonne, commanding those seruants of hers that were priuie to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their course directly towards the sea, where there was a barge in readines prepared to shape their course, & convey them into Egypt. But Elop one of her household seruants declared this enterprise of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, supposing that he had beene made priuie thereto: who had no looser thinking thereof, but (for that before times he was Herodes enemy, by reason he was suspected to haue beene one of those that sought to poison Antipater) he determined by discovery of this secret flight, to conuert Herodes here into assured friendship: and presently discovered Alexandras secret enterprise to the king. Who dissembeling the matter vntil it was vpon the point of execution, surprised her at such time as she thought to fly, and yet notwithstanding he pardoned her that fault (in which she durst not decree any punishment against her, though hee could haue found in his heart to haue vied seueritie) for that Cleopatra would not haue contained her selfe, had shee but had such an occasion offered her to expresse her hatred against Herode. For which cause vnder the colour of a high and magnanimous spirit, hee made shew to pardon her of his meere clemencie: yet inwardly resolved hee to make yong Aristobulus away: yet not rashly vpon the instant, least the act should grow apparant and palpable.

Now the feast of Tabernacles was at hand, which was one of those that was ceremoniously and solemnly celebrated among vs; for which cause he concealed his intents during the festiual daies, intending both in himselfe and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kinde of pleasure and delight; yet did his enuie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seuentene yeere olde, who at such time as he approached the altar to offer sacrifices, according to the lawe, apparelled in the high priests ornaments to performe the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and goodly stature surpassed the yongnes and tendernes of his yeeres) expressing in his countenance the dignitie and nobilitie of his race, drew the eyes and good affection of all the people vnto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people therefore being furred by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the ioy they conceived, they brake out by little and little into happie acclamations, mixed with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobulus discovered it selfe openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herode concluded to execute that which he had heretofore comploted, & conceived against Aristobulus. As soone therefore as the feast was ouerpast, he sojourned in Iericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he vsed Aristobulus with all kindnes, to the end to draw him vnto some place, where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfaising to sport, after the fashion of the youngmen, to gratifie him. Now, for that the place where they disported themselves was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied, left their sport, & went out together to take fresh ayre, and recouering a pleasant shade vnder certaine arbors, and I neere certaine fishpooles which were largely spread round about, they beheld certaine of their seruants and friends that swomme therein, with whom not long after Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herode. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murder) laid hands of him and thrust him vnder the water, pretending to duck him in sport, and neuer gaue him ouer vntill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This hapned about the evening, and after this manner died Aristobulus, after hee had liued in all for the space of eightene yeeres, and administered the priesthood one whole yeere: & after this, Ananell presently recouered his former dignitie.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were sodainly deuoured in teares, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent ouer the dead body. All the citie also was marueilously amated, neither was there any private family that thought not it selfe touched by this inconuenient, but imagined the losse in particular to concerne himselfe, and no other. But aboute all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deede, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomforted, for that shee knew how all things had hapned. But the feare of a farre greater mischiefe constrained her to repress her passion, in such sort, that diuers times she was ready to bereaue her of her owne life; & dispatch her selfe out of misery with her owne hands. But shee contained her selfe, to the end, that suruiuing (and liuing after her sonne, who was so traiterously and fraudulently slaine, and prolonging her owne life without giuing any suspicion or shadow, that she supposed her sonne to be thus cursedly murdered) shee might with more opportunity expect the occasion to reuenge her selfe: For which cause, shee dissembled all things, gouerned her griefe, and made shew that shee knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all meanes to perswade the strangers, that this death had befallen Aristobulus without his knowledge; and did not only prepare that which was requisite for the funerall, but vext himselfe likewise, & made shew of a man truly deuoured in his sorrow: and it may be that in remembrance of Aristobulus beauty and flourishing young yeeres, he was truly touched with compassion, notwithstanding that he imagined that this death of his should be a means of his intire security, demeaning himselfe in all things very circumspectly, with intent to purge himselfe of that crime. But especially he shewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furnishing and preparation of the herse, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in such sort as the griefe which the Ladies had conceived, was pacified after this maner of consolation.

Cleopatra thisling after the kingdome of Arabia and Iewry, labourerth to beg a part of them at Anthonies hands.

BUt none of all these things could either moue or mollifie Alexandra, but that daily more and more she increased her sorrow, and in the heart of her teares kindled her wrath and hate with a desire of reuenge. She therefore certified Cleopatra by her private letters of Herodes treasons, and her sonnes most miserable and vntimely death. Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assit her, and hauing compassion of her

B miserie, vnderooke the matter, and ceased not to incite Anthony to reuenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an unpardonable error, that Herode being created king in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should be suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true & lawfull kings. Anthony perswaded by these her words (as soone as hee came vnto Laodicea) sent for Herode, to the end that making his appearance, he might answer that which might be objected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for he disliked the act, notwithstanding that Herode himselfe had attempted it. But although Herode was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that shee ceased not continually to prouoke Anthony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himselfe thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise doe) notwithstanding hee left his vnle Ioseph behind him, committing the gouernment both of the kingdome & his private estate vnto him, giuing him secret instructions to kill Mariamme, if so bee that Anthony should happen to doe him any mischiefe. For hee loosed her so extremely by reason of her beauty, that he supposed himselfe iniured, if after his deceale she should be beloued by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befel him, proceeded from Anthonies passion and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had before time heard some report. As soone therefore as hee had in this sort disposed his affaires, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Anthony.

But Ioseph gouerning that kingdome that was committed to his hands, conuersed diuers times vpon this occasion with Mariamme, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publique profit sake, but also to doe her that honour which so great a princeesse deserved. At such time therefore as hee secretly deuised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herode bare vnto her, his speeches were iested at after the maner of Ladies, but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Ioseph, being ouer-forward to expresse the kings good will towards her, proceeded so farre that he discovered the commandement that was giuen him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herode to liue without her, and that if any inconuenient should happen vnto him, he would not in death also be disioyned from her. This discourse of Iosephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herodes malignitie; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted that which he had spoken, as the testimonie of his tyrannous & malicious hart. At that time there was a rumour spread in the citie of Ierusalem, by Herodes maligners, that Anthony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the kings house were troubled, and in especiall the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Ioseph to forsake the place, and take the Ladies, and to retire himselfe vnder the ensignes of the Roman legion, who at that time were about the citie for the securitie of the kingdome, vnder the conduct of the Tribune Iulius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the kings house, they might bee by this meanes in securitie, hauing the Romans to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Anthony should see Mariamme, shee might obaine all things at his hands whatsoeuer shee desired, assuring him that he would restore the kingdome vnto her, and depriue her of nothing that concerned, or was answerable to her royall estate.

Herodes death.

But whilst they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herode, contrary to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soone as he came vnto Anthony, he compassed his ioy by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Ierusalem, and sodainly debating the matter with him, hee appeared him in such sort, as he was no more displeased against him; and from that time forward, Cleopatras speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Anthony said, that there was no reason that a king should be any wretched for that which he had done in his kingdome; for that in so doing, he should no more be king: but that when the honour is once giuen him, hee hath the authoritie likewise left him, to vse his regall power. Vrging further, that it concerned Cleopatra G likewise her selfe, not to search too curiously into the affaires and gouernment of kingdomes. Herode certified all this by his letters, and signified further, what other honours hee had receiued at Antonies hands in assemblies and feasts, to which he inuited him alwaies, notwithstanding that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detraacting him; and being desirous to get the kingdome of Iewry into her hands, stroue by all meanes possible to put him to death: but that he had found Anthony alwaies an vpright man, and feared not henceforward that any euil should befall him: and returning presently vpon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Antonies most assured affection, both in respect of his owne kingdome, as of his particular affaires. And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seeke any further then that which she had, because that Anthony had giuen her Cœlofryia in steed of that which shee had demanded, forbear-ing thence forward to mention Iewry any more, because Anthony wholly reiecteth those suites.

After these letters came vnto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were, and their desire to retire vnto the Romans, as if Herode had been dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet was not this their resolution hidden from the king; but that Herode after he had brought Anthony on his way (who at that time fer forward in his warres against the Parthians) hee returned into Iewry. Vpon his arriuall, his sister Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexan-dras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewise spake against Ioseph her husband, and slandered him, obiecting against him that he had had Mariammes company. All which she spake thorow the malice shee had long time conceiued against him, for that in a certaine debate Mariamme had in her rage despitefully hit them in the teeth with their obscure birth. Herode (who was alwaies inflamed with the earnest affection which hee bare vnto his wife Mariamme) was sodainly troubled herat: and although iaculousie pressed him forward, yet loue restrained him and kept him from doing any thing rashly, thorow passion or affection: for which cause hee called Mariamme aside, and demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Ioseph? Shee by solemne oathes and by all possible allegations in her owne defence appealed the king by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in such sort was he transported with the loue that he bare vnto his wife, that he beleueed shee had sufficiently purged her selfe of those slanders, that had been inforced against her; yeelding her most hartie thanks for her honest affection towards him, and declaring vnto her openly the great esteeme and loue that he bare vnto her. Finally (as it often falleth out amongst louers) they fell to teares, and embraced each other with great affection: and for that she gaue him no credit, he endeouored the more to draw her to beliefe. Whereupon Mariamme said vnto him: It is not the act of a louer to haue giuen commandement, that if any thing should befall thee otherwise then well with Anthony, I should presently be done to death with thee; and notwithstanding I haue no waies offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the king entred into a strange passion, and giuing ouer his embraces he cried out with a loud voice and tore his haire, saying, that hee had a most euident proofe that Ioseph had committed adulterie with her: for that he would not haue discovered those things which had been spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted the one the other: and in this emotion or rage of iaculousie hardly contained he himselfe from killing his wife. But the force of loue ouercame him so much, that he bridled his rage notwithstanding it were irre-uerent and grievous vnto him. Yet gaue he order that Ioseph should be slaine without either audience or iustification of his innocencie: and as touching Alexandra, who was the cause of all these troubles, he kept her prisoner.

About the same time there grew certaine troubles & alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually solicited and importuned Anthony, and whetted on his displeasure against all, persuading him to remooue all from their gouernments, and to bestow the same on her selfe. And for that Anthony loued her extremely, shee was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her owne nature inclined to couetousnesse, shee abstained from no kinde of corrupt dealing and wickednesse. For knowing that the kingdome should descend vnto her brother, she caused him to be poisoned, when as hee was but fifteene yeeres olde: as for her sister Asinœ, she caused her to be slaine by Antonies meanes at such time, as shee made her prayers in the temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreouer, in what place soeuer shee vnderstood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of temples, or in breaking open sepulchers, she would be possessed thereof: neither was there any religious place so sacred, from whence shee tooke not away the ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing so prophane and interdicted, which

A she laid her hands on to satisfie her vnbridled auiditie: Neither was the whole world sufficient enough to content this magnificent lady, who was made slave to her owne desires, and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satiate & fill the same.
For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be himselfe towards her:
and therefore entering into Syria with him, shee presently beehought her selfe how she might get it into her possession. For shee caused Zysanias Protomechus sonne to be put to death, obiecting against him that he had priuie intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Iury also at Antonius hands, & required him besides that, to dispose of the kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman that he seemed not onely to be bewitched with her words, but also enchanted by her poisons, to obey her in whatsoever she thought meet: yet was he ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquitie, for feare lest being so farre ouer-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in matters of Cleopatras progresse in Iudea.

C After that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make war in Armenia: she returned back againe, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last rooke her progresse into Iurie: Where King Herode met with her, and assured that portion which had beene giuen vnto her in Arabia, with all the reuenewes of Iericho, vnto her. This country bringeth forth that balme, which of all other ointments is the most precious, and onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bignes of great Dates. Being arrived in that place, & grown inwardly familiar with He-rode, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, being of her selfe naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and happily also being somewhat touched with loue, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) shee in this sort laid the foundation to intrap him vnder colour to reuenge her selfe of some outrage by that meanes. But in effect she generally manifested, that shee was ouercome by her desire and sensuall lust. But Herode was not ouer kindly bent towards Cleopatra, knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time hee conceiued the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: & although that from the beginning he had reiecteth her solicitations, yet determined he to reuenge himselfe on her, if so be by these her subtil underminings she should prosecute & continue her subtil policies to betray him. He asked counsaile also of his friends, whether hauing her in his possession, he should put her to death. For in so doing all those should be deliuered from diuers euils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouble. Moreover that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessitie should enforce him to make triall of her friendship. But whilest he debated E and discoursed vpon this resolution, his friends restrained and dissuaded him, assuring him that it was a great indignitie for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughty resolutions, to cast himselfe into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding it might be approved that it stood with his profit: nay rather that by this meanes hee should increaseth his desire, for that by force and subtiltie hee might seeme to haue lost her. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that she was the woman of greatest note and nobilitie of that time; and that what soeuer profit might redound vnto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius iniury. Whereby it most euidently appeared, how great and remediless damages would befall both to the kingdome & the kings family also; whereas nothing lered him by repulsing her vnlawfull demand to dispose all F things for the present state with great discretion. By these and such like reasons & probable coniectures, they deterred and dissuaded him from aduenturing vpon his apparant danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the leuying of such tribute, paid him for some little time two hundredth talents a yeere; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the halfe, and that also very negligently.

Aretas demeaning himselfe thus vngratefully, and refusing to doe that which in right hee ought to performe; Herode made a shew to take armes against him, but deferred his reuenge in regard of the contentions amongst the Romans. For at that time nought else was expected then the Actian warre (which fell in the hundredth, eighty and seuenth Olympiade) in which Augustus Caesar determined to trie his title with Antonius for the Monarchie. In the meane while Herod, who had already for many yeeres bene master of a peaceable and fruitfull countrey, fro whence he drew rich reuenues & many forces, gathered diuers companies of men, I with the greatest expedition that he might, to succour Antonius. But he by letters signified vnto him, that he had no need of his assistance: notwithstanding hee commanded him to make a road vpon the Arabian, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not only vnderstood by Herod himselfe, but also by Cleopatras aduertisements. For shee verie cunningly conceiued, that it would redound vnto her profit, if one of these two should ouerthrow the other. Herode according to these instructions from Antonius, returned backe into his countrey, and retained his armie alwaies readie about him, and incontinently with the same invaded Arabia, and with his forces both horsemen and footmen came directly to Diospolis, where the Arabians (hauing notice of his intended warre against them) came out to meete him. In this place fought they a most cruell battell, wherein at the last the Iewes had the vpper hand. After this, a great armie of Arabians assembled themselves at Cana, a certaine place in Coelesyria. Whereof when Herode was fore-aduertised, he marched forth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As soone as hee drew neere to Cana, he determined to incampe in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to set on the enemy vpon the first opportunity: but whilest hee employed himselfe in the execution hereof, all the armie of the Iewes cried out, requiring him without delay, to lead them forward against the Arabians. And thus highly were they encouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good administration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardnes, who had been actors in the former warre, and partakers of the victorie; so that they scarce gaue their enemy leasure to settle themselves to their weapons. When as therefore Herode perceived that the heat and forwardnes of the soldier could hardly be appeased; hee thought good to make vse of the readines of his army, & arming himselfe he marched formost, being seconded by his souldiers in battell ray, with a soldier-like march. This sodaine approach of his wonderfully abashed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head against them; yet perceiving their enemies full of heart, and themselves vnable to resist them, diuers of them retreated and betooke themselves to flight; so that all of them had bene verily defeated, had not Athenio endamaged Herode, and the Iewes. For hee hauing the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a priuy grudge towards Herode, disposed his army in a readines, and expecting the cue of the battell, resolved with himselfe to containe his forces, if the Arabians ouercame the Iewes; and if so be they had the worst (as indeed it came to passe) to set vpon the Iewes, who should be spent by that time; and surprising them at vnawares euen in the height of their hope of good happe, to massacre and slaughter them with his fresh supplies. When as therefore the Iewes had spent all their strength against their professed enemies, and expected nothing lesse then the assurance of the victorie, he charged and ouercame them who had retreated into certaine rough and difficult places (whereunto their enemies were better accustomed then themselves) where being grievously wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned backe and set vpon them,

From that time forth, Herod began to make certaine incursions and roades into Arabia, preying the countrey, and flooding therein much mischief: hee incamped himselfe likewise vpon the mountains, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field; notwithstanding by his diligence & industry in trauch, his labors were not fruitlesse; but that prevailing in some exploits, hee fought out all meanes to abolish & put away the ignominie of his former discomfiture.

At such times as Cesar and Anthony made triall of their titles in the Actian warre, and in the seventh yeere of the raigne of king Herod, there hapned such an earthquake in the countrey of Iudaea, that neuer the like was scene in any other place: so that diuers beasts were slaine thereby, & many men were ouerwhelmed with the ruines of their houses, and perished to the number of tenne thousand. Onely the men of warre received no damage, because they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were farre greater by report, then they were in effect, by such, who in fauour of the Arabians & hate of the Iewes, reported the same) waxed proud: yea so much was their courage increased hereby, as if all the Cities of Iewrie had bene already ouerthrowne, and the men thereof extinguished; and as if they had no aduersaries remaining alieue to contradict them. For which cause laying hold of those Embassadours of the Iewes, who came vnto them to intreat of peace in their desperate estates, they slew them, and afterwards in the heate of their spleen, fell vpon their enemies campe. But the Iewes not daring to expect or preuent their assault, for that their present miseries had delected their minds, seemed to neglect their common-weale, and in a manner to despaire of their safetie. These thus affected did the king encourage, and called vnto him their captiues, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reuiuing their drouping spirits; and when he had restored those of better hope, to more successful good hap, at length he attempted to speake vnto all the armie, who in the former ouerthrowes, wold yeeld no respect or allowance to perswasion. was so lightned; for that Anthony forbore to commit any thing that might draw vs to sedition.

Besides, after shee had wrought him by her solicitations to cut off certaine portions of the two kingdoms to be giuen vnto her, the matter was handled by me, that by diuers presents particularly bestowed vpon him by my hands, I haue obtained security for vs both; and by disbursing two hundred talents of mine owne, and giuing my word for two hundred more for others, for the reuenues of that very land which in times past was ours, & these now possesse and enioy. Nor withstanding, reason it was in my opinion, that wee charitie Iewes should not be tributaries, or giue any portion of our countrey to any man; and if we most heedly doe it, it will become vs to pay it for these, who enioy their liues by our meanes. I should not be reasonable for the Ara-bians, who after they had consented with many plausible propositions and thankgiuings, that they enioy their libertie by our benefit, to haue deprived and thrust vs from our own, & to haue vnjustly dealt with vs; yea euen with vs, I say, who were not their enemies, but rather on the cotrarie side their chiefest friends in the time of peace. And if fidelitie should be respected euen amongst those that are our most hated enemies, much more necessarily ought it to be obserued by those that are friends. But these men set light thereby, who think nothing honest, but that which is annexed with Lucre; and thinke no wrong vnexcusable, nor unpunishable iniurie that hath but a shew of profit. Is there any question then, whether wee should chastise these vnjust men by a iust warre? sith both God commandeth no lesse, and enioyneth vs alwaies to hate outrage, & reuenge iniustice, especially in that warre, which is not onely iust, but necessarie. For that which both in the confession of the Græcians, and opinion of the Barbarians is most hateful and hainous, this haue they perpetrated in murdering our Embassadors. For the Greeks say, that Embassadors are sacred and inuiolable, and wee our selues haue receiued our most wholesome and holiest precepts of the law of God by Angels, that is, from his Heralds and messengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enemy to enemy.

What impietie therefore is more unpardonable, then to put those Embassadors to death, who bring tidings of right and iustice? or what prosperity can they expect either in their warres, or felicitie in their whole liues, after so hainous a crime? Truly I cannot imagine any. But perhaps some man will say, that right and equitie is on our side; but that the greater number of men and meanes are with them: but this their speech is vnworthy of my followers. For with those, with whom iustice is, with those also is God: and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let vs wade further, & weigh our owne forces by themselves. In the first battell we had the victorie: in the second, vpon the first charge we put them to flight, & found them vnable to make their partie good against vs. Afterwards, when the victorie was ours; behold thenio, not by lawfull war, but by subtil treacherie assaulted vs. But shall this be called their fortitude, or rather their fraud and second iniurie? why therefore should we haue lesse courage, who ought to haue the greater confidence? or why should we feare them, who are alwaies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraude; and when they seeme to ouercome, they doe it by vniustice?

Moreover, if any man suppose them to be valiant, this should the rather incite them more and more vnto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble mind to overcome his inferi-our, but to haue meanes and might to conquer his superiour. And if any one be terrified by our domestick and homebred miseries, & by our late earthquake, first of all let him thinke vvith himselfe, that he erreth in that which deceiueth the Arabians, by supposing the same to be more grie-uous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becommeth them not to draw matter of feare from thence, whence the other tooke occasion of courage. For as touching themselves, they conceiue not any hope thorow any good that is in themselves, but onely in the trust they haue that wee are already delected by our calamities. But when they shall see vs march forth against them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this means shall be awakened, for that wee are not at this time to encounter with desperate men: For neither are wee ouermuch afflicted; neither (as some thinke) hath this miserie befallen vs thorow Gods displeasure, but these are the casualties of fortune. And if by the will of GOD these things are come to passe, it is marvell if by the same will our calamitie cease not; and that our punishment should not satisfie his displeasure. But that this present war is approved by him for iust, he himselfe hath euidently declared. For whereas diuers thorow the whole region, haue beene oppressed by the earthquake, none of you that beare armes haue incurred any mischiefe; but all of you haue been preserued, which is a manifest token of the will of God: and if your children and wiues had generally followed the warres as you doe, none of you should haue been wanting. When as therefore

A fore you shall haue bethought your selues of these things, and moreouer in regard that God hath at all times an especiall care ouer you; faile not to pursue this iniurious nation with a iust war, that neither respecteth the lawes of friendship, nor keepeth the league of couenant; valiant in murdering sacred Embassadors; and abieft and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour.

These perswasions of his did not a little encourage the Iewes to the battell, & made them more forward then before. As for Herode, after he had offered sacrifice, according to the custome, he drew his army forth, and led them with great confidence against the Arabians, and passing Iordane he encamped neere vnto the enemy, with an intent to surpris a fort situate betwene them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if vpon the present hee should be drawne forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place would serue him to encampe in with more securitie. The same resolution also had the Arabians, for which cause they fell to skirmish in that place, wherein the first on both sides that gaue the charge, & afterwards some other followers were slaine: so that those of the Arabians side beeing ouercome, betooke them to retreat. This successe of theirs bred no little hope in the Iewes, who seeing the enemies army addrested to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardie to assaile the Arabian in his trenches, and beate him from his campe. They beeing forced by these assaits, drew forward to their defence in great disorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victo-rie with them: yet notwithstanding they defended themselves, both in regard of their great number, as also in respect of that necessitie wherunto they were enforced by the Iewes. The skirmish on both sides was hot, and diuers on either party were put to the sword: but in the end, the Arabians beeing put to the worst, turned their backs. The slaughter was so great, that they not onely perished by their enemies swords, but they themselves also murdered one another in the preile, and disorderly flight, in which they were troden vnder foote, & lay slaughtered in a manner by their owne weapons. So that in that discomfiture there died some five thousand: the rest hastily fled on the other side of the rampire: but being ouerpressed with want of victuals, and in especiall with lack of water, they had not any ground or assurance to escape. After them posted the Iewes, and beeing vnable to recouer the fortresse with the, they begirt the camp with a siege, and shut vp all the passages that no succour could come vnto them, and tooke from them all opportunity to escape, although they should affect flight.

D When as therefore they saw themselves reduced into such extremitie, they sent Embassadors vnto Herode, first of all to demaund a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppressed vvith thirst, to craue some remedy for their present necessities. But hee neither respected the Embas-sadors, neither the proffered raunsome for the captiues, nor any other whatsoever reasonable demaund, desiring earnestly to reuenge himselfe of those iniurious treacheries they had practised against his Embassadors. Being therefore enforced by thirst (which amongst other plagues most griuously afflicted them) many of them forooke their trenches, and offered themselves to bonds, and to be led away captiues; so that within five daies space foure thousand of the yielded themselves prisoners. On the sixth day, all the rest determined to sally out, and assaile the enemy; rather making choice of assured death, then thus lingeringly & ignominiously to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches, but like vnapt souldiers for a skirmish, decayed not onely in body but in mind; reputed their death for an aduantage, to escape thereby their extreame misfortunes. For which cause vpon the first onsset, about some seauen thousand of them were slaine, and thus the fiercenesse of this nation being alaid by this overthrow, they submitted themselves to Herode, whom to their owne sorrow they had approved to be a valiant souldier.

Herod passed vp with his successful good fortune, returned back into his own country, Herod hauing obtained great estimation & reputation by his valour and vertue. But at such time as he supposed his state to be most assured, he grew in danger both to lose his dignity & life, by reason of that victory that Cæsar obtained against Anthony in the Asian war. For at that time hee not only supposed himselfe to be utterly overthrow, but both his friends and enemies that were round about him lost their hopes, for that it was vnkely that hee should escape unpunished, who had been so inwardly vnited in friendship with Anthony. Whereby it came to passe, that his friends in no sort concealed their despair, and his enemies vnder their colourable and dissembled griefes, couered their ioy, promising themselves thereafter a better and more pleasing administration of the common-weale. Hereupon Herode perceiving, that except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood roiall aliue, determined to cut him off, resolving with himselfe, that if he hapned to escape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the kingdome then himselfe, should not entermeddle amongst his affaires: and if any misfortune should befall him in regard of Cæsar, he desired to dispossesse Hircanus of the kingdome, in regard of the enuy which he bare him, for that hee was the onely man who deserved to be advanced to that dignitie. Whilst thus hee was tormented and trauelled in his thoughts, hee had an occasion offered him by Hircanus owne followers to execute his intencion. For Hircanus being of a mild and gentle nature, during all his life time forbore to entermeddle with state affaires, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himselfe with whatdoeuer condition it pleased her to allot him.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and vnable to conceale with modestie the hope shee conceived of change, solicited her father that hee should not any longer endure the subjection of Herode, who was the very scourge of their familie, but rather that he should stand vpon his owne guard, and reserve himselfe to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gaue him counsaile to write vnto Malchus, who had the gouernment of Arabia, requesting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herode should chance to be cut off by Cæsars displeasure, doubtlesse the kingdome would returne vnto him, both in regard of his nobilitie, as also of the peoples fauour. These persuasions of hers Hircanus at the first repulled, but afterwards being overcome by the importunitie of the woman, who ceased not day and night to sing the same song of future hope, and of Herods treasons, he gaue certaine letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein hee required him to send him certaine horsemen, who might conduct him to the Alphacine lake, which lieth distant from the coelines of Ierusalem some three hundred furlongs. And therefore especially committed he these letters to Dositheus trust, both for that hee fauoured Hircanus and his daughter, and seemed likely for diuers causes to hate Herod: for he was Iosephs kin man, who was slaine by Herod; & not long before, certaine of his brothers were slaine amongst others at Tirc by Anthones command: yet for none of these occasions continued hee faithful to Hircanus. For he letting more by the present fauour of the king that then raigned, then the rest, discovered the letter vnto the king: who first of all giuing him thanks, required one office of friendship more at his hands; which was, that folding vp the letter, and sealing it, hee should conueigh and deliver the same to Malchus, and returne his answer, for that it meerey concerned him, if he knew his resolution. Which when Dositheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this answer, that he was ready to entertaine both himselfe and his whole family; and all those Iewes likewise which were of his faction, promising to send him a band of souldiers, who should be able to conduct him safely thither, & should be obedient to his command in all things. Now as soone as Herod was teized of these letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacie with Malchus: who denied the same. But Herod protesting & bringing forth his letter in an open assembly, commaunded him afterwards to bee put to death. These are these matters registred in Herods commentaries: for by some are they deliuered otherwise, namely, that hee was executed, not for this crime which hee had committed, but for some treasons against the king. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certaine banquet (dissembling his suspicion) demaunded of Hircanus, whether he had receiued any letters from Malchus; and that he answered, that he had receiued letters, but such as contained nothing else but officious salutations. Further, that another asked him, whether hee had receiued any present therewithall: and when he had answered, that hee had receiued nothing but foure courtiers for his saddle, the King wrested this to a capitall offence of corruption and treason: and commanded him presently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltlesse, they allege this for a most approved argument, namely, his gentle disposition, who euén in his youthfull yeeres neuer gaue signe or appearance of rathnesse, or pride, or signification of audaciousnesse, nor not even then when hee had the whole government in his hands, but in that freedom of authoritie, disposed the most things by his fathers aduise. But at that time he was more then fourescore yeeres old, and knew that Herode was secured: and passing Euphrates also, and liuing on the other side of the river, hee felt such as held him in great honour, and returned home into his owne country, to the end hee might liue vnder Herods government. Whereby it is lesse likely, that he would attempt any alteration

As so farre different from his nature; so that all these things seeme to be fained by Herod. Thus ended Hircanus his life, after his variable and aduerse fortune, where-with during all his life time he was afflicted. For at such time as his mother Alexandra liued, hee was created high priest of the Iewes, and obtained that honour for the space of nine yeeres: and after his mothers death, hee had scarcely gouerned the kingdome for the space of three moneths, but that hee was expelled by his brother Aristobulus; and afterwards restored by Pompeys assistance, and receiuing all his former honours, hee liued in full possession of them for the space of fortie yeeres. After this, he was once more dislaid by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, liued certaine yeeres in captiuitie among the Parthians: from whence not long after hee returned home; and though he had many things promised him by Herode, yet after so many alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands, and that which amongst all the rest is most of all to be lamented, as we haue said, he was vnjustly put to death an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a louer of justice, and an obseruer of perpetuall modestie: and gouerned his kingdome for the most part by other mens direction, being onely guilty in himselfe of ignorance & the loue of idlenesse. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodnesse obtained their so great riches: for which defects of his, against all law, and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But Herod after Hircanus death addressed himselfe to performe his journey towards Cæsar: and hauing little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antonius, hee grew desperately ialous of Alexandra, for feare least the taking opportunitee of the time, should incite the people to rebell, and fill the kingdome with domesticall fedition: for which cause, committing the gouernment of the estate to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, & all his kinned in the Castle of Malida, and commaunded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retaine the kingdome in his owne hands and maintaine it. As for his wife Mariamme, for that by reason of certaine dislikes betwixt her, his mother, and sister, they might not liue together, he left her with her mother Alexandra in the Castle of Alexandrian, and committed them to the custodie of his Treasurer Ioseph, and Sohemus the Iturian, and with her the keeping of his Castles, both which had alwaies beene his faithfull friends, and to whom in way of honour, he committed the custody of these princely Ladies. But he gaue the also this commaundement, that if they should be certified that any sinister mishappe had befallen him, they should presently kill them both, and to the utmost of their power, continue the kingdome in his children, and his brother Pheroras.

Herods disposition of his affaires before he repaired to Cæsar.

CHAP. X.

How Herode obtained the kingdome of Iudæa at Cæsars hands.

After hee had in this sort giuen order for all his affaires, hee withdrew himselfe vnto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Cæsar. And as soone as hee arrived in that city, hee tooke the Diademe from his head and laid it apart, but as for his other princelie ornaments, hee changed them in no sort; and being admitted to Cæsars presence, hee at that time gaue a more ample testimony of the greatnesse of his magnanimitie and courage: for neither addressed he his speech to intreat his fauour (according to the custome of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gaue account of all that which he had done, without concealing or mistrusting any thing. For he freely confessed before Cæsar, that he had intirely loued Antonius, and that to the utmost of his power hee had done him seruice, to the end that he might obtaine the soueraigntie & monarchie; not by annexing his forces vnto his, in that he was otherwise imploied in the Arabian warre; but in furnishing him both with whear and money, and that this was the least office which it behoued him to performe towards Antonius; for that being once his professed friend, it behoued him not onely to imploie his best endeavors on his so princely benefactor, but also to hazard both his head and happinesse to deliuer him from perils. All which (said he) I haue not performed according as I ought to haue done; yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as hee was overcome in the Actian battell, I did not alter my affection with his fortune, neither did I restraine my selfe: for although I befriended not Antonius with my presence & assistance in his Actian war, yet at leastwise I assisted him with my counsaile, certifying him that he had but one onely meanes left him for his security; & preuention of his vtter ruine, which was to put Cherpatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might might enjoy her estate, and might more easily obtaine his peace, & pacifiethy displeasure against him. And for that he gaue but slender regard to these mine admonitions by his owne forthlines and indiscretion, he hath hurt himselfe and profited you, because, as I said, he did not follow my counsaile. Now therefore (O Caesar) in regard of the hate which you beare vnto Anthony, you condemne my friendship also. I will not deny that which I haue done; neither am I affraid freely and publickly to proesse how much I haue loued him; but if without regard of persons, you consider how kindly I am affected towards my benefactors, & how resolute and constant a friend I am, and how mindfull of kindnesse, the effect of that which I haue done, may make me knowne vnto thee. For if the name be onely changed, the friendship notwithstanding may remaine, and deserue a due praise.

By these words (which were manifest testimonies of his resolute and noble courage) he so in-wardly indeered himselfe vnto Caesar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he conuerted this his accusation into an occasion to win & worke him to be his friend: for which cause Caesar in setting the diademe vpon his head, exhorted him that he should no lesse respect his friendship, then he had in former time Anthonies: and withall, did him much honour; certifying him moreover, that Capidius had written vnto him, how much Herode had assisted him in his warres that he had with the Monarches of Syria. Herode seeing that he was thus entertained, & that contrarie to his expectation, the kingdome was more surely confirmed vnto him, then before time, both by Caesars bountie, and also by the decree of the Senate, which hee had practiced to obtaine for his greater assurance, accompanied Caesar as far as Egypt, presenting both himselfe and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his estate: endeavouring by these meanes both to win their fauours, and to shew also the greatnesse of his courage; requiring moreover at Caesars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Anthonies dearest friends, might not be sought out to be punished; yet notwithstanding he could not obtaine the same, by reason of an oath that Caesar had past before he solicited him. That done, hee returned backe againe into Iewry, with more greater honour and assurance, then before; whereby hee strooke them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrarie successe, as if by Gods especiall prouidence he alwaies ouerwent his dangers, to his greater honour. Incontinently therefore, he prepared himselfe to entertaine Caesar, who returned out of Syria to take his iourney into Egypt, & receiued him at Ptolemais, with all roiall honour, & gaue his army presents with all abundance of munition: so that he was accounted for one of Caesars most affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at such time as he tooke the view of his army: he entertained him also and his friends with one hundred and fiftie men, adorned with most rich and sumptuous apparell. And for that they were to passe thorow a country, wherein there was great scarcitie of water, he furnished them both with water and wine; so that they needed neither of them. He gaue Caesar also eight hundred talents, and so roially satisfied he all men, that they confessed themselves to haue had far greater entertainment, then the reuenues and profits of his kingdome could afford them. By which meanes hee gaue the more ample testimonie of his forward friendship, and free affection to deserue well: and making vse of the opportunitie of the time, he obtained the reputation of a prince of an heroick and noble spirit; so that he was held inferiour vnto no man, for the good entertainment that he gaue to the chiefe Romans in their returne out of Egypt.

CHAP. XI.

Herode being incensed by false accusations, putteth his wife Mariamme to death.

Mariamme
and Alexandra
with Herode.

BVt as soone as he returned into his kingdome, hee found all his household troubled, and both his wife Mariamme and her mother Alexandra grievously displeased with him. For they supposed (and not without cause) that they were not shutt vp in that Castle for their securities sake, but as it were in a prison; so that, in asmuch as they neither might make vse of other mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly discontented. Mariamme also supposed that her husband did but dissemble his loue, rather for his own profit and comoditie, then for any intire affection hee bare towards her. But nothing more grieued her; then that she had not any hope to liue after him, if so bee he should happen to die, especially for this order hee had left concerning her: neither could shee ever forget what commandement before that time he had left with Ioseph; so that by all meanes possible, she laboured to winne the affections of those that had the

A the charge of her, and especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safetie depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaued himselfe very wisely and faithfully, containing himselfe very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents and feminine flatteries mollified & wrought him by little and little, at last he blabbed out all that which the king had commaunded him; especially, for that he hoped not that he should returne with the same power and authoritie, which before he had; and for that cause he thought thus in himselfe, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herode, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be deprived of that dignity, wherein they were at that time; but would returne him the like kindnes whē Mariamme should be Queene, or next vnto the king. Furthermore, hee hoped that if Herode also should returne with all things answerable to his desires, that hee would performe nothing without his wiues consent; or vpbraid him with the act, if she contradicted: for he knew too well that the king loued her in such sort, as it was impoossible to equall or expresse his affections; and for these causes hee disclosed the trust that was committed vnto him. But Mariamme was very fore displeased to heare that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether vnited and tied to the dangers of Herode; and she oftentimes wished that hee might neuer more returne againe in safetie, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which shee afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herode beyond all expectation arriued in his country, beeing adorned with mightie fortune, he first of all, as it became him certified his wife of his good tidings and happy successe, whom onely amongst all other his friends and wiues, he embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conuerlation and affection that was in her. But she, whilst he repeated vnto her these fortunate euents of his affaires, rather entertained the same with a displeasing attention, then applauding ioy: & these affections of hers like wife she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about hir necke, she vnfolded her sorrow in her sighes; so simple and vnfaigned were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herode was fore troubled, perceiuing these things not onely suspected, but also fully manifest; but aboue all things he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparant hatred that his wife had conceiued against him, which in such sort incensed him that he could not resist the loue that had attained him; so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace; and being vnresolued in himselfe, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrarie affection: so much was his mind traualled betweene loue and hatred, that when as oftentimes hee desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by lous mediation failed him in the enterprife. For nothing did more torment him then this feare, least executing his displeasure against her, hee should by this meanes more grievously wound himselfe, thorow the desire he bare vnto his decaied delight. Whilst thus he was sweltered and deuoured in his passions, and conceiued sinister opinions against Mariamme his wife; Salome his sister and his mother hauing an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunitie to expresse and execute their hatred towards Mariamme: for which cause they conferred with Herode, and whetted his spleene and displeasure with variety of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kinde his iealousie against her. To these reproches of theirs, he lent no vnwilling eares; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to giue free credit to their report: notwithstanding his displeasure increased, & was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither shee could colour her cares and discontents, nor he containe himselfe from exchanging his loue into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some farall doome against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Caesar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cause hastning forward to meete and entertaine him, he left his family in that present estate. Vpon his departure he recommended Mariamme to Sohemus, giuing him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuite a part of Iewry to gouerne.

dominions.

FWhen Herode was arriued in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Caesar, he was highly honoured by him: for Caesar gaue him those foure hundred Frenchmen that were of Cleopatras guard; and restored that part of his country vnto him againe, which was taken away and spoiled by her. He annexed also vnto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the sea coasts the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Ioppe, with the tower of Straton: which when hee had obtained, he grew more mighty then before: and after he had accompanied Caesar as farre as Antioch, he returned into his owne country. Vpon his arriual, he found that fortune which was fauourable vnto him abroad; too froward at home, especially in regard of his wife, in whose affection affection before time he seemed to be most happy. For he was as inwardly touched with the law-full loue of Mariamme, as any other of whom the Histories make report: and as touching her, she was both chaste and faithfull vnto him; yet had shee a certaine womanly imperfection and narrall frowardnesse, which was the cause that shee presumed too much vpon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; so that without regard of his person, who had power & authoritie ouer others, shee entertained him oftentimes very outrageously: All which he endured patiently, without any shew of discontent. But Mariamme vpbraid and publickly reproached both the kings mother and sister, telling them that they were but abjectly and ba'ely borne.

Wherevpon there grew a great enmity & vnrecoverable hatred betwene the Ladies; and from thence also there arose an occasion of greater accusations and calumnyation then before.
These suspicions were nourished amongst them, for the space of one whole yeere after Herodes H returne from Cesar; and finally this long contriued and fore-imagined hatred at last brake out violently vpon this occasion that ensueth. When as about midday the king had withdrawne himselfe into his chamber to take his rest, hee called Mariamme vnto him to sport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that hee bare vnto her. Vpon this his command shee came in vnto him; yet would he not lie with him, nor entertaine his courtings with friendly acceptance, but vpbraid him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The king tooke these reproachfull words in very euill part, and was almost ready to strike her; but his sister hearing a greater stir and noise within then was vsuall, sent in the butler, who long before that time was us-borne by her, whom the king commanded to tell the king, that Mariamme had prepared a drinke for him to incite and quicken him vnto loue; willing him that if the king should be mooued thereat, I and should demaund what he meant, he should certifie him, that Mariamme hauing prepared a poison for his grace, had dealt with him to deliuer it to his maiestie. Charging him moreover, that if the king in hearing him speake of this poison, should seeme to be mooued therewith, that then he should proceed no further in his discourse. He therefore (being in this maner before hand instructed what hee ought to doe) at that very instant was sent to discouer his treacherie vnto the king; for which cause with a sober and staied countenance hee entred in vnto him, being seriously and well prepared to discourse, and told him that Mariamme had bribed him to present his Maiestie with an amorous cup of drinke. Now when he perceiued that the king was troubled with these words, hee procured his discourse, alleaging that the poison was a certaine medicine which Mariamme had giuen him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which hee had receiued K according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his owne securitie, and the kings safety.

Herode who before this was highly displeased, hearing these words, was so much the more incensed: for which cause he presently commanded Mariammes most faithfull seruant to be examined: by torments, as concerning the poison, supposing that it was impossible for her to vndertake any thing whatsoeuer, without his priuie. He being tired and tormented after this cruel maner, confessed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared vnto the king that the hatred which his wife had conceiued against him, proceeded from certaine words that Sohemus had told hee. Scarcely had he finished these words, but that the king cried out with a loud voice, saying, that Sohemus, who before time had bene most faithfull both to him and his kingdome, would L not haue declared these his priuy commands, except there had been some more inward familiarity and secrecy betwixt him & Mariamme; for which cause he presently commanded his ministers to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her triall, and to this effect he assembled his most familiar friends, before whom hee began to accuse her with great spight and spleene, as touching the potions and poisons aforesaid, wherein he vsed intemperate and vnseemely speeches, and such as for their bitterness did ill become him in cause of iustice; so that in the end, the assistants, seeing the butte and bent of his desire; pronounced sentence of death against her: which being past, both he, and all other the assistants were of this opinion, that she should not so speedily be executed, but that she should bee kept close prisoner in M some sure place of the palace. But by Salomes sollicitations Herod was incited to hasten her death, for that she alleaged that the king ought to feare, least some sedition should bee raised amongst the people, if he should keepe her alieue in prison. And by this meanes Mariamme was led vnto her death.

Alexandra her mother considering the estate of the time, and fearing no lesse mischief from Herodes hands, then her daughter was assured of; she vndecently changed her minde, and abie-ctedly laid aside her former courage, and magnanimitie. For intending to make it knowne, that shee

A shee was neither partie nor priuie to those crimes, wherewith Mariamme was charged, she went out to meete her daughter, and entertained her iniuriously, protesting publickly that shee was a wicked woman, and vngratefull towards her husband; & that she well deserved the punishment that was adiudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so hainous a fact, neglecting to re-quite her husbands entire loue, with her vnfaigned loyaltie. VVhilest thus dishonestly she counter-fai'ted her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mariamme by the haire, the assistants according to re-her desert, condemned her generally for her shamefull hypocrisie: but she that was led to be punished, conuicted her by her milde behauiour. For first of all, shee gaue her no answer; neither was any waies altered by her reproches; neither would so much as cast her eie vpon her; making it appeare, that she discreetly concealed & couered her mothers imperfections, & was aggrieved B that she had so openly shewed so great indignitie: expressing for her owne part a constant beha-uiour; and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her, perceiued in her a kind of manifest courage & nobility, euen in her vtmost extremity. Thus died Mariam-me, hauing bene a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: nor withstanding that she defaulted somewhat in affabilitie and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, she was of an admirable and pleasing beauty, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein shee was intertained, that it was impossible to expresse the same, in that she surpassed all those of her time which was the principall cause that she liued not gratioously and contentedly with the king. For being entertained by him, who intirely loued her, and from whom shee receiued nothing that might discontent her, she presumed vpon a great and intemperate libertie in her discourse. Shee C digested also the losse of her friends verie hardly, according as in open tearms she made it known vnto the king: whereby also it came to passe, that both Herodes mother, and sister, and himselfe likewise grew at odds with her, and in especiall her husband, from whom onely she expected no hard measure.

After her death the king began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who before times, as wee haue declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did hee loue after the common manner of married folke: but whereas almost euen vnto madnes he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too vnbridled manners of his wife to alay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, hee increased the same. And all that time especially hee supposed that God was displeased with him, for the death of Mariamme his D wife. Oftentimes did hee inuocate her name, and more often vndecently lamented hee her.
And norwithstanding he deuiled all kind of delights and sports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and inuiting guests with princely hospitality, to passe away the time; yet all those profited him nothing. For which cause he gaue ouer the charge and administration of his kingdome. And in such sort was he ouerwhelmed with griefe, that oftentimes he commanded his ministers to call his wife Mariamme, as if as yet she had bene alieue. Whilest thus he was affected, there befell a pestilence within the citie, that consumed a great sort of the people, and the better part of the nobilitie, and each man interpreted that this punishment was inflicted by God vpon men, for the vniust death of the Queene. Thus the kings discontents being by this meanes increased, he at last hid himselfe in a solitary wildernes, vnder pretext of hunting, where afflicting E himselfe incessantly, at last he fell into a most grieuous sicknes. This disease of his was an inflammation or paine in the necke: he seemed also in some sort to raue and wax mad; neither could any remedies relieue him of his agony; but when as the sickness seemed rather to increase, al men at last grew almost desperate of his recovery. For which cause his physition, partly in respect of the contumacie of his disease, partly, because in so great danger there was not any free election of diet, they gaue him leaue to taste whatsoeuer best pleased his appetite, committing the vncertaine event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Whilest thus hee sojourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaste, Alexandra inhabiting at that time in Ierusalem, hauing notice of this his estate, sought to reduce all the strong fortresses that were within the Citie, vnder her subiection: the one of which abutted vpon F the Temple; the other was situate within the Citie: for they that are Lords of these, keepe all the rest of the nation vnder their awe; because that without these, neither the vsuall and dayly sacrifices may be performed, neither may the Jews liue without such sacrifices and oblations, who had rather lose their liues then contemne their religion. She therefore laboured those that had the gouernment thereof, to surrender them vp to her & Herodes children begotten of her daughter Mariamme, for feare least he being dead, they should be seized by others: & if it should fortune him to recouer his health, in the meane while they might be kept and held by no man more securely;

securely, then such as were his domestical friends. This suite and solicitation of hers was but coldly conceived of: and the captains who at other times shewed themselves alwaies faithful, at that time were the rather farre more constant in their dutie, both for that they hated Alexandras, as also for that they thought it a great offence to deipaie of the health of their Prince. For these were the kings olde friends, and one of them was Herod; owne nephew, whose name was Asin. For which cause they sent present messengers vnto him, to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who hauing heard these newes, presently commanded her to be slaine: & at length ouercoming his sickness, hee grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that hee waxed hautesill vnto all men; so that all those who offended him for how little cause so euer, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of diuers of his inward friends, as Cofabarus, Lyfimachus, Antipater surnamed Gadias, and Desitheus, for this occasion that ensued. Cofabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst his countrymen, who was descended from the Priests of Cozas, whom the Idumæans esteeme for a God. Now after that Hircanus had drawn the policie of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Iewes, Herode was made king of the Iewes, and appointed Cofabarus to be gouernour in Idumæa and Gaza, giuing him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Ioseph to death, to whom she had bin married before time, as we haue heretofore declared. Cofabarus seeing himselfe in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then his good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himselfe so farre, that he thought himselfe dishonoured, if he should performe that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should bee vnder the Iewes subiection, notwithstanding they had receiued their manner of gouernment from them. He therefore sent messengers vnto Cleopatra, giuing her to vnderstand, that Idumæa had alwaies bene vnder her ancestors subiection; and for that cause she ought vpon iust cause to demaund and beg that countrie at Antonius hands, and that in respect of himselfe he was readie to become her seruant. All which he practised, not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoever, but to the intent, that if Herodes fortunes should be any waies weakened, he might more easily by this meanes both enlarge and obtaine the kingdome of Idumæa. And with these foolish hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together, by such dishonest meanes, as hee continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatra often and earnest petition to obtaine this soueraigntie; yet could shee not obtaine it at Antonius hands. When Herode had notice of these couert and cunning practises, he was ready to kill Cofabarus. But vpon the earnest supplications of his sister and his mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspicion, by reason of this his practise. Not long after it happened, that Salome fell at debate with Cofabarus, for which cause shee sent a libell of diuorces to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the lawes & ordinarie customes of the Iewes. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawfull for the husband to doe the same; & as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet is it not lawfull for her to marry againe, except her husband first giue her licence. But Salome without respect of the lawes of the countrey, grounding her selfe too much vpon her owne authoritie, forooke her husband, saying, that she separated her selfe from her husband, by reason of the great friendship which she bare vnto her brother, for that she had receiued some notice that Cofabarus practised some inuouation with Antipater, Lyfimachus and Desitheus. And this accusation of hers confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all securitie for the space of twelue yeeres. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soone as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolved to cut them off, for that they had been alwaies badly affected towards him and all his enterprises; but all that time he had let them passe, because by continuance they were grown out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmitie and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground. At such time as Antigonus enioyed the soueraigntie, and Herode besieged the citie of Ierusalem with an armie: now those incommodities & necessities that ordinarily happen vnto those that are besieged, were the cause that diuers acknowledged Herode, and fixed their hopes vpon him. But Babas sonnes being in authoritie, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, persecuted in their faithfull obseruation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselves followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the common weale. But after that the citie was surprised by Herode, and he grew master of the estate, Cofabarus, who was appointed to keepe the citie gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to haue forsaken

A forsaken the kings side, should escape, knowing that the sonnes of Babas were greatly esteemed and honoured among the people, and foreseeing that their safety might be no small furtherance to himselfe, if at any time there might be fortune any alteration; he discharged, and hid them within his owne possessions: and notwithstanding that at that time he had protested to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them; yet, though suspected of periury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the king had by proclamation promised a reward to him that should discover them, and sought for them by all means, neither then also would he confesse the fact. For being affraid lest he should be punished for his first deniall, hee continued thorow concealment, being not onely now driuen thereunto by friendship, but also by necessity.

Now when the king had notice hereof by his sisters report, hee sent certaine messengers to the place where they were hidden, and slew them, and all those that were partakers of the same crime: so that no one of Hircanus kindred was now left aliue; but all of them being slaine, who excelled in nobilitie and dignitie, he did what himselfe listed without any contradiction or controuersie: for which cause he by little and little forooke the ceremonies and ordinances of his countrey, and corrupted the decrees and institutions of their ancestors, which he ought to haue kept inuiolable, by his new and strange inuentions. In whose time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of liuing; for all fell from bad to worse: and the politike order, whereby the people ought to be gouerned and kept within compasse of their dutie, went to decay. For first of all, he ordained certaine wrestlings from five yeeres to five yeeres, in honour of Cesar; and builded a Theater for that purpose within Ierusalem. He erected also a most huge Amphitheater within the Plaine, which were two piles worthy the regard and beholding, by reason of the sumptuousnes thereof; but wholly estranged fro the fusions of the Iews.

For neither the vse, nor the presentation of these spectacles hath ever been practised or taught by our ancestors: yet was it his pleasure to ennoble this assembly, to the end it might be continued from five to five yeeres, and this proclaimed he publicly in the countries round about him, and to this spectacle assembled he all the Nations. The wrestlers also, and all that which concerned their exercise, were sought out from all corners of the world, vnder the hope to obtaine the proposed palme and victorie; and all the most excellent in those exercises that were to bee found, were inuited to that assembly. For he proposed most huge rewards, not onely to those that exercised wrestling, but also vnto those who are called Musicians, and to all sorts of plaiers on instruments; labouring to his utmost power, that all the most famous in those professions should bee assisant in those pastimes. Hee appointed also a reward of great valew for such as ranne vpon chariots of three, foure or of one horse; and all that which was both sumptuous and magnificent to behold, for euery one was most carefully provided in that he strove to haue the honour of a most magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cesars titles, and the trophees of those nations, which were ouercome by him, altogether set out & shining with gold and silver. As for the instruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, costly vestments, or precious stones. Thither also were drawne certaine savage beastes, as Lyons and other wilde beasts, which were worthy to be placed in this famous shew, being admirable both for their force and rareness of nature, who fought the one with the other, and against such men likewise who were condemned to die: whereby the strangers conceiued, together with the admiration of his expence, an vncomparable and vnaccustomed pleasure. But his countrymen interpreted this thing for a manifest corruption of those disciplines and manners which before time they had entertained, and honoured amongst them. For it was an act most manifestly impious, to hazard men against wilde beasts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was also a matter as impious, to change & prophane the ordinances of the country, for forraigne exercises: But the most hated of all these, were the Trophees: for in that they were certaine Images attired in armour, the vse and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this displeased and grieved them more then any thing whatsoever: neither was Herod ignorant of those troubles, which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the same for the present by force; and for that cause he familiarly debated the same with some few of them, and discoursed vnto them his occasions, to the end to ridde them of their superstition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them with one consent, cried out against the indignitie which they saw him commit: telling him, that although all other things were to bee tolerated: yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were vnacceptable, because they were vnusall in their countrey. Herode perceiuing that they were discontented, and that they would not easily be wrought vpon, except they had some contentment, he called the most worthiest men amongst them;

Herode obtained no small honour by these expences.

them, & led them into the Theater, demāding of them what they thought these Trophees were: G and when as they cried out that they were images of men: he incontinently caused all the ornaments to be taken off from them, letting them see that they were nought els but naked stocks of wood; so that sodainly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were pleasantly discussed. Thus appeased he the people, and moderated the fury of their dislikes: so that diuers of them changed their opinions, & were no more displeased. Norwithstanding, there were some of these that persisted in the indignity they conceived in those vnaccustomed exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to vndertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policie, by permitting that Herode should introduce new and extra-ordinarie fashions, who onely in word was their king, but in effect an enemy of their whole na- H tion. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselves by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they hid certaine short swords vnder their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who vrged & egged on by the stranges of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of abilitie to execute any thing with his hand, but to testify that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of the were not a little confirmed. These hauing mutually vndertaken this their resolution, repaired to the Theater vnder hope that Herode should not escape them, for that they intended to assaile him vnawares: at leastwise if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foule on some of his fauourites and followers, accounting this to be some solace in their expected death, if in regard of their violated religion they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. I And these intending to offer themselves as chieftaines and leaders vnto the rest, resolved to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herode had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, hauing discovered all this their conspiracie, signified the same vnto the king, at such time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. Hee knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betooke himselfe to his palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no waie for them to escape, resolved to endure their present misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies dismaide, with a constant countenance they drew out their weapons, protesting that their conspiracie was honest and holy, not attempted by them for priuate affection, or their own profit sake, but in the behalfe of their publike discipline, which no good man would either see or K suffer to be violated, no though it cost him his life.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged these things for their iustification, they were led away by the kings ministers to be slaughtered by diuers sorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betrayed them, growing hateful in all mens eyes, was slaine by certaine men, and chope in peeces with their swords, & afterwards cast vnto the dogs in sight and presence of many men. Yet did no man discover this act, vntill after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herode, it was wrought out of certaine poore women (who were priuie to the fact) with diuers torments. Then were all the actors of that murder punished, with their whole families: and notwithstanding all this, the common people was in no sort dismaide, but were ready to defend their lawes, except they were restrained by some greater power. Which L when the king perceiued, he resisted their indeuours with al diligence, least happily thorow these alterations in affaires, the people should be drawne to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two strong castles within the Citie, one wherein his palace was, an other called Antonia, that adioyned neere vnto the temple, fortified by him; he thought good to strengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he changed, and called it Sebastie (which was distant from Ieru-salem some daies iourney) to containe those of the comon sort that were abroad, vnder his obedience, and very fit to bridle any vproares that might be raised in the Citie and fields. And for the whole nation he builded a fort, which in times past was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæfarea. He builded also a fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala, in a large Plaine, M where by course he kept his horsemen. Besides these, he builded the fort of Esthmonites in the countrie of Peræa on the other side Iordan.

Now when he had fitly disposed all these Castles thorow his whole countrie, for the securitie and safetie of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the comon people, who vp-on euery light cause are subiect to commotions, in that he had prepared a remedy against all priuie conspiracies, by planting such forces alwaies neere at hand, who might preuent and paci-fie all alterations vpon their originall. After this, betaking himselfe to encompass Samaria with a wall,

A wall, he brought to passe that diuers of those, who had borne armes with him against his enemies, and diuers of the people likewise that dwelt round about, came to inhabit it, both in regard of the temple, which he intended to build in that place, as also for that hee fortified the same for his owne securitie (although that before time it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebastie, and distributed the lands that confined the Citie among the inhabitants of the same (which was by nature a fruitfull and goodly country) to the intent that within a little space they might enrich themselves. Hee inuironed the Citie also with a strong wall, beeing assisted by the naturall strength and steepnesse of the place: and besides the whole circuit, he included so much ground, that it is no waies inferiour to any of the famous Cities; for it contained the circuit of twentie furlongs or stadia. And in the midst thereof there was B a sacred place, containing a furlong and a halfe, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a temple builded, famous both for beautie and bignesse. And as for the other parts of the Citie, hee decked them with all sorts of ornaments. And seeing how neerely it concerned him to prouide for the securitie of his person in this walled Citie, hee erected a fortress for himselfe. And as touching the beautie thereof, his intent was that it should remaine for a monument to posteritie, of his magnificence and liberalitie.

CHAP. XII.

A famine inuaded the land of Iudea.

C Hat very yeere, which was the thirteenth yeere of Herods raigne, very great calamities happened in that country (either thorow Gods displeasure, or for that the reuolution of time would haue it so.) For first of all, there were such continuall droughts, that by reason thereof the earth grew barren, and produced not those fruites, which of it selfe it was accustomed to beare. And after this, the ordinarie course of mens diets being altered by reason of the want of corne, the want of sustenance was accompanied with a bodily sicknesse (for that by custome these two plagues doe ordinarily entertaine one another.) For this made the plague & sicknesse more vehement, for that the sicke in this great penury, could neither haue care of themselves as was expedient, nor gette conuenient nourishment for preservation of life: And many died daily; and those also that remained alieue were in despaire, because they could not re-lieue their want & necessities, what diligence soeuer they vsed. For which cause, after the old fruites D of that yeer were wholly consumed, & all the rest of their store was utterly spent, there appeared not any meanes wherupon they might hope, namely, for that the misery increased more the was expected; yea and extended it selfe beyond that yeere: so that they had nothing remaining by them, and the seeds they sowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them no interest. The necessitie therefore beeing thus great, constrained men to search out many new inuentions to maintaine their life: and the king likewise was in no lesse perplexitie, in that he was depriued of those ordinarie reuenues which he receiued by the fruites of the earth; & the rather, for that he had spent his money in repairing his cities, according as before this wee haue declared: and in such sort were all things wasted by diuers calamities, that a man could conceiue no hope of remedy. Besides this, the people grew in hatred of their king, for that it is their custome E ordinarily to accule their gouernors, as if they were the authors of all their euils. Yet did the king bethink himself how he might remedy these inconueniences, but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbours had no meanes to sell them victuals, because they were no lesse afflicted then themselves: and although he might haue recovered some little meanes for a great summe of money, yet wanted hee it also to defray the charges: notwithstanding in that he knew, that it behooued him to imploy his vttermost indeauours in yeelding a generall remedie to such and so violent an oppresion, hee moltd downe all those moueables he had either of gold or siluer within his palace, and spared nothing either for the matter, the excellencie, or the fashion; no nor so much as the vessels wherein hee was ordinarily serued. This money sent hee into Egypt, where at that time vnder Cæsar, Petronius held the government. This man being Herods friend, in that he F desired the safetie of his subiects, at such time as diuers of them retired themselves vnto him, by reason of that their necessitie, he permitted them to buy vp corne; and assisted them in all things, both in their bargaines, and in their cariages; so that the greater or the whole summe of their succours was attributed to him. But after their returne, Herode wrought so much, that the care that was taken by him did not onely change the affections of those, which before time were his enemies, but beside all this, he purchased great praise and commendation for his liberalitie and singular prouidence. For first of all hee distributed a certaine quantitie of corne to all those, who were

was not able of themselves to supply their owne wants, vsing herein both great care & diligence. G After this, for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmities, were vnable to prepare their victuals, hee tooke order for their reliefe; and appointed them certaine bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. He gaue order also, that they should not passe the winter disurnished of clothing, but provided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheepe were partly dead, & partly deuoured, & that there was no wooll to set the awork, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subiects with these things, he thought good also to shew kinde- nesse to the neighbouring cities, & stored the Syrians with seed corne to sowe their lands; which yeelded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gaue him a large & plentiful tribute for that she had received; so that all of them had abundance of victuals: and as soone as the harvest H was ready, he sent fiftie thousand men into that country which he had relieved: & by this means he with all diligence restored his afflicted kingdome: and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamitie. For there was not any man in necessitie, that according to his qualitie was not assisted and succoured.

The villages likewise and the cities, and those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, hauing their recourse vnto him, receiued that which they had need of; so that to reckon vp all the corne which he gaue vnto those, who were not his subiects, it appeareth that he imploied ten thousand Cores of wheat: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushels: and within the compasse of his Realme hee imploied eightie thousand: which care of his, and discretely imploied fauour, wrought so much in the hearts of the Iewes, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceived against him, for that he had altered certaine customes of their kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and hee was supposed by them to haue made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence hee had shewed in assisting them in their necessities; and no lesse either grace or glory obtained he among strangers: so that by these miseries the kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoeuer damage here- ceived at home, so much honour and reputation atchieued he abroad. For whereas in strangers ne- cessities he had shewed himselfe so full of magnanimitie, each man did not respect what hee had been before, but such as they lately found him to be.

About the same time also he sent Caesar certaine supplies, namely, five hundred chosen men of his guard, whom Elius Gallus led into the warres in Arabia, and had often vse of the in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his kingdome was restored to his former felicitie, hee builded a roiall palace in the higher part of the citie, furnished with many large buildings, & decked with gold and marble seates; so as they might receiue a great number of men: hee named also each roome of the house according to their severall names, and called one the lodging of Caesar, & another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with loue, he married a wife, least he should be distracted by vaine desires, and the cause of this his new marriage was this. There was amongst those that dwelt in Ierusalem, a certaine citizen called Simon, the son of Boethas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefe in nobilitie amongst them: this man had a daughter, the fairest and comliest creature of that age, whole beautie renowned by the common voice, it came to passe, that with her same Herode at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, hee grew in loue with her; yet would not vse his authoritie, least hee should seeme to behaue himselfe tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his be- trothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed unworthy his affinitie, and yet too woorthy to be blasted by contempt, hee made election of a convenient meanes to obtaine the fullness of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause hee presently depoyed the high Priest Iesus the sonne of Phabetes, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinitie with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had overcome the Iewes, vpon the time and incontinently after the ouerthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken vpon him the gouernment.

This place is distant from Ierusalem some sixtie furlongs or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence & good fortification. For neere vnto the same there is a certaine steepie hill made by art, after the manner of a round dugged, enuironed with round towers, with a steepie ascent of two hundredth steps cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are diuers palaces, builded with great & sumptuous workmanship, made both for defence & delight. At the foote of this hill there are two houses worthy the sight, for diuers their singularities, & namely, by reason of those con- duits of water, which although they spring not in that place, yet notwithstanding are they brought from

A from far with great cost and expence. The Plain that adioyneth vpon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a citie, and the toppe of the castle commandeth all the Plain. As soone as there- fore he had disposed of his affaires, according to his hearts desire, he possessed his kingdome in great quietnesse, for that he made his subiects obedient vnto him, both by feare, and shewing himselfe in- exorable when it concerned him to punish; and by liberality, whereby he provided for their pub- lique necessities: he therefore tooke an especiall care of himselfe, as if the life and safety of his per- son had been the security of his people. He behaued himselfe officiously and fauourably towards all forraign cities: he entertained the Princes by presents, which according to his occasions he sent vnto them, to insinuate himselfe into their fauours, being in his owne nature magnificent and fit to gouerne: so that all his fortunes increased, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts desire. True it is, that the care which he employed in honouring Caesar, and other mighty mi- strates of Rome, caused him to oustrip his customes, & to falsifie diuers ordinances of his coun- trey, in building cities, and erecting temples in honour of them, although he builded them in the kind of Iury; for the Iewes would not haue endured it, because we were forbidden to honour Images and figures, formed according to the likenesse of a man, as the Greeks are accustomed to doe; but he did this in the country and forraigne cities, and excused himselfe to the Iewes, saying, that he did it not of his owne head, but performed that according to the charge and commaund- ment which he had from others, who were greater then himselfe: and in the meane while gratio- ed Caesar and the Romans, in that he respected their honour more then he did the ordinances of his country; although in all things he had a respect to his particular advantage, and determined C with himselfe to leaue behind him after his death large and ample testimonies of his power and greatness: which was the cause that he builded cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

The building of the Citie of Caesarea.

When as therefore he had found out a fit & conuenient place vpon the sea coast, to build a citie on, which of long time had been called the tower of Straton, hee both magnifi- cently designed and set downe the module and forme thereof, and made many sumptu- ous buildings, both of roiall palaces, and of other private lodgings, not builded after a slight manner, or of weake and fading matter, but of marble stone. But the greatest and busiest worke of all, was the haven which hee made exempt and free from stormes and tempests, that in greatness resembled that of Piræus, and was so spacious that it was able to receiue manie great ships into the road, & had diuers roomes and warehouses to lay vp the merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this pile, because the stuffe that was fit to finish this so great worke, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but must needly be brought from another place, vpon great charge & expence. This citie is seated in Phoenicia vpon the coast, in the way to Egypt, between Ioppa and Dora, certaine villages situate vpon the sea coasts, vsit either for landing or harbour, by reason of the Affricke wind, that driving the sand of the sea vpon the shore, giueth not any quiet road vnto the ships, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommoditie of the place, he made the circuit round about the port so spacious, that it was able to receiue a great flect: and he cast downe to the bottom thereof, which was about some twenty fathoms deep, certaine huge stones, that for the most part were fittie foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, some more and some lesse. The pile that was erected vpon this to affront the sea, was a pane of two hundredth foot, the halfe whereof was opposed against the waues to breake the furie of the streame, and for this cause was called in the Greek tongue Procyonion, that is to say, Before flood: The other halfe serued as a foundation to beare vp a wall of stone for- tified with diuers towers, the chiefe whereof was a faire pile or building, which was called Drusus, in memory of Drusus, Caesars sonne in law, who died very young: it had also diuers retreats F or hostries in the same, into which the mariners were receiued and lodged.

The descent being hard by, encompassed all the port like a round platforme, that serued for a pleasant walking place for whom soeuer listed. The entrance and mouth of the haven was toward the north, which is a wind that of all other most purifieth & cleanseth. The supporter & strength of all the circuit on the left hand vpon the entrance to the port, was an ample and huge tower to fasten it the more strongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillars of stone, more higher then the tower that stood opposite against them; erected and fastned together. the haue there were certaine buildings, abutting one vpon another of polished marble, and in the midst there was a little hillock, on which there was a certaine monument placed in honour of Cæsar, which presented it selfe to their sight who sailed to the port, in which there were the figures of the Citie of Rome and of Cæsar. This Citie also was called Cæsarea, as much to be wondered at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the arte whereby it was erected: and no lesse cunning was there shewed in the vaults and conduits vnder ground, then in those buildings that were about them; some of them were conuayed toward the port, and discharged themselves into the sea by certaine compassed spaces: but there was one that went athwart, that comprehended all the rest, to the end that therby the raine-water, & the cleansings of the Citie might be conuayed into the sea, and that when the sea should flow, it might wash and cleanse all the Citie.

Hee erected also a Theater of stone, and behind the same to the Southward; an Amphitheater, that was able to receiue a great number of men; and so pleasantly and fitly situated, that from the same a man might discouer the sea. This Citie was finished at the end of 12 yeeres; during which time, the king was neither wearied by intending the worke, nor negligent in furnishing the necessary charges. After this, perceiving that the Citie of Sebastia was already inhabited also, he resolved to send his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome, to present them vnto the Emperour Cæsar; who no sooner resorted thither but they were lodged in Pollios house, who amongst all the rest was an intire friend of Herods. They might haue lien also at Cæsars house, who entertained them with as great familiaritie and kinnesse, as might be possible: and gaue Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which soeuer best liked him, annexing to his gouernment, the countries of Trachona, Batanea, and Auranita for the occasion which ensued. A certaine man called Zenodorus had hired Lysanias demaines or Lordship: and not contenting himselfe with those reuenues which he gathered, but desirous to gather more, he liued vpon spoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey, the inhabitants whereof commonly liue by pillage and spoile, which they purchase from the Citizens and Merchants of Damasco. And so farre was Zenodorus from prohibiting these robberies, that hee himselfe also was partaker of the bootie; so that the nations neighbouring round about, seeing themselves thus abused, sought for remedy at Varus hands, who was their gouernor, requiring him to certifie Cæsar, of Zenodorus wrongs and outrages. Which when he understood, he commaunded that such lawlesse rioters should be punished, and that the countrey should be added vnto the iurisdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancie the inhabitants of Trachona shoulde no more molest their neighbours. For it was hard to restraine them, considering that they were accustomed and traded in such theft, and could not liue other waies. For they neither had townes nor lands, neither heritages nor any possessions, but onely certaine retraires and caues vnder ground, and liued pell mell like beasts; and hauing made abundant prouision of water and victuals, they might easily endure warre a long time, and maintaine themselves in their caues, when their enemies assailed them without.

The doores of these denues were so narrow, that they could be entred but by one at once; but within it was incredible spacious and large: the vpper part thereof was not steepe, but plaine, & in forme of a smoothe earth: for the whole place naturally consisteth of a sharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult passage thercon, vnlesse a man be guided therow the paths. For the way was not direct & straight, but full of windles & many turnings. At such time as they wanted opportunity to spoile their neighbors, they robbed one another; and omitted no kind of wickednesse. Herod hauing receiued the gift of this countrey at Cæsars hands, resorted thither vnder the conduct of certaine guides that knew the waies, and hauing brought their power and prouision to an end, hee left the neighbour nations in assured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with enuie, partly incited by the grieue which hee conceiued therow the losse of his possessions, resorted to Rome to accuse Herod; yet could effect nothing of that which he intended.

When Agrippa was sent into Asia by Cæsar to gouerne the prouinces beyond the seas, Herode, because hee was his verie friend and familiar, went to salute him at Mitylene where hee vntiered, for that hee was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Iewry. But certaine Gadareans came vnto Agrippa with an intent to accuse Herode: but he sent them bound vnto the king, and vouchsafed them no audience. On the other side, the Auranites, who of long time hated Herodes gouernment, stirred vp commotions, and laboured to drawe the countrey into rebellion, and that vpon a iust ground, as it seemed, at that time: for Zenodorus despairing of his affaires, went and sold them a certaine part of the Lordship in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæsars donation to Herode) for the sum of fiftie talents of yeerely reuenue, wherewith they grew discontented, for that they were vniustly depriued of their estates: and hereupon they made often incurfions, indeuouring themselves sometimes to recouer the same by force; & otherwhile contending for the right of their possession by course of iustice. They drew also vnto them certaine needy souldiers; who, according to the custome of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innouation: which though Herode knew, and could haue prouidently prevented them, yet exhorted hee them to maintaine their titles rather by good meanes then open violence, being loth to giue any occasion of new trouble or disquiet. At length in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, Cæsar came into Syria: vpon whose affrual diuers of the Gadareans beganne to exclaime against Herode, accusing him of his seueritie and tyrannie: which accusation they the rather attempted, because they were chiefly incited therunto by the instigations of Agrippa, who bound himselfe by an oath, that he would neuer giue ouer vntill that deliuering them from Herods tyrannie, they were reduced vnder Cæsars protection. The Gadareans, perswaded by these his protestations, began to continue their exclamations, and that somewhat the more audaciously, for that they perceived that they liued as yet vnpunished whom Agrippa had deliuered into Herods hands: for Herode had set them at liberty without any punishment, notwithstanding that in regard of his owne subiects he was inexorable, as euer man was; and most patient in induring those iniuries that were offered him by strangers, whom he alwaies dismissed without reuenge. When as therefore they accused him of violence and rapine, and for violating and rasing downe their temples, Herode being nothing dismayed therat, presented himselfe before the Emperour to iustifie his actions. But Cæsar entertained him verie kindly, and diminished nothing of the good affection which he bare vnto him, notwithstanding all the vppores & insolent tumults of the people. Thus was the first day spent in audience of their complaints, and in those daies that followed there were no further obiections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Cæsars disposition and the inclination of his counsell, & fearing (as it was most likely) to be deliuered into Herods hands, the next night after some of them slew themselves; other some for feare of torments brake their own necks; & some of them also drowned themselves in the riuer. And thus whereas they seemed to fore iudge themselves, Cæsar presently absolved Herod.

And this felicitie of his, was seconded with another of no small consequence. For Zenodorus hauing his bowels broken through an extreme flux of blood, finished his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cæsar gaue Herode his countrey, which was a large and ample signorie, & was situate betweene Trachonita and Galilee, containing Vlatha, Pannas, and the countries thereabouts. Hee made him one of the gouernours of Syria also, commaunding them to execute nothing without his aduise. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicitie: For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire, all things were disposed by Cæsar, and Agrippa, Cæsar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa respected him about all men next to Cæsar. Whereupon he grew to be so confident, that hee begged a Tetrarchie at Cæsars hands for his brother Pheroras, on whom hee bestowed one hundred talents of his reuenue out of his owne kingdome, to the intent, that if he should happen to die, Pheroras estate might be assured and left no waies subiect vnto his children.

As soone as therefore he had conducted Cæsar as farre as the sea, vpon his returne he builded a goodly temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, neere to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly caue in the hart of a mountaine, and a place of great pleasure, vnder which there is a wide pool of immeasurable depth, which is full of standing water, and the vpper part of the mountaine is very high. From vnder this caue spring the fountaine heads of the floud Iordan. This place of it selfe so famous and delightful, was chosen out by Herod, and adorned also with a temple which he built in honour of Cæsar. At that time also hee releaied the third part of his tributes which his subiects paid vnto him, to the end (as he said) that he might relieue his subiects after the penurie they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their fauours, who were sinistery affected towards him. For they had conceiued an hatred against him, because all pietie was in a manner abolished, & the ordinances of the countrey in a sort diuallied by the means of those temples, which he had built, & each man priuily muttered with bitterness against him; so that welny they were addressed to mutiny. But Herod with great discretion prevented the same, & cut off all occasions of insurrection, commanding euery one to intend his labour; forbidding them to make any assemblies in the citie, or to talk one with another vnder colour of walking abroad for pleasure or feasts sake. Moreover, hee had sent out certaine Intelligencers to discouer all that which was done, appointing grievous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his gouernment. For diuers of them were led vnto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some priuately; where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the citie & in the country, there were certaine men appointed to take note of all such that vsed any assemblies vpon any occasion whatsoeuer. And so inwardly was hee tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, hee tooke vpon him the habite of a priuate man, and thrust himselfe in the night time into the company of the people, to vnderstand and gather what they thought of his gouernment; and those whom he found to be vntractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, hee dispatched the by one meane or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serue him faithfully, and constrained them to keepe the oath they had sworne, & to acknowledge his souerainetic: vvhercunto diuers thorow the feare they conceiued, easily condescended. But they, who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselves constrained, hee cut them short by all the meanes that he might. Hee required also an oath of diuers of those sectaries, who followed the Pharisees Pollio & Sameas: and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet did he not punish them as he did the other for their refusal, in respect & reuerence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst vs are called Essians, which is a sort of men that liue after that manner, that Pithagoras did among the Græcians; of whom I haue more expressly discoursed in another place.

At this present I thinke it not a matter to be ouerslipped, neither estranged from the aime of my historie, to report for what cause the king had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certaine Essian called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an vpright and iust man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. Hee seeing Herod one day at such time as hee was very young and went to schoole, saluted him and called him king of the Iewes. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reprooued him sharplie for this his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himselfe to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand vpon the backe, and said vnto him, Thou shalt be king, and shalt haue a happy raigne. For such is Gods pleasure; and at that time remember thy selfe of the words that Manahem spake vnto thee, which shall serue for a testimonie to put thee in mind of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by iustice, pietie, and equitie, to winne the hearts of thy subiects: yet know I by reuelation from God, that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both diuine and humane lawes: though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate and purchase eternall glorie. Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life, with a grievous punishment.

At that time Herod gaue small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soone as he had obtained the kingdom to the fullness of his felicitie, hee in the greatnesse of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long hee should raigne. But hee returned him a doubtfull answer. Which when Herod perceiued, hee asked him anew if he should raigne ten yeeres. Vvhercunto Manahem answered, and twentie, and thirtie, without setting him downe any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himselfe herewith, embraced Manahem, and gaue him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Essians for his sake. I haue thought good to register these sayings, notwithstanding they may seeme vncredible, to declare that diuers of our nation haue had communication with GOD by reason of their holinesse.

CHAP. XIII.

Herode buildeth a newe Temple in Ierusalem, after he had pulled downe the old.

IN the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, Herod, after hee had finished these many and admirable actions, conceiued in his mind no meane, but a mightie project, which was to reedifie Gods Temple of greater bignesse & answerable height, hoping that this work, which was the most admirable of all those he had vnderaken (as indeed it was) in being finished, would eternize his memorie. But fearing least the people in regard of the greatnesse of the enterprise, would be hardly drawne thereunto, hee determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner;

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain & superfluous, to recount vnto you what things I haue performed, during the time of my gouernment. For they haue been of that nature,

A that they haue returned me but little honour; and your selfe great profit and securitie. For you your selves know that in those aduersities that haue befallen you, I haue been no wayes negligent in that which concerned your proficite; and in those buildings I haue erected by Gods assistance, I haue not so much regarded my selfe, as that which concerneth you all: and my hope is by the wil of God that I haue brought the estate of the Iewes to that degree of felicitie, that they neuer had or expected before this time. As for that which I haue particularly exploited in the heart of the country, & in the cities which I haue augmented, as well with ornament & beautie, as with a number of inhabitants; since you your selves know, I thinke it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your memorie. But I must at this time assure you that the desseign which I will presently enterprise, is far more holy and more excellent, then may be performed by vs. For our predecessors after they were returned from the captiuitie of Babylon, builded a temple in honour of our great and mightie God, which in height wanted sixtie cubits of that which Salomon first built: yet ought we not to object as a blame, or ascribe this action to any impietie in our ancestors. For the temple was not at their disposition, but the measure of the building was set them down by Cyrus and Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, to whom and their successors they haue first of all been lawes, as after their time they haue beene vnder the subiection of the Macedonians: so that they had not the meanes & opportunitie, to raise this religious monument, according to his first patterne, to that requisite and conuenient height. But since at this present by Gods permission, I haue obtained the kingdom; and that for a long time hitherto we haue enioied a happy peace; and that neither money nor great reuenues are wanting; & that which is our greatest good, we are made happy by the fauour of the Romanes, who in a sort are the Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire friends: I will enforce my selfe to repaire that defect, which hapned in times past thorow the miseries, and weake meanes of our noble predecessors, resolving with my selfe to perfect that which is requisite for the seruice of God, in acknowledgement of the benefices which I haue receiued from him, by whose mercy and meanes I haue obtained my kingdom.

This sodaine and v unexpected speech of Herods, filled all mens eares with wonder, and hearts with expectation in that he seemed to promise such a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought farre greater then his power; and that which most distracted them was, for that they had conceiued a feare, least after he had pulled downe the olde, hee should not bee of abilitie to erect a new. For which cause his counsaile seemed to be dangerous, and attempt ouer difficult. But the king perceiuing with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promising in no sort to deface the olde temple, before all that was prepared and polished which was requisite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For he appointed a thousand chariots to draw stones vnto the place, and chose out amongst the rest ten thousand cunning and expert workemen. Hee apparrailed also at his owne charge one thousand Priests in their accustomed vestments, whereof some gaue the masons instructions how they should worke, and the rest assisted the carpenters. This done, after he had fitly and readily performed and prepared all things requisite, he caused them to fall to their building. As soone as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and other more new were planted in their place, the temple was erected vpon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twentie cubits in height about those hundred cubits which the former contained, which twentie cubits were in some sort scantled after that by succession of time the foundations began to be settled, and during Neroes raigne our countymen had thought to haue raised it to the first height. The building was of white and strong marble stones, which were each of them twentie and fiue cubits long, eight cubits high, and about some twelue cubits broad. All the structure of the same was made after the manner of a princely palace on all sides, and the middle part thereof was higher then the rest: so that it might easily bee discovered by the inhabitants of the country many furlongs off; and especially it was most apparant and subiect to their sight, who dwelt opposite against it, or repaired vnto the Citie. The doores thereof and their transomes were correspondent to the rest of the magnificence of the temple, garnished with diuers tapestries, & azured flowers, which inuested & adorned the pillars: vnder whose chapters a golden vine spread it self on each side, replenished with many goodly clusters of grapes hanging downe; which was an admirable worke to behold, both in respect of the greatnesse, as also for the workmanship and matter whereof it was made. Hee encompassed all the temple with most goodly galleries, and porches correspondent to the magnificence of the same, and surpassing those in times past for the cost; so that neuer any man before him so magnificently adorned the temple. Two of which were vnder-propped with very strong wals, whose workmanship was so exquisite as it is incredible to bee reported amongst men. There was a stony rising or hillocke, and verie streight and high, the top wherof towards the eastermost part of the citie was somewhat smooth and vpright. The first that encompassed it with a wall was Solomon our king, who by Gods fauour and the mediation and labour of diuers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herode also inuested the lower part thereof with an other wall, vnder which to the southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastned the one vnto the other with lead, shutting all within his enclosure, & extending it self very deepe; so that the greatnes and height of this foure square building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatnes of the stones appeared in the front, but on the inside they were fastned together with claspes of yron, which fortified and strengthened the building for euer against all iniuries of times. This worke hauing bene thus continued to the top, and the void space between the wall and the rising hillocke filling vp the floore aboue, was made plaine and equal. The whole circuit of the tower contained about foure stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to euery pane from angle to angle. On the inside and nere vnto the top there was an other wall of stone extended along the easterne side; hauing a double porch of equall greatnesse with that of the wall, and placed in the midst of the temple, and openeth right vpon the gares thereof, which the kings before time had adorned. Round about the temple were planted those spoiles which were taken from the Barbarians, which king Herod had placed there with all those spoiles, which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the north side there stood a verie strong and defended fortresse, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessors, and had bene both kings and high priests, and had imposed a name on that tower which was Baris, in which they kept the priestly vesture, wherewith the high priest was wont to bee adorned at that time only when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herode kept the same in that place, and there remained it after his death vntill the time of Tiberius Caesar: vnder whom Vitellius gouernour of Syria came vnto Ierusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the fauours that hee had receiued at their hands, being requested by them that they might haue the keeping of the high priests ornaments, he wrote vnto Tiberius Caesar, to grant them that fauour, & till the death of king Agrippa the Iewes had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that gouerned Syria, & Cuspius Fadus lieutenant of Iudaea, commanded the Iewes to returne the same into the fortresse Antonia, saying that the Romans ought to be Lord thereof, as they had bin in times past. For which cause the Iewes sent embassadors to Claudius Caesar, to request his fauor therein, who arriuing at Rome found the young king Agrippa there, who belonged to the Emperour that it might bee lawfull for him to haue the keeping of the habit: who commaunded Vitellius the gouernor of Syria, to deliuer it vnto his hands. Before time it was kept vnder the seale of the high priest, and the custody of the treasurers, & on the eue of a certaine solemne feast the treasurers went vp to the capitaine, who kept the fortresse for the Romans, and after they had opened their seale they tooke the habit: and after the feast was past, they returned it backe againe vnto the same place, and shut it vp vnder the same seale in the presence of the capitaine. All which wee haue thought good to lay open to make the diuersity knowne that was vsed in that care.

After that Herode had in this fort builded this strong tower for the securitie and guard of the temple, he called it Antonia, for the loue of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefe men in Rome. In the westerne part of this porch, there were foure gates, whereof the one opened vpon the kings palace, to which there was a direct way thorowe the midst of the valley; the two others led vnto the suburbs: and the fourth opened vpon the rest of the citie, & gaue open passage vnto the same, by the meanes of a number of staires, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other staires to ascend vpwades. For the citie was situate nere vnto the temple, after the manner of a theater; and was bended to the southward by a deepe valley. As touching the fourth side turned toward the south, it had likewise certaine gates in the midst thereof; and vpon the same there was a triple gallerie verie royall and princely, the length whereof extended from the orientall valley as farre as the westerne. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This worke was one of the most famous peeces that was euer seene vnder the sunne: For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottome, if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to looke from the toppe thereof, and to consider the depth as well of the valley as the height of the porch, it would make a man giddie, and his eye could not pearce vnto the immeasurable bottome of the same. It had in length

A length foure ranks of pillars opposed the one right ouer against the other (for the fourth pane of the wall was fortified with a wall of hewen stone) the thicknesse of the pillars was such, that it was as much as three men could fadom holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twenty and seven fathoms, with a double base at the bottome. The whole number of them was one hundred, sixtie and two, and they had Chapters engrauen and damasked with Corinthian worke. All this building was so huge, that it moued admiration in those that behelde the same. Betweene these foure ranks there were three porches, whereof two were on either side, containing in breadth each of them thirtie fathoms, and in length a stade or furlong: and more then fiftie foote in height. That in the midst was in breadth once and a halfe as much as these two; and in height twice as much. For it surpassed the rest by farre. The floore was made of goodly planks, engrauen with diuers figures; and the rooffe thereof was farre higher then any of the rest, in which certaine huge beames were mortised, on which there were certaine pillars builded, vnited and annexed so tighly together, that it is a matter incredible to those that haue not seene the same, and admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the fashion of the circuit of the first porch. In the midst, and not farre off from the other, stood the second; whereunto there was an ascent made with few steppes. It was inclosed with a separation of stone, with an inscription, forbidding any stranger to enter the same vpon paine of death. This inward porch both to the southward and the northward had three gates, in ranke equidistant the one from the other; and toward the eastward had one great gate, by which those men entred who were cleaused with their wifes. For beyond that place it was not lawfull for the women to haue access. But the third inward space was only accessible by the Priests. In it was the Temple, and before the same the Altar; on which they were wont to offer burnt sacrifices vnto God. But Herode durst not enter the interior sanctuarie, from whence profane men were excluded by the lawe: but by the mediation of the priests he intended the structure and building of the inward porch, and finishing in eight yeeres space the rest of the edifice, at length also he finished the Temple it selfe, by the induours of the same priests, within the terme of one yeere and sixe moneths. By which meanes the people were replenished with the fulnesse of ioye, and euery one gaue thanks vnto God for that the whole worke was finished so speedily, and wished all happinesse to the king for his cost and diligence in the execution and finishing thereof: and they celebrated a great feast in honour of the restauration of the Temple. Then did the king offer vp three hundred oxen vnto God, and the rest of them each one according to his abilitie offered so many sacrifices, as that scarcely they may be comprehended in number, for that their multitude exceedeth their estimate.

About the very time of the celebration of this feast in honour of the reedification of the Temple, the kings day of coronation fell out, which hee was wont to solemnize euery yeere with great ioye: and for this twofold occasion the solemnitie and ioy was farre more sumptuous and compleate. The king also caused a conduit of water to bee made, and conuayed by pipes vnder ground, drawing it from the Cattle Antonia vnto the Orientall gate of the temple; nere to which he builded an other Tower also, to the ende, that by the conduits he might ascend priuily vnto the Temple, if happely the people should practise any insurrections against his royalty. It is reported, that during the building of this temple, it neuer rained by day time, but onely by night, to the intent the worke might not bee interrupted: and our predecessors haue testified no lesse vnto vs. Neither is this thing vncredible if wee attentively consider those other effectes of Gods prouidence. CHAP. I.

How Alexander and Aristobulus being returned vnto their father, were assailed and calumniated by Salome and Pheroras.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Herod made a new law that wall-breakers should bee sold into bondage out of the kingdome. The punishment of theft according to the law of Moses. Exod. 1. 22. Deut. 12. 15.

Mongst the rest of the affaires of the common wealth, the king thought it behooued him to redresse and hinder priuate iniuries, both in the Citie and countrey: for the which purpose hee made a new law vnlike to the former, that it should bee lawfull for such as were wall-breakers, to bee sold for slaues out of the limits of his kingdome: which law did not seeme so much to intend the punishment of malefactors, as the dissolution of his owne countrey customes. For to serue forraine nations, who liued not after the manner of the Iewes, and to doe whatsoeuer they commanded them, was more preiudiciall vnto religion then vnto the parties conuicted of that fact. Wherefore it was sufficiently already in the olde auncient lawes provided for the punishment of such people, to wit, that a theefe should restore foure times as much as he stole: which if hee was not able to doe, that then he was to be sold; not vnto strangers, nor into perpetual bondage, but onely for seven yeeres: at which time he should againe be set free. So that the common people did interpret this new law to set downe an vnjust punishment, and rather to saue of tyranny, then of princely dignitie, and to be enacted not without contempt of their auncient lawes: so that for this cause all men spake verie ill of the king.

At the same time Herode sayled into Italy to salute Caesar, and to see his children living at Rome. Where, Caesar receiving him very curteously, permitted him to take his sons home with him, as being now sufficiently instructed in the liberall artes. Who returning into their country were ioyfully receiued of all their countymen, both for that they were of comely stature, and of A of curteous conditions; and in their very behauiour did shew that they came of kingly lineage. Which things moued Salome and the rest, by whose false accusations their mother Mariamne was oppressed, to enuie them; fearing their puissance, & verily perswading themselves that they would be reuengers of their mothers iniuries. So taking hereby occasion, they began also falsely to accuse them, as mistaking their father, who had caused their mother to be slaine, and as though they had an auersion from him, whose hands were imbrued in their mothers blood. For they well perceived that by such calumniation they might draw them into hatred, and auert their well good will from them. Yee did they not carry these their inuentions to the kings eares, but contented themselves to brute them abroad amongst the common people; which so in the end coming to his hearing, would cause in him such enmity and hatred against his sonnes, as that it would overcome in him all naturall affection.

CHAP. II.

How Herod gaue wines vnto Alexander and Aristobulus.

But the king as yet mistrusting nothing, moued with a fatherly care ouer them, had them in such estimation as reason did requite, and for that they were now come vnto mans estate, hee married them both; and vnto Aristobulus he gaue Bernice the daughter of Salome; and vnto Alexander, Graphyra the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia. Which done, vnderstanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into Asia, hee went vnto him thither, and inuited him into his kingdome, requestling him to accept of his friendes entertainment. Which Agrippa yeelding vnto Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for he receiued him in his Citie newly built, shewing him the faire houses and goodly edifices, entertaining him and the rest of his friends and followers with all sorts of delights, pompe & magnificence, as well at Sebaste, as at the hausen of Caesarea, and in the Cattles hee built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. Hee also brought him to Ierusalem, where all the people met him, apparelled in such goodly and braue attire, as they were accustomed to adorne themselves withall when as they celebrated their festiuals, and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued & saluted him. Agrippa offered a hundreth head of fat oxen to God, and feasted all the people; and although he would willingly haue made a longer abode there, yet winter drawing nigh, fearing tempestuous weather, he was forced to saile away with all speed into Ionia, both hee and his friends being honoured with verie great presents.

CHAP. III.

Herode hauing past the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an armie minded to go to Bosphorus, the spring time being now at hand, hee sayled vnto him againe, and taking his course by Rhodes & Cos, he came toward Lesbos, thinking there to finde Agrippa: but by a contrary winde he was driuen from thence, and forced a while to stay at Chius; where many priuately comming to salute him, he rewarded them with princely rewards: & perceiving that the citie gate, destroyed in the wars against Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but lay still ruined for want of money to repaire it, hee gaue them so much money as largely sufficed to restore it to the former beautie and bignesse; exhorting them with all expedition to reedifie and adorne the Citie as it was in times past. At last the winde changing, he sailed first to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there vnderstanding that Agrippa had already past the rocks of Cyanes, he followed him with all speed, and ouertooke him at Synope a Citie of Pontus: who contrarie to Agrippas expectation arrived there with his nauie: Herods comming was verie gratefull vnto Agrippa, and with especial affection they embraced one another. It was an euident sign of friendship, that the king omitting his own priuate busines, would now come vnto him in so conuenient a time. Wherefore Herod still abode with him in the army, alwaies present either to assist him with counsell, or to beare part of the labour with him. Hee was also present with him at such times as hee meant to be merrie, being his onely counsellor in difficult matters, for the beneuolence he bare vnto him, and also in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa hauing dispatched the businesse in Pontus for which he came, it pleased him not to return by sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and so they came by land to Ephesus: and there taking shippe they came to Samos. And in all that whole iourney, almost Herode sayled vnto Agrippa to Chius, and gaue a great summe of money to reedifie the porch.

Herod found Agrippa at Synope a citie of Pontus, and was by him honourably entertained.

almost in euerie citie he gratified Herod, at his entreatie relieuing many of their necessities. And Herode did in the way helpe many with money that wanted, and spent much vpon his guests; and moreover if any one had any suit vnto Agrippa, Herode was the onely man that might obtaine his suit for him. And although Agrippa also was both nobly minded and easily entreated to grant all such things as were not preiudiciall to any man, yet was it a matter of no small moment and importance in king Herode, to incite him to vs. beneficence, beinge euen of his own accord forward enough to put the same in practise. For first of all he reconciled Agrippa beinge angrie against the Ilienians, and himselfe paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted vnto Casars receiueurs, obtaininge for them an immunitie: and hee also assisted and pleased others in what soeuer they needed.

CHAP. III.

How the Iewes of Ionia accused those countymen for offering to take from them their priuiledges, granted vnto them by the Romans.

The Iewes of Ionia complained vnto Agrippa of the injuries offered them by those countymen. Nicholas did make a speech vnto Agrippa in the behalfe of the Iewes.

When they came into Ionia, a great multitude of Iewes inhabiting that countrey being gathered together, expected him to speake vnto him; and findinge opportunitie, they complained vnto him of the wrongs that those countymen offered them, not permitting them to liue according vnto their lawes; and that vpon festiuall dayes they pulled and haled them before their tribunall: and that they would not permit them to send sacred moniey vnto Ierusalem, and that they compelled them to doe publike busines, and to spend the holy money in thole affaires, contrarie vnto the priuiledges granted vnto them by the Romanes. Herode laboured to haue the Iewes complaints heard by Agrippa, and willed one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Iewes cause: who made a speech vnto Agrippa, sitting with the rest of the Roman nobilitie, and other kings and princes, in their behalfe after this manner:

„Most worthy Agrippa, true it is that all men that suffer iniurie are constrained to flie for redresse to the higher powers, and we ouer and aboue hope to obtaine our suit. For wee aske nothing but that which your beneficence hath already granted, and that which they endeavour to take from vs that are, as wee also are, your subiects. And although that your benefit bestowed vpon vs was great, yet are wee worthe still to enioy it, onely for that you your selfe iudged vs worthy thereof. And suppose it was a small matter, it is a discredite for you not to grant so small a trifle.

„Wherefore it is euident, that the iniurie done vnto vs, doth also redound vnto you, whose decrees those that haue iniured vs, feare not to contemne, and to disannull your beneficence towards vs.

„For if any one should aske any of them whether they had rather lose their liues, then be deprived of their countrey lawes, rites, sacrifices, and festiuities, wherewith they honour their Gods; I know well they would rather endure any calamitie, then to be forced to forsake their countrey customes.

„For many wars arise onely for defence of religion, & the greatest reward & content that we reap by this happie peace, which through your means we enioy, is this: that wee are euerie one permitted to liue according to the custome of his countrey, and to continue in pietie. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by no means they would permit to be taken from themselves; as who should say, it was not as great an offence to hinder other mens pietie and deuotion, as neglect their owne. Let vs consider whether there be any citie or nation, that doth not account their felicitie to bee situate in your dominion, & the power of the Romanes? or is there any that desireth your honour & power to decay and be of no force? Truly none that is wise: for there is none, whom either publicly or priuately it concerneth not: but these people endeavouring to take frō vs your liberalitie, do also as it were deprive themselves of all benefits which they haue receiued at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other nations liuing vnder the dominion of rigorous kings constituted ouer the; these do only obey the Romanes, and liue in happy peace and tranquillitie? But as for our affaires, were no man troublesome vnto vs, yet are they not such as deserue to be enuiet. For enioying the common felicity, which others your subiects do, we desire nothing of high estimate & worth, but onely request that we may liue according to the religion of our countrey, which of it selfe is not to be enuiet at, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth alwaies loue them, who honour him, and them who do not hinder his honour. What is there in our religion offensive to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all pietie and iustice: whereby all things continue & are preserved? For neither do we conceale what life wee follow, nor the labours and exercise wee vs, but resting the

A seventh day from all labours, we spend that day in learning our religio, & the lawes & customes thereof, esteeming this custome not to bee of small force to correct and amend our manners. These our customes haue in them nothing that any that searcheth them, can iustly reprehend, they are now also, though many are perswaded the contrarie, consecrated and confirmed by their antiquitie: So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our lawes, that haue endured so many ages. These are the injuries that those people by violence offer vs; they sacrilegiously take from vs the money dedicated to God: they impose tributes vpon vs, who are free: they vpon festiuall daies force vs to their tribunalls, to haue either prophane businesse, without any necessity, but onely in contumely and disgrace of our religion, which they knowe well in the meane while that they persecute with vnkind and vnlawfull hatred. For your Empire, equally providing for the good of all your subiects, doth not ouerly nourish the mutuell concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice: These are the injuries most worthy Agrippa, whereof wee seeke redresse at thy hands, requesting thee that hereafter we may liue according to our religion as before times, and that our aduersaries may haue no more authority ouer vs then we ouer them: which is not onely iustice and equitie, but already also granted by your clemencie. And there are yet extant to bee seene in the Capitoll many decrees and ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engrauen in brasse, which are read vnto this day: doubtesse for our truth and fidelitie so oftentimes tried: or at least, though we not deseruing it, yet holy and inuiolate. For you do not only not withdraw from vs & all other nations your former benefits granted vnto vs, but you do rather every day beside all hope and expectation increase them: all which, time will not suffer me to recount. And that we may not seeme vainely to boast of our duties and officiousnes towards you, and also omitting other things that are past; our king now sitting with you can sufficiently testifie it so to be. For what kind of loue & good will hath he omitted to shew vnto your nation? where was he not proued truly: what hath hee not deuised to honour you? where stood you in need, when he was not the first man to helpe you? Why therefore should not wee receiue some fauour for his deserts? I will not omit to put you in minde of the fortitude of his father Antipater, who came with two thousand soldiers to assist Cesar in the Egyptian warres, wherein hee so valiantly behaued himselfe, that neither by sea nor land any one in those warres deserued more commendations then himselfe. I will not at this time recount how much good hee did Cesar in those warres, and what and how great rewardes hee therefore receiued: but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance of the letters that the Emperour writ vnto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith hee obtained for Antipater the honours and priuiledges of the citie. For this onely argument had bene sufficient to haue declared that wee did not obtaine such fauour without desert, & request thee now to confirme the same, of whome wee might iustly hope for new benefits, seeing such friendship and familiaritie between thee and our king. For wee haue vnderstood by our nation that dwell in Iudæa, how many offerings thou didst there sacrifice vnto our God, & with what vowes thou honouredst him: how thou feastedst the people, and wast delighted in that mutuell hospitalitie. All which are as it were an argument of the friendship confirmed betweene so great a Roman prince, and the nation of the Iewes, euen in Herodes house. By all these, we humbly request in the presence of the king nothing but this onely, that thou wouldest not permit vs deceitfully to bee defrauded of that, which you your selues haue already granted vnto the nation of the Iewes.

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppose himselfe against that which Nicholaus did speak: for this was no contention to a Iudge concerning their right, but onely a deprecation and supplication to auoid iniurie. Neither did they denie it: onely thus they excused themselves, that the Iewes dwelling amongst them were troublesome vnto them. But the Iewes shewed themselves to be free citizens, and to liue according to their religion and lawes of their countrey without any mans molestation or iniurie. Wherefore Agrippa vnderstanding that they were wronged, answered thus; that he would not onely gratifie the for his friend Herods sake, but also for that they seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would haue granted them whatsoeuer hee might, without preiudicing the people of Rome. And now seeing they onely demanded of him that which already the Romanes had granted vnto them, hee would ratifie and confirme vnto them the benefit which they had already receiued at the Romanes hands, and prouide that henceforth no man should molest them for liuing according to the institution and ordinances of their countrey. Hauing thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly. Then Herode arising, thanked him in all their names. And then after mutuell embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaues, from Lesbus.

Agrippa confirmed the Iewes priuiledge.

How Herode returned into Iudaea.

Herod returned to Ierusalem and made a speech vnto
the people, and let them

cause of his iniurie, and remitted the fourth part of

THe king hauing a prosperous winde, within a few dayes after arrived at Caesarea; and from thence hee went to Ierusalem; and calling together all the people, as well the Citizens as also the country people then present, there he tolde them the cause of his iniurie, and how he had obtained immunities for the Iewes living in Asia, that they might conuerse there among the Gentiles, without any molestation. Then hee recounted vnto them, what felicitie they had receiued and enioyed by his raigne, seeing that his greatest care was so to provide for his subiects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the taxes and tribute they were to pay for the year past. The people greatly comforted as wel with the kings speech vnto them, as with his liberalities, departed ioyfully, wishing the king all happinesse.

of the discord in Herodes house, betweene him and his sonnes.

Salome persecuted Mariamnes children with naturall hatred.

IN the meane time, the discord of his house was dayly increased; for Salome greatly maligne the two young men, as hauing an hereditarie hatred rooted in her heart; and presumed by reason of her good successe in her exploit practised against their mother, to labour all waies possible not to leaue any aliuie, that might reuenge her death; who died, not deserring it. And she wanted no occasion, for that it seemed the young men were not verie well affected toward their father, partly for the memorie of their mothers death, & partly also for that they desired the kingdom. So that they vpbraiding Salome and Pheroras did renew their olde hatred against them, who dayly practised, by all meanes they could, to overthrow them: the young men also hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race dissembled not their anger, but with lauish tongues declared their mindes. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwise enuiously and craftily prepared themselves a way by calumnies, alwaies prouoking the magnanimous spirits of these young men, whose fiercenesse might loone bring them into suspicion with their father, to the intent that hee might gather hereby, that they wanted not will to reuenge their mothers death, yea even with their owne hands, forasmuch as they were not ashamed to be the children of such a mother, and would contend that she was vniustly put to death. And now all the whole Citie talked of them, euerie one pitying the young mens simplicitie: Salome not ceasing to gather by their owne speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not only take their mothers death impatiently, but also raging like young men, did both bewaile her death, and their owne case, who were compelled to liue with the murderers of their infortunat mother, & as it were contaminat themselves with liuing amongst them. And the absence of the king greatly increased this their dissension; who being returned, and hauing made a speech vnto the people, hee presently was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his sister, that hee was in great danger, by reason of the two young men, who did openly boast that they would be reuenged of them that killed their mother: feining moreover, that they were encouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus king of Cappadocia would helpe them to accule their father vnto Caesar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, for that hee heard the same also reported vnto him by others: And heereby hee was put in memorie of that which was past, how that for the dissension of his house he could not long enioy his friends and dearest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, and fearing some greater calamitie would befall him, he was altogether amazed. And truly as abroad he was most fortunate about all hope; so at home hee was most vnhappy and infortunat beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate successe abroad did counteruaile his misfortunes at home; or whether it had bene more expedient for him to haue had neither the one nor the other, but to haue had onely a common and ordinarie fauour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himselfe, hee thought it good to call vnto the court another sonne of his, whom he begat when hee was a priuate man, and to grace him with honours, and to oppose him against the other two brethren, to the end, to bring downe and repress their fierce and haughty mindes: (this sonne of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection hee did) to make him sole heire of all, but thinking

Alexander and Antipater being by Salome and Pheroras drawn into bad words are by them accused to their father Herod.

Hedio & Rufinus, lib. 4. al. 8.
Pheroras and Salome accuse Alexander and Antipater before Herod.

Herod was fortunate abroad, and vnfortunate at home.

Herod aduanceth Antipater to bridle the arrogancy of his sonnes.

Ang hereby to bridle Mariamnes children, and to diminish their arrogancy by letting them see that it was not needefull to keepe the inheritance of so flourishing a kingdom onely for them: wherefore hee introduced Antipater one opposed against them, that thereby the young men laying their pride aside, might shew themselves more tractable to their father: and so now hee thought hee had by this meanes provided for the safetie of these young men. But it fell out farre otherwise, then hee expected; for the young men esteemed this fact as an iniurie done vnto them: And Antipater was of that nature, that hauing gotten promotion contrarie to his expectation, hee did endeavour all waies possible to bee in greater account with his father then the two young men, who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and euerie day (as he also desired) ready to beleue any thing that might increase him against them.

B Wherefore this was all his labour: yet had he an especiall care not to be thought an accuser of his brethren, but hee vied others of his accomplices, whom the king nothing suspected, who for the trust the king put in them, might also haue better credit giuen vnto their words. For now this man had many followers and fauourers, as it were gaping after preferment by his meanes, who with a kinde of counterfeit good will made a shewe of loue and good will towards Herod: And being many in number and trafficke one to another, the young men were euerie day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed teares for verie griefe of the contumelies and iniuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned the mother, and complained vnto those whom they thought to be their friends, of their father, as one that dealt not well with them: all which Antipaters partakers maliciously noting, and adding thereunto something of their own inuention, they did presently tell it vnto Herode; and so did nourish the dissension of his house. For the king being moued hereat, and purposing to humble Mariamnes children, did daily increase and augment Antipaters honours, and at his entreaties at last brought his mother into the court, and many times secretly writing vnto Caesar in fauour of Antipater, hee especially commended him in particular vnto him: and being to saile to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, hauing gouerned that prouince ten yeeres, hee onely tooke with him Antipater of all his sonnes, whom also hee committed vnto Agrippa with many gifts, to go with him to Rome, and to be brought into fauour with Caesar; so that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this mans becke, and the young men to be already disinherited.

Antipater inciteth his father against his brethren.

Herod brought Antipater mother into his palace. Herod deliuereth Antipater to Agrippa, to be carried to Rome.

CHAP. VII.

How Antipater lining at Rome, Herod brought Alexander and his brother thither, and accused them before Caesar.

His journey did greatly aduantage Antipater, and increase his honour, and preeminence about his brethren: for hee became famous at Rome being by his fathers letters commended vnto all his friends there: yet this was a great griefe vnto him, that he could not dayly calumnie his brethren; for hee feared lest his fathers minde should change, and so hee should affect Mariamnes children most. This was his dayly cogitation: but though hee were absent, yet hee ceased not by letters to incite his father against them, as hauing care of his safetie, but in deede for that he thereby through his bad practises hoped to obtaine the kingdom: so that hee so increased Herods wrath against them, that hee now was become a deadly enimie vnto the young men. But endeavouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to preiudice them, hee determined to saile againe to Rome, and there accuse his sonnes before Caesar, least he being led away thorow indignation and displeasure conceiued against the young men, should seeme to cast off all loue & fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Caesar there, he followed him vnto Aquileia, and comming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, hee presented his two sonnes, and accused them before Caesar of insolencie, and for hauing attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to bee gone so farre, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoever they sought their fathers kingdom; notwithstanding that Caesar had giuen him full power and liberty to leaue the kingdom to him, whom he found most dutifull and obedient vnto him. And that they, though thereby they might not gaine the kingdom, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their owne liues, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that hee hauing long endured this calamitie, was now forced to open it vnto Caesar, and trouble his eares with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Haue I deferted this at their hands? what wrong haue I done them? or how how can they thinke it reason, that I who haue exposed my selfe to so many dangers; and vndergone so difficult labours for a long time to obtaine the kingdome, should not peaceably enjoy the same, and suffer me to bee Lord of my owne dominion, and permit mee the liberty to leaue it vnto him who shall deserue such honour in the best performance of a son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof seeing pietie so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited therunto, especially seeing that without violating the lawes of nature, it is not lawfull to thinke anie such thought: for no man can affect his fathers kingdome, but he doth also desire his fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succcede those in the kingdome who are yet aliuie. He alleaged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing convenient for a kinde father to prouide for princely children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: that also hee had provided for them wiues of noble race, and had married one of them vnto his sisters daughter; and the other vnto Archelaus and his daughter king of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not vied the authoritie of a father against them after these their enterprises, but brought them vnto Cesar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his owne right of a father, who had been iniured, or of a king, against whom treason had bin wrought, he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a iudge, as well knewe how to decide the thing in question according to right & equitie: yet requested hee him that that offence of theirs might not be left unpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetuall feare: seeing that it was expedient that they should neuer see light againe after such ha-nous offences, and to escape unpunished after the violating of all lawes of God and nature. He rode hauing with a vehement voice objected these accusations against his sonnes before Cesar; I the young men were not able to abstaine from teares whilst hee was yet speaking, and hauing ended his speech they wholly retolued into teares, not for that they were guiltie of those impietie laid vnto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speake freely for themselves, nor expedient to refuse to defend their owne cause. When they remained doubtfull what to doe, mouing the auditors to pitie them by their teares and lamentations, and carefull withall lest it should bee thought that their guiltie conscience did so trouble them, that they were not able to speake in their owne defence, seeing that indeede it was their want of skill and tender yeeres, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Cesar well perceiued, and all that were present were so moued to compassion, that neither their father who was their accuser could long refrain from being moued herat to compassion.

of Alexanders defence, and how the two brethren were reconciled vnto their father Herod.

Then the young men perceiuing both their father and Cesar to relent, and the rest that were present partly to pitie them, partly to shed teares of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech vnto his father, began thus to purge himselfe of the crimes objected against them. My father, how wel & friendly minded thou art towards vs, this present iudgement declareth: for hadst thou determined any heauy sentence against vs, thou wouldest not haue brought vs before him, who is the presenter of vs all: for thou mightest being a king, or for the authoritie ouer vs as a father, haue punished vs for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought vs to Rome, and made Cesar our iudge, it is an argument that thou seekest to saue vs: for no man bringeth any one to the temple whom hee purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggravateth our cause, who do censure our selues unworthy to liue, rather then to incurre an opinion of impietie committed against thee such a father. How farre more expedient is it to die guiltlesse, then to liue suspected of such offences. Wherefore, if truth be our parrone, we shall be happy either by thy own iudgement, or for that we haue escaped danger: but if calumnians doe preuaile against vs, it is superfluous and to no purpose that we liue. For what good would it doe vs, if wee liue in continuall suspicion? It is a probable accusation to accuse our yeeres, as hauing affected the kingdome; and our vnfortunate mothers calamitie maketh it seeme more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not be as well framed against any one whomsoever, as against vs. For any king hauing children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to prouoe a man impious and guiltie: wherfore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by vs to haue been attempted,

A attempted, which may adde credit to this calumny; Can any man shew that payson was prepared by vs for you; or that we conspired with any; or that we corrupted any seruants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters against thee? yet may calumnyation saue euery one of these vpon no occasion. It is a grieuous matter for discord to be in a princes contrie; & the hope of dominion, which your maiestie affirmed to be the reward of pietie, doth often impel mens minds vnto hainous offences. But although it be most certaine that wee cannot bee convicted of any crime; yet how can we cleare our selues from accusations forged against vs before them that will not heare vs? But did wee speake some insolent wordes; yet were they not against thee, O my father (for that had beene impietie) but against them who tell all they heare. Wee bewayled our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not because she is dead, but because after her death thee is euill spoken of by those, who ought not to doe it. Wee affected the kingdome of our father he being yet aliuie. Wherein? Is not that purpose of ours vaine and fruitiuous, wee hauing already become graced with kingly honours? And suppose we were not; yet might wee hope for them.
But could wee expect them by killing of thee, whom both earth and seas would didaine after so execrable an offence? Or could we haue expected that the loyaltie of thy subiects, and the lawes of our nation would haue permitted vs, hauing gotten the kingdome by murdering our father, to haue enjoyed the same, and entered into the holy temple, which thou didst repaire? Or suppose we despised them all; yet could any one that murdered thee escape, Cesar being liuing? Thy children by thee begotten are not so impious nor foolish, though more infortunate then thy estate requireth. And seeing thou hast nothing to accuse vs of, or nothing to prouoe any accusation laid vnto our charge, how canst thou be perswaded that wee are guiltie of such inhumane actes?
Is it because our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to haue made vs more warie, then insolent and rash. Wee could speake more in our owne defence, then this; but what need is it to excuse that which was neuer done? Wherefore we beseech Cesar (who is Lord of all, and now our Iudge) onely this, that if thou canst, O my father, put away out of thy minde all suspicion of vs, to suffer vs to liue hereafter how vnhappy and vnfortunate soeuer: for what is more miserable than to be rashly accused without cause? But if thou canst not, wee liuing, liue without feare of vs, let vs die condemned by our owne censure. For our liues are not so deare vnto vs, that we desire to keepe them to his molestation that bestowed them vpon vs.

Cesar with these words, though before not greatly crediting such accusations and slanders did against them, was now more moued to beleuee that they were guiltlesse; and the rather, All men do for that fixing his eyes vpon Herod, hee perceiued him also to be much moued, and all that were present were sorrowfull for the young men: so that all courtiers present thought hardly of the king for the absurd & fruitiuous accusation framed against them & the flower of their age, wherein they were now inlaugered, moued all mens minds what they could to assist them: And much more were they incited after that Alexander had ingeniously refuted his fathers accusations, the accused remaining still in the same habit and place, and for grieve fixing their eyes vpon the ground.
At last some hope appeared, so that the king himselfe seemed to need some excuse, for hauing so rashly accused his sonnes without any certaine proofe of his accusations. At last, Cesar hauing a while deliberated with himselfe, pronounced that the young men were innocent, and guiltlesse of the crimes laid vnto their charge: yet herein they were culpable, in that they had so behaued themselves, that they gaue their father occasion herein to suspect them. And as for Herode he requested him to lay aside all suspicion, and to be reconciled vnto his children. For it was vniustly done of him to beleuee such forged accusations against those whome hee had begotten, and that one might recompence another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will betwene them in times past, if to abolish all suspicions either did hereafter thewe himselfe more friendly to other then before. Cesar hauing thus admonished the young men, they prepared themselves to intreat their fathers wonted fauour: hee not expecting so long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all those that were present both seruants and others did the like.

Then giuing humble thanks vnto Cesar, they departed together; and Antipater with them counterfaising himselfe to congratulate their good hap, for that they were now reconciled vnto his father. Within a few daies after, Herode gaue Cesar three hundred talents, who was now bestowing his gifts and presents at Rome, and exercising his liberalitie vpon the people. And Cesar againe bestowed vpon him halfe of the reuenues out of the mines of the metall in Cyprus; and the other halfe vnto the ouerseeer thereof, and gracing him otherwaies also, he gaue him leaue to distribute it amongst them all: which Herod presently would haue done, but Cæsar would not permit him, affirming that during his life hee should keepe it all whole and vndiuided, and his sonnes should be subiect vnto him.

After this, Herod returned againe into Iudæa, in whose absence the Trachonites that were no small part of his kingdome, were reuolted: yet by the industrie of the captaines he left to oversee all in his absence, they were conquered againe, and forced to doe as they were commanded. As Herode and his sonnes were sailing towards home, arriuing at Eleusa a citie of Cilicia which is now called Sebaste, he found Archelaus there, who was king of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteously entertain Herod, and was very ioyful that his sonnes and he were made friends, and that Alexander his sonne in law had so well cleared himselfe and his brother of the crimes laide vnto their charge. And so each one bestowing vpon the other princely gifts, they departed, taking their leaue one of the other. After this, Herod being new returned into Iudæa, and calling the people together into the temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, & the courtesie of Cæsar: and tolde them also of other affaires that he thought meet for them to know; and turning the latter end of his speech vnto his sonnes, and exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, hee told them that his sonnes should raigne after him, and first of all Antipater: and after him his sonnes that he had by Mariamme, Alexander and Aristobulus; in the meane time euerie one of them should honour him as King and Lord, notwithstanding his olde age, which for long experience was the fitter to gouerne, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keepe both his subiects and children in their obedience; and that the soldiers also if they onely respected him, should liue in all happines and felicitie without molestation. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the people; some thinking he had spoken according to equitie; others thinking cleane contrary: For hauing now as it were caused an emulation amongst his children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

How Herode hauing finished Cæsarea, for ioy thereof did celebrate euerie fift yeere certaine sports.

Cæsars first wife, Agrippina's sister.

About this time Cæsarea was finished, the tenth yeere after it was begunne to be built, the eight and twentieth yeere of Herods raigne, in the hundreth, foure score and twelfth Olympiade. In the dedication hereof there was great pompe and sumptuous preparations: for all musicians were brought hither to striue one with another, who was most excellent in their art; and champions that wrestled being naked & annointed with oyle: there was also a great many that fought with swords, & a great number of sauage beasts; and all things else that at such times were vsed, and in account either at Rome or in other countries. These sports were also consecrated vnto Cæsar, and were to be renewed euerie fift yeere. All this prouision the king at his owne cost and charges prouided to bee brought from any place whatsoever, to shew the greatnes of his magnificence. Julia, Cæsars wife also bestowed much of hir owne to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted vnto fife hundreth talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sportes, hee receiued all Embassadors sent vnto him from other nations, to thanke him for the benefittes hee had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted, and sported them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sportes, at night he receiued them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy king. For he in all things so prouided, that the last was more pleasing and gratefull then the first, and caused him to be more admired. And it is reported that Cæsar himselfe and Agrippa often did say, that Herods magnanimitie was greater then his present reuenues could beare, and that hee well deserued an empire, as big as all Syria, and Egypt. These sportes being ended, he builded another towne in a field called Capharfabas, chusing for it a watery soyle fit for plants: the citie was compassed with a riuer; and he also planted round about it a wood full of most goodly trees. This towne he called Antipatris, after his fathers name Antipater. After which he also builded a castle about Iericho, called after his mothers name Cypron, which was verie strongly defended, and adorned within with rare and sumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, hee dedicated vnto him most goodly buildings: for first he builded a tower as bigge as Pharo in the citie, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phasaelus, which also was the strongest hold and defence in all the citie. After this, he builded a towne nere vnto the valley of Iericho, as one goeth toward the north, wherby the fields that before almost lay desert were now tilled

A tilled and inhabited by the townsmen; so that of them it was named Phasaelus field. It were hard to recount all his liberality in particular shewed both vnto the Cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places wherefoeuer he came: for he helped many either by building publick places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finished for want of money, by giuing them money to finish them: the chiefest amongst all which were, that he builded at his owne cost & charge the temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gaue them many talents of siluer to build their ships. He also builded the greatest part of the publicke houses and places in the Citie by Actium, which Cæsar built for the Nicopolitans there inhabiting, and that with his owne proper costes and charges. Hee also for the Antiochians inhabiting the greatest Citie of Syria, builded porches on each side of the greater streete, that goeth quite thorow the middest of the City, and doth as it were part it into two: and the streete it selfe that lay open, he paved with polished stone: which worke was as great a commodity to the inhabitants, as a beautie vnto their City. He also helped to maintain the sports at Olympus with yeerely reuenues, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: so that by his meanes there were more solemn sacrifices, and all things more sumptuous to please them that came to behold them: for which his liberality he was declared a perpetuall master and maintainer of those sports. It is admirable to see in one man such diuersitie of mindes: for on the one side if we respect his liberality and beneficence towards all men, we must needs say, he was of a most free and bountifull nature; contrariwise, if we consider the iniuries and cruelty he shewed against his subiects and dearest friends, we must confesse him to haue been a hard man, and intractable, and who passed all bounds of modesty: so that we would thinke him to haue bene of two contrary dispositions. But I am otherwise perswaded, and thinke that both these did proceed from one matter: for because hee thirsted after glorie and honour, and wholly applied himselfe therunto, he became liberal wherefoeuer he was, in hope either to reape present thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore spending aboue his reuenues for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable vnto his subiects: for it was necessary that he that so lauishly bestowed such huge summes of money vpon others, should some where get it, though with euill meanes. Lastly, seeing himselfe for such like iniuries hated of his subiects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wils; which he could do no waies else, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abused the hatred of his people for his owne commoditie: for if any one of them did not tolerate that slauerie wherein they liued, or did indeuour to shake off the yoke of his dominion, against such he vsed a meruailous cruelty; and outraged them no lesse, then as if they had been his enemies, neither respecting friendship nor kindred; for that he desired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may ghesse by the honours he did vnto Cæsar, Agrippa, and others of their friends: for he desired to be an example vnto his subiects, that as he himselfe honoured men better then himselfe, so they should all honour him likewise: thereby declaring what thing he did naturally most desire. But the Iewes religion doth not permit them licence to honour potentates, who of necessity ought to haue greater care and respect of right and equitie, then of such officiousnesse toward superiours: for it was disprofite enough vnto the Iews that they could not with statues and temples obtaine the kings fauour, and with such like flatteries satisfie the fonde appetites of a vaine glorious man. And this seemeth to me to be the reason that Herode was vnjust, and hard towards his friends, and to those whom he made partakers of his counsells and enterprises: and franke and bountifull towards strangers.

Of the Embassage of the Cyrenian and Asian Iewes vnto Cæsar.

He Asian and Cyrenian Iewes were greatly afflicted by the Citizens of those countries, who hauing had the same priuiledge granted vnto them by the ancient kings that the Citizens had, were now greatly iniured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the country, & were preiudicial vnto the rest of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of these their iniuries, they were constrained by Embassadors to complain of them vnto Cæsar: who wrote vnto euery prouince, that it was his pleasure that the Iewes should enioy like priuiledges with the other inhabitants of the countrey. The copy of which writing we haue here set down, that it may the better appeare, how the Roman Emperors of ancient times were affected vnto our nation.

Caesar Augustus Pont. Max. Trib. potestatis, thus decreeth. Forasmuch as the nation of the G Iewes hath alwaies been trusty vnto the Romans, not only at this day, but also in all former ages, and especially in the time of our father Caesar the Emperour, vnder Hircanus their high Priest: I haue ordained, that according to the common sentence of the Senate, they shall liue after their country lawes, vnder which they liued in the time of Hircanus the high Priest of God: and that their temple shall retain the right of a sanctuarie, and that it shall bee lawfull for them to sende votiuie money vnto Ierusalem by certaine persons: and that they shall not bee compelled to appeare before any Iudge vpon their Sabaoth daies, or the day before their Sabaoths, after nine of the clocke vpon the preparation day. And if any one be knowne to steale the holie bookes, or holy money laid vp in their places appointed for religion, he shall be guilty of sacriledge: and his goods shall bee confiscated vnto the treasury of the people of Rome. I also decree for the good will I beare vnto all men, that their memoriall or request offered vnto me by C. Marcus Censorinus, shall together with this my edict be published in that famous place, which all Asia hath dedicated vnto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any shall be so hardy as to doe contrary to our decree, he shall be punished extraordinarily. This was engrauen in a pillar in Caesars temple. Caesar wisheth health vnto Norbanus Flaccus: let it be lawfull for all Iewes whereloeuer liuing, to carrie their sacred money vnto Ierusalem, according to their auncient custome, and that no man should forbid them so to doe: and this did Caesar write in fauour of the Iewes.

Agrippa writ

Agrippa also wrote in the Iewes behalfe, as followeth: Agrippa wisheth health vnto the magistrates, Senate, and people of Ephesus. I will that the Iewes liuing in Asia keepe their sacred money, which according to the custome of their countrey, they are wont to sende vnto Ierusalem: and if any one shall steale their holy money, that the same person if he fle to a sanctuarie, shall be violently taken away from thence, as a sacrilegious person, and deliuered vnto the Iewes to be punished. He also wrote vnto Syllanus the magistrate, that the Iewes might not bee constrained vpon their Sabaoths to appeare before a Iudge. M. Agrippa wisheth health to the Cyrenian magistrates and Senate. The Iews inhabiting amongst you, for whom Augustus hath already written vnto Flavius the president of Libya, and vnto other magistrates of that prouince, are not to bee hindered from sending their holy money to Ierusalem, as their custome is: and they haue now complained vnto me, that they are molested by the false accusations of some bad people, and forbidden to doe it vnder pretence of a certaine tribute, which notwithstanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I commaund that they may bee permitted to liue after their custome, and free from all such matters: and if in any of your Cities any sacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certaine persons which you knowe to be fit for that purpose ye make choise of them, to send it againe vnto the Iewes. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconsul, Health vnto the magistrates of Sardinia: Caesar hath written vnto mee, commaunding that no man hinder the Iewes, according to their custome, to send sacred money vnto Ierusalem: wherefore I also write vnto you of the same, that you may not be ignorant both of my wil and Caesars also. Moreover, Iulius Antonius proconsul did also write to this effect: Health vnto the magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus. The Iewes of Asia in the Ides of Februarie, I sitting in iudiciall seat at Ephesus, signified vnto me that Caesar Augustus and Agrippa haue permitted them to vse their countrey customes, and every one, according as he thinketh good, to contribute his first frutes for religion sake, to be carried without let or hinderance vnto the temple of the most mighty God: & they desired me to ratifie by my consent, that which they had already granted them by the abouenamed Emperours. Wherefore I would haue you to know, that I also, according vnto Caesars and Agrippas decrees and ordinaunces, doe permit and grant them also to doe all things they please, according vnto their countrey customes, forbidding anie man to hinder them therein.

Caius Norbanus Flaccus

proconsul.

I haue thought good to annexe these decrees, for that I know that these my writings will come vnto the Grecians hands, that I may shew them that in former ages wee were so esteemed of the publick magistrates that none were permitted to hinder vs from vsing our countries rites and ceremonies; and that by their consent we worshipped God in our owne religion: which I do inculcate the oftner, that I may moue strange and forraigne nations, and take away their hatred conceived against vs, which is without all reasonable cause. For no nation doth alwaies vse the same custome, but almost whole towne amongst them do sometimes alter and differ from the rest; yet is Iustice equally to be distributed vnto all men: which is most possible, as well to the Greeks as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly obserued in our laws; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations loue vs. Wherefore we request all men not to despise vs for that

A that we differ from them in religion, but fauour vs in that we follow vertue. For this is comon to all nations: and without this, mans life cannot stand. But I will now retorne vnto my history.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod hauing neede of money, opened Dauids Sepulchre.

Herod spending lauishly much and many summes of money, both at home and abroade, hearing that Hircanus, who raigned before him, opened Dauids Sepulchre, and tooke out of it three thousand talents of siluer, and that there was left yet farre more, able to defray any great charges whatsoever, he long time purposed to doe the like. And at this time in the night season accompanied only with his most trustie friends, being verie warie that none of the people should know of it, he entred into the Sepulchre: but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he tooke from thence a great company of precious attires & ornaments of gold; whereby he was entised to make a more diligent search: and he sent two of his companie for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Salomon and Dauid were intombed, who were there lost, and as it is reported, fire came out of those secret places and consumed them. Whereat Herode being terrified, departed out of it; and moued with religion to make satisfaction, he builded a most sumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre: of which building Nicholaus also a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he speaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of Dauid, thinking that therein hee should not keepe decorum, if hee should make mention thereof. Wherein he followed his accustomed order: for his writings were to come to the eares of the king yet liuing, wherein he did onely curry fauour, mentioning onely that, that might redound vnto the kings credit: so that many of his open and wicked pranks, he doth either colour vnder some other pretence, or else all waies possible he endeavour to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods crueltie against Mariamme, and his sonnes; as though he did thereby deserue credit and praise, accusing her of adultery, and them as traitors vnto their father: and this he dooth cleane throw his workes, too much extolling the kings good deedes, and too diligently excusing his bad deedes and iniquities. But as I haue said, we must pardon him, who did not so much write to leaue a memorie of things done vnto after ages, as to gratifie and please his king. But I, who come of the lineage of the Asamonian kings, and execute the office of a Priest, account it a shame to lie: and doe intend truly to recount the history of all things that were acted and done, yet with a reuerence of the posteritie of that king, who doe also now beare sway and rule; yet with their pardon and leaue, hauing a greater care to the verity of our history, then to them.

Herods house.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods house began to decay, whether reuenge lighting vpon that part which was already scarce found, or whether by meere chance such calamity at that time befell him, as might iustly be thought the reward of impietie. For there was a discord in the court not vnlike vnto ciuill warres, euerie one struing against other with hatred and forged accusations: but especially Antipaters politick practice against his brethren was to be noted, who intangling them by other mens forged accusations, himselfe oftentimes seemed to take vpon him their defence, that making a shew of good will vnto them hee might secretly oppresse them the sooner; and hee did so craftily circumuent his father, that his father deemed him to be his onely conseruer. Wherefore the king commended Ptolomeus his procurator vnto Antipater his sonne, and did communicate all his secrets vnto his mother, so that all things were done according as they pleased, and they made him displeased with those against whom they knewe the kings displeasure might redound vnto their profit.

Antipaters

But Mariammes children did euery day stomacke the matter more and more, disdayning to giue place vnto their inferior: and for their nobilitie not enduring to bee removed from their places, and not to keepe their dignitie also: their wiues did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra, who was the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, did greatly enuie and disdain Salome; and she also her againe, both for the loue that she bare vnto her husband, and for that she disdaind (as women are wont) that her daughter married vnto Aristobolus should be in equall honour with her. Pheroras also the kings brother had a hand in this other contention about a priuate cause of suspicion and hatred. For he fell so farre in loue with one of his maides, that he refused the kings daughter offered vnto him, rather making choise of his maide. Herode tooke this in very euill part, seeing his brother (who had receiued so many benefits at his hands, and

And seeing hee could not dissuade him from that madnesse, he married his daughter vnto Phasaelus his sonne, and afterward thinking that now his brothers mind towards his maide was satisfied, he complaining of his iniurious dealing in repulsing his daughter, offered vnto him to wife, he now offered him another of his daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus aduised Pheroras not still to contemne his brothers offer, and persist in such folly; telling him it was meere folly therefore to incurre the kings displeasure and hatred, and losse of tranquillity. Pheroras vnderstanding this counsell profitable for him, hauing bene once before iniuriously accused, and obtained pardon at the kings hands, sent away his maide, by whom he now had a son, and promised the king to marry this his other daughter, and appointed the thirtieth day after to celebrate his marriage; making a solemn oath vnto the king, neuer after that time to vse the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, he fell so far in loue with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but againe companied with his maide.

her daughter to

Then Herode, not able any longer to containe himselfe, vsed many speeches, whereby he euidently shewed his mind to be alienated from his brother. And there were many, who taking hereat opportunity, did by forged calumniatione encrease his alienation: so that now there was no day nor hower past, wherein he did not still heare some new alterations and stirs amongst his deere friends; whom nature willed to combine themselues to maintaine concord and amitie. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes children, did not permit her daughter married vnto Aristobulus, one of the young men, to enioy mutuall loue and comfort of her husband, enticing him to bewray her husbands secret talke: and if shee heard any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) she should the more aggravate them with suspitions, whereby she also learned all their secrets; and made the yong woman hate her husband. And she to please her mother, recounted how that often when her husband and Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talk of Mariamme their mother, & vse reprocheful words against their father; and threatening, that if they euer did obtaine the kingdome, they would make the sonnes of the king, whom he had by other wiues, notaries and towne clerkes: and so they might reape profit of their learning which they now studied for: and whensoever they saw any of the kings wiues weare any of Mariammes apparell, that then they vowed in steed of that attire, to cloath them with sackcloth, and shut them vp where they should neuer see the Sunne. Salome presently told all this to the king: who though he were much grieved hereat, yet he chose rather to seeke to amende it, then to punish them: for he was greatly incited against them by suspicion, and euery day waxing worse and worse, at last he beleued all the reports of any whomsoever. But he then contented only sharply to chide his sonnes, and pacified with their excuses and answers, he for that time was quiet.

he was in loue with Glaphyra.

But presently the mischief was againe set on foote: for Pheroras the kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we haue said) was Glaphyra her husband, who was daughter to Archelaus: he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in loue with Glaphyra: so that he could not shake off this affection. The yong man hearing this, became ielous, and was in a great rage: and now what honour soeuer or gifts Herod for the loue of his sonne gaue her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sence, being now made ielous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put vp such iniuries, as he thought, he went vnto his father, and with tears requested vnto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herode was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himselfe falsely to be accused of so shamefull a fact, inuicighing against the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turnes he did them, so rewarded him. And presently sending for Pheroras, very sharply he began to chide him, saying: O most impious that liueth amongst men! art thou become so vngreatfull, either to speak or think such a matter of vs? Thinkest thou that I doe not perceiue thy drift, that thou speakest not these words vnto my sonne to discredit me, but also to the intent by this meanes thou mightest worke some treason against me, & cause me to be poisoned? For who but a good sonne, as this is, would suffer his father, suspected for such a matter, to liue, and not be reuenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou think that thou didst put these speeches into his mind, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his father withall? or what was thy intent, seeing thou hatest both him and his brother, and only counterfeiting good will towards me to belie me, & to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought? get thee hence, thou wretched impe, seeing thou hast thus abused thy brother, who hath well deserved at thy hands; and do as thou wilt till thy life time, my selfe will indevout to be better vnto my children, then I haue been; and neither will I punish them as they deserue. but

A but I will honor them above their merits. The king hauing discharged his choler against his brother Pheroras; and he being taken in a manifest fault, answered, that that report was first deuiled by Salome, of whom he heard it: which she (being then present) hearing, began to exclaim, saying, it was not her deuise, and that they all laboured to make the king hate her, and put her to death, being one who did especially with him well, and what in her lay seeking his safety, and that now he was in danger of more treason then euer before: for (saide she) I was the onely cause that you did put away the woman, whom you so doated after, perswading you to marry the Kings daughter: and this is the cause that you hate me. With these speeches tearing her haire, and striking her breast, she made a shew of innocency: but this her gesture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Pheroras was left in great perplexity, not knowing what to say or do; and finding no pretence to excuse his fact: for on the one side he confessed, that he told it vnto Alexander; and on the other hee could not make Herode beleue, that hee heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at last the king, being wearied sent away his brother, & his sister: and greatly commending his sonnes moderate mind, and that he had given him intelligence of those speeches, very late in the night, he went to supper.

calumniation.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, because she was iudged to be the author of this ill report, and the kings wiues withed euill vnto her, because they knew her to be of strange qualities and hard to please, and so variabell, that according to the time, one while she would professe friendship, and presently after hatred. Wherefore they still had something to enforme Herode of against her, taking occasion hapning by chance, which was this. There was a king of the Arabians, named Obadas, a slouthfull man, and one giuen to idleness: and there was one Syllaeus that did gouerne all his affairs; this man was a crafty fellow, & in the prime of his youth, and very beautifull. This Syllaeus coming vnto Herode about some businesse, and viewing Salome, who then sat at supper with him, began to set his mind vpon her: and finding she was a widow, he entered into talke with her, and shee finding her brother now not so friendly vnto her as before hee had bene, and also entangled with the beauty of this yong man, did not greatly deny to marry him, and many feasts being made at that time, they shewed euident signes of their mutuall consent, and loue one vnto another. The kings wiues told the king of this in scoffing sort: Herod herewith not contented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter stood, & willed him at supper time to note if he could espie any tokens of familiarity betwixt them: And Pheroras tolde him that by signes and mutual viewing one another, they sufficiently shewed their intents. After this the Arabian being suspected, departed into his owne country: But two or three moneths after he came again into Iudaea, only for this purpose, & talked with Herod touching this matter, requesting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinitie would be profitable vnto him for the traficke betwene his people and the Arabians, whose prince he was to be, and did already enioy a great part of the dominion. Herod told all this vnto his sister, & asked hir if she would marie him: & she answered, she would. Then they requested that Syllaeus should become a Jew in religion, or else it was not lawfull for him to marry her. He would not condescend herunto, affirming that he should be stoned to death by his people, if he did it; and so he departed without obtaining his purpose. From that time forth, Pheroras, and especially the kings wiues accused Salome of intemperancy, affirming that she had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marrie his daughter vnto Salomes sonne, whom Pheroras refused for the loue of his maide, which sonne of Salomes was her eldest that she had by Costabarus; and that to shew his good wil toward Salome his sister. But he was dissuaded by Pheroras, who told him that the yong man would neuer loue such a father in lawe, because of his fathers death, perswading him rather to marrie her to his eldest son, who was to succeed him in his Tetrarchy: which he easily perswaded the king vnto, and so obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore the spousals being changed, the maide was married vnto the yong man, who had an hundred talents in dowrie with her, more then other-wise should haue been giuen with her.

his daughter to

But all this while the dissension of Herods house did not cease, but rather encreased, he hauing a shamefull beginning, and coming to a sorrowfull end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom hee greatly esteemed for their beauty: one of them was his butler; the other his cooke; and the third his chamberlaine: whom also he was wont to employ in serious affaires of his kingdom. Some one or other enformed the king, that these three Eunuches were corrupted by his sonne Alexander with great summes of money, and being vpon tortures examined if they had accompanied with him they confessed all; yet they affirmed that they knew no practice of his attempted against his father. But their torments being encreased by Antipaters fauorites, they were forced to conconfesse that Alexander secretly hated his father, and he exhorted them to forsake Herode, who was now good for nothing; who dissembled his age by painting his face to make himselfe seeme younger then he was, and colouring his head and beard black, which were already growne very white through age: but rather set their mindes vpon him who would in despite of his father enjoy his kingdome due vnto him; and that then he would aduance them to the highest honors of the kingdome: for he had not only title vnto it by his birth, but also was now prepared like wife to invade it; and that he had many of the captaines, of the souldiers, and many of the kings friends on his side, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his sake.

Herode hearing this, feare and anger did invade him, by reason that his sonnes words seemed both contumelious and threatening: and being for both these causes in a rage, hee feared some greater matter to be put in practice against him, which he could not sodainly, and hauing so little warning, auoide; and not daring to make open inquiry, he set secret spies a worke, to tell him how all matters stood, himselfe now mistrusting all men, and accounting it his securitie to mistrust all, euen them that deferred it not: and not moderating his suspicious minde, now whose foeuer was the neereft vnto him, was the more suspected, as of most power to iniure him. As for others that were but onely named by his spies, he presently esteemed it his safetie to put them to death.

teth all tales, and so putteth many to death vniustly.

Then they of his householde euerie one being carefull to saue himselfe, were one turned against another, euerie one deeming it his owne safetie to preuent others, by accusing them vnto Herode: which done, presently they incited other mens enuie against them, and euerie one of them to desire such measure as they had measured vnto others: and thus they also reuenged their priuate quarrells, and presently after, they themselves were taken, and did by other means suffer the like, being intrapped in the same trappe they set for their enemies. For the king did quickly repent himselfe, because hee had put very many to death, who were not conuicted, yet for all that, hee was not hereby admonished to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged so farre, as to cause him to inflict the same punishment vpon their accusers, which he had done vpon them. So great trouble and feare then fell vpon all the whole Court. Hee then commaunded manie of his dearest friends, and them especiallie whose fidelitie he had before times experienced, not to come in his sight; nor within his court gates. For he did now shake off the friendship between Andromachus and Gemellus and himselfe, who were his auncient friends, and oftentimes had gone Embassadors for him, and alwaies been of his counsell, and had been tutors vnto his children, in whome hee had alwaies reposed more trust then in any others: the one of them, for that his sonne Demetrius was familiar with Alexander; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to wish well vnto Alexander: for hee was one of them who had brought him vp, and had aboad with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had censured them with some more heauie sentence, had it not been that they were so eminent persons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to haue banished them, and deprived them of all their authoritie, to the end, that hauing now disgraced these good men, hee might the more freely play the Tyrant. Antipater was the cause of all this mischief, who from the first time that he perceiued his father to be fearefull and suspicious, still after that ioyned with him as counsellor, and as it were increased his rage and cruelty; and then he gallantly played his part, endeavouring, that whosoever would resist him should be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the rest of his friends being now banished the court; the king presently tortured all that he imagined any way to fauour Alexander, to see if they were guiltie; or if they knew of any treason to be practiced against him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidst their tormētts. Where he so much more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not so much as an euill thought against him; Antipater craftilie interpreting it, that they had rather in tormētts conceale the truth, then to shew themselves not trustie to their masters and friends: wherefore many being taken he caused them to be tortured to get some thing out of some of them. At last one amongst the rest, not able to indure those tormētts imposed vpon him, sayd; that he had often heard Alexander say, so often as any one commended his goodly stature, or skillfull shooting and the rest of his vertues that these qualities nature bestowed vpon him rather then other benefits; for his father for enuie hereat was offended: so that when he talked with him, he did vpon purpose draw his body together, lest his father should perceiue the taleness of his stature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he vpon purpose did misse the mark he could haue hit, because he knew his father could not endure that he should be commended. And whilest these his words were considered, & pondred, and his tormētts intermitted; he again accused Alexander to haue conspired with his brother Aristobulus to kill his father when he was hunting, & then to flie with speed vnto Rome,

A Rome, and begge the kingdome of Caesar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written vnto his brother, complaining of the iniurious dealing of his father, who had giuen certaine grounds vnto Antipater; they cerely reuenges whereof amounted vnto two hundred talents. Then Herode thinking himselfe to haue probabilitie enough, his former suspition was now confirmed; and so hee tooke Alexander & cast him in prison: and againe he began to rage; notwithstanding that himselfe did scarcely beleue the informations against him: neither could he himselfe denie any cause wherefore they should seeke to worke treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that hauing openly killed his father, hee would afterwards haue gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to find som stronger argument of his sonnes impietie, and because he would not bee thought rashly to haue committed his son to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all Alexanders welwillers to be tortured, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

Whilest thus all the court did resound with feare, tormētts, and contentions; a certaine man accused Alexander to haue sent letters to his friends at Rome, to entreate them to cause him to be sent for by Caesar thither, that he might accuse his father of certaine conspiracies against Caesar; and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates king of the Parthians, then the friendship of the Romans: affirming also, that he had poison ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the parasites about him, as hauing not done any thing rashly; and so he gaue now full credite vnto all: yet the poison was diligently sought for, but could not be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamitie, he yet tooke courage, & because he would more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his father ashamed of himselfe, for giuing credite so easily vnto forged tales; or at least if hee could not effect that, entangle all the court and him too in calamitie and misery: Which that he might the better doe, he writ foure little bookes, and sent them vnto his father, telling him that it was needlesse to vse any more tormētts, for indeed treason was intended against him; and that Theororas and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly vnto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her; and that all of them aimed at this mark, to haue him made away, that so they might enjoy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus and Sapinnus of this conspiracy, who were more faithful vnto the king, then all others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued euerie one, that they had no leasure giuen them to speake in their owne defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tried, and the truth known, that some were bound and imprisoned, other some presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeves to see that day, yet discontented for that anie delay was vsed for their punishment: so that the kings court was now greatly defaced with sorrow, and heauinesse, wherewith the wonted felicitie thereof was destroyed. Herode himselfe amidst these calamities, could not but bee weary of his life, who not daring trust himselfe in any bodys hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourly feare of some vntimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himselfe, that hee did see his sons before him with a drawne sword, ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith he almost ran mad.

Whilest Herode was thus troubled in his minde, Archelaus king of Cappadocia carefull for his daughter, and the young man his sonne in law, and pitying his friend Herode entangled in such calamities; he thought it his dutie to make a iourney vnto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported vnto him before his coming, he thought it an vnfitt way to argue him of too much credulity and rashnesse; perceiuing that thereby hee would bee rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himselfe. Wherefore Archelaus deuised an other way to appease these troubles. Wherefore hee counterfained indignation against the young man, approouing all the kings actions for good; affirming that he would breake the band of wedlocke betweene his daughter and Alexander, and that if hee knew of the conspiracie, and did not informe the king thereof, himselfe would punish her. Then Herode contrarie to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, did easily perswade Caesar any thing; for that Caesar was now very credulous; and Syllaus ayimed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Aeneas succeeded him in the kingdom of Arabia, who changing his name, called himselfe Aretas, whom Syllaus by forged calumniationes did seeke to depole from the crowne, and vsurpe the kingdome vnto himselfe; giuing great summes of money vnto the courtiers, and promising great summes vnto Caesar; whom he now perceiued to be angry against Aretas, for that without his consent he presumed to take vpon him the gouernment of the kingdom. But at last he also sent letters and gifts vnto Caesar, and amongst the rest a crown of gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllaus, who as an impious and disloyal seruant, had poisoned his king Obodas; in whose life time he had also inuaded the gouernment of the kingdom, committing adulterie with the Arabians wiues, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtaine the kingdom. Caesar would not permit these embassadours to haue audience, but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affaires of Iudaea and Arabia euery day became worse and worse, euery one seeking to trouble the estate of both kingdomes, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the king of Arabia was not yet established in his kingdom, and therefore could not controule his subiects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himselfe, he should so much the more incite Caesar against him; and so was forced to put vp all iniuries that were done vnto him: and finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send againe to Rome embassadours, to see if by the help of his friends Caesar might bee perswaded to thinke better of him, and so committed them. baissa vnto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome.

AT this time the dissension of Herodes house was much encreased; and although al-ther times his court was neuer voided of suspition, which is a pernicious euill to Kings and Princes, yet at that time especially this mischief was in his principall vigor & force.
For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian and a noble man of his countrey, but hauing a turbulent wit gi-uen ouer to flattery & pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, comming vnto Herod and giuing him gifts, & receiuing greater gifts at his hands, was by him curteously entertained; and familiarily conuersing with him, brought it so to passe that he was receiued amongst his especial friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house, being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus king of Cappadocia and himselfe were great friends, and therefore hee counterfained himselfe to reuerence Glaphyra verie much; and all men iudging him indifferent vnto all parties, he diligently noted whatoeuer past, and euery word that was spoken, seeking by all meanes he could, matter to gratifie others by carrying of tales; and with such flattering faire speeches he insinuated himselfe into euery mans friendship, that he semed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, and to vse other men as it behooued a friend. And by this he deceit he so insinuated himselfe into Alexanders fauour, that the young man thought him to be his only friend, vnto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened vnto him his griefe, for that his father was something alienated from him, and recounted vnto him his mothers misfortune, and that Antipater had now gotten all authoritie and dignitie from him, and his brother: and was the onely man that could doe all; and that these iniuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now so incited against them, that now hee would neither admit them vnto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefes (as he then thought) into his friends bosome. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speake of it for the greatnesse of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not sticke openly to shew what mind he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done he receiued of Antipater most rich gifts, as pledges of his good will towards him; and finally he was by him perswaded to relate this newes himselfe vnto Herode. The king lent a greedy eare whilst here-counted Alexanders malice, and was so moued with the circumstances of his speeches, that he conceiued a deadly hatred against his sonne, which also without further delay hee did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his paines with 50. talents. Which he hauing receiued went vnto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted vnto him in what stee-de he had stood him in reconciling him vnto his father: and receiuing of him also a summe of money, hee departed before his malice was discovered; and returned into his countrey, and vsing the

OF THE IEWES. THE XVI. BOOKE.

As the like shifts there also, hee was finally by his countymen banished from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herode not content now, as before he was, to heare only that which was told him of Alexander and Aristobulus, did now himselfe also conceiue a proper hatred against them himselfe, obseruing all things, and making diligent inquiry though no man accused them, and permitting all men to speake what they list against them. And amongst the rest, Euratus of Cous had conspired with Alexander, and he seemed now to heare no talke more willingly then this, & such like. But then greater misfortunes then all the rest befel the young men; false accusations, neuer ceasing to be forged against them, and euery one as it were, striming to accuse them of some crime or other vnto the king, pretending the care they bare of his safete. Herod had two champions, Iucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable and gratefull vnto him, for their strength & tall stature & bignes of body: these two for some offence were banished the court, and receiued into Alexanders seruice, and placed amongst his stipendary horsemen, and for that they were verie active he bestowed many giftes and much money vpon them. Whereat the king presently conceiuing suspition, began to torture them, & after many torments they confessed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod as hee was a hunting wilde beastes: for so it might easily be bruited abroad that hee falling off his horse, fell vpon his owne lance; and so was slaine: which once before had almost hapned vnto him. They also declared vnto him, that certaine golde was hidden and buried in the stable: and they also accused Herods chiefe huntsman, that at Alexanders command hee had giuen Alexanders seruants the kings launces and his armour. After them the prefect of the Caste of Alexandrium, was taken and examined vpon tortures, and it was C objected against him, that he promised to receiue them into the Caste, and to deliuer vnto them the kings treasure there. But he denying it, his owne sonne affirmed all to be true, and brought forth letters to testifie the same, resembling Alexanders hand, written to this effect: So soone as by Gods assistance we haue done that which wee intend to doe, wee wil presently come vnto you: bee carefull therefore, that according to your promise you doe receiue vs into the Caste. He-rode hauing had a viewe of these letters, did now without any hesitation beleene that indeede some treacherous practice was plotted against him by his sonnes. But Alexander affirmed, that Diophantus the scribe had counterfained his hand, and that the letter was Antipaters deuise. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in such matters, and afterward being taken with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the king produced them that had been tortured at Iericho before the people to accuse his sonnes, where they were stoned to death, and the people hereat moued, would also haue killed Alexander and Aristobulus with the same death. But Herode, by the means of Ptolomeus and Pheroras did restraine them, and commanded the young men to be cast into prison, and there to be kept so streight that no man was admitted vnto them, but ma-niples were set, who should narrowly marke all their actions and wordes: and now they were accounted as condemned men both by other mens opinions and also by their owne. One of them, to wit Aristobulus, for griefe inuiuing his aunt, and mother in lawe to compassionate his present calamitie, and to hate him that was the author hereof, affirmed that she also was in great danger, being accused, in hope to marry with Syllaus, to haue signified vnto him by letters all that past in Herods court. Which words the woman presently came and recounted vnto her brother E Herod. The king no longer able to bridle his furie, commanded them both to be bound & kept in seuerall places one from another, and each of them to write what they had plotted against their father: & being thus commanded, they wrot that they neither prepared treason, nor yet thought of any treason against him, only they purposed to flie, because they perceiued that they could no longer liue here, because they were so suspected & in continual care. At that time a prince of Cappadocia came Embassadour from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greatest lords of the country: and Herod willing to shew his sons malice, he sent for Alexander out of prison, commanding him to recount how and after what order, or whither they meant to flie: hee answered, vnto Archelaus, who had also promised them to send them to Rome; but that they had no further intent or purpose to effect any vnlawfull practice against their father, and that all other accusations were false. And that he requested that Tyrannus and the rest might haue been better examined; But Antipater presented that, who by his owne forged rumours spread amongst the people did cause them to hasten their deaths. Which being said, Herode commanded both him and Mela to be led vnto Glaphyra, that she might be asked whether she were any way priuie vnto the conspiracie against Herod: and comming vnto her, the woman seeing her husband bound, presently tore her haire, and being amazed, with great compassion cried out amaine. The young mans cheekes were also bedewed with teares; so that a long time after, those that were present amazed and moued to compassion at this miserable sight, could neither speake or doe the kings G command. At last Ptolomeus, to whose charge Alexander was committed, willing him to speake whether his wife was priuie to his intent: he answered, how could it be otherwise, who is dearer vnto me then my owne life, being mother of her and my children? then she answered, crying out aloud, that she was priuie to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth she) if it will auail you any thing, or helpe to saue your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatsoeuer seeing I must die, and will denie nothing you would haue me to say. Alexander answered, neither did I purpose any impietie against my father, as some suppose, who ought not to thinke so: neither doe I know of any one: this thou knowest, that thou and I purposed to flie vnto Archelaus thy father, and that he promised to conuay vs to Rome, which she also affirmed.

Herode now thinking that Archelaus was conuicted of euil will towards him, deliuered letters vnto Olympus and Volumnius, commaunding them in the way as they went, to passe by Ekusa a towne of Cilicia, and deliuer certain letters vnto Archelaus himselfe to the same effect: and that from thence they should go to Rome, and if so be when they came there they found that Cæsar had been reconciled vnto him by Nicholaus his meanes, that then they should also deliuer certain letters vnto him, declaring all that was past betwene him and his sonnes, and the proofes alleaged to conuince the young men. Archelaus writ againe vnto Herod, that indeede he would haue entertained the young men, for feare that any greater mischance should befall them or their father, by reason of the suspicion against them; yet was he not minded to send them to Cæsar, nor to haue confirmed them in any malicious course. The messengers comming to Rome found Cæsar reconciled to Herode, and deliuered the letters vnto him. For Nicholaus his embassage was I to this effect: So soone as he came vnto Rome and had entred the palace, beside the charge hee had giuen him, he did also vnder take to accuse Syllaus. For hee perceiued the Arabians at variance amongst themselves, and that some of them had declared all Syllaus his bad practices, and that by his means and procurement many of Obodas kinsmen were murthered, as his aduersaries, manifestly prooued by certaine of his letters which they intercepted.

Now Nicholaus desirous to reconcile Herod vnto Cæsar, omitted not this occasion by chance offered him: for he well knew that if he began with the kings defence, he should then find a hard and heauy iudge against him; but if he began to accuse Syllaus, he should finde also fit occasion to pleade his kings cause. Wherefore Nicholaus taking vpon him to prooue the accusation against him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the king Aretas Embassadors, accused Syllaus as a murtherer of his Lord and king, and many other Arabians; and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the common wealth; and that he had corrupted manie women and honest matrons both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a most greuous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and false reports had deceiued Cæsar, whom in all things he had misinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cæsar commaunded him to omit the rest; and onely to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an armie, and did slaine two thousand and fise hundred men, and carrie away captiues and robbe and spoile the countrey? Nicholaus answered, that to these demands himselfe was able to answere, that Herode did none of these, or at least verie little hereof, which he did recount; and that he did not deserue any displeasure. Cæsar contrary L to his expectation, hearing this, began to giue diligent care to what Nicholaus sayd: and herupon Nicholaus recounted vnto Cæsar how Herode had lent D. talents, and that hee had a writing in pawne wherein he was permitted after the day appointed if then it were not repaid him againe, to prey vpon all the whole country, and satisfie himselfe; and that this was no hostile inuasion, but according to lawe and equity a requiring of his right and debt due vnto him. And that this was not rashly done, though by the writing he was so permitted to doe, but by the consent of Saturnius and Volumnius presidents of Syria, in whose presence Syllaus swore by Cæsars good fortune at Berytum, that within 30. daies after both the debt & also certain fugitiues from the king, should be restored vnto him, and that Syllaus performed none of this: and so Herod went againe vnto the presidents, and they permitted him to goe and take pledges for his money; and that so by M their permission he went into Arabia. And this (quoth hee) is the warre that his aduersaries haue so tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth hee) how can it be called a warre seeing that it was done by the consent of the presidents, and that by couenant after periurie, wherewith both other gods and also Cæsars name was violated. It now (quoth hee) remaineth that I speake something concerning the captiues. There were forty theeues of Trachon, and afterward more that fled from

A to the iniurie of all men, and gaue them ground to inhabite, and was partaker of their priees; notwithstanding that by his forced oath hee was bound to restore them together with the borrowed money: neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and caried away captiue, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the captiues beeing thus refuted, heare, O Soueraigne Cæsar, the lying inuention which to prouoke thee to wrath himselfe deuised. For I am well able to affirme this, that when the Arabian army assaulted vs, and one or two of our men were slaine; then at last Herod forced to make resistance, he slew Nacebus and with him fise and twentie and no more: for euerie one of which Syllaus falsely recounted vnto Cæsar a hundred and so told him that two thousand and fise hundred were slaine. Cæsar hereat greatly moued with an angrie countenance looking vpon Syllaus, he asked him how many Arabians were slaine in the fight: he amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions betwene them, and the writings of the presidents, and the letters of the cities containing the cōplaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to this passe, that Cæsar was reconciled vnto Herod, & condemned Syllaus to die; & repenting himselfe to haue written so threatening letters vnto Herod, he objected that also vnto Syllaus, affirming, that by his false enformations he had caused him to passe the limits of friendship in vsing his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllaus into his countrey, that after hee had satisfied his creditors he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas, for that without his authoritie hee had vsurped the crowne & kingdome, and he was minded also to bestow Arabia vpon Herod: but the letters which Herod sent him changed his minde. For Olympus and Volumnius so loone as they vnderstood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they deliuered vnto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein was contained the arguments whereby his sons were conuicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar hauing read, he thought it not cōuenient to trouble the old man, infortunate with his sonnes, with another kingdome; & so he admitted Aretas the embassadors: and chiding them that their king had rashly vsurped the kingdome without his authority & knowledge, not expecting his pleasure: he receiued their gifts, and confirmed him in the kingdome by his authority. This done, being now reconciled vnto Herod, he writ vnto him that he was sorrowful for him, that had such children; & that he should if they had attempted any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murder their father: for he gaue him free D & full authoritie; but if they only attempted to fly, he should also be sufficed with a lesse punishment. Wherefore he counsellèd him to call a consistorie at Berytum; and together with the Roman presidents, & Archelaus king of Cappadocia, & the rest of his friends, & the nobility thereabout, according as they should aduise him, so to doe. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

Herode receiuing this letter, reioiced about measure, both for that hee had againe obtained Cæsars fauour; & also for that Cæsar had giuen him full authoritie to do what he pleased vnto his sonnes. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperity was a hard father, did yet shew himselfe not rash in putting his sonnes to death: & now his estate being better then it was, and he recovering his wonted assurance; he now began a new hatred. Wherefore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would haue withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the presidents as the rest who were called out of diuers cities, he would not bring his sonnes into the counsell, but kept them in a village of the Sidonians, named Platan, nor farre distant from the Citie, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himselfe alone entring into the counsell before an hundred & fifty men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his sonnes before them, and vied a speech not onely pitifull for his owne calamities, but also little becomming a father. For he was very vehement and vnheedy in inueying against their offence; neither did hee sufficiently expresse his minde shewing many signes of furie, and anger; neither did he deliuer in writing any proofes of the accusations vnto the Iudges: but vndeceitly himselfe alleadged there the father against the sonne, himselfe also reading before them certaine letters written by them, wherein was contained no impietie nor treason, but onely a consulation to fly away, and certaine hard speeches whereby they shewed themselves offended. Which when G he came vnto, he exclaimed as though hereby they confessed their treacherous practises, greatly exaggerating the matter, and protesting that he had rather die then heare such speeches. Lastly, affirming that both nature and Cæsar permitted him authoritie against them; and his countrey lawes so commanded, that if any one being accused, his father or mother should lay their hands vpon his head, & the standers by must presently stone him to death: which though he might easily do in his owne countrey and kingdome; yet hee thought good also to expect their censures. Yet he came vnto them, not for that they were to iudge his sons, who were taken in a manifest crime, but that by this occasion they might adde their suffrages to the iust indignation of a father offended, and that they might leaue an example vnto all posterity, that such treasons ought not to be left vn Timer punished. The king hauing thus spoken, & not permitting the yong men to be brought H vnto their answer, all seeing what the king intended, & that there was now no hope to reconcile the yong men vnto their father, or saue their liues, they al confirmed his authority. And first of al Saturninus, one that had bene Consul, and had bene graced with many honours, pronounced an indifferent sentence, limited with circumstances, to wit, that he condemned Herods sons, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my selfe haue sons, and I would not adde this calamity to Herods misfortune past. After him also his three sonnes, who were their fathers legats, pronounced the same sentence. But Volumnius pronounced, that they had deserued death, who were so impious towards their father; whose sentence after him the most part followed: so that it seemed that they were now ordained to be put to death. Presently Herod caried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arriued, returning from Rome: vnto whom the king first re- I counting what was done at Berytum, hee asked of him what his friends at Rome thought of his sons. He answered that they iudged the yong mens intents impious, & that they also iudged that they ought to be bound and imprisoned; and then after due consideration if it were so thought expedient, to be put to death, least the king might be thought rather to haue giuen place vnto his choler then vnto reason: yet if it might please him they thought it best to acquit them, least o- therwise hee doe that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of most of his friends at Rome. Then the king a long time pondered these his words, and made no reply, but commanded him to faile along in his company. At his arriual at Cæsarea all men were careful what should become of his sons, expecting an end of that tragedy, for they greatly feared that by reason of the olde discord hee would now cut them off; yet notwithstanding they K were sorrowful for them: yet it was dangerous either to speake rashly, or to heare any thing spoken freely concerning them, but in their hearts compassionating them they concealed their griefes. Onely one amongst all the rest, an ancient soldier of the kings named Tyro, others dissembling their griefe, spake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a sonne of Alexanders age, and beloued of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidst the multitudes exclaimed, that truth & equity was now banished from out of the world, and that in their steede malice & vntruth reigned: whereby there was such a mist & a fogge caused ouer the whole world, that no man could see his owne errors. This his freespcech though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moued, for that he had some reason to shew his fortitude in so dangerous a time, & every one was willing to heare this speech: and though themselves for feare were silent, L yet did they not reprehend him for speaking freely. For the expectation of the euent of so great mischief was able to haue wrested from every one of them words of commiseration. Tyro with great audacitie also came vnto the king, and belought him that hee might talke with him alone: which the king granting, hee vsed these words with great lamentation. I can no longer, O my king, suppress this my griefe, which causeth me so boldly to speake though with my own perill; yet if it please thee my king, that which I intend to speake shall be for thine aduantage.

Where now my Lord are thy wits? where is that thy courageous mind euer hitherto able to match all difficult busineses whatsoever? how hapneth it that thou hast so few friends & kinned for I account not them kinmen or friends, that permit such wickednes and hatred in thy court, which curst was most happy & fortunate. And what art thou vnto thy selfe? wilt thou not looke M and see what is done? wilt thou put to death the two yong men born vnto thee by the queene thy wife, who abound in all vertue; and commit thy selfe now in thy olde age vnto one only sonne, who nourisheth impious hopes & desires? and to thy kindred, who by thy own censure haue often deserued death? Dost thou not perceiue, that the people keeping themselves quiet & still, do both condemne the error of thy friends, and also pitie and compassionate the two yong men? Moreover, all thy soldiers and the captaines themselves haue compassion on them, and curse the authors

A authors of this infortunate calamitie. The king at first tooke these words of Tyro in good part, as being admonished of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his owne calamitie. But Tyro immodestly & souldier-like vrging the king, and for his owne simplicity not able to discern what fitted that time, the king at last though he this rather a turbulent vpbraiding him the a friend- ly admonition: asking who those captaines & souldiers were, he commanded them all. & Tyro also to be bound & kept in prison. Then one Triphe the kings barbar, taking hereat occasion, told the king that Tyro had often solicited him, as he shaued the king, to cut his throat with his razor, promising him for a recompence great rewards, & that he should be one of Alexanders chiefe friends. Hauing spoken these words, the king commanded him to be apprehended, & the Barbar, and Tyro and his son to be tortured. Tyro his sonne seeing his father in most miserable torments, B and that hee still persisted in them (and by the kings displeasure, coniecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that hee would confesse all the truth conditionally, that his father and himselfe might be no more tormented: & hauing his request granted, he told the that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand should haue killed the king: for he could get opportunity to come vnto the king when no man else was with him, & so he would kill him, and for Alexanders sake endure any torments whatsoever. This spoken, he deliuered himselfe & his father from further tortures, but it is incertaine whether the tale he told was true, or whether he deuised it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aside (if before he were in any) thought what death his sons should die, & leauing no place to repentance & mercie, he hastened to execute his purpose: and producing 300. captaines, and Tyro & his sonne, and C the Barbar his accusèr, he accused them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they slew them euery one. And Alexander & Aristobulus were caried vnto Sebastè, and there by their fathers command were strangled: and their bodies caried by night into the castle Alexandrium, where their grandfather by the mothers side, and many of their progenitors lay buried. But perhaps some will nothing maruaile that a hatred so long a breeding should in the end so preuaile, that it ouercame naturall affection. But one may iustly doubt whether the fault were in the yong men, who exasperated by a hard father so long time, fell into such hatred of him: or whether it is to be imputed vnto his vnkindnes & immoderate desire of honour & rule, who could not abide any to be his equal, but rather chusing to do all at his own pleasure: Or rather vnto fortune, whose power the wisest liuing is not able to resist. Wherefore I D am perswaded, that fortune hath predestinated all humane actions, so that they must haue a necessary euent. And this ineuitable force we call fate or farall destiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it sufficeth briefly to haue touched this high matter, which is of it selfe verie difficult, which attributeth something vnto our actions, & examineth the causes of the variety of our actions, which speculation is already comprised in the two volumes of our law. Furthermore as touching the yong mens fault, we may accuse their youthfull arrogancy, and the free kingly pride which was in them, who did giue too great care vnto their fathers accusers, & for that they were vniust searchers into his life & actions, & that they maliciously suspected him, & could not rule their tongues: but hereby gaue double occasion vnto their aduersaries, & matter vnto those tale-bearers that sought to get the kings fauour. But their fathers shamefull fault cannot be excu- E sed, who suffered himselfe so to be ouerruled with passion, that he put the to death that were be- gotten of his owne body, without any prooffe or argument of the crimes laide vnto their charge: yea two yong men of excellent feature of body, not only beloued of their own nation but also of strangers, not slouthful in hunting, & commendable in military affaires, & eloquent in ciuill discour- ses. For in all these things they were excellent, & especially Alexander the eldest of them. It had bin enough for him, suppose hee had condemned them, either to haue kept the in perpetuall prison; or to haue banished them into some far country: seeing that hee was assured of the Roman power, vnder whose protection he neither needed to haue feared inuasion; nor secret treason against him. For so soon to put them to death only to satisfy his own furious will, what other thing doth it betoken, but only an impious liberty casting off al fatherly humanity & kindnes? especial- ly seeing that he was aged, whose yeers could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excused by the delay he vsed: nay it had bin a lesse offence if amazed with some sudden newes, he had bin incited vnto so hainous an offence; but after so long delay & deliberation at last to effect such a matter, betokeneth a bloudy mind & obdurate in wickednes, as he shewed himselfe afterward to haue, not sparing the rest, whom before time he held most dear: who although they were lesse to be pitied in that they iustly suffered, yet was it an argumēt of his like cruelty in that he abstained not frō their deaths also: but we will speak hereof hereafter.

Of Antipaters malice, who was Herods sonne.

The yeare of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity, 3.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Antipater after he had made away his brothers, grew hatefull both to the souldiers and the people.

Antipater gouerned the kingdom with his father.

Antipater with his fathers death.

After that Antipater had made away his brothers thorow the extreame impietie and vnbridled furie, wherewith Herode their father was incensed and whetted against them; yet incontinently obtained hee not that which vndoubtedly he hoped for. For being deliuered and discharged of that feare he conceiued, least his brethren should bee partakers with him in the kingdome, he found it a difficult & dangerous matter for himselfe to finde the meanes how hee might obtaine the kingdome: so strange and hainous a hatred had all the nation conceiued against him. On the other side, in shewing himselfe proud & lofty, he more & more whetted & encreased that hatred which the souldiers had foreconceiued against him, in whom notwithstanding the security of the kingdome consisted, if it should fortune so to fall out that the people should attempt any alteration. All which mischiefs were begotten by his own sins, & the vnnatural murder of his brothers. Naithels he gouerned the kingdome with his father, liuing in no lesse authority then himselfe: Herod also reposed more confidence in him euen in those things, for which he was worthy to lose his head. For the king conceiued that in confirmation of his good affectio towards him, Antipater had accused his brethren, as vnder resolution to continue his father in security, & not for any hatred he bore as wel vnto the, as to his father; though indeed he hated the for his fathers sake, being transported with fury. But all these were but as it were many subtill stratagems to insinuate himselfe into Herods counsailes & fauours: & these did he craftily make vse of, to cut off the occasion least any should preuent or accuse him of that which hee pretended to doe, & that Herod might be deprived of all meanes & maner of reliefe, if so be Antipater should bend his forces against him. For the treason he comploted against his brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare vnto his father: but at that time was he the more egged on to prosecute his intended purposes, without any delay or procrastination. For if Herod should happen to die, it was a matter most assured that the kingdome should be his; and should his life continue any longer time, Antipater laboureth his father to breake off the marriages he intended.

Herodes nine wives.

A time, and the practise Antipater went about should be discouered, seeing himselfe inuironed with these dangers, he should be inforced to make his father his enemy. For which cause he vied verie great bouny and liberality to all those that were about his father: and thorow the great largesse he bestowed vpon them, hee strangled and extinguished that hatred which all of them bare vnto him: and aboue all things he continued himselfe in credite with those friends, which Herode had at Rome, by sending them diuers presents, & namely to Saturninus, who was gouernour of Syria. He hoped also by bribes and rewards to draw his fathers brother into his faction, and to corrupt the kings sister also, who was married to one of the kings most esteemed friends in court. Furthermore, hee was a subtil and politike man in entertaining those men with colourable and cloaking shew of friendship, with whom hee conuersed, and to draw himselfe into credit with them: contrariwise, he was sufficiently practised to dissemble his malice and discontents, which he had conceiued against any man. Notwithstanding all this, hee could not deceiue Salome his aunt, who of long time before had founded his inclination, & who was not so simple as to suffer herselfe to be deceiued; but had already by all cunning meanes that might be, preuented his malice, although she had a daughter married vnto his vncl, by the mothers side. This daughter was first of all wedded to Aristobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters meanes espoused to his vncl. For Callias her husbands sonne had married the other. But neither could this affinitie colour the matter so much, but that his malice was discouered; neither could that former congauntie extinguish the deserved hatred conceiued against him. Herode constrained Salome (who thorow amorous passion had thought to haue married herselfe to Syllaus the Arabian) to marrie with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perswasion of Julia Caesars wife, who aduiled Salome not to refuse that marriage, for feare lest he should prooue her vtter enemy; for that Herode had made an oath, that if Salome condescended not to marry Alexas, he would neuer make account of her: For which cause she followed Julias aduile, who was Caesars wife, and counselled her also to her profit and preferment.

At the same time Herode sent his daughter to king Archelaus, who had beene married to Alexander, presenting him a dowrie out of his owne treasure, lest there should any different arise betweene them, and he himselfe most carefully brought vp his sonnes children. For Alexander had two sonnes by Glaphyra, and Aristobulus begat on Bernice Salomes daughter, three sons and two daughters. These sometimes would he present and commend vnto his friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his sonnes would beseech God that no such ill fortune might befall their children, but rather that they might encrease in vertue and acknowledge their education and bringing vp, with all dutifull respects vnto their parents. He prouided them also each of them with a wife, at such time as they were ready for marriage, namely, the daughter of Pheroras for the eldest of Alexanders sonnes; and the daughter of Antipater for Aristobulus eldest sonne; and one of Aristobulus daughters was married to Antipaters sonne; and the other hee espoused to Herode his owne sonne, whom he had begotten of the daughter of the high priest. For it is lawfull in our cuntry, and according to our custome, to haue diuers wiues at one time. The king procured these marriages thorow the compasion hee had of those Orphelins, thinking by the mutuall alliances to cause Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceiued no lesse hatred

E toward the children, then he had done malice towards their fathers. For the care that Herod had of them increased his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greatest among the brethren; and he especially feared lest when they should grow to mans estate they would resist his power, being assisted by king Archelaus, as his sonnes in law; and Pheroras who was a Terrarch should do the like, for that he had married his sonne to Alexanders daughter. And so much the more was he incited, because all the people had compasion of these Orphanes, and had conceiued a hatred against him, who neuer ceased to expresse his malice against his brethren. He therefore deuised all the means that were possible to disannul those decrees, which his father had resolved vpon to this effect, being verie loth that they should euer liue to be partners with him in the kingdome. So that at last Herod condescended to Antipaters demaund, which was, that he might marry Aristobulus daughter, and his sonne be espoused to Pheroras daughter; and thus were the promised and forementioned marriages wholly cut off; yea euen against Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wiues, namely Antipaters mother, the high priests daughter, by whom he had a sonne that bare his name, and a daughter of his brothers, and a cousin of his owne, by whom he had no children. He had another wife also, that by nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two sonnes Antipas and Archelaus; and a daughter called Olimpias, who was afterwards married to Ioseph the kings cousin. As for Archelaus and Antipas they were brought vp at Rome, with a certaine priuate friend of his. Moreover, hee espoused one that was called Cleopatra, that was borne in Ierusalem, by whom he had Herode and Philip, which Philip was brought vp at Rome. By Pallas he had Phaſaelus: by Phedra and Helpis he had two daughters, Roxana and Salome. As touching his eldest daughters, Alexanders sisters by the mothers side, whom Pheroras had refused to take in marriage, hee matcht the one with Antipater his sisters sonne, & the other he wedded to Phaſaelus his brothers sonne, and this was Herods progeny.

CHAP. II.

Of Zamaris the Babylonian Iewe.

Herode buildeth a castle in the region of the Trachonites, and maketh Zamaris the Iew that came from Babylon go-governor thereof.

After this, intending to assure his estate in the country of Trachonite, he resolved to build a borough of the bigness of a Citie in the midst of the country, as well to warrantize his country as to be in better readines to repulse his enemies, and to repulse them with more expedition. And hauing intelligence that a certaine Iewe was come from Babylon with five hundred archers on horsebacke, and about one hundred of his kinsmen, and had aduened to passe Euphrates, and was in the country adioyning Antioch neere vnto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine generall of the Roman army had giuen him a Castle, called Valatha to inhabit, he sent for him and his followers, promising him to giue him both lands and lordships in the signorie of Batanea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that hee should make head against those that would assaile him, and promising him that both his land and his souldiers should be exempt from all tributes, and payments of customes. This Babylonian Iew was induced by these offers of his to come, and take possession of the place, where hee builded a borough called Bathyrta. This man opposing himselfe against the Trachonites defended them of the country, and those Iewes that came from Babylon to Ierusalem to offer sacrifice, from all incursions and robberies of the Trachonites: and diuers that obserued the religion of the Iewes resorted vnto him from all places; so that this country was very well peopled, by reason of the enfranchisement of the Tribute which continued during Herods life time.

But Philip, who succeeded him, exacted afterward some small tribute of them, & that but for a little while. But Agrippa the great, and his sonne of the same name, vexed them very grievously with taxations; yet permitted them to enioy their liberty, whose successors the Romans imposed many grievous tributes vpon them, yet continued their freedome, of whom hereafter wee will more particularly and largely discourse in due place, & in proceſse of my history. Now this Iew Zamaris, to whom Herod had giuen the possession of his country, died, after he had liued virtuously, and left a vertuous offspring behinde him, amongst whome was Iacim renowned for his dexterity on horsebacke, who with his troupe of horse was of the king of Babylons guard. This Iacim died when he was very olde, & left his sonne Philip to succede him, a man valiant in armes, and addicted to all sorts of vertue, as much as any one that hath bene renowned in writing: for which cause king Agrippa loued him and put his trust in him, and committed the trust and training of his souldiers vnto him, who led them also forth if any occasion of seruice was proffered.

Iacim and Philip the sons of Zamaris.

CHAP. III.

Antipater conspireth against Herod.

Hedto & Rufinus, chap. 3.

After the estate & affaires of Herod were thus disposed, all mens eies were fixed vpon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permission was granted him vnder the hope that his father had, that he would be true to him selfe faithfully, & affectionately towards him: but hee abused his authority more audaciously then could be expected; for he traiterously coloured his conceited malice, & easily drew his father to beleue him in whatsoever he said. He was feared by all men; not onely for his force & authoritie; but for his subtilties and policies. But above all the rest, Pheroras respected him most, and was in like manner as greatly esteemed by him. For Antipater had circumuented him by the meanes of certain women, who fauoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his mother & sister in law, notwithstanding that he hated them, by reason of the outrage they had offered to his daughters who were virgins; that he should be enforced to assemble all things, because he could doe nothing but that they were alwaies found about him, and had such mastery of his affaires, that they wrought him to performe whatsoever they pleased. To these likewise was Antipater neerly tied, both of himselfe and by his mother: for these four women

Pheroras deceived by women.

A women were of one mind and affection in all things, and spake as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at odds with Antipater vpon some slight mislikes, and she that wrought this debate betwixt them was the kings sister, who had of long time espied at their drifts, knowing that the friendship they bare one another tended to the ouerthrow of Herod: neither refused shee to expresse what her opinion was therein. And they knowing wel that the king disliked this their inward familiaritie, and that he was priue to that which they pretended, which was his vtter ruine, resolved between themselves to refraine their publique familiaritie, & to make a shew that they were at odds one with another: to which intent they reproched one another, especially at such time as they were either in Herods presence, or there was any one with them, who (as they thought) would certifie him thereof. But in secret they intermitted not their accustomed friendship, and continued their intercourses with more priuie affabilitie, & such was their ordinary demeanour & behaviour: yet was not Salome ignorant heereof, neither when they first deuised this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution: for the diligently noted all things, and aggravated the same in her reports to her brother, whom she informed of their secret assemblies & banquetting, vrging their secret consultations, which (as shee said) had no other issue but his ruine, except vpon their discouerie he sought to repress them in time. Further, that for the present they behaved themselves like enemies in outward shew, & all their speeches tended to disgrace one another; but that in secret they were friends, & that in priuate they entertained their amitie, & promised each other their mutuall assistance to strengthen themselves against those to whom they were loth their friendship should be discouered. These things obserued, shee with all diligence signified the same vnto her brother, who of himselfe had already many probabilities thereof. But he durst not make shew thereof, because he knew that his sister was a woman too much addicted to reproachfull accusation. There was amongst the Iewes a sect of people that were called Pharisees, who were too much addicted to selfe opinion, and boasted themselves to be the exactest obseruers of the law in all the country, to whom these women were very much addicted, as to those who were much beloved of God, as in outward appearance they made shew for. These were such as durst oppose themselves against kings, full of fraud, arrogancie, & rebellion, presuming to raise war vpon their motions, and to rebell and offend their princes at their pleasures: whereas therefore all the nation of the Iewes had sworn to be faithfull to Cesar, and to the estate of the king; these onely refused to take the oath, & of this sect there were to the number of six thousand. For which cause the king Salome discouereth to Herode the conspiracies of the Ladies and others.

The Pharisees subtil and arrogant.

The Pharisees would not sweare obedience but were fined. Pheroras wife perceieth their fine, for which benefit they promise her the kingdom. Bagoas, Carus and others are put to death by Herode.

D hauing imposed an amercement vpon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them; for which cause they pretending to gratifie her, and being esteemed for such as were skilfull in foretelling such things as were to come, by reason of their often communication with God, foretold her that God had decreed to bring the kingdom of Herod and his posteritie to an end, & would bring to passe that the crowne should descend to Pheroras and his sonnes. Salome had got an inkling heereof, and had told Herod no lesse: & how they likewise corrupted euery one of his Courtiers; for which cause he put those to death amongst the Pharisees, who were the principall authors of this aduise; and with them also the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodliest men of that time. Hee afterwards cut off all those amongst his household seruants, who were of the Pharisees faction: For Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he suffered himselfe to be called the father and benefactor of the king, who should be established according to their prediction, and who should haue the government of all things, and should be strengthened by marriages, and descent of his lawfull and naturall children.

But after that Herode had punished those amongst the Pharisees, who were conuicted to haue bene of the conspiracie, hee assembled a councill of his friends, before whom hee accused Pheroras wife, and ripped vp the outrage that was done vnto his daughters, as it hath bene declared, ascribing the same to the pride of this woman, & obiecting it for a crime against her, for thereby shee had injured his honour. Besides this, he accused her that she had of set purpose stirred vp mutinies, and by all meanes possible both in word and in effect, contrarie to all law of nature, shee stirred vp debate betwixt him and his brother; and that the fine that he had imposed vpon his adheraries was satisfied at her charge: so that no iot of that conspiracie was contriued without her priuie and consent. For which causes (said hee) brother Pheroras, it shall not be amisse for you of your owne accord to drue such a wretched woman from you, before you bee requested, and the sentence be pronounced against her, otherwise she will be the cause to kindle a vvarre betwixt you and mee. For if at this present you will continue the friendship and brotherhoode betwixt you and mee, separate your selfe from her: in so doing I will account you for my brother, and you shall lose nothing by the affection which I beare vnto you. For the bond of brotherlie it loue cannot continue safe and vniolate, vnlesse you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moued with the importance and waight of this discourse; yet said he, that for the loue he bare vnto his wife, hee would forget nothing of that dutie which consanguinitie required at his hands in regard of his brother: but that he had rather die then liue without her company, whom he loued more dearly then his life. Herode although hee tooke this answer of his brothers for a most grievous iniurie, yet forbore he to discouer his displeasure towards him: hee onely forbade Antipater and his mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. Hee commaunded the women likewise that they should giue ouer their familiar entertainements the one with the other, which all of them promised to performe. Yet this notwithstanding vpon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another, and Antipater & Pheroras feasted one another by night. The report also went that Antipater had the company of Pheroras wife, and that his mother was the meanes and minister of their private meetings.

CHAP. III.

Herode sendeth Antipater vnto Caesar.

Herod sendeth Antipater to Caesar.

Antipater accuseth Syllaus at Rome before Caesar. Arcas accuseth Syllaus, for killing Phabatus and others.

A traitor that sought the kings death, is apprehended.

Antipater suspecting his fathers dislikes, and fearing least his hatred should by increase bring him into hazard, he wrote vnto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their letters vnto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater vnto Caesar, with all expedition as was possible. Which beeing brought to passe, Herod sent him thither with diuers roiall presents, and gaue him his testament and will with him, wherein he had bequeathed the kingdome to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then bequeathed he the same to his sonne Herod, whom he had by the high Priests daughter. About the same time Syllaus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding hee had neglected those things that Caesar had giuen him in charge. Him did Antipater accuse before Caesar, for the same defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllaus also was accused by Arcas, for murdering diuers of the best account in the citie of Petra, contrarie to his mind: amongst the which was Sohemus (a man of much vertue and honour) and Phabatus, Caesars seruant, of which crimes Syllaus was accused vpon that occasion which ensueth: There was a certain man of Corinthus, who was one of the kings guard, and such a one as he put very great trust in: him did Syllaus perswade by store of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which hee promised to performe. Phabatus made priuie to Syllaus mind, hee presently told it to the king, who caused him to be apprehended and tortured; who confessed the whole matter. Hee laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthians confession; one of which was a man of command in his countrey, and the other was Syllaus chiefe friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to sollicite and egge forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murder, and to asist him if he stood in need of them. Which being fully approoued by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

Pheroras death.

An oath solemnly obserued.

Pheroras in his sicknesse is visited by Herod, & being dead, is honourably buried by him.

Herod, perceiuing that his brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his wife, hee commaunded him to retire himselfe into his owne dominion: whereupon hee willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, protesting by many solemn othes that he would neuer more returne into the Citie, vnlesse hee were assured that Herode was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the king falling sick, hee was sent for to receive certaine secret instructions, as fro the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his oath. This notwithstanding Herode dealt more kindly with him, and continued his loue and affection towards him: for he came vnto Pheroras as soone as he heard of his first sicknesse, and being vnfit for alio; and after hee was deceased, hee sent his body to Ierusalem, and honourably entombed him in that place, and grievously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters mishaps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was Gods pleasure that at last he should be punished for the murder of his brethren. This matter wil I discourse of at large, that it may serue for an example vnto many kings, how they ought to practice & follow vertue in all their actions.

After Pheroras death, two of his freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and such as Pheroras in his life time both inlie trusted, and dearly loued, came vnto Herode, requiring him not to suffer his brothers death to passe vnpunished, but to make diligent enquire of that vnfortunate & vnexpected misadventure. Herod lent a willing eare to their sute, perceiuing that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible. Whereupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his vnexpected sicknes, had suppt with his wife, and that hauing receiued an vnaccustomed poison with his meat, he was dead. That this poison had beene brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her speech protested that it was some potion to increafe loue, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others are skilfull in poisons, and are great Sorcerers, and she that was charged with this fact, was esteemed a great friend and fauourer of Syllaus best beloved. That Pheroras mother and his wives sister went into those quarters vpon purpose to buy that poison, and returned backe, and brought this woman with them the day before the supper. The king moued by these words of theirs, tortured both those maid-seruants of theirs, who were their bond women; as also certaine other of their free seruants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed the same; at length, shee that was last of all put to her triall, ouercome by the paines she endured, said nought else, but that shee praised God that Antipaters mother might feele the like torments, sith shee was the cause of all those mischiefes which they endured.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. Pheroras freemen accuse his wife for poisoning him Herod tortures the Ladies bondwomen, & foundeth out Antipaters & their secrets.

These words of hers made Herode the more eager and inquisitiue, so that by force of tortures hee wrought out all the secrets of these women, their banquets, their secret assemblies, and those verie words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his sonne and himselfe, which had beene reported vnto the women that Pheroras entertained: namely, that he would giue him one hundred talents, provided he would vse no conference with Pheroras. Moreouer, they reckoned vp the hatred that Antipater bare vnto his father, the complaints that he made vnto his mother of the too long life and continuance of his father: for that in regard of himselfe hee was already wexen old; so that although the kingdome should fall into his hands presently, yet could he receiue but verie little contentment thereby. Moreouer hee alledged, that diuers brothers and brothers children were brought vp together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing, for that already if he should fortune to die, the kingdome was to descend not to his sonne, but to his brother: besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the king of diuers cruelties committed by him, & of that murder which he executed vpon the persons of his children. That for feare least he should practise his tyrannie against those that remained, Antipater had found out the deuise to bee summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himselfe into his Tetrarchy.

These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that beeing pressed with the malice of Antipater, hee sought Doris his mother from his presence, spoiling her before her departure of all her ieuels, which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he shewed himselfe more fauourable towards those women of Pheroras household. But nothing did more where Herodes displeasure against Antipater, then did a certaine Samaritane, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the affaires of Antipater the kings son. For he being brought in question and tortured, declared amongst other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortall poison, and deliuered the same to Pheroras his vnle, commanding him to practice the kings death in his abience, and by that meanes least suspected. That this poison was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphius, Antipaters friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipaters mothers brother. That this poison was kept by Pheroras wife, & was committed by her husband to her custodie. She being examined by the king hereupon, confessed no lesse, & hastning forth as if she intended to fetch the same, shee cast herselfe downe headlong from the top of the house: yet did she not murder her selfe, because she fell vpon her feet. Now after shee was recovered out of her swoone, & the king had promised all securitie both to herselfe & her familie, if so be she would discouer the truth; and contrariwise threatened her with extreme torments, if she obstinately continued in concealing these treasons, she sware that she would discouer all things according as they were were acted, and as many men thought at that time shee told nothing but the truth. That poysen (said she) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt, and bought there by the meanes of a brother of his, who was a Physitian. After this, Thendion brought it to our house, and I hauing receiued it from Pheroras hands, kept the same, but bought by your sonne Antipater to poison you that are his father. Now therefore after that my husband fell sick, and you in kindeſſe came to visit and comfort him, he beeing moued with compaſſion, and conquered by your brotherly kindeſſe, by your good affection and louing care in giuing order for his health, called mee vnto him, and said: O wife, Antipater hath circumuented me, whilst by his pestilent counsailes and poisoning practices he desireth to cut off his father, and depriue me of a kind brother. Now therefore, such as I perceiue there is no part of my brothers louing and naturall affection diminished towards mee, wherewith he was wont to entertaine me, and that my latest houre of life approacheth, God forbid, that being ready to sleep with my fore-fathers, I should present them with a ghost foiled and sweltred in my brothers blood: Dispatch therefore, & burne this poison before mine eyes. Here vpon said she, I presently brought it forth according as my husband commaunded me, and burnt the greatest part of the poison, and the rest I referred, that if after my husbands death your Grace should vſe me vnkindly, it might serue me to escape those extremities that would beride me.

After she had spoken thus, she brought forth before them all the poison, and the boxe wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antiphilus brothers, and the mother to them both, confessed no lesſe, being constrained thereunto by force and violence of torture, and acknowledged the boxe. The kings wife also, who was the daughter of the high Priest, was accused for confederacie and concalement of all these treasons. For which cause Herode put her away from him, and raised his sonnes name out of his testament, wherein he had bequeathed him the kingdom after his decaſe. He displaced also his father in law Simon the son of Boethus from the priesthood, & placed Matthias the sonne of Theophilus, who was borne in Ierusalem, in his stead. In the meaneſpace Bathilus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who beeing tortured, confessed that he brought a poison with him to deliuer it to Antipaters mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the first poi- son were not effectually enough to dispatch the king, they might make vſe of this other, to cut him off speedily. There came letters also to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written and deu- ided by Antipaters means, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, for that very often they had refreshed the memorie of Alexander and Aristobulus death, contriued by their father; and for that they la- mented the miserable fate of them, who were innocently betraied; and that now also they them- selues were called back into their country for no other cause, but vpon their arriual to bee made partakers of their brothers miserable destinie. These things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mightie presents he wrought them thereunto. He himſelfe also wrote vnto his father colourably, after a manner excusing the young men, and imputing their words to their indiscretion and young yeeres. Meane while, he busied himſelfe in accusing Syllaus, & court- ed the chiefeſt Romans, buying diuers ornaments and iewels to present them with, to the valew of two hundred talents. And it is to be wondred at, that ſo great matters being brought on foot against him ſeauen moneths at least before his returne into the countrey of Iudæa, that no ink- ling thereof came vnto his eares. But the cause partly was, the diligent ſearch and watch that was kept vpon the high waies, & partly the hatred that all men had conceiued against Antipater. For there was not any that would put themſelues in hazard to procure his securitie.

CHAP. VII.

Antipater is condemned, and cast into prison.

Hedio & Ruf- finus, chap. 6.
Herod writeth friendly let- ters to Anti- pater, and cal- leth him home from Rome.

Herode concealing his displeasure, answered Antipater his sonnes letters (wherin he gaue him to vnderstand, that as soone as he had dispatched his affaires as it behooued him, he should returne) charging him to hasten homeward, for feare least during his absence, some vnexpected inconuenience might betide him. He likewise after a temperate manner com- plained vnto him of his mother, promising notwithstanding to remit the fault vpon his returne, and by all meanes hee made shew vnto him of much kindeſſe, fearing least he apprehending any suspicion should defer to hasten his returne homeward, and lingring too long at Rome, should con- triue some traiterous stratageme, to the preiudice of himſelfe, and the ouerthrow of his king- dome. These letters did Antipater receiue in Cilicia, and already had he receiued others at Ta- rentum, rentum, by whom he vnderstood of Pheroras his vnles death, wherewith he was fore grieved; not for the loue he bare to Pheroras, but for that he died before hee had murdered his father; accord- ing as hee had promised him. As soone as hee came to Celenderis a Citie of Cilicia, hee grew doubtfull whether he should returne or no, and grieuouſly was he distracted by his mothers dif- graces, who was banished from the court. Sundry also were the opinions of his friends in this behalfe: for some of them counsailed him to stay, and expect the euent of these troubles in some place: other some on the other side, aduised him to delay no longer his returne into his countrey, for that vpon his arriual hee might easily ſatistie all those obiections and accusations that were inforced against him, because his accusers had nought else to strengthen their cause with, but his absence: This latter aduise liked him best; so that hee tooke himſelfe to sea, and at last arri- ued in the Port of Sebaste, so called, and builded by Herode, to his great charge in honour of Cesar.

And now already it manifestly appeared that Antipater was vpon his downfall: For no man came out to salute him, no man entertained him; as they did vpon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with praises and happy acclamations: but contrariwise, they boldly and openly ſpake against him, and bitterly cursed him, telling him that he was iuſtly punished for the wickedneſſe he had committed against his brothers.

About the ſame time Quintilius Varus, who was sent to ſucceed Saturnine in the gouernment of Syria, was at Ierusalem, and drew thither at that instant vpon Herods request, to aſſiſt him with his counsailes in his present and weightie occasions. Now whilst these two ſate and conſulted to- gether, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple garment and roialty that hee was accustomed to vſe, entered the palace. The guard of the gates ſuffered him to enter in, but they excluded all those that were with him. This ſiſt of all affrighted and appauled his ſpirits, in that he already perceiued into what calamities he was fallen; & now also when he drew neere his father, he thrust him from him, accusing him of the murder of his brethren, & repro- ching him with that intent he had to poison him, telling him that the next day Varus should both heare and iudge all his miſdeemeanours.

He altogether amazed at the greatneſſe of that vnexpected miſchiefe, which he both heard and ſaw, departed preſently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had been king of the Iewes before Herode) by whom he was aduertised of all that which had hapned, and for that cause more diligently prepared him- ſelfe for his triall. The next day Varus & Herode ſate in iudgement, accompanied by their friends on both ſides; thither also were cited the kings kinned and his ſiſter Salome, and certaine others, who could diſcouer his ſecret practices; some of which had been tortured, and namely Antipaters mothers ſeruants, who a little before his arriual, had beene apprehended with a letter to this ef- fect: That he should take heed that he returned not into the country, because his father was made priue to all his practices, and that for the present he had no other refuge but onely to Cesar, and to take care likewise least he should fall into his fathers hands.

Here vpon Antipater humbling himſelfe on his knees before the king his father, besought him not to condemne him before his cause were heard, but to ſuſpend his iudgement vntill ſuch time as he had heard his iuſtifications. But Herode after hee had commaunded him to withdraw him- ſelfe into the miſt of the court and aſſembly, deplored his infelicities in begetting ſuch children, and bewailed his miſhap, that in his old age he was reſerued for an Antipater. After this, hee re- koned vp the cares hee had ſpent in their education and institution, and how bountifully he had beſtowed vpon him as much riches as he required: hee furthermore alleadged, that none of all these fauours could preſerue him from falling into the lapſe of the loſſe of his life by their policie, to the intent that they might iniuriouſly poſſeſſe the kingdom before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their owne rights could challenge the ſame. But about all the reſt, hee wondred at Antipater, with what hope hee could poſſibly be puffed vp to attempt ſo audaci- ous and wicked an enterpriſe. For by his testament hee had made him the heire of his kingdom, and in his life time also had made him equall parraker of his dignitie, glorie and power: that hee receiued annually fiftie talents of reuenewe, and to furniſh his voiage for Rome, had three hundred talents giuen him. Moreover, hee accused him for his ſlaunderous accusations against his murdered and ſlaughtered brothers: who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent, why without cause produced hee his ſlaunderous accusations against those, who were his naturall brethren? For in his owne reſpect hee had neuer found any thing against them, but by his report: neither had he giuen ſentence against them, but by Antipaters aduice; advice, who for the present were absolved by him, because hee was become the heire of their pa-tricide. In vttering these words he beganne to weepe, being vnable to vrge his griefes any further; for which cause he besought Nicholas Damasene, who was his deere friend, and conuer-sarily with him, and was priuie to all that which had passed, to prosecute the rest that apper-tained to the inquest and approbation of his crime.

But Antipater turning himselfe towards his father, began to iustifie himselfe, vrging the same testimonies and fauours that his father had shewed vnto him, and the honours he had receiued at his hands, which he would neuer haue shewed him if he had been vnworthy of the same, and had not by his vertue deserued these fauours. He alleadged also, that by his vertue hee had prevented all that which might haue hapned, and that where the cause required his labour or diligence, hee dispatched all things with his owne industrie; that it was vnlikely that he, who had deliuered his father from those treasons, which were intended against him by other men, should himselfe attempt the like: and as farre from probabilitie that he should goe about to extinguish that vertue (whereof euē vntill that day he had giuen testimonie) to the end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for such an indignitie. For long before this time he was named and entituled to succeed him, and to enioy those very honours whereof already he partooke no small part; vvhich by hee protested that it was vnlikely, that hee, who might enioy the halfe of all that his father had, in all securitie, vertue and honour, should desire the whole with infamie, and danger; yea and with in-certitude to obtaine the same; considering in especiall, that the punishment which had befallen his brothers (whom he had both disclosed & accused at such time as they were hidden) was proceeded by him, who, if he had listend, might haue concealed them in secret, and whose wickednes towards their father (after it was approued) he himselfe had reuenged vpon them: neither (as he said) repented he himselfe of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument to approue how incorruptly he loued his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in at Rome, Cesar himselfe was witnesse thereof; who could be no more deceiued then God himselfe: whereof those letters bore record, which were written by him; which in equitie should be of no lesse force, then the slanders of those who sought to set them at oddes: the most part of vvhich obiections and reproches had beene comploted and deuised by his enemies, who haue had the leisure to pursue the same during his absence, which they could not haue performed in his presence. Finally he auowed, that all those confessions were false which were extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that such as are put to the triall, confesse many things by force of torment that are vnture, to satisfie them that put them thereto: briefly without all fauour, he offered himselfe to the rack in iustification of his innocencie. Vpon these his protestations, all the councell & assistants were confounded. For all of them had great compulsion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his teares; so that his very enemies beganne to pittie him. And Herode himselfe made it appeare, that hee seemed in some sort to be altered in his opinion: notwithstanding he endeoured to conceale the same.

But Nicholas, according as he was requested, prosecuted that accusation which the king had begunne, vrging all things to the vttermost, and producing all the witnesses, and those manifest prooues, that were gathered from their examinations who were tortured. In especiall, he amply discourfed of the kings vertue, which he had fatherly expressed in the education and instruction of his children; for vvhich he had beene so vnkindly and vnaturally requited. Moreover, that his first childrens foolish rashnesse was not so much to be wondered at, for that being young, they had beene corrupted by the malice of their counsellors, and had blotted out of their hearts all the lawes of nature, rather through ambition of rule then desire of riches: But that *Antipater*s boldnesse was both wonderfull and wicked, who more cruell then the cruellst beastes (who toward their benefactors acknowledge each good turne) was nothing mollified by his fathers so great indulgence; neither terrified by his brothers calamitie, but that he must needs emulate the in their crueltie. And thou thy selfe (said he) O Antipater, wert the Iudge of their attempted treasons, by thy inquisition they were indicted, thou didst execute the iustice against them being conuicted.
Neither do we disallow that thou didst prosecute them with iust indignation, but rather admire thee for that thou imitatest their intemperance: and we easily gather that those acts of thine were not atcepted for thy fathers securitie, but intended for thy brothers ouerthrow, that by detesting their malice, thou mightst insinuate thy selfe into the allowance & good liking of thy father and thine, that afterwards thou mightest more cunningly and securely bring him to his end, which at length thou hast attempted to performe. For whilst thou adiudgest thy guiltie brothers to death, and sparest their confederats, thou makest it manifest in all mens eyes, that thou art in good liking

A liking with them, whose assistance thou mightest hereafter vse in oppressing thy father. Thou hast therefore taken a double pleasure worthy thy manners; the one openly, as if reioicing and glorying, that by thy brothers death thou hast achieved a matter of honour: the other secretly, by endeavouring with greater wickednes, but more secret fraud to make an end of thy father; the reucenger of whose iniuries thou pretendedst to be. For if thou haddest truly detested their malice, thou hadst neuer esteemed the same to be worthy of thy imitation: For thou hast not cut them off for committing such capitall offences, as were answerable vnto thine, but for that they had a more iust and rightfull title to succede in the kingdome then thou hast: And thou hast thought good to mixe the murder of thy father with the slaughtered bodies of thy brothers, for feare least thou shouldst be sodainly conuincid in thy conspiracies against them, and to the end B that the punishment which thou well deseruest to suffer, should light vpon thy vnfortunate father, proiecting with your selfe such a parricide, and so rare and hainous a murder, that to this day the like thereof hath not been heard of amongst men. For thou being his sonne hast practised these treasons, not only against thy father, but against him that loued thee about measure, and did thee good beyond hope, with whom thou hast actual participation of the gouernment of the kingdome, and who had appointed thee his heire in the same, being no waies hindered, either for the present, or in times past, to participate the pleasure of soueraigntie, and being assured of the hope of succession both by the will and writings of thy father. But you haue measured the course of your affaires, not according to Herods vertue, but according to your owne appetite and malice, intending to deprive such a father of his part, who granted you the whole; and seeking C in effect to murder him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from injury. And not content of your selfe to practise these treacheries, you haue poisoned your mother also with no lesse corruption, and in steed of the loue that should haue beene amongst brethren, you haue filled your familie with mutinies and hatreds: And after and besides all these things, thou hast beene so audacious, as to call thy father beast; being of thy selfe more malignant then those beasts that are most venomous, vsing thine owne venome against thy dearest friends, and such as haue best deserued at thy hands, strengthening thy selfe with his guard, & diuers treacheries both of men and women against one olde man, as if thy cursed minde alone were not sufficient to sa-tisfie thy hatred. And now after so many men and women slaues and free men tortured for thy cause, after the open and manifest testimonies of thy parties in the conspiracie, thou art so im-D pudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedst to deprive thy father of his life, dost now as much as in thee lieth, endeavour to abolish that law that was instituted against malefactors in thy kind, herewithal Venus equitie, & all whatsoeuer iustice is in the world. Dost thou therefore accuse the of falsehood, who were examined in torments, to the end thou mightest endanger their credit, who were the prelersuers of thy fathers life? shall wee beleene thee more then them in their torments? Wilt thou nor (O Venus) deliuer the king from the iniuries of those, who are his own flesh & blood? wilt thou not put this wicked beast to death, who hath murdered his brothers to pretend a loue towards his father, and who hath at last beene discovered to be the most mortall enemie of them all, to the intent that at one instant hee might establish the kingdome in himselfe? Thou knowest that Patricide is no priuate crime, but a publike injury to life E & nature, which is no lesse loathsome in the thought, then it is in the act: which who so punisheth not, is of himselfe guilty of an injury offered to our common mother nature.

After these speeches, he annexed certaine points as touching *Antipater*s mother, which tho-row feminine frailty had beene blabbed out by her, to wit, that she had asked counsaile of South-siders and diuiners, to whom the kingdome should befall: And that shee had offered sacrifices, and made prayers for the death of the king. And moreover he declared what lasciuious pranks Antipater had plaied with Pheroras women, in banquetting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewise that were presented by such as were tortured, with sundry resomonies of diuers men, some suborned; the other found out to be incontinently produced and confirmed. For each man seeing that Antipater was exposed to the accusations of those men, who had the gouernment in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly deliuered him into the hands of his enemies, they manifestly discovered the insatiable hatred which they had conceiued against him, whereas before time the feare that they had of him inforced them to be silent: yet was he not so much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his owne wickednes, namely his deadly hatred against his father, his breach of amicie amongst his brethren, whereby he filled the kings household with seditions and murders, of some comploted, and acted by other some; neither giuing place to hatred according to iustice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might stand with his profit. Which for that diuers men perceived long before that time, they iudged of euents according as they had reason, & the rather because that being void of hatred, they spake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a lowd voice against him, at such time as they were shut vp; at this time when they were depriued of their feare, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were diuers produced of the mischiefes committed by him, yet seemed there nothing to be fained, for that the accusers neither spake in fauour of the king, neither concealed any thing for feare of perill, but condemned all Antipaters wicked actions, and iudged him worthy of death & punishment, not so much for his fathers security as of his own demerit. Neither did they onely accuse him, who were by iustice tied thereunto, but diuers voluntary witnesses also brought in their euidence; so that although hee was a very cunning dissembler, and colourer of his lies, and most impudent in his assertions, yet durst he not once open his mouth or mutter against the same.

As soone as Nicholas had finished his discourse and accusations, Varus commanded Antipater to answer to those crimes, that were objected against him, if he had any thing to alledge, that he was not guilty of those forsaits or hainous crimes that were laid vnto his charge. For of himselfe he desired nothing more, and knew well that Herode his father desired no lesse; then that he should iustifie himselfe, and maintaine his innocencie. But hee humbling himselfe vpon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, besought God, who was the searcher of all hearts, to approue his innocency by some euident signe, how he had neuer attempted any thing to his fathers preiudice. For this is the custome of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they engage themselves in all wickednes, without any respect of Gods iustice; & when as by their misdeeds, they are fallen into perill, then call they God to their minds, by whose inuocation and testimony they desire to be deliuered, making a shew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof at that time happened in Antipater: who, whereas before time disposed all his actions in such sort, as if there had beene no God that had the ouersway of humane affaires; at such time as iustice ouertooke him, and hee was disurnished of the benefit of the lawe, had his recourse to Gods power, alledging that he was referred by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers safety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often questionings he could wrest nothing from him, but that he onely cried vpon God, seeing that otherwise there would be no end of these debates, hee commanded the poison to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being presently brought vnto him, & ministred to one that was condemned to die, it presently killed the man. Which done, he arose and departed out of the counsell and the next day went to Antioch, where for the most part he was wont to haue his residence, for that it was the chiefe citie of the Assyrians. But Herod presently commanded his sonne to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talke had beene betwene him and Varus vpon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the king did nothing in imprisoning him, but by his counsaile. When as therefore he had fast bound him, hee sent vnto Caesar, & wrote his letters vnto him, as touching Antipater, sending certaine appointed messengers, who by worde of mouth might certify him of his curled treasons.

At the very same time there was a letter intercepted, sent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which letter being opened by the king, was written to this effect. I haue sent you Acemes letter, hazardng thereby mine owne life: for you know that I am in danger of the displeasure of two mighty families, if I should be discovered. As for your selfe, be thinke you well of your affaires in this respect. Such were the contents of this letter. The king made diligent search for others also, but he could finde none: for Antiphilus seruant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But whilst the king was in this doubt, one of his seruants and friends perceived that the inside of the messengers vnder-coat was newly sewed: for hee had two garments the one vpon the other, and coiciding that the letters might be hidden in the fould thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the same, and found them. The tenour thereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I haue written the letters to your father, according as you gaue me instructions, and haue counterfeited the copy of my letter; as it had been sent by Salome my mistris. I assure my selfe, that when he hath read the same, he will punish Salome as one that hath practised treason against him. But that letter that was supposed to haue been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipaters inuention, and written in Salomes name, according to his inuention, and in Acmes stile. The contents were these: Acme to king Herode, Health: Whereas I haue an especiall care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy

A thy security; hauing found a letter of Salomes written against thee vnto my Lady, I haue not without danger taken the copie thereof, & sent it vnto you, in which the required that she might haue licence to marry Syllaeus. Teare this copy, least thow the knowledg of the same, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which she had written to Antipater, she had discovered that she had written these words to Herode, according to that commandement he had giuen her, as if Salome had conspired to worke some treason against him. She sent also the copy of those counterfeit letters in the name of Salome, and sent them vnto her mistris to worke treason.

This Acme was a Iewe borne, and chambermaid to Iulia, Caesars wife, and did that which is aboue written for the loue which she bare to Antipater, whom hee had hired by great summes of money, to the end, that she should asist him to execute the mischief, which he practised against his father & against his aunt. Herod made almost desperate by the great mischiefes of Antipater, was stirred vp on the sodaine to shorten his daies, for that hee was the onely meane that stirred vp these great tempests of sedition in his kingdome, & who not only practised against his father and his aunt, but against his sister also; and had in like sort corrupted Caesars family. Salome also incensed him the more, breauing her breasts and offering her selfe to all deaths, if any such like matter might be duely proved against her. For which cause Herod lent for Antipater, commanding him to speake freely all that which he had to say without feare. But he hauing nor one word to answer for his defence, Herod said vnto him: Since that on all sides thou art compassed, and surprised in thy wickednes, delay not, but discover those that are of thy confederacy. Whereupon he laid all the fault vpon Antiphilus, and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extreame griefe, would haue sent Antipater to Rome vnto Caesar, that hee might receiue his iudgement from him, but afterwards he feared least by the interest of his friends he should escape the danger, for which cause he kept him bound & fettered in prison, as he had done before. And in the meane while sent certaine messengers with letters to Caesar, to accuse his sonne, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copie of the letters. These embassadors therefore resorted to Rome, instructed in those things they were to answer to those interrogatories that should be offered them, and with them he sent these letters.

CHAP. VII.

D Herodes sicknesse and the sedition amongst the Iewes.

Eane while Herod fell sicke, and made his will, and appointed his yongest sonne to succeede in the kingdome, for that through Antipaters instigations he had conceived a hatred against Archelaus & Philip. Hee lent also one thousand talents vnto Caesar, & five hundred to his wife, and to his children, friends and freemen. He bestowed also money, rents, & lands vpon his own children: he gaue his sister Salome an ample possession, for that she had alwaies perseuered in louing him, & had neuer offended him. And hauing lost all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70. yeeres olde, he became very tutchie & froward in whatsoeuer his affaires. The cause hereof was, that opinion he had conceived, that he waxed contemptible, & that the whole nation tooke pleasure in those mishaps which befell him: which some of those who were fauoured by the people, made him the rather beleue vpon this occasion which ensued. Amongst those that were most learned, among the Iews, Iudas the son of Saripheus, and Matthias the sonne of Margalothus the most excellent interpreters of the lawes & ordinances of the country (and for this cause were in greatest estimation among the people, by reason that they instructed & trained vp the youth; for all those that desired to obtaine vertue, spent all their time with them) vnderstanding that the kings sicknesse was dangerous, they incensed the yonger sort, counsailling them to ouerthrow all those workes that the king had caused to be made contrary to the law and custome of the country; to the ende, that they fighting for piety, might obtaine the reward that attendeth the same. For in that the king had enterprised and done many things contrary to the law, diuers vnaccustomed miseries had befallen him, & namely that sicknes wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done diuers things contrary to the ancient lawe; against which Iudas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For hee had erected ouer the portall of the great temple, an Egle of gold of great valew. Now the law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to liue according to the same, should nor in any sort erect any image, nor represent any figures of liuing creatures whatsoeuer. For this cause these doctors counsailed them to pull down that Egle: telling them, that although the matter seemed to want no peril, yet ought they rather to prefer an honest death before a pleasant life, if so be it be imployed for the defence of their countrey lawes and religion. For in so doing they should obtaine immortall praise for the present, and a memorable and eternall glorie in time to come; neither that they should protract the execution thereof for feare of danger, since death was a thing that might not be avoided; so that since by the generall course of nature, they must needly die, it should become them brauely to forsake their liues with praise and honour in embracing vertue. For to die in the execution of some noble exploit (which cannot be achieved without hazard or danger) their children should be richly rewarded with the fruits thereof, & their other parents that should outlive them (of what sex so euer) should reape the fruits of that glory which was honourably achieved by them. The Eclipse.

About that time there was a rumour spread, that the King was dead, which gaue very great furtherance to the doctors resolution. For at high noone they went vp into the temple, they pulled and hewed downe the Eagle with their axes, in the sight and assembly of a great number of people that were in the temple. Now when the tidings hereof came vnto the eares of the kings captaine, he fearing least some further and more fatall tumult might be raised, drew out a strong company of souldiers with him, to repulse those that were assembled to hew downe the Eagle: and charging the rude and disarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he easily slew and disperfed the most; as for those forty yong men that valiantly addrested themselves to resist, he apprehended them, and with them the authors of this sedition Iudas and Matthias, who thought scorn to submit themselves, and led them to the king; who demanding of them how they durst deface the sacred image: they answered, that long before that time they had resolved it, and that I now according as they had resolved, they had like valiant men performed the same. For we (said they) maintaine the honour of God and the doctrine of our lawe, whereof we are disciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we haue preferred the lawes of our forefathers, which Moses hath left vs in writing, according as he was suggested and taught them by God: neither doe we refuse any death or punishment which thou shalt inflict vpon vs, being assured in our consciences, that we suffer not for our impiety, but piety sake. Thus spake they all of them, continuing the like constant boldnes in their answers, as they had shewed in their actions, being also ready, constantly to endure any punishment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the king commanded them to be bound, and sent them to Iericho: then calling before him those principall Iewes, who had the gouernment vnder him; and being brought into their assembly vpon his pallat, by reason of his weaknes, he recited vnto them the number of his trauels he had endured for their sakes: in like maner, how vpo his great charges he had repaired and reedified the temple; whereas the Asmonians for the space of 125. yeeres, wherein they reigned, could not performe such a building in the honour of God. Moreouer, he signified vnto them, how he had adorned the same with precious gifts, for which he hoped that after his death his memory and glory should suruiue. After this he expostulated with them for what cause they abstained not from offering him that outrage during his life time? And why at noone daies & in the sight of all the people, they had laid hands on those prelates which he had dedicated vnto God, and had taken those things away violently, which though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect if the act were wel examined, they had taken from God. The gouernours suspecting his cruelty, and fearing least his vnbridled passion should vrge him further, by which means they might be assured of some seuerer punishment, answered him: that those things were not done by their consents, and that in their opinion the iniury ought not to be let slip without punishment. At that time Herod shewed himselfe more fauourable towards the rest, but hee caused Matthias to be deprived of the priesthood, as one in part who had bene the cause of that which had hapned; & in his place substituted Iozar one of his wiues brethren. During the priesthood of this Matthias it hapned also, that another high priest was elected that very day, wherein the Iewes did vsually celebrate their fast. For Matthias the night before the day of the fast, seemed in his dreame to haue had the company of his wife; and whereas for this cause he was vnfit to offer the diuine sacrifice, he had Ioseph the sonne of Ellemus appointed him to be his assister and substitute, by reason of his alliance. Herod therefore deposed Matthias: and as touching the other Matthias, who had mooued this trouble, both he and his companions were by his commandment consumed with fire.

This very night the moone was eclipsed, & Herods sicknes grew more vehement. For God punished those sins which he had committed. For he was inflamed with a lent or slow fire, which to the outward sense seemed not so vehement, but inwardly searched & afflicted all his entrails: he

A had also a rauinous and an vnnatural appetite to his meat, which might no waies be satisfied. Besides that, he had an vlcer in his bowels with a strange and furious colicke. His feet were swolne with moist and shining flegme, and his stomacke was no lesse affected alio. His members rotted and were full of crawling wormes, with a filthy & no lesse troublesome Priapisme, accompanied with an intollerable stench: besides all this, he had a strong conuulsion of his nerues, and shortnesse of breath. For which cause it was a generall opinion amongst holy men, and such as had the knowledge of prophecy, that the king was thus punished for his infinite impieties and sinnes committed against the maiesty of God. And although he was tormented with an vsupportable sicknes, yet had he hope to escape: and for that cause he sent for Physitions from all places; and refused none of those remedies which they thought behoouefull for him. He therefore past ouer Jordan and went into the hot bathes of Calliroes, the waters whereof are potable, besides other vertues they haue against all other kind of sicknes: this water ditchargeth it selfe into the lake calphatice. Being there it was thought good by his physitions, that hee should refresh himselfe in those waters: There being let by them into a bathing tubbe filled with oyle, he waxed so sick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his houshold seruants wept and grievously lamented; and all his familiar friends crying out and bewailing him, with their great noyse caused him to come to himselfe: and seeing himselfe wholly out of hope to escape, hee gaue order that there should a distribution be made to euery soldier the summe of fifty drachmes, and he offered great presents to their captaines & his friends. Afterwards he returned to Iericho, where a melancholy humour possessed him, which made him vntociable, and displeased against all men; so that seeing that he must needly die, he bethought him of this facinorous action that foloweth. For the noblest men among the nation of the Iewes, resorting vnto him from all parts (vpon his commandment vnder the expresse penaltie of losse of life to whoeuer should neglect the same) the king shewed himselfe to be displeased, as well against those whom hee thought guilty, as against them who had giuen him no occasion of discontent. For he caused them to be shut vp in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the tilt-yard to runne horses in, and sent for his sister Salome, and Alexas her husband; telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefes did incessantly torment him: which as he said he ought to beare patiently, because it was an end that should happen to all men. But that which most grieved him was, that he saw himselfe deprived of those mournings and lamentations, which a king deserued. For he was not to seeke of the Iewes affections, neither how his death was desired and longed for by them, since that in his life time they presumed so farre as to reuolt, and dishonour & deface those gifts, which he had bestowed vpon the commonweale. It therefore behooued them to afford him some solace in that his bitter anguish, for that if they refused not to perform that which he had contriued in his mind, the lamentation of his death should be magnificent, & as great as any king euer had: and the pleasure and laughter that might accompany his death, should be abated by their sorrow, who should vnfaignedly lament for the whole nation. He therefore willed them that at such time as he should giue vp the ghost, they should cause the Hippodrome to be inuironed by his soldiers, as yet vnaduerstified of his death (which he would not haue published before this execution were ended) and to command them to shoot their arrows at those that were shut vp therein. And that when they had slaine them all after this maner, they should make him triumph & reioyce in a double ioy; first, for that in his death his commandment should be ratified by effect: secondly, for that he should be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he besought his kinsfolke for the loue they bare vnto him, and for the faith they bare vnto God, that they should not suffer him to die frustrate of this last honour: & they protested that they would not transgresse any point of this his commandment. Hereby a man may coniecture, what his nature was, who tooke pleasure in these about named impieties, and who through the desire he had of long life, hath after this sort dealt with those of his blood: and it may be coniectured by these his last commandments, that he had nothing in him that sauoured any humanitie: for that departing out of the world hee had such a mind, that all the nation and all such as were most affectioned towards him, should be driuen to sorrow and desolation; commanding that in euery house one should be slaine, yea such as had not in any sort offended him, and were not accused of any misdeed committed against any other: whereas they that haue any vertue, finding themselves at that state, haue been accustomed to lay aside the hatred which they haue before time borne vnto their enemies.

XV Hisst he deliuered these instructions to his kinred, he receiued letters from those Embassadors which he had sent to Rome vnto Cesar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cesars command, who was displeased with her for that she had been of Antipaters conspiracie, who was remitted to Herods pleasure like a king and father to vse him, as best pleased him; either to exile and banish him; or if it so pleased him, to put him to death. Herod receiuing these newes, recouered his spirits a little thorow the pleasure he receiued in the contents of those letters, both of the death of Acme, as of the power that was granted him to punish his sonne. But beeing assailed afresh with grievous dolours, & vrged with a desire to eate, he called for an apple and a knife: for before time he was accustomed to pare his apples himselfe, and to cut a little; and afterwards to eate it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, hee looked round about him, determining to giue himselfe a mortall wound therewith, and had surely done it, had not *Achiab*us his nephew hastily stept within him, & staid his hand, and called for assistance. At that time the sorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the palace, as if the king had been already dead; and Antipater certainly belieuving that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no lesse in his words) that beeing deliuered out of prison, he should obtaine the possession of the kingdom without any difficultie: & deuised with the Gaoler as touching his deliuerance, offering him great presents both in hand & hereafter, as if there had bene no other question but of that. But so farre was the Gaoler from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that hee presently went and certified the king what his intent was, and what offers he had made him. Herod, who had already conceived a sinister opinion of his sonne, hearing what the Gaoler had said, beganne to exclaime, and to beat his head, although hee was almost at the vttermost gasp: and lifting himselfe vp vpon his elbowes, he commanded that one of his guard should presently haste and kill him; and that done, that he should be buried in the Castle of Hircanion without any honour.

After this, hauing changed his mind, he made a new testament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before that he had instituted him for his successor in the kingdom. He created Archelaus king; hee gaue the prouinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea and Paneade to Philip his son, and Archelaus brother by the mothers side, to be Tetrarch ouer those places. Hee gaue his sister Salome Iamnia, Azot and Phasaelis, with fiftie thousand crownes of gold. He prouided also for his other kinsmen, that all whom he left rich in money, which he gaue them, & reuenewes which he assigned them. Hee gaue Cesar ten millions of drachmes in siluer, amounting to the sum of eleuen hundred thousand francs, besides a great quantitie of gold and siluer plate, and of precious moueables. To Iulius Cæsars wife, and to certaine others, he bequeathed fife millions of drachmes, amounting to fife hundred & fiftie thousand francs, or thereabouts. After he had in this manner disposed all things, some fife daies after hee had caused Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: hauing reigned after Antigonus death, for the space of thirtie and foure yeeres, and thirtie and seauen yeeres after he was elected and approued king by the Romans: a man without respect cruell, & seuerer towards all men; slaue to his wrath; Lord of the lawes; yet so fauoured by fortune, as no man more; for from a priuate man he became a king, and beeing inuironed with many perils, hee alwaies happily escaped, and he liued also a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this also in his owne opinion was he happy, in that hee ouercame his enemies and aduersaries: but in my opinion, he was most vnfortunate.

But before the kings death was thorowly known, Salome and Alexas discharged thofe that were locked vp in the Hippodrome, and fent euery one of them home vnto his owne houfe, telling them that the king commaunded them to depart and follow their household affaires, and till their land : vvherein they performed a moft noble action, and benefited the whole nation with an efpecial good turne. After that the kings death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas caufed all the men of warre to be afsembled in the Amphitheater in Iericho . and firft of all they caufed

the people.

A Herods letters to be read, which were addressed to the souldiers, in which he gaue them thanks for the fidelitie and good will which they had expressed towards him, praying them to continue the same to Archelaus his sonne, whom he had appointed to be their king after him. That done, Ptolomey, to whom the king had committed the custodie of his seale, recited his testament, which was to take no effect except that Cesar approued the same. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their king. The men of warre flocked about him in troupes, accompanied with their capitaines, promising him to serue him with no lesse will and affection, then they had done his father, praying God to yeeld him his assistance.

they had done his father, praying God to yeeld him his assistance.
At that time also the kings herse was prepared, and Archelaus gaue order that his obsequies should be most royally performed, and bestowed all the furniture that was requisite for that funerall and princely enterrement. Hee was caried out in a gilded litter, distinguisht with diuer precious stones, the cover thereof was of azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a purple raiment, hauing a diademe vpon his head, ouer which there was sette a crowne of gold, and a scepter was couched in his right hand. About this litter marched a great number of his children and kinsfolke; and after them followed the men of warre, disposed in bands and troupes, according to the manners of euery nation. The first of these were the Archiers of his guard: after them went the Thracians: and lastly marched the Germans, and Galathians; all of them in their warlike habiliments and discipline. After them followed all the army, marching in order in like manner as when they were addressed to battell, each one vnder his corporal and captain. Next thes followed fife hundred of his household seruants, bearing perfumes, & all these in this equipage marched to the Castle Herodion, distant some eight stades or furlongs off. For there was hee entombed, according to the tenor of his testament. Thus died Herod. Archelaus continued his mourning for seauen daies space in honour of his father. (For the law of the country ordaineth no lesse.) And after he had feasted the people, and laid aside his mourning apparell, he ascended vnto the temple. All the way as hee went, all the people with shouts and acclamations cried, God saue the king; and with praies and praises honoured him to their vttermost; and hee being conducted vp to a high station and state, which was made for the purpose, and placed in a throne that was embellished with gold, entertained the people very graciously, taking pleasure in their acclamations and congratulations that they bestowed vpon him. Hee gaue them thanks also for that they had blotted out of their remembrance the iniuries, that his father had doone vnto them protesting in his owne behalfe, that he would enforce himselfe to requite their kindnesse, with a intire affection. Helikewise told them, that for the present hee accepted not the stile of king, because the honour was bequeathed him with this condition, that Cesar should ratifie his fathers testament. For this cause, although the souldiers that were in Iericho enforced themselves to set the diademe vpon his head, yet would he not accept that vncertaine honour, because it was resolued whether Cesar, who was the principall partie in the gift, would grant him the gouernment or no.

Hee alledged likewise, that if his affaires succeeded according to his desire, hee would not according as his honour commaunded him, forgette their loue, or leaue their good affection vnrequited. And that in the meane while, hee would enforce himselfe by all means to further those things that concerned them, and entertaine them with more kindeesse then his father had done.

E But they, according as it is the custome of the common people, thinking that those that enter into such dignities, declare and open their minds at the first day, the more Archelaus spake kindly and curteously vnto them, the more they applauded him, and presented him with diuers petitions, for certaine grants & donations from him. Some of them cried out vnto him, that he should cut off some part of their taxes and tallages, which they paid annually: Othersome cried vpon him, to deliuer those prisoners that were committed by Herod, of whom diuers had pined a long time in prison: Others instantly vrged him to cut off those tributes which had been imposed by him vpon bargaines and sales, which was to pay the halfe of the bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not in any sort contradict, struing to the vttermoost of his power to please the people, for that he knew full well that their good affection would be no small aduantage toward him in the confirmation of his kingdome.

F That done, hee sacrificed vnto God, and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainment of his friends.

Archelaus promisseth that with Cæsars approbation hee will carefully intend the desires & profits of the people.

Eane while, certaine men among the Iewes that were deſirous of innouation, in their priuate conuenticles bewailed Matthias and his confederates, whom Herode had put to death, and condemned for raiſing & defacing the golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their deceaſe, they had neither been publiquely honoured, nor lamented for, by reaſon of the feare that the people had conceived of Herod. For which cauſe at that time they required with lamentations and great cries, that their obſequies might be ſolemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received ſome contentation by their teares & tempeſt of exclaymes, they vttered many hainous and diſgracefull ſpeeches againſt Herod; & af- ſembliſembling themſelves together, they required Archelaus to doe them iuſtice againſt thoſe, that during Herods life were in authoritie; and eſpecially they demanded, that the high Prieſt, who vvas aduanced by his father, ſhould bee depoled, and that another more lawfull and vprimight be placed in his ſteed, to offer and exerciſe the high Prieſts place. Now, though Archelaus was ſore diſpleaſed at theſe their violent proceedings: yet notwithstanding, hee conformed him- ſelfe to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repaire vnto Rome, to vnderſtand and attend Caeſars pleaſure. He therefore called for the Generall of his army, willing him to per- ſwade them not to ſecke a reuenge for thoſe men, who were dead, notwithstanding they vvere their friends; becauſe whatſoeuer was done, was done according to law; and that no enquiremight be made thereof, except to the great preiudice of his reputation, and hazard of his ſtate, in regard of the incertaintie of the time: that it was more expedient for him to ſtudie for the maintenance of peace, vntill ſuch time as beeing eſtabliſhed in the kingdome by Caeſars conſent, hee ſhould returne backe againe vnto them, and that then hee would conſult with them for the com-

When he had thus inſtructed his Generall, he ſent him vnto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not ſuffer him to ſpeake: but for feare of danger and death, they put him to ſilence. And if any other were ſo forward as to ſpeak vnto them, and perſwade them to ſome moderation, and to alter their ſiniſter reſolutions, hee was alſo in danger; for that they had this per- ſwaſion, that all things ought rather to bee ordered according to their pleaſures, then by the authority of their ſuperiours: ſuppoſing that although during Herods life time they had been depri-ued of their deereſt friends, it ſhould be now a matter vnworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from the priuiledge to demand their reuenge. For they were tranſported with their owne opinions, and held all that for lawfull and vpri-ght, which was in any ſort conformable to their pleaſures, without foreſeeing the danger that might happen thereby: ſo much vvere they pleaſed to be reuenged on thoſe, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas diuers were ſent by Archelaus, to conſult with them; and diuers came vnto them, not as meſſengers fro him, but as friends and louers of peace, of their owne motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to ſpeak; and thorow their rage thereaſe a great tumult, which had growne to a further extremitie, if a greater number of people had ioyned themſelves with them.

the feaſt of the Paſſeouer.

At that time fell the feaſt of vnleavened bread, which is called Paſcha, which is a memoriall of their deliuerance out of Egypt, at which time all men doe moſt willingly preſent their ſacrifices, and a greater number of beaſts are ſlaine at that feaſt, then at any other time. To this ſole-mnitie alſo an infinite number of people aſſembled from all parts, to honour God: whereby theſe ſeditions (ſuppoſing that they had gotten a fit opportunitie) lamented Judas & Matthias, who were the Expoſitors of the law, and kept themſelves within the temple, whither they had gathered good ſtore of victuals, which they were not aſhamed impudently to begge for. But Archelaus, feare leaſt their rage ſhould produce ſome more grieuous effect of miſchiefe, ſent out a band of armed men, with a captaine, and a regiment of a thouſand men, to repreſſe their head-long furie, before the reſt of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewiſe vnto him, whom they found to bee the forwardſt in that commotion. Againſt thoſe the ſeditious cried out, with great clamors, and incented the people againſt them, ſo that all of them ruſhed in vpon the men of warre, and ſlew diuers of them. The reſt of them eſcaped with their captaine, yet not without diuers wounds. That done, they which were within the temple returned againe to their diuine ſeruice.

A Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole fortune was endangered, except hee repreſſed the rage of the multitude, he ſent out all his footmen with a certaine number of horſemen, to preuent leaſt they that were without ſhould yield aſſiſtance to thoſe, who had taken vp their lodging in the temple, and to put thoſe to the ſword, who hauing eſcaped the violence of the footmen, ſup-poſed themſelves to be in ſecuritie. Theſe horſemen ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelves into the mountaines that were neere adioyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one ſhould repaire vnto his owne houſe. For which cauſe they departed and abandoned the feaſt, for feare of greater miſchiefe; notwithstanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinarie cuſtome of the ignorant multitude.

After this, Archelaus accompanied with his mother, betooke himſelfe to ſea, and led with him B Nicholas and Ptolomey, with diuers other his friends, committing the gouernment of all his houſehold and kingdome to his brother Philip: with him alſo departed Salome, Herods ſiſter, leading with her her children. There went alſo diuers other of his kinned, who ſaid that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that hee might obtaine the kingdome, but in effect it was to contradict him with all their power: & in eſpeciall, to vrge that againſt him with great vehemencie, that was done in the temple. Sabinus, Caeſars Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Iewrie to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Caeſarea. But Varus arriuing in the meane while, detained him from finiſhing that voiage; for Archelaus had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to doe Varus a pleaſure, wold not ſeize the fortrefſes of Iewrie; neither ſealed vp Herods treaſures, but left them in Archelaus poſſeſſion, vntill ſuch time as Caeſar had giuen order

After Archelaus had ſette ſaile towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch; Sabinus went to Ieruſalem, where he ſeized the kings palace: and calling before him the kings Agents, & the Capitaines of his garrifons, he required them to deliuer vp their Caſtles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the kings direction, pretending to keepe the ſame in Caeſars behalfe.
At the ſame time, Antipas Herods ſonne trauailed to Rome likewiſe, vnder the hope to be elected king, in regard of Salomes promiſes; and for that he better deſerued the ſame then Archelaus, coſidering that in the firſt teſtament, which ſhould be of more force then the later, hee had been appointed king. He led his mother alſo with him, & Ptolomey the brother of Nicholas, who had bin D one of Herods moſt eſteemed friends, and was well affected to further & ſer forward his title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred vp to ſecke the kingdome by Ireneus, a man very eloquent; & to whoſe charge in regard of his ſufficiencie, the affaires of the kingdome had been committed. For which cauſe, although he were perſwaded to giue ouer the kingdome vnto his elder brother, vwho was confirmed in the kingdome by his fathers teſtament, yet would hee not giue eare thereunto. But Antipas no ſooner arriued in Rome, but all his kinsfolke reuolted from Archelaus, vnto him, nor ſo much for the loue they bare him, as for the hatred they had conceived againſt Archelaus: and aboue all, for the deſire they had to recouer their libertie, & to draw themſelves vnder a Romane Gouernour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whoſe they endeuoured to procure the roialtie, ſhould bee more profitable vnto them then Archelaus. Sabi-nus alſo by his letters accuſed Archelaus to Caeſar: but Archelaus by Ptolomey exhibited vnto Cae-ſar a ſupplication containing his right and title to the kingdome, his fathers teſtament, and the account of the money which Herod his father had ſealed vp, together with his ring, & expected the iſſue.

Antipater, Sa-

Augustus Cae-ſar.

But when hee had read theſe letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and vn-derſtood what ſummes of money he had left, and what the annuall reuenue was, and how Ant-tipas challenged the kingdome, & appropriated it to himſelfe, according as his letters made mention: he aſſembled all his friends to haue their aduiſe thereupon. Amongſt them was Caius the ſonne of Agrippa and his daughter Iulia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſitte in the chiefeſt place: which done, he commaunded the aſſiſtants to ſpeake what they would touching this matter. At that time Antipater Salomes ſonne, a man very eloquent, & a great aduerſarie to Archelaus, ſpake firſt ſaying, that it was a mockerie for him at that time to ſpeake of the kingdome, conſidering that before Caeſar had granted it him, hee had already ſeized the forces of the ſtate; F when as vpon a feſtiuall day he had ſlaine ſo many: who although they had deſerued that puniſhment, yet ought the iuſtice thereof to haue been referred to a lawfull power; and not to haue bin vſurped by him, either beeing king with Caeſars preiudice; whoſe authoritie he had contemned; or by being a priuate man, which was a greater ouerſight: For which cauſe hee vnderſeuerd lie at this

this time hoped for his approbation, whom already as much as in him lay, hee had deprived of the title and authoritie of his allowance. Moreover, hee objected against him; that of his own authoritie he had changed certaine chieftaines of the armie, and that hee had seated himselfe in the royall throne, and like a king had determined certaine causes, & had granted certain demands of the people: finally, that he had left nothing undone, which he might haue performed, had Caesar confirmed his title. He alledged also, that they who were inclosed in the Hippodrome, were dismissed by him, and diuers other acts, partly true, partly probable, in regard of the ambition of young men, who desirous to gouerne doe ordinarily commit such things: besides this, his neglect in mourning for his father, and withall, his reare banquetts all night long: at that verie time his father died; whereat the people beganne to mutine, seeing the small regard he had of his fathers death, from whom he had receiued so great goods and honours. How all the day long he made a shew of his sorow and teares in his paullion, but all the night rooke pleasures like a king; and being such, if Caesar should grant him the kingdom, he would behaue himselfe no lesse vnkindly towards him, then he had done towards his most kind father. That it was no lesse then a heinous crime in him, to delight himselfe with songs and dances at his fathers death; as if he had beene his enemy: That he now came to Caesars prelence, to the intent to obtaine the kingdom by his consent, whereas already he had behaue himselfe no otherwise then if he had already bene established king by his authoritie. But most of all he exaggerated the slaughter he had committed in the temple, & the impietie perpetrated to neere to the feast of Easter, at which time diuers both strangers and citizens had been slaughtered after the manner of sacrifices, and the temple filled with carcasses, not by a stranger, but by him, who vnder the colour of religion desired the gouernment of the kingdom, to the end hee might satisfie the vniustice of his nature, in exercising each way his tyrannie towards all men: for which cause his father neuer thought, nor euer dreamt to substitute him king in his place. For hee knew both his life and disposition, and by his former testament (& that of greatest force) had ordained his aduersarie Antipater to be king. For he had been allotted the kingdom by his father, not when his mind was dead before his bodie, but while both his iudgement was sound, and his body in health. Yea although at that time Archelaus father had such a conceit of him, as in his later testament & bequest he pretendeth; yet that hee had already declared what kind of king hee was like to be, who contemned Caesars authoritie in confirming the kingdom, and being as yet a priuate man, doubted not to murder the citizens in the temple. This said, Antipater (to giue greater credit to his words, bringing diuers of his kindred as witnesses of that he had said) ended his Oration.

Whereupon Nicholaus arose, and alleadged in Archelaus behalfe as touching the slaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impietie, who could not bee restrained from their tumults and uprores, before Archelaus was enforced to appease the by force, alleadging that they were so much the more guiltie, for that they had not onely exercised their malice, but also had enforced others to attempt so heinous a reuenge against them: for their insolencie seemed in appearance to concerne Archelaus; yet in a sort their contumacie pertained to Caesars ruine. For those that had been sent by him to appeale and redresse their sedition, were against all law and right charged & slaine by them, without respect of God, or regard of the solemne feast: whose defence Antipater was not ashamed of, without respect of equitie, so that hee might satisfie that hatred which hee bare vnto Archelaus. That therefore it was their fault, who first of all abstained not from iniurie, but whetted those swords, which were drawne in maintenance of the peace, against their owne bosomes. He enforced all other things also, whereof they had accused Archelaus, against themselves, saying, that none of these things were done without their consents: and that the offence was not so grievous, as they intended it should be esteemed, to the end they might discredit Archelaus. So great a desire was in them to hurt their kinsman, a man both well respected, and affected by his father, as also kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the testament, that it was made by the king when he was in perfect estate of mind and body, and of greater force then the former, because the authoritie and confirmation thereof was ascribed to Caesar the soveraigne of the world.

Further, that Caesar would not imitate them in that wrong they did vnto Herod, who (being during his life time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, goe about to violate his last and truest testament: but that rather like a friend & confederate hee would confirm his will, who like his faithful and sworne welwiller had committed all things to his trust. For that there must needs be a great difference between their malice and Caesars vertue & faith, which was renowned thorow the whole world. For which cause hee would not iudge his decreeto be inconsiderately past, who left his succession to his well deserving sonne, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was vnlikely that he should erre in the choise of his successor, who had so discreetly submitted all things to Caesars iudgement. After this manner Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Caesar courteously railed Archelaus, who lay prostrate & humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be king, by giuing an apparant testimony, that hee was constant in his resolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which should be answerable to Herods testament, & Archelaus profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some good hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time: but dismissing the counsell, he debated with himselfe whether he should ratifie the kingdom to Archelaus only, or diuide it amongst Herods kinred, especially since all men had need of his assistance.

CHAP. XII.

The Iewes mutinie against Sabinus, and how Varus punisheth the authors of the sedition.

Before Caesar had determined any thing certainly in this behalfe, Marthalce Archelaus mother died of a sicknes, and Varus the president of the Iewes in Syria, had sent letters, which certified the emperor of the rebellion of the Iewes. For after Archelaus departure, all the nation was in an uprore. To pacify which, Varus resorted thither, & punished the authors of the same, & after he had in this sort appeased all things, he returned to Antioch, leauing a regiment of soldiers in Ierusalem to restraine the factious in vocations amongst the Iewes: yet preuailed he nothing by this his policy. For as soone as Varus was departed, Sabinus who intended Caesars affaires, remaining in that place, grievously burthened the Iewes, trusting to that power that was left him, & supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed diuers souldiers, and made vse of them to oppress the Iewes, and to prouoke them to sedition. For he enforced himselfe to surpris their fortresses, and forcibly to make search after the kings treasures, for his priuate lucre and couetousnes sake. When as therefore the feast of VV hitontide was come (which is one of our festiualls) diuers thousands from all parts repaired to Ierusalem, not only for religion sake, but also for the despise & hatred they had conceiued against those violences & iniuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were those of Iudea grievously offended (but diuers also resorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Iericho and the cities situate on the other side of Iordan, desiring all of them to be reuenged on Sabinus.

And diuiding their campe into three bandes after this manner, the one part of them tooke vp the Hippodrome, and of the other two the one seized the southerne quarter of the temple, and the other the easterne, & the third, which was in the Hippodrome were planted to the westward, where the kings palace stood; and thus prepared they all things that were necessary to set vpō the Romans whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, and resolution, who were resolved either to die or to ouercome, sent present letters vnto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the regiment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs utterly perish without his speedy rescous: as for himselfe he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the castle Phaelus, which was a fortress which was builded and so called in honour of Herods brother, who was slaine by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a signe to the Romans, that they should fall out vpon the Iewes, being afraid to trust himselfe to his own friends, and supposing that the rest ought to expose their liues to danger in maintenance of his seruice. The Romans hauing made this fallie, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans diuers waies had the vpper hand; yet were nor the Iewes any waies discomfited, notwithstanding they had lost many men, but wheeling about so long till at last they seized the outward galleries, and those that encompassed the temple, and in that place there was a hot assault: for they slung downe stones with their hands & slings, and there were certaine archers mixed amongst them; who in that they had recouered a place of advantage, grievously gauled the Romans which were below, in that they had no meanes to auoid their shot, but were in such sort exposed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And with this disadvantage fought the Romans a long time, till at length sore aggrieved at this their present indignity, they secretly fired the galleries & porches, without any discovery of those that were therein: which fire brought thither by many, and fed with such matter, as would speedily flame, incontinently tooke holde of the rooffe, because the rooffe was couered with pitch and waxe, and guiled vpon the waxe; so that these great and excellent buildings were burnt downe to nothing in a moment, and they that were resorted thither were all of them consumed before they were aware. For some of them fell with the rooffe of the Galleries; other some

About the same time also, the roiall palace of Amathat, that was fast by Iordan, was burnt by men of as bad disposition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole nation ruigned this raging rebellion, for that the countrey had no king, who by his vertue might gouerne and moderate the people, for that the strangers, who were sent to repress these mutinies, did rather incense them thorow their violence and auarice. For a certaine obscure and base man (neither esteemed for vertue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but beeing a shepheard vtterly vnknowne before time, and onely famous for his huge stature and strength) called Athronges, was so audacious to aspire to roiall

At this time was all Iudaea full of robberies, and as many seditious assemblies as drew together, so many kings were there elected, who were raised to the utter ruine of the common-weale. Amongst the rest, the Romans were they that smarted least, but the murders were executed against those that were out of the country. But Varus vnderstanding by Sabinus letters, in what dangers they were, and fearing the utter overthrow of his third legion, hee tooke with him the two other (for to the uttermost, in Syria there were but three) and with the assistance of the kings and Terrarches he hasted into Iewry, to relieue those that were besieged, commanding those that were sent out before he dislodged, to meete him at Ptolemais, and passing by the Citie of the Berythians he receiued a thousand, & five hundred soldiers at their hands, to attend him in his war. Aretas also, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himselfe into confederacy with the Romans, in regard of that hatred he bare toward Herode, lent him horsemen and footmen. When all these forces were assembled at Ptolemais, he deliuered a part thereof to his son, and one of his friends, commanding them to make warre vpon the Galileans, who bordered vpon that Citie: who entering that region, and putting all those to flight, whoeuer durst make head against him, he took Sephoris, and selling the inhabitants vnder the speare, he consumed the Citie with fire. Varus himselfe marching towards Samaria with his army, violence not the Citie in that hee knew it was free from the contagion of the seditious, but he pitched his campe in a certain village, which was Ptolomies possession called Arus. The same did the Arabians burne, reuenging themselves on Herods friend for his sake, and marching onward the Arabians spoiled also an other village called Sampho, and for that it was strongly fortified burned the same. Besides, in that journey nothing escaped their hands, but they put all to fire and sword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus commaund, and in reuenge of his souldiers that were slaine in that place, it was left desolate and void of inhabitants. From thence drawing neere to Ierusalem, those Iewes that besieged the legion on that side, vpon the foudaine view and approach of the army of the Romans, I fearfully fled, giuing ouer that siege which they intended. But those Iewes of Ierusalem, being grievously reprobred by Varus, alleaged in their excuse, that the people in regard of the feast were assembled in that place, and that the warre was not begun by their consent, but vnderaken by their boldnesse who resorted thither from diuers places; and that they were so faine off from assailing the Romans, as they rather seemed to bee besieged by them. And long before this, Ioseph king Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus with their souldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and those Romans that had sustained the siege, had done no lesse. But as touching Sabinus, hee would not appeare in Varus presence, by stealing away pitiouly out of the Citie, hee fled vnto the seaward. The Varus sending a part of his armie thorow the whole region, sought out the authors of this sedition, and those that were noted men in the action; some of which, who were most guiltie, were punished: the rest were deliuered. Now of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified; and that done, seeing that his army stood him in little need, hee dismissed them. For diuers disorders and outrages, contrarie to Varus expresse command, were acted by his souldiers, who sought after nothing more then to increase their meanes by other mens miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Iewes were assembled together, he hastned to apprehend them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabius aduice submitted themselves. But Varus hauing pardoned the people for this their rebellion, sent all those that were the ringleaders thereof to Cesar, who discharged diuers of them. But he chastised certaine of Herodes allies, and such as bare armes with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, nor respect of iustice, they had abstained from rebellious insurrection. After that Varus had in this sort appeased all the troubles in Iewrie, and left the first legion in garrison in Ierusalem, he returned to Antioch.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another occurrent that arose vpon this occasion: Certaine Embassadors of the Iewes resorted thither by Varus permission, requiring that it might be lawfull for them to liue according to their owne lawes: these presented themselves, to the number of fiftie, and were backt by eight thousand Iewes, that inhabited the Citie. And when as Cesar had assembled the councell of his friends, and chiefest citizens in Apollos temple, which he had builded to his mightie charge, thither resorted the Embassadors, who were followed by a troop of Iewes; & Archelaus also attended by his friends. But the kings kindred neither stood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, and yet disdained they to assist the embassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cesars presence to oppose themselves against their nearest friend and kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus perswasion resorted thither out of Syria, especially to the intent to plead for his brother, to whom Varus wished al good fortune: besides that, hoping not a little that if the Iewes should obtaine the libertie to liue according to their lawes, it might come to passe that the kingdome being diuided amongst Herods children, he might also light on some part thereof. After therefore the Embassadors of the Iewes had obtained licence to propose their demands, pretending with themselves wholly to extinguish the royalty: they began to rippe vp Herodes disgraces, alleadging how onely in name he had beene a king; whereas otherwise he had vied all the tyrannous practices that the most wickedest person could haue inuented toward the destruction of his nation; and that not content with these, he had of his owne head praetised and inuented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon vp how many hee had deprived of life, when as the estate of those that were aliue was farre more desperate; whome hee not onely affrighted with perpetuall terror and feueritie, but also with iniurious hands had not abstained from their goods. By which meanes it came to passe, that he not only builded, but beautified forraine Cities inhabited by forraine nations, to the ende hee might the rather verily spoyle those by exaction, which were situate and seated in his owne Countrey: and that he enforced his nation to extreame pouertie, which hee receiued in most happy estate, whilest hee spoiled those nobles of their estates, who vpon weake probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life deprived them of their possessions. Furthermore, whereas yeerely tributes were imposed on euery one; yet secretly was the rauinous & covetous desires of his friends and courtiers to be satisfied, yea and of his seruants also, who had the authority to exacte these things, that by this meanes they might redeeme their iniurious vexations. As for the deflowring of virgins, and the scornfull betraying of a matrons chastitie, they couered them vnder silence, for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such outrage, if their disgraces be but knowne to a fewe. In briefe, that Herod had in no other sort gouerned, then as if the government of them had been committed to a most savage beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that nation had been afflicted with many calamities and murders, yet that there is no example extant amongst their monuments of antiquitie, that may be compared with their present calamitie vnder Herod. For which cause vpon iust respects they had with one consent named Archelaus their king, supposing that whatsoeuer king might befall them, he would alwaies demean himselfe more affably then Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection vnto them: But hee without delay and all at once had made manifest to the whole nation, what opinion they were to conceiue of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed king (for that it lay in Cesars hands

A hands to bequeath it, yea or no) and as if hee had been affraide least he should assuredly be acknowledged for his fathers sonne, he had shewed an example of his vertue, moderation & good government, that he would vie towards his subiects, by the first act which he hath committed, not onely against God, but also against men. For in the temple it selfe he hath caused three thousand of his owne countrein to be slaine. And how can he choose but be iustly hated, who besides his other cruelties, obiecteth against vs the crime of rebellion and murinie? The effect of their request therefore was this, that they might not any more be gouerned by a king, nor any such like government, but that they might be annexed vnto Syria, and submit themselves vnto those gouernours that should be sent thither. That in so dooing it should truly appeare whether they were seditious, and addicted to chaunges, or whether they would liue in peace at such time as they had fauourable gouernours. After the Iewes had spoken to this effect, Nicholas discharged the kings of those accusations that were obiected against them, and namely Herod, who (as he said) had neuer beene accused all his life time; and that it was no reason that they who iustly accusing him, might haue caused him to be punished during his life time, should now addresse their accusations against him after he was dead. And as touching those things that were obiected concerning Archelaus actions; it ought to be imputed to their insolence, for that engaging themselves in matters contrary to lawe, and hauing begun to murder those who sought to appease the tumult, they accused such as had kept them in obedience. Besides this, he obiected against them, that they were addicted to alterations, and tooke pleasure to stirre vp seditions; for that they knew not what thing it was to obey iustice and the lawes, and that there was no nation in the world so headstrong as that of the Iewes; for that they would haue the vpper hand ouer all. Thus spake Nicholas.

Cesar confirms Herods testament, and appointeth his children to be his successors.

When Cesar had heard these things, he dismissed the assembly. But som few daies after, hee desirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not king, but Lord of halfe that government that appertained to Herode, promising him to bestow a royall dignity vpon him, if so be he behaued himselfe vertuously, according as it became him. As for the other moitie, he diuided it betweene two, giuing a feuerall part thereof to each of Herods sonnes, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his brother Archelaus for the whole kingdom. The same Antipas also had the countrey on the other side of Iordan, and Galilee, with two hundred talents of annuall reuenue. As for Philip he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundred talents. As for Archelaus, he had Iudæa, Iudæa & Samaria, which were discharged of the fourth part of the tributes by Cesar, for that they had not ioined themselves with the rest of the people during the time of the sedition. Besides that, Archelaus had the tower of Straton, Sebaste, Ioppe and Ierusalem. For Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon were cities of Greece which Cesar had dismembred, and adioyned to Syria. Archelaus had five hundred talents of yeerely rent out of his countrey. Thus was the patrimony diuided among Herods sonnes. As for Salome, besides that which her brother had giuen her in his will, which were the Cities of Iamnia, Azot, Phasaelis, and halfe a million of siluer mony, Cesar granted her a royall house in Ascalon; so as she receiued, in the whole, sixty talents of annuall reuenue, and had her house allotted her within the dominion of Archelaus. All other of Herods kinred, receiued that which was bequeathed vnto them by his testament. Two of his daughters that were vnmarried, were endowed by Cesar with a quarter of a million of siluer mony which he gaue them, beside their fathers portion, and they were married to Pheroras sonnes. Moreouer he gaue Herodes sonnes, all that which he had giuen him by his testament, amounting to the sum of one thousand & five hundred talents; contenting himselfe onely to receiue some fewe moueables, not so much for their value, as in remembrance of the king, who had giuen them.

The false Alexander.

After these things were in this sort disposed by Cæsar, a young man and a Jew borne, brought vp in the Citie of Sidon, by a certaine Romane libertine, intruded himselfe into Herods kinred, for that all those that beheld him, reported he resembled Alexander Herodes sonne, who was slaine by him; and by this meanes, he began to aspire vnto the kingdome: wherupon calling to him a companion, who was his owne countreiman, & a long beaten courtier, and his craftmaster, and fit to execute any dangerous or desperate actions, he by his instructions fained himselfe to be that Alexander Herods son, who was deliuered from death by the meanes of a certaine friend, who had the charge to see him executed; who executing others in their steedes, deliuered both him and his brother Aristobulus, and that they were both escaped in this manner. Becing puffed vp by these toys, he fayled not to deceiue other men; and as soone as he came to Crete, as many Iewes soeuer as hee fell in conference with, he perswaded them no lesse: and getting much money at their hands, he sailed into the Isle of Melos, where he gathered a great summe of money vnder pretext that he was of the kings blood. And now hoping that he should recouer his fathers kingdome, and that he should remunerate those who were beneficiall vnto him, hee hasted towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pompe. And being arriued at Puteol, he there also was entertained with no lesse fauour by those Iews whom he deceiued by his colourable title, and diuers others, who had bin Herods friends & familiars came vnto him, and entertained him as their king. The cause hercof was the natural dispositiō of men, who take pleasure in false reports, together with the report of his resemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter most assured, that he was the man, and none other, and affirmed vnto other vpon their othes that it was he; so that this rumor at last came to Rome. And all the Iewes that dwelt there came forth to meet him, saying, that it was Gods handy work, that he was after that sort preserved beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly reioyced in his mother Mariammes behalfe, from whom he was descended; and he was carried in a litter thorow the streets with all the apparell of a king, the charge wherof was defraied by those who were his friends. He was attended with a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applause, as it ordinarily falleth out at such time as beyond all expectation any one is found to haue bin miraculously preserved. When this newes was brought to Cæsars cares, he gaue small credite thereunto, perswading himselfe that it was a hard matter to deceiue Herode in a cause of so great importance: notwithstanding conforming himselfe in some sort to the opinions of men, he sent a certaine free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly conuersed with Alexander and Aristobulus during their infancy, giuing him in charge to bring Alexander vnto him, to the end he might see him; which he did, and was neuer the wiser in discovering him. This notwithstanding Cæsar was not fully deceiued. For, although he resembled him somewhat, yet was not he so neerely like him, that he could deceiue those who narrowly obserued him. For this counterfaite Alexander had hard hands, in that he had beene accustomed to laboor, which the true Alexander could not haue in regard of his tender and delicate education: and contrariwise this man was of a rough skin & hard flesh. Cæsar therefore discovering the trechery both of the counterfaite scholler and lying master, and how they accorded in their confident iustifications, he enquired of them what was becom of Aristobulus who was secretly hiddē with him, & for what cause he presented not himselfe to enioy the honor that appertained to those, who were so nobly descended? It was answered him, that he remained in the Isle of Cyprus, for feare of dangers, to which they are exposed who saile by sea, to the end that if any misfortune should befall them, all Mariammes race should not be extinguished, but that at leastwise Aristobulus might be left aliue. Whilest hee auowed these things, and the author of this fable iustified no less, Cæsar drawing the yong man aside, said vnto him: My friend, if thou wilt not deceiue me, thou shalt haue this recompence, that thou shalt not be punished. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who hath emboldned thee to practice this fraud: for this malice is so great that it surpasseth thine age: wherupō being vnable to conceal the truth, he disclosed the trechery to Cæsar, how & by whom it was contriued. At that time Cæsar being loth to fulfill his promise that he had past to this false Alexander, and seeing that in times past he had trauailed with his hands, he caused him to be enrowled among the number of his laylers to row, & caused the other that induced him to this fraud to be put to death, contenting him-

Archelaus is accused anew, and afterwards banished, and sent into Vienna.

After that Archelaus had taken possession of that Soueraignty that was allotted him, hee came into Iudæa, where he deposed Ioazar the son of Baithus from the high priesthood, accusing him to haue fauoured the seditious, and established Eleazar his brother in his place. After this he reedified the Palace in Iericho, and sumptuously adorned it, drawing away the halfe of those waters which serued the borough of Næara: and conuaying them thorow a field which he had planted with palm trees, he builded a borough in that place, which he named Archelaus, and contrary to the lawes of his country he married Glaphyra Archelaus daughter, who had been his brother Alexanders wife, by whom also he had diuers children, notwithstanding the lawe of the Iewes forbiddeth a man to marry his brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enioy the priesthood any long time: but during his life time, Iesus the sonne of Sias was substituted in his place.

The tenth yeare of Archelaus gouernment, the chiefeest gouernours among the Iewes and Samaritanes vnable any longer to endure his cruelty and tyranny, accused him before Cæsar, and especially after they had vnderstood that he had transgressed Cæsars commaund, who had charged him to behaue himselfe graciously towards them. Which when Cæsar vnderstood, he was sore displeased, and caused Archelaus agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome; and sent for Archelaus also: & esteeming it too base an indignity for him to write vnto him, Go (sayd he) vnto him with all expedition, and bring him vnto me without delay. He posting forward with all diligence, at length arriued in Iudæa, where he found Archelaus banquetting with his friends, and hauing certified him of Cæsars pleasure, he incited him to hasten onward of his way. As soone as he came to Rome, after that Cæsar had heard certaine of his accusers and his iustifications, he banished him, and confined him in the Citie of Vienna in France, and confiscated all his goods.

banished and confined.

But before Archelaus was sent for to Rome, he reported vnto his friends this dreame which ensteth. Him thought that he sawe tenne eares full of wheat, and very ripe, which the oxen broufed vpon, and as soone as he awoke he conceiued an opinion that his vision prefiged some great matter. For which cause he sent for certaine soothsayers, who made it their profession to interpret dreames. Now whilest they were debating one with an other (for they differed for the most part in their exposition) a certain man called Simon an Essæan, hauing first of all obtained security and licence to speake, said that the vision pretended, that a great alteration should befall in Archelaus estate, to his vtter disgrace. For the oxen signified afflictions, in respect that those kinde of creatures do ordinarily trauell and as touching the change of estate it was signified by this, in that the earth being laboured by the trauell of the oxen, retained not the same estate: and as touching the ten eares of corne, they signified the like number of yeers. And therefore when as one sommer should be ouerpast, that then the time of Archelaus soueraignie should be at an end. Thus interpreted he this dreame. And the first day after the vision thereof, his factor Archelaus by Cæsars commandement came into Iury to summon him to Rome. Some such like matter hapned to Glaphyra his wife also, the daughter of king Archelaus: she (as we haue said) married Alexander Herods sonne when she was a maid, and brother to this Archelaus; who beeing slaine by his father, she was married the second time to Iuba king of Mauritania: and he also being dead, the liuing with her father in Cappadocia was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme his wife for the loue he bare vnto Glaphyra. She liuing with Archelaus, was encountred with such a dreame: She thought that she saw Alexander fast by her, who cherishing and embracing her, checked her saying: Glaphyra, Thou approuest the truth of that prouerbe, which saith, Women haue no loyalty. For hauing giuen me thy faith, and married with me at such time as thou wert a Virgin, and born children by me, thou hast forgotten and neglected my loue, thorow the desire thou hast had to be married the second time. Neither hast thou contented to haue done mee this wrong, but hast taken vnto thee likewise a third husband, lewdely and impudently intruding thy selfe into my family; and being married with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my brother for thy husband. This notwithstanding I wil not forget the loue that I haue borne borne there, but will deliuer thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine owne, as heerebefore thou hast been. After that he had told this vision to certaine women that were her familiars, she died very shortly after. Which accident I haue thought good to register in this place, in that I was to intreat of those kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signall example containing a most certaine argument of the immortalitie of soules, and Gods providence. And if any one deeme these things incredible, let him reserue his opinion to himselfe, and no waies contradiet those, who by such euents are incited to the study of vertue. Now when the gouernment of Archelaus was annexed to Syria, Cyrenius, who had been Consul, was sent by Cesar to taxe Syria, and to dispose of Archelaus house.

Cyrenius is sent by Cesar into Syria to execute iustice in that place. Coponius Pretect of Iudaa.
The taxation of the people of the Iewes.

Cyrenius the Roman Senator hauing executed all degrees, offices, and dignities vntill such time as hee obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Cesars direction, to doe iustice among the people, and to sesse and taxe each mans goods: with him was sent Caponius a capitaine of a company of horsemen, who was appointed to haue the commaundement of all Iewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Iudaa, which was already annexed vnto Syria, to taxe the goods of the inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus substance. And although at the first the Iewes thought but hardly of this descriptio, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselves, being perswaded thereunto by the counsell of the high Priest Isazar the sonne of Bathus, M by whose aduice they suffered themselves to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certaine Iewe called Iudas the Gaulanite, borne in the towne of Gamala, who hauing a certaine man called Sadoc the Pharisee confederate with him, laboured to stirre vp the people to rebellion: allending that the description was no other thing, but a manifest confession of their seruitude, exhorting all the nation to maintain their libertie, and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enioy their goods with security; and besides this,

Alias, chap. 3.

A this, obtaine both honour and glory in prosecution of such an enterprife. Moreover, that God would not afford them a more assured way to settle their fortunes then by this meanes, namely, if they would employ themselves in the execution of their desseignes, and if hauing conceived in their minds haucie and noble attempts, they forbore not to finish the same, notwithstanding the execution cost them their liues. These speeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleasure, and by the same they were the more confirmed & hartned to rebellion. So that there was no kind of euill which these men let not abroach, yea the whole nation was replenished with such miseries, that it is impossible to recount them: for the wars therein continued with such fury, that it was impossible to restraine the violence thereof; so that they neither spared friends, nor respected enemies, but were wholly giuen ouer to the spoyle. There rained nothing but robberies & murders of noble personages, who entertained one another vnder pretence to establish the estate of the common-weale, but in effect for their priuate profit sake, whereby the cities were replenished with seditions & murders, in which the inhabitants slaughtered one another, after a strange manner of furie, and desire they had not to spare any that was of their contrary faction. They were afflicted with forraigne enemies and famine; yet none of these could pacifie their furie, but that they furiously rased Cities, shed innocent blood, till at length the horrible mischiefe rooke such a head, that they consumed the temple of God, and burned all the beautifull buildings. So dangerous a thing is it to change the customes and manners of a countrey. For Iudas and Sadoc hauing introduced and raised a fourth sect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole common-weale for the present with many troubles, and produced the roots of these mischiefs, which afterward branched abroad from this vnaccustomed sect. For which cause I thinke it not amisse to discourse briefly of these sectaries opinions, whereby so many euills haue fallen vpon our nation.

CHAP. II.

How many, and what sects there were among the Iewes.

D Here were three sects among the Iews, of long continuance and antiquity: that of the Esscians; that of the Sadduces; and that of those who were called Pharisees. Of these I haue spoken in our second book of the wars of the Iewes; and yet now I thinke it not amisse to speake somewhat of them in this place also. The Pharisees vse a very austere and strict kinde of life, and addiect not themselves to any delicacy, but diligently follow that which their reason induceth them vnto. They honour their elders, neither dare they reply or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things vnto fate, and yet they take not an assent of will from man, supposing that God tempereth all things in such sort, that by his ordinance & mans will all things are performed either good or euil. They beleeue also that the soules of men are immortall; and that vnder the earth they receiue iudgement of honour or disgrace, according as they haue addicted themselves to vertue or vice in their life times: the one to liue in perpetuall prison; the other to rise againe very shortly. For which cause they are in great estimation among the people: and all that which appertaineth to the seruice of God, whether they be praiers or sacrifices, all things are done according as they giue direction. So ample a testimony yeeld the Cities of their wisdom, temperance & honest life. But the Sadduces are of that opiniõ, that the soules of men perish with their bodies. They obserue no other thing but that which is in the law, and hold it a vertue to dispute with their masters, as touching the decrees of their sect. Their opinion is entertained by very fewe, yet such, who for the most part are men of the best reckoning; yet entermeddle they not in any case with any affaires; and when they are aduanced to any honours, either with their owne good liking, or with constraint, they are enforced to allow of that which the Pharisees shall propose, otherwise the common people will not endure them. The Esscians attribute vnto God the gouernment and disposition of all things. They say that the soules of men are immortal, and all the vttermost of their indeuour and delight is to maintaine iustice and equite. They send their offerings vnto the temple, yet sacrifice they not with other men, by reason they vse more sacred and different ceremonies: for which cause they are secluded out of the common temple, and sacrifice apart. Otherwise they are men of most reconciled behauiour, and such as are wholly addicted in trimming & laboring their fields. They haue one custom which is worthy admiration, & such a one as is not to be found amongst any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they haue not practiced practiced for a little while, but euen from all antiquitie; which is, that they possesse their goods in common: neither doth the richest among them make more vic of his possessions then he hath least of all. They are at least foure thousand in number, who neither haue wiues nor slaues, supposing that women are the occasion of iniustice, and that slaues do arise by mutinies: and li- uing apart by themselves, they serue one another: and choose out certaine vpright men among their priests to gather the fruits & reuenews of their lands, to the end they may be sustained and nourished thereby: In a word, they follow the same course of life that they do, who are called Plisi among the Danes. The fourth sect was founded by Iudas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether & in all things with the Pharisees, but that they are extremely iealous of their liberty; acknow- ledging but one onely God, Lord & master of all things, and had rather both themselves with their dearest childrē & kinsfolke endure the most grievous and bitter torments that may be ima- gined, then cal any mortal man their Lord. Of which constancy of theirs I forbear to discourse any further at this time, for that it is sufficiently known to diuers, who haue bene eye witnes- ses therof: neither feare I least any one should suppose those things to be incredible, which I haue said of them; but contrariwise, that I haue spoken lesse then they themselves make evident in contemning their grievous tortures & punishments, which courage and magnanimity of theirs increaced very mightily amongst our nation, being kindled by the most hainous injuries which were offered vs by Gesius Florus our gouernour, by which means at length it came to passe that they reuolted and rebelled against the people of Rome. Thus much as touching the sects among the Iewes.

After that Cyrenius had confiscated Archelaus goods, & finished the valuation of every mans estate (which hapned 37. yeeres after Antonies ouerthrow by Cæsar in the Asi- an battell) he deposed Iozar from the priestly dignity, by reason of that sedition which the people stirred vp against him, and established Ananus the sonne of Seth in his place. But Herode and Philip tooke each of them the possession of their Terrarchy, and disposed of the affaires therof. Herod inclosed Sephoris with a strong wall, and made it the chiefest Citie and ornament of all Galilee: he fortified also another Citie called Betaramphtha, & named it Iu- lias in honour of Iulia the Emperour Cæsars wife. Philip repaired Paneada situated nere vnto the fource of Iordan, and called it Cæsaria: he repaired also the borough of Bethsaida nere vnto the lake of Genazereth, and gaue it the dignity of a Citie, both for the number of the inhabi- tants as for other preheminences, and called it Iulia by Cæsars wiues name. As for Coponius the gouernour in Iudæa, who (as we haue sayd) was sent with Cyrenius, in whose time there hapned that which followeth. At the feast of vnleauened bread, which we call Pascha, the custome was that the Priests opened the temple gates about midnight: at which time certain Samaritans, who secretly entred into Ierusalem, as soon as the gates were open, spred mens bones amidst the por- ches, and ouer all the temple: wherby it came to passe, that the Priests began to keep a more di- ligent watch, then they had done before time.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambiuus succeeded him in the gouernment. In his time Salome king Herods sister departing out of this life, bequeathed vnto Iulia the Citie of Iamnia and all the lands and countrey round about: she gaue her also Phasæ- lis situate in the Plaine, and Archelaus where there are diuers date trees, bearing most excellent fruit. After Ambiuus, Annius Rufus had the commaund, vnder whom died Cæsar the second Romane Emperour, after he had reigned fifty seuen yeeres, sixe moneths and two daies, and had Antonius his copartner in the monarchy for the space of foureteen yeeres. He liued in the whole seauenty seuen yeeres.

After Cæsar succeeded Tiberius Nero the son of Iulia his wife, who was the third Roman Em- perour. He it was that sent the sifst gouernour into Iudæa, whose name was Valerius Gratus, who succeeded Annius Rufus. This Gratus deposed Ananus, and appointed Ismael the sonne of Fa- bius high Priest. And after his decafe (for he liued but a little while after) Eleazar the son of A- nannus was made high Priest. A yeer after this, this Eleazar also was deposed, and the Priesthood was giuen to Simon the son of Camithus: who continuing in this dignitie for a yeers space & no lōger, Ioseph called Caiaphas succeeded after him. After Gratus had behaued himself thus, he re- turned to Rome, after he had remained in Iudæa for the space of 11. yeeres. After him came Pontius Pilate and succeeded him in the gouernment. But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendship, builded a Citie in honor of his name, & called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfullst part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazereth, & neer vnto the natural barhes in the borough called Emmaus. This Citie was peopled by strangers, who resorted thither from all parts, and by diuers of the countries of Galilee, some of which were constrained to inhabit the same. Some of those likewise, who were in authority repaired thither, and from all coun- tries there flocked many, who were not assuredly held for men of free condition, all which he in- franchised, and gaue them great giftes, vnder that condition, that they should not abandon the Citie. To some of them he gaue houses already builded, to other some lands very apt to be til- led, knowing that the habitation of such a place was contrary to the lawes and customes of his country, and the ordinances of the Iewes; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of sepul- chers: and our law saith, he that conuerfeth in those places is held vnclane and defiled for the space of seuen dayes.

At that very time died Phraates king of Parthia, being traiterously slaine by his sonne Phraa- taces, for this cause. After that phraates had gotten many lawfull children, he took vnto him an Italian woman to his concubine, called Thermusa, whom with other presents Iulius Cæsar had sent vnto him. After he had begotten on hir his son Phraataces, he was so much besotted with hir beauty, that he tooke her to his wife, and held her in high estimation. She that might perswade him vnto all that whatsoever she list, enforced her selfe to the vttermost to make her son king of Parthia: and seeing that she might not attaine thereunto, except shee had first found out the meanes to deliuer her selfe of Phraates lawfull children, shee perswaded him to sende them hostages to Rome. In a word, they were presently sent away, because Phraates in no sort had the power to contradiēt Thermusas wil, and only Phraataces was brought vp in the affairs of estate; who thinking the time too tedious and long if he should expect the kingdome whilest his father were dead, conspired against him by the instigation and furtherance of his mother, with whom (as it is thought) he committed incest. In effect, being equally attainted of these two hai- nous crimes, both for the murder of his father, as his incest committed with his mother, he was generally hated by his subiects, who rebelled against him before such time as he was settled in his kingdom. By this means was his fortune overthrowen, and he died. The noble men among the Parthians perceiuing, that it was impossible for them to maintain their policy without a king, and that their king ought lineally to descend of the race of the Arsacians (because by custom they might not choose any out of another stock) & supposing that their ordinances had too much al- ready bene contradicted, and that it would redound to their great dishonour if the kingdome should be continued in the hands of such a man, who was descended from an Italian concubine, they sent Embassadors to require Herod to come and be their king, who otherwise was in hatred with all the people, and accused of extreame cruelty. In a word, he was an vnsofiable man, and extremely cholericke, notwithstanding he were of the bloud of the Arsacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certaine sacrifice (for the custom of the Parthians was, that euery one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was slain at such time as he was a hunting. For this cause, they sent Embassadors to Rome, requiring that one of those that were hostages there might be their king, and one Vonones was sent vnto them, who was preferred aboue all his brethren. For hee seemed to be capable of that high degree of honour, as to commaund two of the greatest soueraignties that were vnder the sunne; the one of his owne nation; the other of a forraigne dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by na- ture mutable and most impatient of indignitie, shortly after repented themselves: for they dis- dained to execute the commaund of a slave; for so called they a pledge, saying, that the Parthi- ans had not a king giuen them by right of warre, but that which was the most outrage that might befall them, by iniury offered them in time of peace. For which cause they speedily sent for Ar- tabanus king of Media, who was of the race of the Arsacides. To this request of theirs he wil- lingly condescended, & came vnto them with his army. And Vonones marched forward to make head against him. At the first encounter, although the common sort among the Parthians fa- uoured Artabanus; yet was hee overcome and fled to the mountaines of Media. But not long after, hauing assembled a greater army, he once more set vpon Vonones and discomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himself with some horsemen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus ha- uing made a great slaughter of those that fled, and wholly abashed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired himselfe to the Citie of Geseiphon, with those people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made king of Parthia. Vonones arriued in Armenia, and at the first sought to make himselfe himselfe king ouer that nation, sending to this effect certaine Embassadors to Rome: but Tiberius repulld his suit in respect of his cowardice, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expresse Embassage had threatned him with warre. For they of greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the floud Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vionnes, destitute of all hope to obaine the kingdom, yeelded himselfe to Syllanus, who was Gouernor of Syria, and in regard that he had bin brought vp at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gaue Armenia to Orodus, one of his sons. Antiochus king of the Comagenes dyed also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the commons and the nobility; so that both parties sent their Embassadors to Rome. The nobles required that the forme of their gouernment might be changed into diuers signiories; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a king, as they had been accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affaires in the East, fortune therby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arriued in the East, and orderly disposed all things, he was poisoned by Piso, whereof he died, as it is declared in another place.

Pilate Gouernour of Iudæa led his army from Caesarea to Ierusalem, where he winced them with an intent to bring in Caesars statues, & standards into the City, in contempt of our lawe which forbiddeth vs to make images. For which cause, those Gouernours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the Citie without such pictures or paintings. Pilate was the first, who vnawares and by night entred Ierusalem, bringing with him his images. Which when the people vnderstood, in great multitudes they resorted to Caesarea, beseeching him for many dayes, that hee would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to perform their request, because the matter would redound to Caesars dishonour, and the Iewes also ceased not to sollicite him; some sixe dayes after commanding his souldiers to lie in ambush in a readinesse, hee fate him downe in the Tribunall within the Hippodrom, making vse of the opportunity of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being virged once more about the same businesse, hee gaue a signe to his souldiers to beset them, threatening them with death, except they would presently giue ouer their suite, and repaire euery one of them with all speed to their owne houses. But they prostrating themselves vpon the earth, and offering their naked throats, tolde him, that they rather desired to die, then to see their lawes violated, which were with so great iudgement and reason propofed vnto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conseruation of their laws, sodainly caused Caesars images to be transported out of Ierusalem into Caesarea, and out of the sacred treasury he made certaine conduits of water, that had their fountaine heads more then two hundred stades off. But the people took no pleasure in those conduits, and diuers thousands of men assembled themselves exclaiming against Pilate, endeavouring thereby to make him giue ouer his enterprise. Some of them also vttered diuers iniurious speeches against him, as if ordinarily falleth out amongst an vnbridled multitude. But he causing them to be hemmed in by a great number of his souldiers, attired in a popular habite, as soone as they began to exclaime against him, gaue a signe to his souldiers: they as it was before time commanded them, made vse of their maces, and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and so vnmercifully laide on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slaine, other some grievously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeard.

At that time was IESVS, a wife man, if it be lawfull to call him a man. For he was the former of diuers admirable works, and the instructor of those who willingly entertain the truth: and he drew vnto him diuers Iewes & Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accused by the princes of our nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the crosse by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbear to loue him for the ignominie of his death. For hee appeared vnto them aliue the third day after, according as the diuine Prophets had before testified the same, and diuers other wonderfull things of him: and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who haue deriued their name from him, hath neuer ceased.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sore troubled the Iewes, and in the

The yeare of the world, 3998. after Christs Nativity, 36.

A the temple of Isis at Rome there were many shamefull acts committed. But I will first of all recount the accident in the Temple of Isis: and then will I declare that which befell the Iewes. There was in Rome a Ladie called Paulina, renowned both for the nobilitie of hir house, as also thorow her studie and exercise in vertue. Besides this, shee was verie rich, and with her riches beautifull, and in her flowing yeers; and notwithstanding a verie mirror of chastitie. Shee was married to a certaine noble man called Saturnine, that equall her in all those her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus one of the knights of greatest account at that time, fell in loue with her. But she was of that disposition, that it was impossible for him to corrupt her by presents: And the more shee refused those infinite presents which hee sent vnto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; so that to enioy her but onely one night, he offered her two hundred thousand drachmes, amounting in our English money to some fixe thousand pound; yet for all this hee could not overcome her. For which cause being vnable to endure this his vnfortunate loue, hee thought best to pine himself away for want of sustentance, thereby to deliuer himselfe from the tyranny of that passion, wherewith hee was afflicted: Finally, that he confidently resolved, hee constantly put in execution. Now there was a certaine free woman that belonged to Mundus father, whose name was Ide, expert in all sorts of subtilties, who being sore aggrieved to behold the young mans resolution, whom she saw wholly addicted to a desperate death, she addrest her selfe vnto him, and encouraged him with hope, promising him to bring him to Paulinas speech, by the meanes of a certaine bribe which shee intended to offer. He reioicing verie much at her motion, demanded what summe would serue her: C who requiring nothing more then fiftie thousand drachmes to obtaine Paulina; he furnished hir presently. When as by this means she had quickened the young mans spirit, and receiued all that which she demanded, she shaped not the same course which others had kept that had the solicitation of the matter before, seeing she saw that money would not tempt her; but knowing that she was deeply deuoted to the seruice of Isis, she practised this subtil and vnexpected policie. Shee addrest her selfe to certaine priests of the temple, and vpon great hopes and offer of greater presents, and paying them down vpon the present twentie and fixe thousand drachmes, and promising them as much more vpon the performance of the bargaine, shee disclosed vnto them the passionate loue which the young man bare vnto Paulina, exhorting them to worke so wisely that he might enioy her. They bewitched with this huge present they had, and hoped to receiue, promised her to worke the feat. Whereupon the eldest among them resorted to Paulina, and ha- D uing free access vnto her presence, he required that he might haue conference with her in secret: which when he had obtained, he tolde her that hee was sent vnto her by God Anubis, in that the God was surprised with her loue, and desired that shee would come vnto him. Paulina tooke great pleasure in this his discourse, and tolde her familiars how she had bene honoured with the amorous solicitation of a God, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he consented, knowing how great his wiues chastitie was. She therefore repaired to the temple, and after she had slept, and the time was come wherein she was vsually accustomed to lay her downe to rest, and the gates were lockt vp by the priests that were therein, and the lights likewise were taken away; Mundus, who was hidden within, failed not to accost E her: who thinking that it was the God Anubis, satisfied his desires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the priests, who were priuie to this trecherie, were stirring, hee retired himselfe. Paulina also early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared vnto her, and boasting her selfe among her familiars what conference hee had vsed with her. But some of them beleued her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the rest were altogether amazed, supposing those things to bee no wayes incredible, at such time as they behought themselves of the Ladies chastitie. Some three dayes after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, laid vnto her: You haue saued mee two hundred thousand drachmes, wherewith you might haue augmented your treasure, and this notwithstanding you haue not failed to satisfie my request: neither am I grieved that you haue F contemned me vnder the name of Mundus, since that vndertaking Anubis name I haue accomplished my desire, and this said hee departed. But she presently amazed with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and hauing told her husband of all this subtil circumuention, she requested earnestly his assistance, and that he would not forsake her in the prosecution of her reuenge: who presently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently vnderstood, how all things had happened, by the inquisition and examination of the Priests, he condemned them and Ide, who had bene the inuenter and comploter of this this treason against Panlino, to be hanged: he pulled downe the temple also, and cast Anubis statue into Tyber, and banished Mundus; supposing that he ought not to be more grievously punished, considering that the fault which was committed by him, proceeded from extreame love. Behold here the insolence committed in the temple of Isis, by the priest that appertained to that temple. Now intend I to declare that which hapned to the Iewes that were at that time in Rome, according as heretofore I both purposed and promised.

Here was a certaine Iewe, that hauing beene accused for the breach of the lawes of his country, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischieuous behaiour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himselfe to bee an expounder of Moses lawe, and drawing vnto him three other no lesse reprobates then himselfe, he followed his ordinary profession. Fulvia a Ladie of much honour became their scholer, and had embraced the religion of the Iewes, whom they had perswaded to send certaine purple and gold to the temple of Ierusalem: which after they had receivede at her hands, they conuerted it to their owne vse, as before that time they had determined to doe. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friend, and Fulvia his husband, who had discovered the same vnto him, commanded all Iewes whatsoever to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and enrowled to the number of foure thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished diuers of them that refused to beare armes, for feare they should transgresse the ordinances of their country. So that by reason of the loose behaiour of foure wicked persons, all those of our nation were driuen out of the Citie of Rome.

Neither was the nation of the Samaritanes exempt from this trouble: for a certaine subrill companion, who sought by all the means he might to inroche vpon the peoples fauour, perswaded them to withdrawe themselves with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to bee the holiest amongst all their mountaines) in which place, he auowed he would shewe them the sacred Vessells buried in a certaine place, where Moses had laide them: and at that time they being gathered together in armes, by his perswasion encamped themselves in a borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adioin themselves with them, to the ende they might ascend the mountaine with the greater companie. But Pilate prevented them, and got vp before them with his horsemen and footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefeest ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitiues. The tumult of these Iewes being published abroad, and their misfortune made knowne, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselves to Vitellius who had bin Consul, and who at that time gouerned Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murder of those whom he had slaine, saying, that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebell against the Romans, but to warrantize themselves against Pilates tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Marcellus his friend, to take charge of Iudaea, commanding Pilate to returne to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperor in those things whereof the people had accused him. Herupon Pilate, after he had sojourned ten yeeres in Iewry, repaired to Rome, hauing no means to contradict that commandement that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was departed and dead.

As soone as Vitellius came into Iudaea, he went vp to Ierusalem and celebrated there the feast of the passouer, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the Citizens the tribute of all those fruits which were sold. He deliuered them also the ornaments of the high priests, with all the rest of the priestly furniture within the temple, committing the charge thereof vnto the priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid vp in the castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth. Hircanus the high priest the first of that name (for diuers haue been so called) hauing builded a tower nere vnto the temple, did for the most part make his residence therein, and there kept his

A his vestments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he onely had the authoritie to put them on, and returne them into their place at such time as hee came downe into the Citie, and put vpon him his accustomed rayment. His sonne and his sonnes sonnes entertained the same custome, till such time as Herode being exalted to the kingdom, and seeing this tower to bee strongly fixed, builded the same most magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony, who was his great friend. And hauing found these vestments in that place, hee retained them with him, assuring himselfe that the people would attempt nothing against him. Archelaus his sonne and successour in the kingdom, kept the same course that Herode had done. But after that the Romanes had obtained the sovereignty thereof, they kept the high Priests ornaments in their hands, and reserved them in a place builded for the purpose, vnder the scale of the Priests: and the prefect of those that kept the sacred treasure, lighted the lampe euerie day in that place. This euerie leuenth day before the feast, doth the prefect deliuer into the high priests hands, and after it was purified he put it on to doe diuine seruice, and the next day after the feast hee returneth it againe to the same place where it was kept before: which custome was obserued thrice euerie yeere in the time of a fast. But Vitellius returned those ornaments into the hands of the Priests, according to the auncient orders, leaving them to bee vled at such time as neede required, commanding the prefect to trouble himselfe no more about the place, where they should be kept. After he had done this fauour to the nation of the Iewes, hee dispossessed the high Priest Ioseph surnamed Caaphas, and advanced Jonathan the sonne of Ananus to that dignitie, and afterwarde returned to

At that time he receiued letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendship with Artabanus the king of the Parthians (whose harred hee suspected, and feared least being seized of Armenians, hee should worke further displeasure to the state of Rome) willing him to assure the league by hostages, and namely with Artabanus sonne. After Tiberius had written these letters about mentioned vnto Vitellius, hee perswaded the kings of Iberia and Alania by great store of money, that with all expedition they should make warre against Artabanus. But the Iberians would not bee drawen thereunto, yet suffered they the Alaines to march thorow their country, and opened them their gates of the mount Caspian, to giue them passage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the country of the Parthians was filled with warre, whereby the chiefeest among them were slaine, and all their estate was spoyled and disordered. The kings sonne also was slaine in those conflicts, with diuers thousands of his men of warre. Moreover Vitellius having sent money to a certaine kinsman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiuing the plot that was intended against him, and seeing that he could not escape, because it was attempted by a great number of the best accompted nobles within his court, ceased to passe any further: and seeing himselfe most apparantly inuironed, and thinking that vnder colour of friendship he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himselfe into the prouinces of the higher country, and there to saue himselfe, rather then to put himselfe in hazard, and resort vnto them who had already betrayed and forsaken him. E that place he assembled a great number of souldiers of the countries of Danes, and Swethians: and hauing fought against them who opposed themselves against him; he recovered his estate. When Tiberius had tidings hereof, hee wrought the meanes to draw Artabanus into friendship with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, hee willingly admitted; so that Artabanus and Vitellius met together nere Euphrates, and by the means of a bridge that was builded vpon the riuer they debated the matter together, being each of them attended by their guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herode the Terrarch feasted them in a verie magnificent Pavilion, erected in the midst of the foud, not without his great cost. And not long after, Vitellius sent Darius, Artabanus sonne in hostage to Rome, with diuers presents; amongst which there was a man seuen cubits high, a lew borne, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Giant by reason of his greatnes. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herode desirous to be the first who should aduertise Caesar of the receite of these hostages, sent expresse messengers with letters, by which hee fully satisfied him of all that which had hapned, omitting nothing for the Consul to certifie: so that after Vitellius letters were brought vnto him, and that Caesar had already certified him of the true information that Herode Vitellius letters had giuen him, Vitellius was sore troubled: and suspecting least hee had receiued a greater iniurie then the matter made shewe for; hee conceiued in his heart a secrete despayre, which continued vntill such time as Tiberius was dead, and Caius obtained the Empire. At that time also died Philip Herods brother, in the twentieth yeere of Tiberius raigne, after hee had raigned himselfe for the space of seuen and thirtie yeeres, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis and Bathanza. During all the time of his government, hee behaued himselfe verie peaceably, and farre from busines. For he made his ordinarie abode within his owne dominion. He walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen seruants, and had that seat caried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and doe Iustice: and therein sat he to the ende that if any one presented himselfe, and required his assistance, hee might without delay doe him right. For vpon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part where the plaintiffe met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guiltie, and absolving the innocent. He died in Lyade, and was buried in the sepulcher which hee himselfe had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great solemnitie and maiestie. And for that he left no heires males behind him, Tiberius seized his estate, which hee annexed to the government of Syria, ordaining that the tributes that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same region.

Meane while Aretas king of Arabia Petrea, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the other, for this cause that enlueth. Herode the Tetrarch married Aretas daughter, with whome hee had liued married a verie long time. Afterwardes taking his iourney towards Rome, he lodged with Herode his halfe brother by the father side (for Herode was the sonne of Simons daughter, which Simon was the high priest) and there being surprised with the loue of Herodias his brothers wife, which was the daughter of Aristobulus their brother, and sister to the great Agrippa, he was so bold as to offer her some speech of mariage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made betweene them, that at such time as hee should returne from Rome, he should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions, that he should banish Aretas daughter farre from him. After he had ratified those couenants, hee made his voyage to Rome, from whence he no looner returned and performed that for which he went, but his wife (who had some priuie notice of the conuentions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before hee suspected that she knew thereof, required him to send her to the castle of Macheron, which was the frontire towne betwixt Herodes and Aretas countries, without certifying him any waies of her intent. Herode without suspect easily condescended vnto her request, thinking she was ignorant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the gouernour of Macheron (which at that time was vnder her fathers government) to prepare all thinges for her iourney, where being arriued the speedily posted into Arabia, vnder the conuoy of those gouernours, who receiued & conducted her the one after the other. As soone as she arriued in her fathers court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arole the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soone as therefore they had both of them assembled their armies vpon the confines of the country of Ganalite, they fought together vnder the conduct of the two generals, to whome they had committed their armies. In this battell Herods armie was wholly discomfited thorow the treason that was complotted against him by certaine banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herode. Tiberius was certified of all this by those letters which Herode had written vnto him: and being sore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, hee commaunded Vitellius to make warre against him, willing him that if he could take him alive hee should send him bound vnto him: but if dead, he should send him his head. Such was the commission that Tiberius sent to the gouernour of Syria.

Diuers Iewes were of the opinion, that Herodes armie was ouerthrowne by the iust vengeance of God, who punished him most iustly, because of the execution which hee caused to be done on Iohn surnamed Baptiste: For hee had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue and who exhorted the Iewes to addict themselves thereto, and to execute iustice towards men, and pietie towards God: exhorting them to be baptized, and telling them that baptisme should at that time bee agreeable vnto God, if they should renounce not onely their

A sinnes, but if to the puritie of their bodies they should annex the cleanness of their soules repurified by iustice. And whereas it came to passe that diuers flocked and followed him to heare his doctrine, Herode feared least his subiects allured by his doctrine and perswasions should be drawne to reuolt. For it seemed that they would subscribe in all thinges to his aduice, he therefore thought it better to preuent a mischiefe by putting him to death, then to expect some sodaine commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Vpon this suspition Herode caused him to be bound, and sent to the Castle of Macheron, whereof we haue spoken heretofore, and there was he put to death. The Iewes were of opinion that in reuenge of this so grieuous a sinne, Herodes army, against whom God was displeased, had been subiect to their viter ruine and ouerthrow. But Vitellius being addressed to make warre against Aretas, gathered together two legions, and all those horse or foot that he could assemble amongst those kings, who were the Romans allies, and marching towards Petra hee staid at Ptolemais, because hee pretended to passe by Iudaea. Which when the principall nobles amongst the Iewes had notice of, they went out to meet him, beseeching him that he would not passe thorow their country, because it was a custome amongst them not to see any images borne, such as he had of diuers colours in his armie. Whereunto he condescended, and hauing changed his purpose, hee caused his army to march thorow the great Plaine: as for himselfe he came to Ierusalem accompanied with Herode the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer sacrifice vnto God vpon the next festiual day, where he was most magnificently receiued by all the people of the Iewes. There sojourned he for the space of 3 daies, during which time he disposed Jonathan from the high priesthood, and inuested Theophilus his brother. The fourth day letters came vnto him that aduertized him of Tiberius death, for which cause he commaunded the oath of fidelitie should be ministered to the people in the new Emperour Caius be-halfe. Hee called his army backe also, and sent them to their wintering garrison, because it was not lawfull for him to prosecute the warre: by reason the soueraigne estate was fallen vnto Caius.

It is said, that Aretas hearing newes of Vitellius expedition or voyage, and after hee had taken counsell of the Augurs, said, that the army should not finde engines to pierce as farre as Petra, because the chiefeaine thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or hee that obeyed his ordinance in conducting the same, or he against whom the army was conducted, should die. Vitellius therefore retired himselfe to Antioch. A yeere before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa Aristobulus sonne came to Rome, to intreat with the Emperour about certaine affaires, according to the power which hee should obtaine at his hands. But before I speake any thing hereof, I will relate Herodes progenie, both for that it is pertinent to this present narration, as also that the greatnesse of Gods prouidence may appeare, to the ende that a man may know that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatsoeuer it be, can bee auailable without the feare of God: considering that within the space of one hundred or somewhat lesse, it to fell out, that all Herodes line, which was verie populous and fruitfull, was extinguished, a very few excepted. Whereby we are giuen to vnderstand, what the miserie of mankind is, and learne to moderate our owne felues. It is also expedient to speake something of Agrippa, who amongst all others deserueth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obsecritie and base in birth, hee was exalted to such greatnes, as no one of those that knew him, would euer haue thought his fortune should haue such successe and mightnesse. And although heretofore I haue spoken somewhat of this matter, yet it is requisite that I speake something more expressely thereof in this place. Herode the great had two daughters borne by Mariamme Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampso, was married by Herode to Phasaelus the sonne of Phasaelus, who was Herodes brother. The other called Cypros was elpoused to Antipater her Cousin, who was Salomes sonne, who was Herodes sister. Phasaelus had fiue children by Salampso: Three sonnes, Antipater, Herode, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, whom Agrippa the son of Aristobulus married, & Alexandra was married to Timasus of Cyprus, who was a man of great dignitie, and with whom she died without issue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two sonnes and three daughters: Bernice, Mariamme and Drusilla: their two sons were called Agrippa and Drusus. Drusus died verie young: but Agrippa was brought vp by his grandfather amongst his other brethren, Herode, Aristobulus and Bernice. These were Herodes children, sonne vnto him who was surnamed the Great; Bernice was Cosbarus daughter, begotten on Salome Herodes sister: Aristobulus died leauing his children vnder age, vnder his fathers charge with Alexander his brother, as we haue already recounted. These attaining their full age were in this sort married: Herode brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme Olympias.

Olympius daughter, who was Herode the Great his daughter, and of Ioseph Herodes brother: By C her he had his sonne Aristobulus: Aristobulus Agrippas third brother married Iotape the daughter of Sampsigeram king of the Emelienians. They had a daughter which in like sort was called Iotape, which was deafe. These were the children begotten by Herodes three sonnes. But Herodias their sister married Herode the sonne of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Mariamne the daughter of Simon the high priett, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the lawes of the countrey, married her selfe with Herode her husbands brother begotten of the same father, being separate from him during his life time, who was Tetrarch of Gailee. His daughter Salome was married to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herodes sonne: who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herodes sonne and Agrippas brother. They had three sonnes, Herode, Agrippa and Aristobulus. See here the posteritie of Phasaclus and Salampson. Antipater by Cypros had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius the sonne of Alexas, of whom he begot a daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herode and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipaters brothers, they died without issue. Alexander Herodes sonne, who was slaine by his father, begate Alexander and Tigranes on the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia. Tigranes being king of Armenia died without issue, after he had bin accused at Rome. Alexander had a sonne called Tigranes, after his brothers name, who was sent by Nero to raigne in Armenia, who had a sonne called Alexander, who married Iotape the daughter of Antiochus king of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected king in Leis a Citie of Cilicia. As soone as Alexanders posteritie began to multiply, they fell from their countrey religion to follow the customes of the Greekes. All the rest of kings Herods daughters died without issue. Having after this manner reckoned vp Herods posteritie, which continued vntill such time as Agrippa the great began to raigne, it remaineth at this time to declare what adventures, befell this Agrippa, and how hee escaping his dangers obtained at last so great power and dignitie.

*S*ome little time before the death of king Herode, Agrippa conuersing at Rome, grew into great familiaritie and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperours sonne, and was beloved by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder, by the meanes of his mother Bere- nice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, & to whom shee had recommended her sonne. And whereas by nature he was of a liberal and high spirit, as long as his mother liued hee would not discouer his intent, least he should prouoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Berenice was dead, and hee became Lord of himselfe, partly by his dayly and bountifull entertainment and liuing, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his laudh prodigality towards Cæsars treemen, whose fauour hee hunted after, he was brought into extreame pouertie, and could no more liue at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius hauing lost his sonne, forbade his friends to come into his sight, for feare least their presence should refresh and encrease the sorrow hee conceived for the losse of his sonne. For these causes hee returned backe into Iudæa, hauing but badly ordered his estate, spent his money and left himselfe no meanes to satisfie his importunate and many creditors. For which cause incertaine how to dispose himselfe, and ashamed of his present estate, hee withdrew himselfe into a Castle called Malatha in Iudæa, be-thinking himselfe after some sort to cut off his miserable dayes. Which purpose of his, when Cy- pros his wife perceiued, she endeouored by all meanes to prevent his resolution: shee wrote also to his sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessitie he was enforced thereunto: and she exhorted her, that in regard of affinitie she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, re-lieued his miserie, although her fortunes were farre weaker then hers. Being therefore sent for by his sister and wife, hee was commaunded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certaine summe of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that Citie. Yet did not Herode continue long time in that minde, although by the meanes he had giuen him, he had not satisfied his kinfmans necessities. For being in the Citie of Tyre in a certaine company, where he dranke immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreame injury that Herode had vpbraided him with his pueritie, and bit him in the teeth that he maintained him

*A*t his charge. For which cause he withdrew himselfe to Flaccus, who had sometimes been Consul at Rome, and for the present was president of Syria, with whom at Rome hee had fallen into familiaritie, who entertained by him liued with him, who long before that time had entertained Aristobulus; who though Agrippas brother, yet was he his enemy; yet notwithstanding this dissention betweene them, Flaccus entertained them both with equall fauour. But Aristobulus remitted nothing of his hatred hee bare his brother; neither euer rested he before hee had drawne Flaccus into dislike with his brother; vpon this occasion. The inhabitants of Damasco, contending with the Sidonians about their demaines, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus, knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their cause, promising him a great summe of money; whereupon he addressed himselfe in what hee could to further those of Damasco. But Aristobulus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, accused his brother to Flaccus; and after inquisition was made, and hee found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the presidents fauour, and falling againe into extreame pueritie, hee came to Ptolemais; and for that he had no meanes of maintenance, hee determined to saile into Italy.
 And for that he wanted money, he commaunded Marfys his free-man, that by all meanes whatsoeuer he should seeke to take vp money vpon interest. He spake vnto Protus (who was Agrippas mothers free-man (who by the testament of his deceased Mistris was left vnto Antonias protection) that vpon his Masters bill and promise, he would lend him some money. But hee alleading that Agrippa before that time ought him money, extorted from Marfys a bill of his hand; for twentie thousand Attique drachmes, deducting out of that sum two thousand and siue hundreth, which Marfys took for himselfe, which he might the more easily doe, for that Agrippa could not otherwile chuse. Hauing therefore receiued this money, he went to Anthedon, where getting shipping he prepared himselfe for the iourney.

But when Herennius Capito, who was treasurer of Iamnia, vnderstood of his being there, hee sent his souldiers vnto him, to exact three hundreth thousand silver drachmes at his hands; for which hee stood indebted to Cæsars treasurer during his being at Rome, by which meane hee was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demand; but as soone as it was night, hee caused the cables of his shippe to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to Alexandria; there requested he Alexander Alabarcha to lend him two hundreth thousand drachmes in silver.
 But he protested that hee would trust him with nothing. But admiring Cypros his wiues constant loue towards her husband, and her many other vertues, he vpon her promise accorded to doe him kindeesse: whereupon in present money hee payed him five talents in Alexandria, and promised to deliuer him the rest of the money at Puteol, fearing Agrippas vnthriftinesse. Thus Cypros hauing furnished her husband for his iourney into Italy, returned her selfe and her children into Iudæa by land. But Agrippa, as soone as hee arrived at Puteol, wrote vnto Tiberius Cæ- sar, who liued at Capreas, signifying vnto him that hee came to doe his duetie, beseeching him that hee would grant him free and fauourable access. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a verie kinde answer, certifying him that hee would be verie glad to see him safely arrived in Ca- preas. In a word, as soone as hee was arrived, Cæsar exprest and made it knowne, that his affection was answerable to his letters, and both embraced him and lodged him. The next day E Cæsar receiued letters from Herennius Capito, who aduertized him that Agrippa ought three hun-dreth thousand drachmes of silver, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at such time as the appointed time of payment was come he was fled out of the countrey, & place of his procurement, and by this occasion had deprived him of the meanes to constrain him to make satisfaction. When Cæsar had read the letters, he was sore displeased, and commaunded those of his chamber, that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, vntill such time as hee had discharged that debt.

But hee nothing dismayed at Cæsars displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the summe of three hundreth thousand drachmes, to the end he might not lose Cæsars friendship. Who remembering her Berenice Agrip- he committed his nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him alwaies, whither time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritan, Cæsars free-man, of whom hee borrowed

ten hundred thousand drachmes of silver, & paid Antonia her due, & kept the rest the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being intertained with most inward familiarity, it happened one day that riding in the same Coach with him, Agrippa wisht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might shortly surrender the kingdom and empire vnto Caius, who was each way more worthy then he. These words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippa's freeman, who for that time spake not a word thereof. But being afterwards accused for stealing Agrippa's garment (as he indeede had done) and brought backe againe after he had fled away to Piso (who was the prefect of the citie) he asked him why he fled: who answered, that he had certaine secrets which he desired to reueale vnto Caius: that appertained to his profit and safetie: for which cause he was sent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatorie manner, wherein no King or tyrant euer equalled him, held him prisoner. For neither did he presently admit any Embassadors, neither sent he successours to those, who were gouernours, and prefects of his provinces, when the former were dead; and no lesse negligent was he in yeelding audience to his prisoners. But when his friends at any time questioned with him, why he vsed these accustomed delauies; he answered them, that he deferred the embassadors after that sort, for feare least if he should speedily dispatch them, they should instantly returne with newes; whereby it should come to passe, that hee should be continually troubled in entertaining and dismissing them.

And as touching his offices, he left the in their hands, to whom he had committed the, in regard of his subiects welfare. For naturally all magistracy is subiect to auarice; but in especial strangers induce those, who exercise the same to gather, and ingrosse the more instantly, when as the time of their authoritie is short and of small assurance; whereas if they should continue in the same for a long time, in regard of the game they had made, and the much profits they had raised, they would be afterward lesse greedy to extort further. Now if hee should send others to succcede them on a sodaine, it were impossible for him to content them, notwithstanding their manie bribes: whereas in giuing them time to fill their purses, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious desire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpose he told them an example of a poore man that was a Lazier, to whose wounds a great number of flies assembled themselves, and couered the same: at sight whereof some by fortune arriuing there, and hauing compassion of his miserie, and supposing that the cause why they assisted him not, proceeded from their disability, approached neere to helpe him: but hee required them to let him alone. Whereupon they demanding the cause, wherefore he that was hurt refused to be deliuered from so irkefome an euil: he answered them, for that they should do him more wrong, if those flies were driuen away; for that being already full of bloud they pricke mee not (said hee) neither luche mee so earnestly, but giue me some ease; whereas if new should alight on my wound which were hungry, & should seize my flesh in that desperate estate that I am, they would procure my death. For these causes he said; that seeing his subiects already consumed by so many exactions, he thought it a good policie in him, and a better prouision for them, not to send them new gouernours continually, who might after the manner of flies luche them to the quicke, especially if to their innated couetousnesse hee should annex the feare of their sodaine displacing. Now to approue that to be true which I haue declared of Tiberius's disposition, this action of his may suffice to iustifie L me. For hauing bene Emperor for the space of twentie and two yeeres, all those gouernours which he sent into Iury were two, namely Gratus and Pilate his successours; neither demeaned he himselfe otherwise towards the rest of his subiects of the empire.

Why Caius would not giue audience to his prisoners. Agrippa solicited Antonia to bring Eutychus to his answer. Antonia vertie much honoured by Tiberius. Antonia discovered Seianus's conspiracy to Caius.

And as touching his prisoners, the reason why he delaied so much to giue them audience, was to the ende, that they who had bene condemned to death, should not speedily be deliuered from those torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deserued by their wickednes. For whilst he kept them in that paine, their misshap increased the more. For this cause Eutychus could not obtaine audience at his hands, but was long time detained prisoner. Afterwards in proceffe of time, Tiberius transported himselfe from Capreas to Tusculanum, which was distant from Rome some hundred furlongs. There did Agrippa sollicite Antonia, to cause Eutychus to be called to his answer, as touching the accusation which he pretended against him. Now Antonia was in great fauour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that shee was Drusus's wife, who was Tiberius's brother) as in respect of her modestie. For the being yong continued in her widowhood, & would not marry with any other, notwithstanding Augustus importuned her to wed; but liued alwaies in honour without blame. Besides that, she had done Tiberius a great pleasure: for at such time as Seianus his friend, and a man in great

A great account in those daies (by reason he had the gouernment of the army) practised a conspiracy against him, whereunto diuers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of warre likewise, were accessarie: yet brought the all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Seianus had finished his purpose; had not Antonia vied more aduised courage, then Seianus did in executing his treason. For hauing discovered the danger that threatned Tiberius, she wrote and sent her expresse letters by Pallas one of her trustie seruants vnto him to Capreas, certifying him in particular the whole proceffe of the conspiracy. Caius hauing true vnderstanding thereof, caused Seianus and his confederates to bee executed. Although therefore that before that time hee honoured Antonia greatly, yet did he afterwards honour her farre more, in such sort as he trusted her in all things. VVhen as therefore she intreated him to giue Eutychus audience: Tiberius answered, If, said he, Eutychus hath falsely obiected any thing against Agrippa, it sufficeth that he endure that punishment which I haue enioyned him. But being in the torture he maintaine that which he hath spoken to bee true, it is to be feared least Agrippa intending to punish his free man, do rather heape the punishment vpon his owne head. When Antonia had reported this answer of his to Agrippa, he did the more instantly sollicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to triall. And for that Agrippa ceased not to importune her, Antonia took the occasion, which was this: Tiberius being after dinner time caried in his litter, and hauing Caius & Agrippa before him, the walking foot by foot by the litter, belought him to call Eutychus to his triall: whereunto he replied: The Gods (said hee) know that that which I doe, I doe it not of mine owne will, but for the necessitie I am pressed with vpon your request: and hauing spoken C thus, he commaunded Macron Seianus's successour to bring Eutychus before him: which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to say against him, who had enfranchised him. My loueraign (said he) Caius that is here present, & Agrippa rode one day together in the same Coach, & I sat at their feet. After diuers discourses held betweene them, Agrippa began to speake after this manner vnto Caius: O said hee, would God the day were come wherein the olde man departing out of this world, would make you gouernour thereof. For his sonne Tiberius would be no hindrance vnto you, for him might you make away. Then should the world be happy, and I likewise haue my share in the felicitie. Tiberius esteeming this his accusation to be true, and hauing of long time conceiued a grudge against Agrippa, for that notwithstanding he had commaunded him to honour Tiberius, who was his nephew, and Drusus sonne; Agrippa D had giuen small regard to his commaundement, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted vnto Caius. For which cause said he to Macron, bind me this fellow. Hee scarcely vnderstanding that which he spake, and no wayes suspecting that he should giue that commaundement in respect of Agrippa, deferred the performance vntill such time as he might more exactly vnderstand his minde. VVhen as therefore Caius turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (said he) Macron, whom I haue commaunded to be bound, and demanding of him once more by whom he spake: It is Agrippa said he. Then had Agrippa recourse to submissiue and humble prayers, refreshing the memorie of his sonne, with whom hee had bin brought vp, & alledging the education he had vied towards his nephew Tiberius. But he preuailed nothing, but was led away bound in those purple ornaments which he then wore.

E At that time it was verie hot weather, and being in distresse of wine he was extremely thirsty, and distressed, yea more then became one of his qualitie. Whereupon espying Thaumasus one of Caius's seruants, who caried water in a picher; hee required him to giue him drinke: which when hee had willingly bestowed on him, he dranke, and afterwards said vnto him. This seruice thou hast done me in giuing mee drinke, shall do thee good one day. For as soone as I shall escape out of these bonds, it shall not be long before I obtaine thy libertie at Caius's hands, for that thou hast not neglected to do mee seruice in this my imprisonment, as thou hast before time done me whilst I was in my prosperitie and dignity: Neither deceiued hee the mans expectation of his promise, but rewarded & gratified him. For afterwards, when he had obtained the kingdom, he begged Thaumasus's libertie at Caius's hands, & made him superintendēt of his affairs, & after his deceale F he gaue order that he should serue in the same place, with his son Agrippa & his daughter Bernice; so that he died very olde, and much honoured. But this hapned afterwarde. But at that time Agrippa stood before the palace bound with other companions, who were likewise in bonds: and thorow the grief he conceiued, he leaned against a certain tree, on which there sat an owle. One of those prisoners, who was by nation a Germane, beholding that bird, asked the souldier that was fettered with him, who he was that was apparrelled in purple: and vnderstanding that his name was Agrippa, and that hee was a Iew; and one of the nobilitie of that nation; hee required the souldier; souldier, who to the ende to guard him was chained with him, to suffer him to drave neere vnto Agrippa, and to haue a little cōference with him, for that he had a great desire to ask him of certaine things concerning the customes of his countrey. Which when he had obtained, and hauing got neere him, hee certified him by an interpreter of that which followeth: Young man (said he) the sodaine change that hath befallen thee at this present, afflicteeth and oppresseth thee with great and grievous torment; neither wilt thou easily beleuee that thou shalt escape from thy miserie: yet so doth the diuine prouidence dispose all things, that thou shalt shortly be deli-uered. Know therefore, and I sweare vnto thee by the Gods both those of mine auncestors, and those also, who haue residence and presidence in this place, and who haue procured vs this yron chaine, that I will tell thee all, not to yeeld thee pleasure by my vaine discourse, or to entertaine thee with fruitlesse consolation; knowing well that when these predictions shall happen to faile, they will breed thee more sorrow, then if thou hadst neuer heard speech of them. But I haue thought it good, yea although it were with mine own danger, to declare vnto thee the predictions of the gods. It cannot otherwaies bee, but that shortly thou shalt bee deliuered from these bonds, and shalt be aduanced to great honour and power; so that those, who at this day haue compassion of thy calamitie, shall beare enuie to thy glorie, and thou shalt depart this life in great felicitie, and shalt leaue thy children mightie possessions. But beare this in thy remembrance, that when thou shalt see this bird once more, thou must needie die within fise dayes after. These are those things which the gods thinke meete to foretell thee by this bird. As for my selfe, I haue supposed that I should doe thee wrong if I should conceale this prediction from thee, hauing the foreknowledge thereof. I haue therefore thought good to impart this to thee, vnto thee, whereby thou mayest know hope of thy future profit, thou mayest more easily indure thy present misfortune, for which cause I beseech thee, that as soone as thou shalt be partaker of this thy felicitie, thou wilt indure thy selfe to deliuer vs also from these aduersities.

This pefage of the Germane seemed so ridiculous to Agrippa, as it afterwarde deserued most mightie admiration. But Antonia being sore grieved at the young mans calamitie, thought not onely a difficult matter for her to intreat Tiberius for him, but altogether vnprofitable in-tegard she should be repulled: yet wrought she so much with Macon, that hee was committed to the custodie of such souldiers, who were of more reconciled behauiour, and had a Centurion appointed to keepe him, that suffered him to vse his daily bathings, and gaue his friendes and ser-uants leaue to visit him, by whose seruice and kindnesse his necessities might bee relieved. His friend Silas also was admitted to speak with him, and amongst his free-men Marcius and Stichus, who brought him in such meares as he was delighted withall, and coverings vnder colour to sell them, which by the permission of the souldiers, who had no lesse direction from Macon, they spred by night for him to take his rest vpon. See here the estate wherein Agrippa liued in prison for the space of sixe monthes. But Tiberius being returned to Capreae began at first to be assainted with a certaine lingring disease: and for that his sicknesse increased more and more, hee began to conceiue a sinister hope of himselfe, and commanded Enodus, whom hee most honoured amongst all his free-men, to bring him his sonnes, because hee intended to talke with them before hee died. But the sooth is, that he had not any children of his own, but had adopted them.
For Drusus, who was his onely childe, was already dead, and had left behinde him a sonne called Tiberius, surnamed Gemellus. Hee had Caius also, his brother Germanicus sonne, who was in the flower of his age, and had traiailed very diligently in good disciplines. To him also the people ascribed verie much, in remembrance of the vertues of his deceased father; and as touching himselfe, he was of a sweet conuersation, and so modest, that he was familiar and conuersant with all men. Whereby it came to passe, that not onely the people, but the Senate also held him in great estimation, as also all the subiects in euerie seuerall prouince. For they that spake with him were drawn partly by his affabilitie, partly by the fidelitie that they saw in him: so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfaintly lamenting his losse, but with vnfaigned sorrow, for that there was not any one that supposed not his death to be euerie mans particular losse.
Hee therefore demeaned himselfe so modestly towards all men, that his sonne after his death was highly aduanced thereby. For among the rest the men of warre made their reckoning, that although it should cost them their liues to get him the Empire, they would not refuse the hazard.

After that Tiberius had charged Enodus to bring him the two young men the next morrow by breake of day, he besought the Gods of that place to giue him an euident signe whereby hee might know who should succeed him: For although hee desired to leaue the Empire to his sons sonnes;

Tiberius by an

A sonne; yet made he more account of that which God should make manifest vnto him. He therefore conceiued a pefage, that hee, who the next day should enter first to salure him, it should bee hee, who in the Empire should necessarily succede him. And hauing settled this thing in his fantasie, hee sent vnto his little sonnes Master, charging him to bring him vnto him by breake of day, supposing that God had ordained that the Empire should bee his: but the matter fell out quite contrarie to his expectation. For being in this thought, hee commanded Enodus, that as soone as hee might, and as soone as the day should arise, hee should shouler him of the two young princes to enter in vnto him, who should arrive the first. Hee walking out met with Caius before the chamber doore (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his grandfather thought, was busie about his breakfast) and said vnto him: That the Emperour his father called for him, and withall suffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, hee sodainely began to consider vpon the power of God, who deprived him of the meanes to dispose of the Empire, according as he had determined with himselfe, for that it lay not in his power; and hee lamented greatly, not so much for that hee sawe his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his sonne Tiberius was distated of the Romane Empire; and besides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckoning that they, who were more stronger then hee, would not suffer him to conuerse among them, and that alliance could not assure him his life: for sometimes for feare, and other whiles for hatred, some one would accuse him, that he went about and butlily sought to seize the Empire; or that he had comploted some stratageme, least hee should lose the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Astrological predictions and nativities; so that the greater part of those things which he executed in all his life time, was ordered thereby.

Hee seeing Calpurnia one day coming towards him, spake this of him to certain of his familiars: Behold the man that shall bee one day honoured with the Romane Empire. And amongst all the Emperours, he gaue greatest credit to diuination, for that in certaine things he had found the coniectures correspondent to truth. But at that time he was so grievously disquieted, by reason of the misfortune that had hapned; yea he was in such sort grieved, as if his grandchild had bin already lost, & hee blamed himselfe for that he had sought these pefages: for that he might haue died without falling into that disaster, in being ignorant of that which was to come: whereas now he should die in the knowledge of their mishaps, whom he loued most intirely. Being thus troubled to see that the soveraigntie of the Empire should contrarie to his intention fall into their hands, who by his will should not enioy the same, although it were with hearts grieft and contrarie to his will, yet spake he to Caius after this manner which ensueth: My sonne, although that Tiberius be more neerely allied vnto me then you are; yet notwithstanding both by mine owne aduice, as also by the wil of the immortal Gods, I comit vnto your hands the Empire of the Romans. I require you therefore that when you shall enioy the same, you forget not the good will I haue borne towards you, who haue established you in so high and worthie a dignitie; and charge you likewise that you forget not your Cousin Tiberius; but knowing that by the will of the Gods I am he, who after them am the author of so many goods, which haue befallen you, you returne mee the like good will and affection: and that you likewise take care of Tiberius, by reason of our mutual alliance: for you ought to know that Tiberius serueth you for a bulwarke to maintaine you Empire, and your owne life; and if hee die, it will be the beginning of your mishap. For it is a perilous matter for those, who are raised to high dignities, to bee sole and without allies. Furthermore, the Gods doe neuer leaue them unpunished, who attempt or ast any thing against the lawes of consanguinitie. These were the last words which Tiberius spake to Caius, who promised him to perform all that which he required, notwithstanding he meant nothing lesse. For inconti-nently after he was installed in the Empire, hee caused Tiberius to bee made away, bethinking him of those diuinations: as also the same Caius died anon after by a conspiracie that was prac-tized against him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his successor in the Empire, he liued not many daies after, and died after he had gouerned twentie two yeeres, sixe monthes, and three daies. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

The Romans hauing intelligence of Tiberius death, greatly reioiced at the good newes: yet durst they not assure themselves: and though of long time they would haue willingly reddemed the truth of these reports with a good summe of money; yet feared they least the newes should be false, and least if they shewed themselves too diligent in expressing their signes of ioy, they should afterwards be accused for it, and lose their liues thereby. For onely Tiberius had done much mischief to the noble families in Rome, being of himselfe a man cholericke, implacable towards all men without any occasion, hauing a naturall inclination so cruel, that the easiest paine G whereunto he adiudged those whom hee condemned, was death: notwithstanding therfore that each man tooke pleasure to heare the newes, yet did each one conceale it, vntill such time as they might be more fully assured; thorow the feare of those miseries they foresawe, if the matter should fall out otherwaies. But Marfias Agrippas free-man, hauing certaine notice of Tiberius death, ranne speedily to comfort his Master Agrippa, with these good newes, & meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a signe vnto him, and told him in the Hebrew tongue, the Lion was dead. Agrippa conceiuing that which he meant, was rauished with ioy; and said vnto him: I will requite thee for all those benefits I haue receiued at thy hands, and especially for this good newes; provided that it prouue true. The Centurion, who had the keeping of Agrippa, considering what expedition Marfias had vsed in running, and the pleasure that Agrippa had con-ceiued, in his report, he began to suspect some alteration, and asked them what had hapned: and whereas they delaied to giue him an answer, hee importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa tolde him plainly what he had heard, in that he had growne already into inward familiaritie with him. The Centurion reioyced at this newes, as well as Agrippa, hoping to speede the better thereby, and made Agrippa good chere: but whilest they were in the midst of their banquetting, and drunke freely; there came one vnto them, who tolde them that Tiberius was aliue, and that within fewe dayes he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this newes, for that hee had committed a capitall crime in eating in the company of a prisoner, vpon the newes of Cæsars death, and by reioycing with him, hee draue Agrippa out of the place where he sate, and reprochfully said vnto him: Thinkest thou (saide hee) that I know not how falsely thou spreadest the rumor of Cæsars death? yes be assured thou shalt answer thy lie with the losse of thy head. This said, he caused Agrippa to be bound, whome before time hee had suffered to goe libertie; and shut him vp in more close prison, then he had been before: so that Agrippa was all that night long in this extreame miserie. The next day the rumour was spread thorow the whole Citie, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time euerie one boldly protested it. There were some also, who offered sacrifices for this cause, and there came letters also from Caius, which were addressed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. Hee wrote an other also to Piso, who had the guard of the Citie, containing the like report, and besides that, commanding him to transerre Agrippa from the company of those souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the same place where hee was lodged K before; so that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a prisoner, yet liued hee at his owne discretion. Caius arriuing in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which hee burned most magnificently, according to the custome of the country. And although he were verie willing to deliuer Agrippa the same day; yet was hee dissuaded from the same by Antonia, not for any ill will she bare: he prisoner, but in regard of Caius honour, least thereby he should shew himselfe to be glad of Tiberius death, in setting him at libertie so speedily, whome he had committed to prison. When as therfore some few daies were ouerpast, he sent for him to his house, and caused him to be powld, and his garments changed, and that done, hee set a diademe vpon his head, and made him king of Philips Tetrachy, to which he annexed Lysa-nias Tetrachy, and changed his chaine of yron into a chaine of gold of the same weight, & sen L Marullus into Iudæa to gouerne there. The second yeere of Caius raigne, Agrippa asked licence to repaire into Iudæa, to the intent hee might dispose of his kingdom, purposing to returne againe at such time as he had dispatched those affaires. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Iudæa, and was seene and saluted for a king beyond all mens expectation, ser-uing thereby for a most notable example vnto men to expresse vnto them how great the power of destinie is in humane affaires, considering the poore estate wherein he had bene before, and the happinesse which he enioyed at that time. Some termed him happy, in that he resolutely followed his hopes, other some could scarcely beleue that he was in this fort aduanced.

time as (he saw him) apparelled like a king, & eniured with a great multitude of people, and impossible was it for her to hide the bitterness of hir griefe; for which cause shee incited her husband & perswaded him to make a voiage to Rome, & to purchase as much as he possessed. For said she,
I cannot endure to liue it Agrippa Aristobulus son condemned to death by the sentence of his own father (so poore and indigent, that to redresse his necessities wherwith he was daily pressed by his creditors, he was constrained at last to flie to Rome) should returne with such titles of a king, and that her husband who was a kings son, & was called to the kingdom by his father, should liue obscure, & passe his life like a priuat man: Husband (saide she) if heretofore it hath bin no prejudice to thee to liue in lesse dignitie, then erit thy father hath done; now at least wile, desire that due honor B which belongeth to thy family: neither thinke it to be sufferable to subscribe to him in estimation, who in times past hath bene maintained by thy bountie. Neither suffer it to bee thought (tho-row thine owne slouth) that hee in his necessitie had better meanes and industrie to obtaine an ample fortune, then you amidst your mightie abundance; as if it redounded not to thy shame to be thought inferior to him at this time, who not long since, except by thy merie had no meanes to liue. Let vs therefore hastily repaire vnto Rome, and neither spare gold, silver, or any other expence, for that it auaileth vs not so much to keepe the same, as to employ the same in the purchase of a kingdom. But Herode dissuaded her as much as he might, for that hee contented himselfe to liue in quiet, & suspected the confusion that was at Rome, which hee endeoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias. But the more negligent she saw him; the more instantly C incited she him to seek out the kingdom; and neuer gaue she him ouer vntill she had conformed him to her desire: Whereunto hee rather listned, in that she might not be drawne from her resolution. Hauing therefore furnished himselfe after the most magnificent manner, and spared no cost, he repaired to Rome, & led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa smelling their intent & the preparation they made, made his prouision likewise. And hauing notice that they were put to sea, he sent Fortunatus one of his freemen to Rome, with presents to the Emperour, and certaine letters against Herod, with commission to certifie Caius of euerie particular, according as the occasion should serue. He embarking himselfe after Herode, had a happy passage, and was onely prevented by him, but for the space that Herode presented himselfe to Caius: for hee continually followed him, and deliuered his letters. For they arriued at one time at Putcol, and found Caius D at Baia, a village of Campania, distant from Putcol some five stades, enriched with most royal and sumptuous palaces, for that euerie Emperour enforced himselfe to exceed the honour of his predecessor, by reason of the hot bathes that naturally issued out of the earth, seruing both for the health of the body, and recreation of the spirits. Whilest Caius talked with Herode in that hee visited him first, hee receiued Agrippas letters, containing Herodes accusations; for they accused him of a conspiracie made and complotted betwixt him and Seianus, since the beginning of Ti-berius Empire: And how for the present hee fauoured Artabanus king of the Parthians to the pre-iudice of the Emperour Caius; of this, the preparations Herod had stored vp in his Arsenals, gaue euidēt testimony, which were sufficient to arme seuentie thousand men of warre. Caius was fore-moued with these informations, and asked Herode if that which was informed him as touching E his warlike preparation, was true. Hee vnable to contradict the same in any thing, for feare hee should be convicted of falshood, auowed no lesse. Whereupon Caius supposing the accusation of his reuolt to be sufficiently approued, depriued him of his Tetrachy, and annexed it to Agrippas kingdom; bestowing Herods substance also vpon him. Hee banished him likewise for euer, & confined him in the cite of Lions in France. & vnderstanding that Herodias was Agrippas sister, he gaue her all that which in right appertained vnto her. And supposing that she would not willingly accompany her husband in that his calamity, hee told her that her brother should be her warrant. But she gaue him this reply: Mightie Emperour, you speake magnificently, and as it well becometh to great a maiestie, but there is a cause that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bountie, which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I beare vnto my husband, F whom if I should forsake in this his miserie, it would verie ill become me, in that I haue bene a partner with him in his felicitie. Caius displeased with this her resolute answer, banished her likewise with her husband, and gaue the confiscation of her estate also to Agrippa. God did after this manner punish Herodias, in regard of that enuy which shee had conceiued against her brother, and plagued Herode in that he had so lightly listned to the foolish perswasions of a woman. But Caius gouerned the Empire, the first and second yeere of his raigne, with most noble directions, behauing himselfe graciously towards all men, whereby he obtained the good liking of the Ro-

The sedition of the Iewes and Grecians in the citie of Alexandria.

A Nd whereas there arose a sedition betwixt the Iewes and Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three chosen Embassadours on either side were sent vnto Caius. One of these Embassadours of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Iewes with many outrages, and amongst other things hee alledged that they made no reckoning of honouring Cæsar: And that whereas all other subiects of the Romane Empire had erected altars and temples in honour of Caius, & in all other things had receiued him as a God, the Iewes supposed it to be a dishonor for them to honour his statues, or sweare by his name. After that Appion had vrged many things and inueyed grievously against the Iewes, hoping that Caius would be prouoked against them; as in all likelihood and appearance it should haue fallen out, Philo the chiefeft among the Embassadours of the Iewes, a man of famous memory, & brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philosophy, enforced himself to answer those accusations which were vrged against the Iewes. But Caius commanded him silence, and willed him instantly to withdraw himself, and was so fore displeased, that it appeared verie manifestly, that he intended some hainous reuenge against them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had been grievously taunted, and spake thus vnto the Iewes that flockt about him. We must be of good courage, since Caius in words seemeth to bee displeased with vs: for in effect he will arme God in our behalfe against himselfe.

CHAP. XI.

Caius sendeth Petronius into Syria to make warre against the Iewes, who should refuse his statue.

B Ut Caius being sore displeased for that the Iewes only despised his ordinances, sent Petronius into Syria to succeed Vitellius in his roome, charging him with a strong army to invade Iudæa: and if they willingly admitted his statue, that then he should place it in the temple of God; but if they denied the same, then that ouercomming them by warre he should enforce them to condescend thereunto. As soone as Petronius came into Syria, hee endeoured himselfe to satisfie Cæsars command: and having assembled as great an armie as he could possibly leaue, and leading forth with him two legions of Romane souldiers, he wintered at Ptolemais, intending vpon the first spring to invade Iudæa. All which he signified to Caius by his letters: who commending him for his indutrie, aduised him to vse all expedition therein, and to make warre against those who should disobey his commandements. Meane while diuers thousands of the Iewes resorted to Petronius, who sojourned at Ptolemais, beseeching him not to constrain them to do that thing which was contrary to their lawes, or to transgress the ordinances of their forefathers. For if (sayd they) you haue wholly decreed to bring and erect this statue in our temple, first depriue vs of our liues: and afterwards doe that which shall seeme good in your eyes. For it is impossible for vs as long as our soules remaine within our bodies, to permit that which is forbidden by our lawes, or to suffer such impietie in regard of that honour, which we owe vnto our lawmaker, and our predecessors, who haue ratified our lawes to the entent we should increase in vertue. Petronius enraged at this their protestation, answered thus. If I were Emperour, and of mine owne mind enterprised this action, you had reason to vse these kinds of insinuations vnto me. But since Cæsar hath sent me this commission, there is no contradiction, but that I must obey his decrees: For if you resist the same, you shall endure a most seuer and rigorous punishment for your disobedience and contumacie. Hereunto the Iewes answered. My Lord (sayd they) M since your pleasure is such as you will not in any sort transgresse the command and contents of Cæsars letters, neither wil we also any waies violate or infringe the prescript of our law, vnder hope of the diuine assistance and in imitation of the vertue of our aunccestors: For we are not so faint hearted, that vnder hope of a vaine and vntimely desire of life, we should break those lawes which almighty God hath proposed vnto vs, vnder the reward of eternall felicitie: for which cause we will endure all fortunes whatsoever; so as our cuntry law and religion may remaine inviolate,

A and we are ready to encounter any misfortune, vnder hope that God will assit vs, for whose honour we feare not to aduenture on any danger. This had wee rather doe, then by obeying thee thorow cowardise, to incurre perpetuall ignomie; and that which is more, Gods wrath in neglect of his lawes, whose authoritie euen in thine owne iudgement, is more to be regarded, then Caius commission. Petronius coniecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiving that he could not doe for Caius that he expected in the erection of his statue, without great bloodshed, whereby much murder and inconvenience might follow, he tooke certaine of his neereft and deereft friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that hee might more conveniently and circumspectly looke into the Iewes actions. They fearing some imminent danger thorow the warres they expected from the Romans, and greater mischief thorow the breach of their lawes, assembled once more many thousands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him that hee would not inforce them to that necessitie, nor defile their sacred Citie with forbidden images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (sayd he) you will fight with Cæsar, without regard either of his ability or your owne weakenesse? Wee will not fight (sayd they) but we will rather die then depart from our lawes. Whereupon prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertaine their deaths. In these tearmes continued they for the space of 40. daies, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefeft seed time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death then to admit the statue. Whilest the matter stood vpon these tearmes, Aristobulus Agrippas brother, and Elcias surnamed the Great, came vnto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacie of the people: neither giue them occasions to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that he would write vnto Caius, with what obstinacie the people refused the dedication of his image in the Temple: and how giuing ouer the care of their husbandry, they prepared themselves for the warre without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addresssed to die then to suffer so great an indignitie to be offered to their religion. Besides, how giuing ouer their tillage there was nothing to be expected but robberie, whereas they should want meanes to pay their customes; by which meanes they hoped that Cæsar would be moued to moderate his seueritie towards that nation, and not to giue them cause of rebellion: and that if he might not bee moued from the prosecution of the warre, that then he might goe forward with his businesse. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

B ut Petronius partly in respect of their prayers, who instantly vrged him, and the waightines of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Iewes, supposing that it was a matter vnworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfy Caius vnbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the feare of God, and the remorse of his own conscience, he had rather to his owne danger informe the Emperour of the absurditie of the matter, by his letters, being no waies ignorant of his wrathfull spirit and forwardnes in reuenge, except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he, that although it altered not his resolution, but happily inforced his displeasure against him, in that he did not speedily execute his command; yet that it was the duetic of a good man no not to refuse an assured death, if so be he might saue so guiltlesse and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled all those warlike forces that at that time gaue attendance on him round about him, he tolde the Iewes first of all, not his owne, but the Emperours intent, who would haue them shortly taste his displeasure, and enforce them to beare the burthen of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himselfe, that it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours fauour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrarie to his command. I hold it (sayd he) a matter most iust to employ my life & honor for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawne into danger of death: and I will respect the excellency of the lawes of your fathers, for which you thinke you ought to entertaine warre and danger: neither is it lawfull to suffer the temple of God to be defiled by the authority of princes. I will therefore write vnto Cæsar and certifie him of your minds: and in all that I may, I will assit you to obtaine your requests. God (whose power surpasseth all industrie and humane force) vouchsafe to conduct you, and make you constant in the obseruation of your lawes, and grant that hee thorow excessiue desire of humane glorie, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius bee displeased and inforce his inuitable displeasure against me, I will vnder take all danger; and endure all torments ments both in body and spirit, to the end that I may not behold so many vertuous men, as you are, perish in your good and iust actions. Go therefore each of you, and ply your worke, and till your lands: my selfe will send vnto Rome, and both in my selfe and by my friends, I will employ my selfe for you. After he had spoken thus, he dismissed the assembly, praying the chiefeft amongst them to encourage the husbandmen to ply their businesse, and to confirme the rest of the people in their good hope. Of himselfe also he ceased not to animate them. And truly God shewed his assistance to Petronius, and assisted him in all his affaires. For as soone as he had finished his discourse vnto the Iewes, there sodainly fell a great raine beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very faire, neither was there any appearance of raine in the ayre, and all that yeere long there was an extreme drought; so that men were past hope to haue any moisture, notwithstanding that sometime there appeared certaine clouds in the heauens. At that time therefore the water fell in great abundance, and besides the expectation and opinion of men, the Iewes con-ceiued hope that Petronius, soliciting their cause, should not bee repulsed. But Petronius was more amazed then all the rest, seeing evidently that God vnderooke the affaires of the Iewes, and gaue them testimony of his manifest assistance; so that they that were their professed ad-uersaries, had no meanes to contradict them, as he himselfe wrote to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end he should not drawe so many thousand men into a desperate resolution and vnhappy death. For without warre it was impossible for him euer to make them forsake their religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off and lose the reuenue which he re-ceiued of that nation; and would not erect a trophy of an euermlasting curse and malediction against himselfe. Adding moreover, what the power of their God was: which he had so cleerely declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his mercifull hand was ouer them. This is the content of Petronius letters.

On the other side, king Agrippa, who at that time conuersed at Rome, grew more and more in fauour with Caius, hauing entertained him at a banquet, wherein he enforced himselfe to exceede all others in sumptuousnesse, as in all other sorts of delights and pleasures; yea with such festiuall entertained he him, that not onely others, but also the Emperour himselfe could not artaine to such magnificence; so much enforced he himselfe to exceede all others thorow the great desire he had to content and satisfie Caesar in all things. Caius was abashed at this his courage and magnificence, seeing Agrippa enforce himselfe about his power and meanes to abound in siluer, and all this to the intent to please him. For which cause Caesar in requitall of his kindnes, intending to honour Agrippa to his utmost power, in granting him that which he most desired, being one day whet with wine, inuited him to drinke a carouse: adding these words; Agrippa, I haue heretofore known the honour thou hast shewed towards me, and thou hast expressed the earnest affection that thou bearest me, in hazarding thy selfe in diuers dangers, into which thou hast been drawne during Tiberius life time, and hast omitted nothing, no not in that which ex-ceedeth thy power, to shew thy vertuous affection towards me. For which cause I thinke that it should be a great shame for mee, if I should suffer my selfe to be overcome by thee in kindnes, without some answerable correspondence: I will therefore put that in practise which I haue heretofore omitted. For all those things that hitherto I haue bestowed on thee, are of no reckoning.
My will is that thy readines & vertue should at this present be required, by such meanes as might foreuer make thee happy. Now he spake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg some great prouince at his hands, or the reuenues of some Cities.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did hee not discover his intent, but gaue Caius this ready answer, that whereas he had serued him to the dislike of Tiberius, it was not for the gaine he expected heretofore, and for the present also hee did nothing vnder hope to be rich, contenting himselfe that he was in the Emperours good fauour. That the benefits he had receiued by him, were great, yea exceeding all that which he durst euer haue hoped. For (said he) although they be but small in comparison of your greatnesse, yet in respect of my selfe, who haue receiued them, and in my conceit and qualitie, they are very great. Caius being amazed at this his courage, insisted the rather to perswade him, that he would grant him all that he would require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa said: Dread prince, since it is your good pleasure to thinke me worthy to be honoured by your presents, I wil not request any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me; for that by those goods you haue already giuen me, I am greatly honoured: but I beseech and request one thing at your hands, which will purchase you the reputation of pietie, and will procure God to be propitious vnto you in all your actions, and which also will breed me much glory among those, who shall heare that I haue not been refused in my demand,

A demand, which concerneth me more then the necessities of this life. I therefore beseech you that it will please you to giue commandement, that that statue, which you haue charged Petroni- us to erect in the temple of the Iewes, may neuer be advanced there. This was Agrippas request, which to his great hazard he presented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perillous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any such thing at Caius hands, that was not answerable to his humour. Caius on the one side moued with the seruice Agrippa had done him, and on the other side seeing how great an indignity it should be for him, if before such an assembly of witnesses, he should deny that which he had so instantly pressed Agrippa to request, as if he sodainly had repented himselfe, and admiring Agrippas vertue (who hauing meanes within a little time to augment his particular estate, either by reuenues or other commodities, had preferred the common cause, the lawes of his countrey and piety before all these) he granted him his supplication, and wrote to Petronius, praising him for that he had vied such diligence in assembling his army, as also for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing these words: If (said he) you haue already planted the statue, as I commanded you, let it remaine in the place: but if it be not done be thou no more troublefome to the Iewes, but dismisse thine armie, and repaire thou in person to that place whither I haue sent thee. For I vrgo no more the erection of that statue for the desire that I haue to gratifie Agrippa, whom I entirely honour, and in such sort, as it is impossible for me to contradict any thing whatsoever, that either he hath neede of, or shall require. These were the contents of those letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he vnderstood that the Iewes bethought them of reuolt: for they made it knowne, that rather then they would endure that statue, they would hazard a war against the Romans: which when Caius vnderstood, he was extremely sorrowfull, & being a man addicted to all villany, and estranged from all honesty, and who gaue place to no good counsell, incontinently after he had conceiued a displeasure against any man, & who likewise thought it a great good hap for him to accomplish all that whatsoever he pleased, he wrote againe to Petronius to this effect: Since the presents which the Iewes haue giuen thee, haue preuailed more with thee then my commandements haue done, so as to please them thou hast despised that which I haue enioyned thee, I make thy selfe the iudge how much thou hast deserued to incurre my displeasure, to the end that thou maist serue for an example to all those, who shall come after thee, that an Emperours commandement ought not in any sort to be neglected. Although this Epistle was both written and sent, yet did not Petronius receiue the same during Caius life time, for that they that carried the same, were stayed by crosse windes; so that Petronius receiued those letters that certified him of Caius death, before he receiued the other. For God would not forget Petronius, who exposed himselfe to great dangers for the loue of the Iewes, and for the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by Gods wrath being kindled against him, by reason that he affected diuine honours, receiued his reward; and Petronius obtained fauour both at Rome, and thorow all the whole go-uernment, and especially among the principall Senators, against whom Caius was accustomed to vomit his cholericke disgraces. He died a little after hee had written the letter to Petronius, by which he threatned and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cause why he was taken out of this world, & the manner how treason was plotted and wrought against him. The letter that brought tidings of Caius death, was deliuered to Petronius first; and incontinently after hee receiued that wherein hee enioyned him to kill himselfe. He highly reioiced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods providence, who speedily and happily had rewarded him both for the honour that he bare vnto his Temple, as also for the assistance he vied towards the Iewes. Behold how Petronius escaped from death, by an vnexpected meanes.

That which hapned to the Iewes that were at Babylon, and of the two brethren Afinxus and Anilæus.

IN those daies there hapned a grieuous commotion amongst those Iewes that inhabited Mesopotamia and Babylon, and such slaughters and calamities as neuer the like hath bin declared in our former narrations; which in that I intend to report both particularly and seriously, I wil rippe vp the whole cause thereof from his first originall. There was a Citie called Nearda belonging to Babylon, stored with inhabitants, and enriched with many fruit-full possessions, sufficient to sustaine so great a multitude: Moreover it was such as might be hardly inuaded by the enemy, both for that the riuer Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as also for that it was defended with verie strong walles. Vpon the same riuer also there stood an other citie, called Nisibis, in which the Iewes, in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer vnto God, and the rest of their vortue money. These two Cities therefore serued them for two store-houses: and from thence according as the time required, they sent the money they had gathered to Ierusalem, and committed the conuoy thereof to diuers thousands of men, for feare least it should be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the soueraignty in Babylon. Among these Iewes liued Asineus and Anilaus, two brethren, borne in Nearda; whose father being dead, their mother set them and bound them to the weauers trade, for that amongst those nations it was accounted no indignitie to follow that trade: for both men and women exercise themselves therein. It hapned that their master with whom they learnt their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late vnto their worke. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great iniurie had been done vnto them, betooke themselves to their weapons, whereof there were great store in that house, and retired themselves into a place where the flood diuideth it selfe into two parts, which naturally abounded with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserved for the vse of winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed and became their captaines, and no man opposed himselfe against their insolent proceedings. Being by this meanes grown absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselves a strong fortresse, they sent vnto the inhabitants, commanding them to pay them tribute for their cattell which they pastured; so that this tribute gaue sufficient to entertaine them, promising vnto those who obeyed them all friendship, and that they would maintaine them against all those that should iniury them, of what place soeuer they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatened them that they would kill all their cattell. The inhabitants of the country knowing themselves vnable to oppose them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of cattell which they required; so that greater forces daily coupled themselves with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excursions against those whome they intended to hurt. Euery one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renoume came at last to the eares of the king of Parthia.

The gouernour of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischief before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possible, both Parthians and Babylonians, & marched forth against them, with an intent to roote them out before they should haue any inkling thereof, to prepare themselves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his army, he lay in ambush neere vnto a marsh, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Iewes forbore all kind of worke, he making his account that the enemy durst not make head against him, but without stroke striking he should lead the away captiues) he marched softly, thinking to charge them vnawares. Asineus, who at that time by chance sat idly with his fellows, hauing his Armes fast by him: Ye men (said he) methinkes I heare the neighing of horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreouer, I heare the noise of their bridles, & I feare least the enemies secretly stealing vpon vs, should circumsent vs: let therefore some one of vs go and discouer what the matter is, and certifie vs truly of that which he shall perceiue: I would I were found a liar in that which I haue told you. This said, some one of them went out to espy what the noise intended; who returning hastily backe againe, told him that he had not fallily coniectured as touching the intent of the enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselves any longer to be out-brained by them. Hee also declared that there was a mighty number of horsemen, who were assembled like a droue of beasts, sufficient & able vnto to ouercome Asineus and all his company, forasmuch as they were not in a readines to defend themselves; for that they are forbidden by our lawe in any sort to trauele on the Sabbath. Asineus determined with himselfe not to do that which the spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behaue themselves valiantly in that their necessity wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needly die, it better became them to make breach of their lawe, then to hearken their enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betooke himselfe to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it knowne in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth against the enemy, & slaughtered a great many of them, for that they despising Asineus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay holde on men already vanquished; but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

When the bruit of this skirmish was brought to the eares of the king of Parthia, hee was wholly Asineus and Anilaus are sought vnto by Artabanus for friendship.

A wholly astonished at the boldnes of these two brethren, and hee had a desire to see them, and to speake with them. Hee therefore sent one of the trustiest of his guard, to let them vnderstand that although king Artabanus had bene iniured by them, in that they had inuaded his countrey; notwithstanding said this embassadour, he making lesse account of the displeasure he hath conceived against you, then of your vertue, hath sent me vnto you to giue you my hand & troth in his name for safe conduct and securitie in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: hee conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promising you gifts and honours, and determineth to encrease your dignity by his power. Asineus refused to enterprise this voyage, but sent his brother Anilaus with certaine presents, such as he could possibly finde. Hee therefore departed with the messenger, and presented himselfe before Artabanus; who seeing Anilaus come alone, asked him how it hapned that Asineus came not with him: & vnderstanding that he staid in his marsh thorow the feare that he had of him, he swore by the Gods of his ancestors, that he would doe him no wrong, wishing them to giue credit to his promise, and hee stretched out his hand, which is the greatest signe which the kings of that countrey vse to assure those that parlie with them. For after they haue mutually giuen one another their hands, there is no sinister practise to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harme, are no more to be feared at such time as they haue giuen this testimony of assurance. That done, Artabanus sent back Anilaus to perswade his brother Asineus to come to the court. Artabanus did this, supposing that this his amitie with the two brothers would bee a bridle for the Iewes, who otherwise might encroach vpon his gouernments. For he feared least if any rebellion should happen, and he should be troubled in that warre, Asineus and they of Babylon should grow more strong, both by the voluntary submission of the Iewes, as by force: and thereby should doe him the more mischief. Vpon this deliberation he sent Anilaus; who easily perswaded his brother, giuing him to vnderstand among other things, what goodwill the king bare him, and the oath that he had sworne: so that both of them resorted to Artabanus, who received them verie graciously, admiring Asineus vertue, who had so great a courage to exercise his enterprises, considering especially that he was a man of lowe stature, and who to looke on seemed to be contemptible: and hee told his friends that without comparison, hee had a greater heart then his body.

And when as in banquetting he had named Asineus and shewed him to Abdagasis the general of his army, signifying vnto him with what valour these brethren were endowed in feats of armes, Abdagasis required that it might be lawful for him to kill Asineus; to the end that he might punish the wrongs he had done to the estate of the Parthians. Neuer (said the king) will I giue my consent to betray a man, who hath committed himselfe to my protection: & hath giuen mee his hand, and who buildeth vpon the oath I haue past vnto him in the name of the Gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of armes: thou hast no need to make me forswear my selfe, to the end I might doe iustice on him for his outrages committed against the Parthians: but at such time as he and his brother shall depart from hence, assault him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not priuy to thy attempt. And afterwards calling Asineus to him in the morning: It is time (said he) that thou returne homeward, for feare thou prouokest diuers of the captaines of my court, which contrary to my will, will endeavour themselves to kill thee. I commit thee to the countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancy shall remaine exempt from all robberies, and other such calamities. Reason it is that I procure thy good; because I haue engaged mine honour & faith irreuocably vnto thee, not vpon any slight matter, but for things that importune thee as neerly as thy life. This said, he gaue him certaine presents, and incontinently dismissed him. Now as soone as he returned home to his owne fortresse, hee fortified the places, both those which before time he had thorowly defended, as the other which as yet no man had attempted to strengthen: and in short time he grew to that greatness, as no one might obscure fortune & beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honours of the Babylonians, he was also held in great account by the captaines of the Parthians; who were sent to gouerne in the neighbouring prouinces: yea so much hee increased his authority with his power, that all Mesopotamia was in his command: In this felicitie and increasing glory of his, he continued for the space of fiftene yeeres: which neuer began to wane vntill such time as neglecting the ancient studie of vertue, and contemning the lawes of his forefathers, both hee and his factious followers being deuoured with pleasure, yielded themselves captiue to forniculists. It was then that a certaine gouernour of those Parthians came into that countrey, accompanied with his wife, not onely enriched and endowed with other perfections; but also admired for her incomparable comparable comelines and beauty. Whom without euer seeing her, only by report of her beauty Anilaus Asinaeus brother loued entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtaine her fauour, neither had any other hope to enioy the Lady, he could not bridle his vnuly lust, but he made warre against her husband: and killing the Parthian in their first conflict, his wife became his both in subiection and bed-seruice, which thing was the original of many mighty calamities both to himselfe and towards his brother. For when as hauing lost her former husband, she was led away captiue, she carried with her the images of the gods of her country, which she highly esteemed, according as it was the custome of those that inhabited that place, to haue their gods whom they adored in their houses, whom at such time as they trauell into a foraine country, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and vsed them according to the fashion of her country, at the first secretly: but after she was knowne for Anilaus his wife, then adored the them according to the custome, and with the same seruice which she vsed during her first husbands daies, sacrificing to her Gods.

Their chiefeest friends seeing this, first of all reprooued them, for that Anilaus committed such things, as were no waies vsed among the Hebrewes, and altogether repugnant to their lawes, for that he had married a woman of a foraine nation, that contradicted and violated their accustomed religion: for which cause they aduised them to beware, lest in submitting themselues too much to their vnbridled pleasures, they should lose the honour & power they had received from God, euen vntill that present. But seeing their perswasions profited nothing, and that Anilaus likewise had villanously slaine one of his dearest friends, who had somewhat too freely reproued him (who at such time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeale of the lawes of his ancestors, and with griefe against his murdurer, wished that Asinaeus and Anilaus and all their associates might die the like death: they for that they were transgressors of the lawes; the other, for that they succoured not themselues in that oppression, which they suffered for the maintenance of their lawes.) They were sore displeased, yet notwithstanding they contained themselues, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cause, but from the valour of those brethren.

But whē they vnderstood that the Parthian gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoued them not any more to beare with Anilaus, in contempt of their laws: for which cause, addressing themselues to Asinaus in great assemblies, they exclaimed against Anilaus, laying, that he ought, although at first he had no power to dispose of himselfe, yet now at least, to correct this error before it should redound to their publike plague: for that both his marriage was disallowed in all mens eyes, as altogether contrarie to their country lawes, and that the superstitious obleruance of the gods, which the woman presumed to vse, was an apparant iniurie offered to the true God. But he although he knew that his brothers fault would breed some great inconuenience, both to himselfe and his followers, yet being ouercome with brotherly affection, he easily pardoned his brother, ascribing his error to the violence of his vnbridled passion. But whereas daily more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofes, at length he admonished his brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was past, and willing him to amend the error hereafter, by sending home the woman vnto her kinned. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiuing that the rumour that was raised among the people was for her sake, and being affraid lest for her loue sake Anilaus should incurre some danger, she poisoned Asinaus, to the end that her loue being in authority she might more freely practise her impiety. Now when Anilaus had gotten the government into his owne hands, he drew out his forces against certaine villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeest among the Parthians, and Artabanus sonne in lawe, which villages he spoiled, and carried away moucables, men, sheepe and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was resident in those quarters, vnderstood of the spoile of his villages, he was sore displeased; and therather for that without any occasion or proffer of iniury, Anilaus had assailed him in contempt of his estate, who was a chiefe Peere of the country: for which cause he incontinently assembled the greatest power of horse and footmen he could gather, to set vpon Anilaus and his associates. Leading his forces therefore against one of his villages, he kept himselfe in couert to the end he might fight the next day; which was the Sabbath day, on which the Iewes attempt not any thing. Whereof when Anilaus was aduertised by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in an other village, who had exactly told him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his souldiers; after he had made his souldiers take their refectiō, he departed by night to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be aduertised of his

A his comming. Hee therefore rushed in vpon them about the fourth watch of the night, and those whom he found asleepe, and the rest being astonished hereat, were forced to flee: and by flight he also rooke Mithridates prisoner, and caused him to be carried away naked on an Asle, which is one of the greatest disgraces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this disgracefull manner carried him into a Forrest, some of his familiars perswaded him to kill him: but Anilaus told them incontinently, that they ought to deale with him far otherwise, for that it behoued them not to kill a man, who was one of the chiefeest among the nobilitie of the Parthians, and one who was most honoured in regard of that affinitie and alliance hee had with the king: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mithridates were insupportable; yet if they should be the meanes of the safegard of his life, he would remit the iniuries, and Remunerate them for their mercie in sauing his life; whereas if they should deale seuerelie with him, the king would seeke his reuenge, and make a horrible slaughter of all those Iewes that inhabited Babylon: who they ought to haue compasion of, both for that they are of their blood, as for that if any mischief should befall them, they knew not whither to retire themselues; whereas they might be asslited with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Having thus discoursed and debated the matter in the eares of his souldiers, his opinion was approoued, and they were perswaded; and so Mithridates was sent backe againe.

But no sooner returned he home vnto his house, but that his wife hit him in the teeth, that hee liued but by the mercy of his enemies; notwithstanding he were the kings sonne in law: that he had made no reckoning to punish those, who had so much injured him: that he likewise contented himselfe to haue his life laued after he had been prisoner to the Iewes. For which cause (said shee) recover thou thy former vertue and honour, which thou hast heretofore lost, or I swear by the Gods of the king my father, that the bond of mariage which is betwixt thee and me, shall be dissolved.

Mithridates, vnable to endure these vsuall reproches, and on the other side, apprehending his wifes hautie courage, from whom he feared to be separated; he assembled the greatest power of men of warre that he could possible, notwithstanding it were against his will, and led them forth; supposing himselfe to be vnworthy of life, if he who was by nation a Parthian, should be cowardly put to the worst by the Iewes. When Anilaus vnderstood that Mithridates came forth against him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignitie, if hee should lie lurking amidst his marshes; and hoping that hee should haue no worse fortune against his enemies, then he had at the first, and building much vpon his souldiers, who were euer wont to get the vpper hand in their encountries, hee likewise drew forth his armie: to them also certaine other adioyned themselues, who sought nought else but pillage, and hoped that with their only presence they might dismay their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninetie stades, and passed thorow a country that was scant of water, and were about the heate of the midday trauailed with thirst: Mithridates armie came in sight, and charged them euen at that time, when they fainted for want of drinke, and thorow the extremitie of heate; so as they could scarcely wield their weapons. At that time Anilaus souldiers encountering with Mithridates fresh men, were shamefully put to flight: whereby it came

E to passe, that a great number of them was murdered, and many thousand men put to the sword. But Anilaus himselfe, and all those of his company, retired themselues in great haste into a forest, leaving Mithridates Lord and Maister of the field, whereof he was very ioyfull. Notwithstanding this disaster, an infinite number of lawlesse men resorted to Anilaus, who set little by their liues, provided there might no limit be proposed to their vnbridled licentiousnesse; so that hee gathered a greater number of men, then those whom hee had lost: yet were they farre different in valour from the former: for they were men wholly ignorant of warlike discipline: notwithstanding, hee being accompanied with these men, went and sette vpon certaine boroughs of the Babylonians, which were wholly destroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cause, the Babylonians and his other enemies, sent vnto Neard to the Iewes that were there, requiring

F that Anilaus might be deliuered into their hands: whereunto condescending not (for although they had a will to performe their request, yet it lay not in their power to deliuer him) they required that they might liue in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians sent certaine men to confer with Anilaus. They hauing suruaid the place wherein Anilaus kept, assailed both himselfe and his followers by night, and slew all those they encountered with, without resist, and among the rest Anilaus. When the Babylonians saw that they were deliuered from the oppression of Anilaus, who till that time had been as it were a bridle vnto them to restraints and and curbe the hatred they conceiued against the Iewes, with whom they had oftentimes been at G oddes, by reason of the contrarietie of their religions, whereby it grew that they oftentimes fell at debate vpon each opportunitie, wherein they met.

At that time therefore that Anileus men were discomfited, the Babylonians set vpon the Iewes on all sides; who seeing themselves in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, a-they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a Citie famous in regard of Seleucus the sonne of Nicanor, who built it. In that Citie dwelt diuers Macedons, diuers Greekes, and a great number of Syrians. The Iewes fled thither, and sojourned there about some five yeeres, without any molestation: but in the sixt yeere, when the plague grew rife in Babylon, the Iewes that remained there, were enforced to seeke them some new habitation; and that remooue of theirs into the Cittie of H Seleucia was the cause likewise of their further mitchiefe, as I will make manifest. The Greekes who dwell in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, & haue alwaies the vpper hand; but after that the Iewes came to inhabit in that place, in a certaine sedition that arose among the,

the Syrians had the vpper hand, by the means of the Iewes, who ioyned their forces with theirs, who of themselves were valiant and good souldiers.

The Greekes, who had been repulled in this tumult, seeing they had but one onely means left them to maintaine their former honour, but to breake that league of friendship which was betweene the Syrians and the Iewes, deuised in priuate each one with those Syrians, with whom they were acquainted, promising to liue in peace and amitie with them, whereunto they condescended willingly. For the chiefe of these two nations concluded the peace, which presently after followed, to the end that on both parts they should ioine in hatred against the Iewes. So that altogether charging them at vnawares, they slew more then fiftie thousand of them: and all of them were slaine, except some few, who thorow the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their neighbors were suffered to escape. These retired themselves to Ctesiphon a citie of Greece, that was not farre from Seleucia, where the king sojourneth euery yeere, and keepeth the greatest part of his moueables, hoping in that place thorow the reuerence of the king they might remain in more safetie & securitie. All the nation of the Iewes that were in these quarters stood in great fear; For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that countrey, accorded among themselves to make a general war against the Iewes; whereby it came to passe that they assembled themselves at Nearda and Nisibis, trusting themselves to the strength of these fortref-ses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in armes. See heere what the estate of those Iewes was, who remained in Babylon.

How Caius was slaine by Chereas.

Caius did not onely expresse and manifest his furie towards those Iewes that dwelt in Ierusalem, and in other neighbouring places; but also thorow all the countries both by land & sea, which were subiect to the Romane Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of mitchiefes; yea such and so hainous, as the like heereof hetherto haue neuer been heard of. But Rome in especiall felt the force of his furie, which partooke no leile calamitie and mifery, then any other citie: but especially the Senators, Patricians, and noble men were plagued. They also that were called Romane knights, who in wealth and dignity were next vnto the Senators, for that out of their number such men were choien, who were to supply the Senat, were vexed with intolerable iniuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with banishments and confiscations weakned, and by slaughters wholly exterminated. Hee likewise vsurped the name of a God, commanding his subiects to dignifie him with more then humane honours; and ascending the Capitoll, which amongst all the temples in Rome is most religiously honoured, he was so bold as to salute Iupiter, and to call him brother. Many such impieties committed he, by which hee exprest that his vnbridled and boundlesse madnesse did neuer forsake him. Amongst his other mad pranks that he plaied, this is woorthy of memorie: for on a time, C thinking it to be too much trouble for him to crosse the sea betweene Puteola a citie in Campani-and Misenum another towne seated by the sea shore, in a galley; & otherwise esteeming it a thing correspondent to his greatness, who was Emperour, to exact that superiority on the sea which was answerable to his soueraignie on the land, betwixt one cape of the sea vnto another, for the space of thirtie furlongs or stades, betwixt which the gulfie had his courte, hee caused a bridge to be built, on which he commanded himselfe to be drawne in a chariot, as if that way were answerable to the dignitie of his deitie. Hee left not one temple of Greece whatsoeuer, that hee spoiled not of those excellent pictures or imagery that was therein: Giuing a commission that all statues and whatsoeuer ornaments, or gifts, and presents that were dedicated in any temple, should bee brought vnto him; saying, that such things as were admirable, should bee referred for a place of D admiration, such as was the citie of Rome: with these spoiles of the temples decked he his palace and gardens, and generally all his houses and pallaces, that he had in Italie. He was so impudent also, as to giue direction, that Iupiter Olympius statue, which the Greekes had in great estimation, and Phideas the Athenian caruer had made, should be transported to Rome. But Nemmius Regulus, to whom he had directed this commission, executed it not, because the Macons informed him, that without spoiling it they could not remoue it from the place. It is reported also that he was hindered from this execution by such prodigies as are almost incredible: which hee certified Caius of, giuing him to vnderstand, what the occasion was that had moued him to disobey him therein: and whilst he was in danger of death for this his delay, the suddaine and succesful death of Caius warranted him from the same. Yea so farre stretched his vnbridled furie, that hauing E a daughter newly borne, he caused her to be caried into the Capitoll, and laid at the feete of the Image of Iupiter; saying, that that child was common betwixt him and Iupiter, leauing the iudge-ment to all men, which of the two parents was the greatest. And notwithstanding all these his misdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

He gaue libertie to slaues also to accuse their masters, of whatsoeuer crimes they would: which was so much the more hateful, because all things were done by Cesars authoritie, and to his good liking: so that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durst accuse him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Iudges to heare his vnle brought in question for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwise) to pick out an occasion to put him to death. For hauing filled all the countries of his Empire with false accusations, and all sorts of mitchiefes, & giuing slaues a pro-F rogative about their masters; their Lords deuised many conspiracies against him, some for spite, and with an intent to reuenge them of those iniuries they had receiued: other some pretending by his death to prevent those inconueniences that threatned them. In a word, his death concerned the securitie of the lawes and the safetie of all men: and had he not bene speedily cut off, our nation almost had bene vtterly exterminated. For which cause I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of euerie occurrent, namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifestation of Gods power and vwill, which bring consolation vnto those who are in aduersitie, & keepe them within the bounds of modestie, who suppose that their prosperitie should continue alwaies firme, and although they neglect vertue, thinke that no euill may befall them. Three plots of conspiracie were intended against him, and purposed to his vtter ruine, each of which was attempted by men of great reckoning. For Aemilius Regulus, vvhho was borne in Corduba in Spaine, was fully resolu'd to kill him, himselfe, or to make him away by the meanes of his confederates. Chæreas Castus, Colonell ouer a thousand men, was the chiefe of an other band; and Annius Minucianus was in no lesse readinesse to doe his vttermost herein. The cause that moued them to accord thus altogether in hatred against Caius, was, that in respect of Regulus, hee was by nature a detester of all iniquitie: for hee was a man endowed with great magnanimitie, and beautified with a liberall spirit; so as he dissembled not any of his counsailes, but communicated them with many, who either were his friends, or valiant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induc'd to seeke his reuenge thorow the desire hee had to doe iustice on him in Lepridus halfe, who had beene one of his especiall friends, and one of the rarest men that were euer found among the Romane citizens (whom Caius had put to death thorow the feare he had conceiu'd of him) knowing well that all they against whom Caius was incens'd, could not escape with lesser indignitie then losse of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the shame and reproche of cowardie that Caius had obiected against him, but feared besides, that his friendship and inward familiaritie with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause & his own securitie, & honors sake, he thought good to make him away. Generally, all of them were resolu'd to rid the world of Caius, & bring an end to his pride and tyrannicall power, for their hope was that their attempt should haue good successe: which if it happily fell out, their country & common-weale should reape the fruites thereof, for vvhose security and safetie, it became them to hazard theselues, though it were with the losse of their heads. But about all the rest, Chæreas was egged on with a desire hee had to grow famous, and thorow the facilitie & conuenient meanes he had to finish the same, becaule his Colonels roome gaue him most secure access vnto him. About that time the Circensian games were solemnized, which is a kind of pastime which the Romanes very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercitils, and the common people is wont to demaund somewhat at their Emperors hands, which they desire to obtaine; and they after they haue examined their requests, doe neuer refuse them. Now they required with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxations, and moderate the excessiue tributes which they pay'd: but he would giue no care vnto them, and caus'd those to be apprehended who call'd vpon the matter most earnestly, sending of his guard some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword. After he had giuen this commaundement, and they who receiu'd the charge had fully executed it, there were a great number of men slaine. The people seeing this, ceas'd to exclaime any more, setting light by their goods; and seeing before their eyes that their refusal would be the cause of their deaths. These considerations incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprise, to the end he might finish his furious and lawlesse life, whose pleasure was all mens iniurie, and preiudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to set vpon him whilst hee banquetted, yet deferred he to do the same, not for that he faile'd or fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some fit opportunity to hit him home & speed him to the death. He liued captaine of Caius guard a long time, yet tooke he small pleasure in conuersing with him.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his tributes, and that money which was confiscate, hee seem'd to haue lesse occasion then before: for at that time hee had doubled their payments, in the execution whereof he followed his owne nature rather then Cæsars command, and spared those of whom he ought to haue compasion for their pouertie sake. Caius was sore displeased heerewith, and obiected against him, that the cause why he delaied the bringing in of his money, was his cowardise and negligence: And among other outrages that hee offered him, as oft as he gaue him the vvarch-word, as hee vsually vvent to fetch it once a day vpon his vvarch day, hee gaue him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominie, notwithstanding that hee himselfe was not exempt from note of no lesse dauntinesse. For in certaine ceremonies which he himselfe had established, he attired himselfe like a woman, and was disguis'd with certaine vailles, whereby hee might the better counterfait that sexe, and yet notwithstanding durst he obiect this dishonour to Chæreas. As oftentimes as Chæreas receiued the watch-word, so oftentimes grew he in choler: which was increased the more at such time, as hee deliuer'd the same to his companions, vvhoo openly mocked and iested at him. For vvhén it was his turne to receiue the word from Cæsars mouth, hee ordinarily fitted him with such a one as might moue laughter, which

42. Popedius is accused of a crime by Timidius vnto Cæsar.

A which made him the bolder to conspire with his confederates, in that hee had iust occasion to be displeased: amongst these was a Senator, and one that had past all honours and offices, otherwise an Epicure and louer of delights. Him did Timidius accuse (in that he was his enemy) that he had vs'd certaine iniurious speeches against Caius: and for prooff thereof he alleadged Quintilia for his witnesse, a woman amongst all stageplaiers dearly beloued by many, but in especiall by Popedius, by reason of her incomparable beautie: and for that she refused to beare witnesse in a matter falsely obiected against him, whom she intirely loued, Timidius required that he might be examined by torture. Caius prouoked heerewith, commaunded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to see Quintilia tortured, and the rather gaue he Chæreas these commissions, to kill & torment those whom he pleased, for that he had conceiued this opinion, that he would acquit himselfe with more crueltie, to the intent he might exempt himselfe of that reproche of faint-heartednesse, vvhich was wrongfully inforced against him.

B Whilst thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, shee trod vpon the foote of one of those, who were of the confederacie, giuing him to vnderstand that he should be of good courage, for that there was no feare that she would bewray any thing in torture, but wold endure it with great constancie: notwithstanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by constraint then of his own free will. And seeing he could enforce nothing out of her, hee brought her back to Caius, in so pitifull an estate, that all they that beheld her had compasion of her. Caius likewise himselfe was moued, and bethinking him of those paines which she had indured, he desisted from the enquest and accusation which was prosecuted against Popedius and Quintilia, and gaue her a certaine summe of money, to comfort her against the indisposition that might happen by reason of her torments, which she had so courageously endured.

C This displeased Chæreas very much, as if hee had beene the cause of all those euils that had happened to those two persons, hauing been so great, that to heale them it behoou'd Cæsar to minister a medicine. Hee consulted therefore with Clement, who was capitaine of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the guard, and spake vnto them to this effect: We haue (said he) O Clement, imploied our selues to the vttermost for the Emperors safety: for by our prouidence and trauell we haue wrought so much, that of all those, who haue conspired against him, some of them haue been slaine; the rest in such sort tormented & martyred, that Caius himselfe had compasion on them. But what reward or honour receiue we for all these seruices? Clement hearing these words, held his peace, giuing manifest testimonie by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly ashamed that he had so long time obeyed the Emperours commaundements: and whilst hee thought with himselfe that it was no policie for him to open his mouth against Caius crueltie, Chæreas emboldned himselfe to discouer the calamities and dangers, wherein both the citie and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him that the common report was, that Caius was the cause of them: but (said hee) those that will narrowly examine the truth, vwill iudge that I and Papinius that standeth by mee, and you Clement more then we, haue caus'd the Romans torment & the worlds miserie, for that of our own will we haue been ministers of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in vs to make an end of those violences that are committed against the citizens, and iniuries to the whole world: yet serue wee him for his guard and hangmen, instead of men of warre. And wee beare armes not to maintaine our libertie, and the Romaine Empire, but to preferue him, who keepeth their bodies and minds in seruitude: & euery day are we soiled in their blood, who are slaine and tortured, vntill such time as some one serue vs with the same sauce, to satise Caius crueltie. For it is not for the good will he beareth vs, that hee maketh vse of vs: but that which is more, wee are suspected by him, and he will cause vs to be slaine, as hee hath done others. For his displeasure is not limited by iustice, but by his will: vvee also shall serue him for a mark to aime at: For vvhich cause it behooueth vs to provide for the securitie and libertie of all men, and especially to vvarrant our selues against those dangers that threaten vs.

E Clement declared by apparant signes that he thought wel of Chæreas resolution, but he counsailed him to make no vwords of it, for feare the rumour thereof should bee spreadde among the people, and the secret should be discouered before the execution: and least that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they should all of them be drawne into danger of death; and in the meane while, it behooued them to hope that some good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himselfe, his age had taken from him the necessarie courage that belonged to such enterprises. It may be (said he) that I may furnish you with some aduice more secure then yours is, Chæreas: for a more honeste then it is, who is he that can propose? This said, Clement returned to his house, house, ruminating with himselfe vpon those words, which hee had both heard and spoken. But Chareas waxed fearefull, and conferred with the Colonell Cornelius Sabinus, who he knew to be a man of reputation, a louer of libertie, and greatly discontented with the estate about the miseries of the common-weale; and seeing it was necessarie to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him, fearing least Clement should discover all the conspiracie, considering that delay and procrastination, would be but an occasion to hinder the action. When as therefore he perceived him to giue willing care to all that which he intended, & that already hee was confirmed with no lesse resolution, then himselfe was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the same, hee said nothing: whereas otherwise he was ready, not onely to conceale that which he had heard, but also declared that which he had in his hart, he was so much the more encouraged. For which cause, without any further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable vnto them in vertue, good affection, and great courage; and who besides that, was suspected by Caius by reason of Lepidus death. For Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, and had been associates in the same dangers. For Caius was feared by all those, who had any publique office, sparing none of them in particular or in generall, but made them all grone vnder the burthen of his furie.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were displeased to see the common-weale in that estate: but the apprehension of the danger, suffered them not to manifest the hatred that each one of them bare to Caius, although that their secret conceit engendred amongst them a certaine amitie. For before that time, as oftentimes as they met together, they were accustomed to esteeme Minucianus, for the most honourable man of the companie; as in truth among all the citizens of Rome, he was the most famous, valiant and best esteemed among them: being therefore assembled at that time, he was first of all requested to speake his opinion. For which cause hee asked Chareas, what the watch-word was he had receiued that day (for all the citie knew very well what mockerie Caius vsually vsed in giuing Chareas the watch-word) Chareas notwithstanding this disgrace, failed not to answer him, relying on the wisdom of Minucianus, & said vnto him.

“But giue you me for the watch-word, Libertie; meane while I giue you thanks for that you haue awakened me more speedily then of my selfe I haue accustomed to be. You neede not now any further inforce your selfe to incite me by your words, sith both you & I haue vnderaken the same resolution. Before wee were assembled in this place, our thoughts were vnitied. Behold here my sword, that is girt vnto my side; this shall suffice for vs both. And if you please, you shall be my captaine, and I will march vnder your command, & will follow you vnder assurance of your assistance, and wisdom. They, who haue valiant hearts, neuer want armes: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon walke. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the consideration of my particular interest: For I haue not the leysure to think on those dangers that threaten mee, thorow the griefe that I conceive, to see the libertie of my countrey changed into seruitude, and the force of the lawes wholly abolished, and all sorts of men assigned to death by the cruelty of Caius. It is I that deserue to be trusted in this execution, and I make you my iudge, sith you haue the like intention, as I haue.”

Minucianus perceiuing with what affection Chareas spake, embraced him with all loue, and after he had praised him, hee exhorted him to continue his constancie: then departed they the one from the other, with prayers and wishes; and at that time there hapned a prelagē that confirmed the more. For as Chareas entred into the Senate, some one among the people cast out a word, that redoubled his courage: Dispatch (said hee) that which thou hast to doe: for God wil assist thee. Chareas was somewhat affraid, least some one of his associates had betrayed him. But at last, he thought that it was some one of those, who being priuie to his resolution, gaue him a watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who gouerning and obseruing humane affaires, pushed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to diuers; sundry Senators, knights, & men of war, being aduertised hercof, were in arms. For there was not any one that supposed not that Caius death was the greatest good hap the common-weale could expect. For which cause all of them enforced themselves, as much as was to them possible, to assist that execution with courageous & vertuous resolution; & as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect; desiring each of the to be partakers in the dispatch of a tyrāt. For Calisthus also, who was Caius free-man, & raised him to great authority; yea such as he almost equalled him, adioyned himselfe vnto them for the fear he apprehended of all men, & for those great riches, which he had gathered together, for that he was a man of a corupt conscience, & easily won by bribes & presents, doing wrong vnto all men, & abusing the power that he had against whosoever he pleased, contrary

A contrarie to all right and reason. Besides, for that he knew the vnbridled nature of Caius, who hauing once conceiued an ill opinion of any man, could neuer afterwards be dissuaded or reconciled. Amongst diuers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatnes of the danger of his riches was not the least, which was the cause that made him serue Claudius, and secretly to follow him vnder hope, that after Caius death, he should be his successor in the Empire, and that at that time he should by him be maintained in the same estate, which hee enioyed: and by this meanes thought he to obaine his amity and good liking, by giuing him to vnderstand how Caius had commanded him to poison him, and how hee had inuented infinite delaies to defer this execution. As for mine owne part, I thinke that Calisthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been dissuaded by Calisthus allegations, who had incontinently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Masters command, with all expedition in a matter so acceptable to him. So it is, that the prouidence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage against Claudius, and Calisthus was thereby thanked for a benefite which he no waies deserued.

Those that were about Chareas day by day, followed the action very slowly, notwithstanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occasions fit to finish his purpose in, for that hee might assaile him at such time as he ascended vp into the Capitol, or euen then when he solemnized those ceremonies, which he had instituted in honour of his daughter, or at such time as he stood in the palace to scatter gold, and siluer money among the people, by casting him from the toppe of the palace into the market place, or at such time as he celebrated those mysteries, that were introduced by him. For no man suspected Chareas, so discreetly had he behaued himselfe in all things; and he perswaded himselfe that no man would haue thought, that he should lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet so it is, that the power of the gods was sufficient to giue him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chareas was sore displeased against his companions, in respect that hee feared that they would let slip their occasions; and although they perfectly knew that hee trauiled for the maintenance of the lawes, and for the good of them all: yet did they request him to delay a little, for feare least in the execution he should in some sort miscarry, and for that cause the citie might be brought in trouble, by the informations that would be made of that act; and that finally when Caius should bee so much the better defended against them, they should not know how to shew their vertue, when the time required that they should assault and set vpon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunitie to set forward this busines, should bee the time in which the games of the palace were celebrated, which were solemnized in honour of Caesar, who first of all disannulled the peoples authority, and appropriated it to himselfe. This solemnitie is celebrated in a Tent before the palace, where the noble Citizens with their wiues and children remained to behold the sport, and Caesar himselfe likewise. At that time concluded they that it would bee an easie matter for them, when as so many thousands of people should be shut vp in so narrow a place; so that he, who would step foremost to giue the stroke, might very easily be succoured, for that hee could haue no force in armes, although his guard should haue the courage and desire to defend him. Chareas resolved vpon this, & it was concluded that the first day of those sports that were next at hand, the deed should bee done: but their aduenture was greater then their conclusion. For the delay was such, as the third day was almost past, and hardly could they be drawne to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chareas assembled all the confederates, and told them that the opportunitie of time that ouerslipped them, accused and reproached them of slacknes in that execution, which had been so vertuously resolved amongst them: and that it was to be feared, least if any should be discovered, the whole matter should waxe frustrate: by which meanes Caius might grow more cruell then hee was before. See we not (said he) that by how much libertie we take from our selues, by so much we augment Caius tyranny: whereas we ought first of all to obaine security for our selues, and afterwards purchase perpetuall felicity to others, the greatest glory whereof shall redound vnto our selues. Now they hauing nothing to reply for to honourable a resolution, and yet notwithstanding no waies enforcing themselves towards the action, but remaining altogether dismayed without one word speaking, Chareas spake thus:

Most noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cause that we linger and delay in this sort? see you not that this day is the last day of the games, and that Caius is ready to depart to sea? For he hath determined to saile into Alexandria, and to see Egypt: verely it will be a small honour for vs, if we suffer him to escape our hands, to the end that both by land and sea, he may triumph.

ouer the Romans vaine boast and negligence. How can we chuse but condemne our selues iustly, and challenge nothing but dishonour, if some Egyptian supposing that men of free condition could not any longer endure his insolence, should put the matter in execution? For mine owne part, I will dreame no longer vpon your consultations, but this very day will I hazard my selfe, and betide me what can, I will sustaine all fortunes with pleasure and courage. For I am a man of that minde, that no danger can be so great or grievous to daunt mee, as that Caius should bee slaine, during my life time, and I should be deprived of so deserued an honour, which so worthy an attempt may challenge. This said, he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the rest to doe the like; so that all of them were desirous to set hand to the enterprise, without any further delay. The custome was, that the captaines of the guard entred the palace with their swords by their sides, and in such equipage they asked the Emperour the watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chaereas turne to set the word; when as a great number of people flocked to the palace, to take vp their places to behold the games with great praise and noyse; wherein Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no distinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one sat together confusedly, men and women, slaves & free-men. Caius, arriuing there first, had offered sacrifice in honour of Cesar Augustus, in dignifying whom likewise those sports were solemnized. It came to passe that whilst those beasts were embowelled, that were appointed for sacrifice, Asprenas gowne, who at that time was Senator, was besprinkled with blood: wherat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithstanding, this was a preface for Asprenas. For he was slaine that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaued himselfe most affably towards all men, so that all the assistants were astonished to behold the courtesie that he vsed. After the sacrifice was done, hee farch him down to behold the pastimes, and had about him the most noble of his friends & familiars. Now was there euery yeere a Theater builded, according to this forme and fashion that ensueh: it had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening vpon the porch, by which the actors had their egress and regresse, without disturbance of those who sat to behold the pastime. There was within the same a certaine seuerall roome, separated from the rest, where the plaiers & musicians kept. When the people were seated, & Chaereas with the captaines were neer about Cesar, who sat on the right side of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Armes, asked Cluuitus priuily in his eare, who sat by him & had in like sort been Consul, whether he had heard any news? who answering him, that he had heard nothing, on this day (said K Batibius) shall the tragedy be plaied of a tyrants death. Cluuitus made him this reply in Homers words:

Whist, least some Greeke should listen to our talke.

Now whilst some one darted certaine apples and rare and precious birds at the people, Caius tooke great pleasure to behold how they stroue one with another round about him, buffeting one another to see who should get the same: but at that present there chanced two prefaces: for the sport that was represented was of a Iudge, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the daunce they represented Cynera, who was slaine with Myrrha hir daughter: and there was a great quantitie of blood gathered to counterfait both the murder of the Iudge that was crucified, as also of Cynera. It is affirmed likewise, that the day was the very same, whereon Philip the sonne of Amyntas king of Macedon, had bene slaine by Pausanias one of his familiars, at such time as he entred a Theater. Whilst Caius was incertaine with himselfe whether he should remaine vntill the sports were finished; for that it was the last day of them, or rather should resort to the bath; and after he had taken his refection returne back againe thither, as he had done before time; Minucianus sitting next vnto him, fearing least the occasion should be ouerslipped, arose for that he had seene Chaereas depart out of doores, with an intent to goe and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the gown, saying, Whither go you my friend? At which time for the reuerence sake that he bare vnto Cesar, he sat him downe againe: but the feare that he had grew so forcible, that he arose againe; so that Caius could not detaine him, supposing that he departed thence to dispatch some important busines. At that time did Asprenas counsaile Cesar to repaire to the bath telling him that after his refection he might returne thither againe; all which hee did, being desirous that the resolution might take effect. They that were with Chaereas were alreadie disposed to take aduantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to stand prepared and in a readines; in a place appointed, to the intent to ast the tragedy: and the delay was very grievous vnto them, for that it was already three a clocke after noone. So that Chaereas seeing that Caius lingered so long, intended to go in vnto him and assaile him in his seat: but he conceiued that he could not bring that to passe without great losse and murder of Senators, and Knights that were there present.

A Now although he had this apprehension; yet addressed he himselfe to the execution thereof, supposing that the losse that might happen by the death of some one, would bee well recompensed by the security and liberty, that would redound vnto all men. When as therefore they were in a readines to enter the Theater; newes was brought them that Caius was risen to come forth, by meanes whereof there arose some noyse. For which cause the confederates returned backe into the Theater, & appeased the people, telling them that they displeased & annoyed the Emperour: but the effect was, to draw him aside from all those, who might yeeld him any assistance; and so to set vpon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his vnckle, and M. Minucianus his sisters husband and Valerius, who at that time was Proconsul, who might not any waies be drawn from their place, although they had the will, by reason of the place and dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entred into the palace, he left the ready way where his officers were, and Claudius with his associates held: he turned aside by an vnfrequented way to the bathes, vpon purpose to see certaine yong boies, who were come out of Asia, & were sent him out of that countrey, partly to sing in the ceremonies that were instituted by him, and partly to daunce in armes about the Theater; and in that place Chaereas came and encountered him, asking him the watch-word: which Caius gaue him verie reproachfully according to his custome. For which cause without any further delay, Chaereas assailing him both in word and act, drew his sword and gaue him a great wound, which notwithstanding was not mortal: some say that Chaereas purposely wounded him after that sort, because he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increase the number of his wounds: but

C I cannot beleue the fime, for that in such executions a man hath no leasure to determine how to strike. And if Chaereas had such an intention, I account him the veriest foole that might bee, for that he rather tooke his pleasure to content his despight, then readily to deliuer both himselfe and others, who by his delay in being of his confederacie might be drawne into hazard. For if Caius had not beene sodainly slaine, hee could not haue wanted meanes of rescous, and it should seeme that Chaereas had not pretended to do so much mischief to Caius, as to himselfe & his fellow confederates. And being in this incertaintie, whether his enterprise should haue fallen out happily or no, he had without reason both vndone himselfe & lost the occasion: whereas hauing happily hit home, he might without a word speaking, warrantize himselfe against those, who would offend him. But let each man thinke what best pleaseth him. Caius feeling the griefe of the

D wound (for he was strooken betwixt the shoulder and the necke, and his sword could not pierce further, by reason that it hit vpon the first bone of the breast) he cried not in any sort, neither called for any of his friends, whether it were that he distrusted them all, or that he had some other thought, and in lamenting himselfe he past onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus, who was already prepared to encounter him, who thrust him downe vpon his knees: whereupon all of them enuironed him round about, and with mutuall exhortations encouraged one another to doe their vttermost in murdering him. At length in all mens opinion they agreed on this, that it was Aquila that gaue him the deadly wound, that seuered his soule from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chaereas. For although diuers set to their hands in the action; yet was he the first, who had bethought him of the action, hauing long time before any of them premeditated the same, after what sort it should be attempted: and he also was the first that durst boldly impart it vnto others, and who after they had allowed of his resolution assembled them: and when as euery one was to speake his opinion, he concluded the same very discreetly, and had alwaies done farre more then the rest; so that by his earnest and honourable perswasions, he encouraged those that were faint-hearted, since at such time as the opportunitie presented it selfe to set hand to the execution, he was the first that attempted it, and who valiantly strooke and made an easie way to the rest, who found Caius calme inough, in that hee was a man almost thorowly slaine. For which cause, it is necessarie, that all that which others haue done should be ascribed to Chaereas aduice, vertue and diligence.

Thus died Caius, being slaughtered with many mortall wounds: now when Chaereas and his companions had dispatched him, they perceiued well that it would bee impossible for them to saue themselves, if so bee they should returne by the way that they came; so much were they ruined with that which they had done. For they drew themselves into no small danger, by murdering an Emperour, who was cherished and beloued thorow the folly of the common people, and whose death the men of warre would not leaue unpunished. Now in that the waies were narrow where the murder was done, and they themselves also were hindered by reason of the great number of people, and officers and souldiers that gaue their attendance that day in guarding ding the Emperor, they tooke another way & retired themselves into Germanicus lodging, who was Caius father, whom they had lately slaughtered. This house adioyned vpon the palace. For although the palace was but one, yet consisted it of diuers lodgings which were builded by seuerall Emperours; whose names, whether they had begunne or finished the workes, were imposed on the same buildings. When as therefore they were elcaped from the preale, they were in safetie as long as the inconuenient that had befallen the Emperor was as yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germans who were of his guard, being a company chosen out of that nation named the Celtique band, for the preservation of the Emperours person. These men are very prone vnto wrath, and amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution: otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the warres alwaies giue the first onser, yielding great aduantage to those on whose side they fight. H They hauing notice of Caius murder, were vehemently aggrieved therat, for that it is their manner to censure all things, not according to right, but as they are answerable to their own profits: Caius in especiall was deerey beloued by them, in that he had obtained their fauour by bestowing much money vpon them. Their captaine was one called Sabinus, who was not aduanced to that estate, either for his vertue or the nobilitie of his ancestors (for he was but a fencer) but for his mightie strength and huge body. They therefore ran about with their naked swords, searching for Casars murderers from house to house, and meeting with Asprenas at first, whose gowne (as we haue said) was beblouded with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifice, which was a preface that boaded him but little good fortune, they heawed him in pieces. The second was Norbanus (who for his nobility and auncestors might deriue his titles from the noblest Citizens, I amongst whom were diuers generals of armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his dignity, and being of himselfe endowed with great force and strength, he tooke a sword from one of them which first assailed him; with whom he graped, and made them know that he intended that they should buy his blood very deerey: and in deed so had he done, but that beeing inuironed by diuers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten downe. & slaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two other had done; but to shew the hatred that hee bare vnto Caius, and the pleasure that hee tooke to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with enuy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anteius father, whose name likewise was Anteius, and not content therewith hee had sent his soldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the slaughtered carcase of this tyrant: but hearing the vprore that was raised in euery part of the house, he thought good to hide himselfe; yet might he not auoid the narrow search of the Germans, who were so displeased, that they slew all those whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltlesse of the fact. Thus were these three made away.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, euery one was amazed, and could scarcely beleue it. For although diuers of them were very glad, that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselves that it would highly profit them; yet did their feare hinder their beliefe. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befall Casars, and conceiuing in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there was no man so hardy, as to enterprise the same; they supposed the report to be vnterue. Of this minde were certaine women and children, slaues and souldiers. These, by reason they receiued vvasages at his hand, and tyrannized vwith him beeing his ministers in all those outrages that he offered to many good Citizens, in partaking the boocie and other aduantages that Caius drew vnto him. As for the women and children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kinde of people take delight in plaies, iests, donations of flesh, and other such pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to haue means to satisfie his rage and cruelty. He was also gracious among the seruants & slaues, for that by him they had the liberty to accuse and contemne their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For vwhen they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily beleued: and vwhen they M discovered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discouerie they were not onely made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reuward that was assigned them, was the eighth part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certain of the nobilitie, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before time they were priue to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding, they desired that the enterprise should be effected: yet kept they all things close, and gaue no signe of ioy, nor made any shew that they heard that

A that which was reported. For some of them feared least if they should be frustrated of their hope, they should bring themselves in danger of punishment, for that they had discovered their intent sooner then they should haue done. They likewise, who knew the enterprise and were confederates with the actors; yet did they more closely conceale it the one from the other, fearing least if they should discover the matter to any one of those, who drew any commoditie from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius should bee yet aliue, they might incur the danger of punishment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certaine places; yet that he was not slaine; but as yet aliue, and among his Physicians hands, who dressed his vounds. No man therefore durst liberally discover the secrets of his heart to his neighbour: for they that spread those reports were either friends (and for that cause were suspected as fauourers of his tyranny) or enemies, and by that meanes in that they were but sinisterly affected towards Caius, there was no certaintie to be gathered of that which they said. There arose also another report, which abashed and beat downe the hearts and hopes of the nobilitie, namely that Caius setting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little also by the wounds hee had receiued, was come into the market place all bloody as hee vvas, and after that manner declaimed before the people. See here how they that spread these rumors, preferred their coñectures, which were void of all reason, which distracted those vnertainly that heard the same, according as they were affected. This notwithstanding no man remooued from his place, for feare least they should be sodainly accused, knowing well that they should be censured, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the disposition of their iudges and accusers.

C But after that the troupe of Germans had inuironed the Theater with their naked swords, all the assistants expected nothing but death; and as soone as any man entred, they were seized with such an amazement, as if they had already felt the strokes; so that they knew not what to doe, hauing no heart to depart from thence: and otherwise perswading themselves, that if they staid there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the souldiers were entred into the Theater by force, the whole assembly cried out, and besought them, protesting that whatsoeuer was done it was beside their knowledge, whether it were either attempted by conspiracie, or any other meanes. They therefore most humbly intreated them, that they would spare them, and not insist the penalty of the guiltie on those that were innocent: for their own parts, they besought them to search out those, who had committed the act, if any such thing were committed. And thus spake they with teares, beating their breasts, and calling the gods to witnesse, alleading all that which the present danger suggested them with, and as much as such as pleaded for their liues could profer. By these perswasions of theirs the souldiers furie was abated; so that they began to repent themselves of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this also was a cruelty, as they themselves, notwithstanding their barbarous inciuilitie, supposed it to be; which was, that the heads of Asprenas and other that were slaine, were carried and set vpon an Altar. Vwhereat all the assistants were most grievously discontented, remembring themselves of the dignity of the men, and hauing compasion of that which had befallen them; considering also that they themselves were not farre off from dangers, being vnertaine whether they should saue themselves: whereby it came to passe, that some of those, who had for good cause hated Caius, durst not freely reioice at his death, because they were vpon the point to lose their owne liues, hauing as yet no appearance of any safety.

At length Aruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common criers, who had a strong voice, and by crying such goods as were to be solde, had gathered to great substance, as that he was accounted one of the richest men in Rome, and in great estimation amongst all men in that behalfe, entred the Theater in a mourning habit, and after a lamentable manner: and although hee inwardly hated Caius; yet for the feare hee conceiued least hee should lose his goods, and in consideration of the present danger, hee dissembled his ioy, wearing all those garments of mourning, and vsing no lesse lamentation then if hee had beemoaned the death of his deere friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publishing Caius death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: after this, he began to repress the rage of the Germans, and commanded their captaines and cribunes to put vp their swords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifestly saue the liues of all those, who were assembled in the Theater; and all them likewise, whom they could haue met with. For if they had had but the least surmise, that Caius had as yet been aliue, there was not any sort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him so great loue and affection, that to warrantize him from that mishap, they would haue redeemed him with the losse of their own liues. But as soone as they vnderstood that he was dead, they repressed their furious rage, which egged them forward to reuenge: knowing that it auailed them nothing to discover their affections towards him, in that he could yeeld them no requital. Besides, the feare they had least that in pursuit of their tyrannous murders, the Senate should bee incensed against them, if so be the gouernment of the estate should bee returned into their hands, made them containe themselves. Thus was the fury of these Germans appeased for the death of Caius.

Meane while Chareas (who feared very much lest Minucianus should fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be slaughtered by them) fought for him among the souldiers, enquiring of euery one whether they knew if hee were slaine or no. Whereupon Minucianus and Clement were brought vnto him, who in his presence commended Chareas exploit, and gaue him thanks in the name of the whole Senate, who witnessed that it was to the generall benefit and good of the common weale, and that the greatest persons were beholding to him, for that hee had neither wanted good aduice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his resolution; alledging that the nature of tyranny was such, that being puffed vp with a short pleasure of vniust and intolerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in miserie, as it manifestly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who before any thing was either deuised, practiced or executed against him, was already hateful to all men, and had in such a sort violated all lawes, that his greatest friends were resolved to take armes against him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himselfe, who was the author of his owne ruine.

Hereupon all they arose who were in the Theater, and raised great noise and trouble in seeking to saue themselves. The occasion was, that a certaine Physician called Arcion, being called out to goe and dresse certaine men that were wounded, making a shew as if hee went to goe and prepare such things, as were necessarie for those that were wounded, made those issue out with him who sate nearest vnto him: but the truth was, that he did it to the end to draw them out of the present danger. Meane while the Senate assembled themselves in the palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after those, who had murdered Caius: the people with an intire and simple intent, the Senat onely to vse some forward proceeding. For Valerius Asiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Consul, came forth among the people, who were in an vprore; and supposing it a strange matter that no man knew who had slaine the Emperour, whilest euery one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O said he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Consuls published an edict, containing the accusations that were presented against Caius, commanding the people and souldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themselves to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they should be eased of those taxations, wherewith before time they had been burthened: and the men of war were promised honours and dignities, if they would containe themselves in their accustomed order, and stirre vp no further trouble. For it was to be feared, least if they had been further fleshed in slaughters, the Citie should haue fallen into some great danger thorow rapines and the spoiles both of houses and temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate was assembled, especially those who were confederates in Caius murder; who seemed to gather courage, and to speake boldly as if the gouernment of the estate had been fallen into their hands.

CHAP. II.

Claudius tooke vpon him the gouernment of the Empire.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. The souldiers elect Claudius Emperour.

Whilest the estate of the Empire was thus distracted, Claudius was sodainly fetcht out of his house: For the souldiers assembling themselves together, and conferring among themselves what was requisite to be done, perceived that it was impossible, that so many and so waighie affaires of the common weale should be wel disposed by a popular gouernment; and that this change also would yeeld them little profit, if some of those who were in authoritie should happen to obtaine the soueraigne gouernment. Furthermore, that it would be euery way preiudiciall vnto them, if they had not a part of the gouernance, & a hand in the administration of the common weale. Whilest therefore the soueraigne authoritie remained as yet vndisposed, they thought meete to elect Claudius, who was Caius vncke, for their Emperour; who was a man of that reputation, that none of those, who had bene assembled in the Senate, was more capable then he was, both in regard of the vertue of his ancestors, as also in respect of the doctrine wherwith he was endowed. Who likewise being by them exalted to the dignity of the Empire, would honour them, and with all answerable bountie acknowledge their good deserts. This conclusion of theirs was both admitted, and presently executed: so that Claudius was receiued and elected Emperour by the men of warre. But Cnæus Sentius Saturninus hauing intelligence that Claudius was in this sort elected (who in appearance seemed veruiously to contradict, but in effect desired nothing more) presented himselfe before the Senate: and being neither amazed nor amazed in any sort, he freely spake his mind; and as it became his birth & nobilitie, he spake vnto the assembly after the manner that ensueth.

You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the liberty which hath so long time been vnexpected, should returne and visit vs; yet so it is, that wee see the excellencie thereof; although it be vncertaine how long time the Gods will bestow it on vs: which is such, that it may reioyce vs for the present; what issue soeuer it may haue hereafter. For to them that knowe what vertue is, it is no small felicitie to liue one houre in freedom of mind, and in a free countrey gouerned by such lawes, which in times past haue made our comon-weale to flourish. For mine owne part, I cannot remember our ancient libertie, for that I was borne after the subuersion thereof: But I infinitely desire to haue the happy fruition of that which wee enioy at this present. And I thinke them also very happy, who are borne and brought vp in vertuous studies. I likewise suppose that a second honor next to the immortall Gods is to be ascribed to them, by whole vertue at last though very late euen in this our age, we haue obtained the felicity to enioy the same: which happines would God with our inheritances we might bequeath to our posteritie. For in regard of our selues, this day sufficeth vs both, as well all those that are young as they also who are old. For the aged shal forsake this life with more pleasure, in that they haue had the knowledge of that blessing which is annexed to their libertie: and the younger shal bee furnished with a royall example in admiring & knowing their vertues, by whom we enioy this benefit of freedom. For in regard of the present time, there is not any thing that wee ought more earnestly to affect, then to liue veruiously. For onely vertue is the thing that confirmeth men in their libertie. I cannot speake of the time past, but onely by hearefay: but for that I haue sene with mine eyes, and perceived by my obseruation, I know how great mischiefes tyrannies doe ordinarily breed in a politike estate: for they vtterly extinguisht all vertue, and depriue freemen of all that perfect magnanimitie that may be in them; and teach both to flatter and to feare, for that the common-weale is abandoned not to the wisdom of the lawes, but to the furie of intemperate gouernors. For since Julius Cæsar bent his thoughts to ouerthrow the popular gouernment in Rome, & violated that happy course of law, whereby our state was policied; the comon-weale hath been ouerthrowne. For in subiecting the law to his good liking, and himselfe to his particular desires, there is not any kind of misery and mischiefe, that hath not ouerthrowne our citie; so that his successours haue imploied themselves to their vttermost, & with a certaine emulation, to abolish the lawes of our countrey, struing which of them might depouile our common-weale of her noblest citizens: for that they haue made their account, that their securitie consisted in communicating their secrets with such as were base and abiect; abasing not onely the haucie courages of those men, who were famous for their nobilitie and vertue, but also by slaughtering a great number of them by all sorts of punishment: and whilst each of them laboured to be absolute in their commaund, they informed themselves to oppresse the common-weale.

But amongst all the rest, Caius, who this day hath lost the benefit of life, hath wrought greater mischiefes himselfe alone, then any other, by enforcing his brutish and beastly wrath not onely against the common citizens, but also against his owne parents and friends; demeaning himselfe alike towards all men, and manifesting his vniustice in that hee pursued them with most iniurie, vwho were most innocent: and by this means grew hatefull not onely to men, but also to the immortall Gods. For it is not enough for tyrants to satisfie their concupiscence, to vse all sorts of outrages, to raiue both mens vvealth and their vviues; but also their guine and glory is, vwhen they may vtterly ruinate both their fortunes and families; who are their enemies. For all libertie is opposed against tyrannie, & it is impossible (notwithstanding all the miseries that may be imagined or offered) that free men should accord with tyrants, how little time soeuer it bee that they haue exercised their tyrannie. They also know too well with how many mischiefes they haue entangled their subiects (although they haue not the spirits to reuenge themselves of those wrongs that are done vnto them) and being well assured into what incombrances they haue drawne them, perswade themselves, that they haue but one onely means left them to warrantize themselves from suspensions; and to procure their owne securitie, which is, to put them to death; if they may possibly doe it. Sith therefore at this present you are deliuered from so many mischiefes, and are no more subiect, except to one another (which is a pledge of concord for the present, and of securitie in time to come, and glory vnto him that hath redressed the estate) you shall deale very well and wisely in my opinion to provide for the common-weale, foreseeing very diligently all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speake his opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no superiour to countermaund their sayings, or that is exempt from reproofe if he offend against the common-weale, or that may threaten with the authoritie of an Emperour for that shall be said. For what else in these later times hath increased and furthered our ouer-topping tyranny, then their fleshfull feare, who durst in no sort oppose themselves against his lust? For being entangled by a certaine kind of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to liue after the manner of slaues, and being afraid also to die virtuously, & desirous to liue with shame, we are fallen into these scarce sufferable calamities, and into such mischiefes as haue concerned vs too neerly. First of all therefore, you ought to honor those, who haue slaine the tyrant, by dignifying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and especiallie Chæreas. For he onely hath been the man, who by the power of the gods, and thorowe his great wisdom & valour, hath giuen you your liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heape honours on his head, yea especiall fauours, as to the man who first of all consulted, and first of all hazarded himselfe against a tyrant for your libertie. It is an honest and well-beseeming action in men of free hearts, to restore and repay condigne kindnesse for the benefits that they haue recei-ued: such is this man in your behalfe, not like to Brutus and Cassius, who murdered Cæsar; for they were the originals of seditions and ciuill warres in this Cittie: and this man by the death of a tyrant, hath not onely at once deliuered you of him, but also hath cutte off all those mischiefs that arose by him.

Thus spake Sentius, and his aduice was entertained with great applause, not onely by the Senators, but the knights also that were there present. Whereupon a certaine Senator called Tre-bellius Maximus arose, and stepping to him, pulled off the ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inclosed a stone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: so intend was he about that which he both said and did: and by this meanes the engraueed Image was broken. Now for that it was late, Chæreas demanded the watch-word at the Consuls hands, who gaue him the word Libertie. Thus all of them were astonished at this change, and could scarcely believe that which had hapned. For since that time that the popular gouernment had bene abolished, the Consuls had neuer giuen the watch-word vntill that present time. For before the citie was oppressed by tyrannie, the Consuls commaunded the men of warre. After that Chæreas had received the word, he gaue it to his souldiers, who subscribed to the Senates authoritie: of these there were about foure companies, which preferred the lawfull gouernment before a tyrannie, who also retired themselves to their chieftaines. As for their parts, the people returned to their seuerall houses, full of ioy, hope and courage, for that they had regained the gouernment of the state, which belonged vnto them, and not to any particular gouernour. In a word, Chæreas was their onely hope: He foreseeing that there would some mischiefe follow, if Caius wife & daughter should remaine aliue; and that if all his friends and family should not be vtterly extinguished, all those who should be spared, would serue to no other end, but to the ruine of the common-weale and the lawes: and on the other side, desiring to see a finall end of that which he had begunne, & to satisfie that hatred he had conceiued against Caius, he sent Iulius Lupus one of the captaines of the guard, to kill both his wife & daughter, which he did. And the cause why he gaue this charge chiefely to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clements kinsman, who was a confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end that partaking after this manner the death of the tyrant, hee might be knowne to haue dealt as forwardly for the common-weale, as if from the beginning he had been a counsellor and agent in the conspiracie. Notwithstanding, there were some of his companions of that opinion, that it should be but cruelty to deale with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended thorow the corruption of his owne nature, and not by the counsaile of his wife; & that all those euils which he committed in the common-weale, by desolating the flower thereof, was his owne offence, not hers.

There were others that accused her to bee the cause of all that which Caius had committed, al-leading that she had giuen him an amorous drink, by which he was tied & entangled in such sort vnto her, & so led and transported by her loue, that shee gouerned all that which concerned the estate of Rome, and the world subiect to Rome; but her defenders preuailed nothing. For finally it was resolved, that she should lose her life.

for that hee counsailes.

A To finish this tragedy, Lupus was dispatcht, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their intent who had sent him, for feare he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the common-weale. As soone as therefore he came into the palace, he found Cæsonia, Caius widow, lying fast by the body of her slaughtered husband, destitute of all that which the law gratifieth those that are dead with, altogether bloody and greatly afflicted, hauing her daughter fast couched by her. Being in this estate, she was heard to utter no other words, but that she blamed Caius, for that he had not giuen credit to that counsell which shee had giuen him so often: which words of hers, were by certaine of them interpreted two waies: For some of the thought that she meant, that she had counsailed her husband to giue ouer his crueltie, & murders which he exercised against his Citizens; & that in his gouernment he should vse a tempered mea-B sure with vertue, for feare least his subjects misliking of his manners, should seeke his destruction. Others tooke it as if she had encouraged Caius to set vpon the conspirators & kill the, without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that meanes provide for his secu-ritie. They therefore said, that Cæsonia blamed Caius for that hee had behaued himselfe too carelessly, in that wherein she had counsailed him. Such were the words Cæsonia spake, and such was the exposition, as diuers men interpreted the same.

Shee seeing Lupus comming, shewed him Caius body, and besought him with teares & complaints to come no neerer. But perceiuing that he continued in his resolution, & made no account of her words, but did that for which he came, after that she knew the cause of his arriual, shee offered her naked throat vnto him, with a great courage, vsing such supplications as they ordinarily C do when they despair of their liues. For she willed him to defer no longer, to finish that tragedy which his companions had begun, & died in this sort courageously by the hand of Lupus; and after her was her daughter slaine, which was very young. This did Lupus certifie Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after hee had liued foure yeeres, wanting foure months. Before such time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate & wicked man, and addicted to his pleasure, a fauourer of tale-bearers, exceedingly fearefull, and for that cause, when he gotte the vpper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He esteemed this the onely fruite of his power, when he abused the same against innocents; and gathered or heaped vp great spoiles and booties by wicked and vniust murders, rapines and oppressions; lifting himselfe above all humane autho-ritie, and affecting to be esteemed as a G O D, suffering himselfe to be transported by the peoples D praies. Furthermore, all that which the law condemned and punished, as a thing most detestable, that made he vse of to punish vertue with. He neuer remembered any friendship that had bene done him, how great soeuer it either was or had bene, at such time as hee was in his choler, and was apt to inflict punishments in his rage on iust and vpright men. All that which was answerable to vertue, was odious in his eyes: In all things that him lifted hee had so violent appetites, that it was impossible to contradict him; so that hee was not ashamed to vse the unlawfull companie of his owne sister: vtherby it came to passe, that the Cittizens of Rome beganne to hate him ex-treamly; for that the like matter had not bene seene nor heard of: of a long time men could not believe the same, yet notwithstanding they sufficiently expressed the hatred they bare against the fact he had committed. It cannot be said of him, that he builded any worke becoming his royall E magnificence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the present or future world, except some ports that he made neerer to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of such ships as came and went into Egypt for corne, which doubtles is a goodly and mightie work, & very profitable for such as traueiled by sea. True it is that it was not brought to perfection, but onely halfe finished, because the workmen trauailed leysurely. But the chiefe cause thereof was, that hee spent his studie in vn-profitable matters, and loued rather to consume his substance to feede his owne priuate lustes wherin he tooke great delight, then to erect and build any goodly or famous work, which might haue redounded to the profit of the common-weale. Otherwise hee was a man well spoken, and very expert in the Greek and vulgar Roman tongues, apprehending presently that which others said: and although they had spent long time in discouering their mindes; yet answered hee them F vpon the instant, and in affaires of consequence he had such a moouing perswasion and power, as no man could exceed him both in regard of his quick spirit and easie apprehension, as of the exercise and paine he had taken. For being Tiberius brothers sonne, whose successe also hee was, hee was enforced to bee studious, seeing that Tiberius, who was of the same yeeres, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therefore enforced himselfe to imitate the Emperour Tiberius, whose neere kinsman he was, & surpassed all those that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithstanding all these great aduantages, which his good instruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befell him, by the abuse of his authoritie. So rare a thing it is to see them, who have libertie to do what they list without punishment, to gouerne themselves with modestie. In the beginning hee tooke delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was giuen ouer to licentiousness, the affection that he bare them was changed; and in steed thereof he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were enforced to conspire against him, and seeke his ruine.

Hedio & Ruf-sinus, chap. 3.

Now, as I haue heeretofore declared, Claudius vnderstanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled, for this occasion was in such distrust, that he knew not what to doe to saue himselfe: but went and hid himselfe in a certaine corner, where he was surpris'd, hauing no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his nobilitie. For during the time that he liued a priuate man, he behaued himselfe modestly, kindly, and fauourably vnto all men, being well seene in the Sciences, and principally in the Greeke tongue, shunning as much as in him lay all tumult and traine that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the palace was replenished with souldier-like furie and feare, and nothing raigned more in generall then confusion and disorder; the souldiers of the guard, who were the most experienced and hardy amongst the men of warre, consulted amongst themselves what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that vpon iust occasion, he was done to death: for which cause they rather berthought themselves on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselves in those dangers, seeing the Germans were wholly bent against those, who had slaughtered Caius; rather incited thereunto of their owne cruell natures, then of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the common-weale. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in feare of his life, the rather for that hee saw Asprenas head, and the rest of the nobilitie that were massacred, carried about to be seene: for this cause he kept himselfe in a certaine place, which was onely accessible by certaine steps or staires, and hid himselfe therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the souldiers of the palace, called Gratus, being vnable to discern who hee was in regard of the obscuritie of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew neere vnto him, to the intent he might the better know him: And when as Claudius besought him that he would depart and leave him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him: "This is Germanicus, let vs take hold of him, and create him Emperour. Claudius perceiuing that he was ready to be attached, and fearing least they should put him to death in the like manner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting vnto them his innocence, and how he had in no sort been either accessarie or agent in that which had been done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to smile, tooke him by the hand, saying, that hee had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it behoueth thee to pull vp thy spirits, & to berinke thee how to gouerne an Empire, of which the gods (who haue the care of the whole world) haue deposed Caius, to reward thy vertue with. Arise therefore and take possession of the throne of thine auncestors. This said, hee lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walke on foote thorow the fence and ioy that he had conceived of that which had been told him.

Vpon these speeches diuers of the souldiers of the guard assembled about Gratus: and perceiuing that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermeddled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the iudgement of his matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were vnarmed, fled from them; yet could not Claudius goe onward in his way; so weak and feeble felt he himselfe in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiuing this flight, fled away for feare, and left him; so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw thus to be drawn by the souldiers. Now when Gratus & his associates were arrived in the court of the palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to thinke vpon that which was to be done: this hee also there flocked a great number of other souldiers vnto them, who tooke pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselves to place him in the imperiall dignitie, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his brother, whose memory was much honored among all those, who had at any time conuersed with him. Moreover, they ripped vp how many auaritious acts the Senat had committed, & how great errors the chiefeest Senators had defaulted in be-

A fore the publique gouernment was changed. Moreover, they considered vpon the danger and difficultie of their actions then in hand, for that the gouernment being admitted by one onely man, would be dangerous for them if he should obaine the same by any other means; whereas if Claudius should enioy the same by their permission and good will, hee would haue them in remembrance who had fauoured him, and would recompence the according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselves, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded vpon this aduice, and enuironed Claudius, and lifting him vp vpon their shoulders, they caried him into the army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended. There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and Citizens: For the Senat desirous to recouer their former dignitie, & enforcing themselves to auoid the seruitude that had befallen the by the out-rage of tyrants, intended the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwise, the people enuied them that dignitie: And knowing that their Emperors should be as it were certaine bridles, to restrain the auarice of the Senat, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Claudius was aduanced: making their account that if hee were created Emperour, they should auoid a ciuill warre, like vnto that which hapned in Pompeius time.

The Senat knowing that Claudius was caried into the army by the souldiers, chose out some of their order, and now sent them as messengers in their behalfe, to signifie vnto him that he ought to vse no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the charge of the common-weale to the Senat. That he both was and should be one of the Senatours, and haue the conduct of the common-weale, and dispose it according to law, persuading him to call vnto his remembrance those grieuous mischiefs, which the former tyrants had wrought in the common-weale, and what dangers hee himselfe also had suffered with them, during the raigne of Caius their late Emperour. That it should ill become him, who had detested the furie of others tyrannicall at such time as they vied outrages, now willingly to be drawne to oppose himselfe against his country. That if hee would obey them, and continue to expresse the vertue and constancie of his life, which in times past he led with commendation, he should obtaine those honors which free Citizens could afford him; and in suffering himselfe to be gouerned by lawes, to the end he might haue part in the commaundment, and to be commaunded in his turne, hee should obtaine the praise of vertue. That if hee would not be dissuaded by the slaughter of Caius, which was fresh in memorie, for their owne parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alledged, that they were furnished with men of war, with store of armour, and a great number of domesticall seruants, all which they would employ against him: But ouer and aboue these things, they had farre greater helps, namely their hope, good fortune, and the gods, who are vnto fight for those who maintaine vertue and goodnesse. They solemnly protested also for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honest and iust, then to fight for their libertie and country. The Embassadors that brought this message, were Veranius & Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselves on their knees before him, humbly besought him that hee would not draw the common-weale into ciuill vvar. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great company of men of war, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no force, they besought him that it would please him to demand the gouernment at the Senats hands, and receiue it from them if he were resolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with iustice & good hap, if hee should obtaine the same with their good wil, and not in despight of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

CHAP. III.

The Sedition that arose betwixt the Senate and the people.

Although Claudius knew with what presumption the Senat had sent this Embassage, yet did hee modestly entertaine the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his securitie to commit himselfe to their trust, & being encouraged by the exhortation of the souldiers, who promised him their utmost endeavour, & by the incitation of king Agrippa, he determined in no sort to let the souerainty escape out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when hee thought least on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties vnto Caius which were requisite for such a one as had bin by him aduanced to honour, & hauing taken his body & laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the souldiers of his guard, and certified them that Caius was yet aliue; and for that he found himselfe sick of those wounds which he had received, he sent to seeke for Physicians. But afterwards, G vnderstanding that Claudius was taken by the men of war, he thrust so much that he got himselfe passage, and came vnto him, whom he found altogether dismaide, & ready to surrender all things into the Senats hands, and encouraged him and incited him to take vpon him the gouernment of the Empire which the men of war had offered him. Which done, he departed, and was suddenly sent for by the Senat, whither hee resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time hee were returned from some banquet, and had known nothing of that which had hapned. He there fore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; & besides that, required him to giue them his opinion and counsaile as touching the present affaires: his answer was, that hee was ready to aduenture his life in the behalfe of the Senat; yet by the way hee told them that they ought to haue an especiall regard of the common-weale, rather then all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords of an Empire, had need of armes and men to maintaine themselves, least beeing weak and vnfortified, they should be deceived in their expectations. The Senat replied that they had great store of furniture, & that they would contribute money; that they had good store of men of warre, to whom they would annex their slaues and giue them libertie. But Agrippa replied, would God, graue fathers, that you were able to performe the matters you intend; yet will I not feare to discouer that vnto you, which concerneth you neerely. You knowe well that the army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who haue beene long time trained vp in feates of armes; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but men gathered together, and such as you couple them with are the very scumme of your slaues, who are both intractable and vntrained. We shal therefore enter fight against expert souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their swords; I rather thinke it meet that wee send vnto Claudius such men, as may perswade him to giue ouer the Empire. And to performe this message, behold my selfe in a readinesse to be commanded by you.

Agrippa with Ironic others sent to Claudius.

To this effect spake Agrippa; And heereunto the Senators accorded, & sent him to Claudius, appointing him certaine others to accompany him. As soone as he came to Claudius, he secretly discouered vnto him in what perplexitie the Senat was, and gaue him instructions to answer and demean himselfe like an Emperor, & to shew his dignity & power. Whereupon Claudius gaue the Embassadors this answer; That hee wondered not that the Senat were so vnwilling to be commanded by a soueraigne, in regard of that crueltie which the forepassed Emperours had vsed to their destruction. But for the present, they should taste of his mercy, & feele his moderate rule; and they should liue vnder the gouernment of such a one, who although in name hee had the imperiall authoritie; yet that in effect he would gouerne all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort to distrust him, whom as they themselves could witnes, they haue seene and known to haue dealt verduously and iustly in many affaires, although the state of times had been farre different. Those that were sent from the Senat hearing these words, returned back againe. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of warre, and exacted an oath of fidelitie from them, bestowing on euery one of them who were of his guard in way of largesse, fiew thousand drachmes, amounting to some 25 pound a man of our sterling money. Hee presented their captaines also with presents answerable to their qualities, promising to performe no lesse bounty to all the rest of the men of warre, in what place soeuer they were. Hereupon, the Consuls assembled the Senate in the temple of Iupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselves through the feare they had of that which should be spoken: other some departed out of the cite, and resorted to their countrey farmes, foreseeing with themselves the issue of all these things; and perceiuing that their hope of libertie was lost, they thought it farre better for them to exempt from danger, and to passe their life in repose, though it were with subiection, then to be altogether vncertaine of their securitie and safetie, by maintaining the dignitie of the Senators; yet about some hundred of them drew themselves together and no more. Now whilst they were consulting vpon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senat to chuse them an Emperour, and not to suffer their state to be lost thorow a multitude of gouernours: and to this effect spake they, least the gouernment should be giuen to diuers and not vnto one. This course of theirs gaue little content to the Senators, both in regard of the losse of that libertie which they expected, as thorow the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to be advanced both in respect of the nobilitie of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cesars. For Marcus Minucianus a man of himselfe of noble descent, and who had

A had married Julia Caius sister, stood vp to demaund the soueraigne gouernment: but the Consuls restrained him, alledging excuse vpon excuse. Another Minucianus also one of Caius tutors withdrew Valerius Asiaticus from thinking on those thinges: and there had hapned as great a slaughter as had euer beene heard of, had any of these had the liberty to desire the Empire, or oppose themselves against Claudius. For amongst other, the fencers, who were of no small number, they of the watch and the failers ioyned themselves together with the men of warre. They therefore that pretended to demand the Empire, gaue ouer their suits, partly in the cities behalfe, partly for their owne priuate securitie sake.

About the day spring Chereas and his companions went forth to debate the matter with the soldiers: but they seeing by the beckoning with their hands that they would draw them to silence, B and were vpon the instant to fall into discourse, made a great noyse to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earnestly affected to haue an Emperour & Soueraign Lord, and required with all expedition that they might haue one proclaimed and knowne. At that time the Senate were so distracted, both for the manner how they should command, as for the meanes they ought to vse to cause themselves to be obeyed, considering the souldiers set light by them; and those that were confederates in the death of Caius, suffered not the Senat to obey the souldiers. At length Chereas being vnable to coöceale his passion wherewith he was surprised, & hearing that they asked for a monarch, promised that he would giue the one, if they would bring him a token from Entychus, who was the wagouer to the Greene band, whom Caius had loued extremely, in so much as he employed his souldiers in seruile labours, as to build him stables for his

C hortes, & reproched the with diuers such like matters, telling the that he would bring them Claudius head, shewing them that it was a matter ill becoming them, if after a mad man they should commend the Empire to a foole. Yet none of these words could diuert them from their purpose: but all of them drew their swords, & with displayed ensignes marched toward Claudius to visite the souldiers with those, who had already bound themselves by an oath to serue him faithfully. So that the Senat was abandoned, & destitute of all defence; so as there was no difference betwixt private men & Consuls. All of them were astonished & confused, not knowing what to do, because they had thus provoked Claudius displeasure against them. And now fell they to reuiling one another, in testimony of the repentance they conceiued for these their proceedings. Wherupon Sabinus one of those who had murdered Caius, arose & protested that he would sooner cut his own

D throat, then consent to the establishment of Claudius; or behold with his eyes the misery & thralldome of his country: he likewise encouraged Chereas, telling him that he had deserued very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to liue without the libertie of his country. To which he answered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to sound Claudius mind, and with this resolution they concluded. Meane while certaine of the Senators sought on euerie side to breake thorow the mist & thickest of the souldiers, to go and do reuerence and homage to Claudius: amongst whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Consuls, whom the men of war accused to be one of the principall actors to incite the Senat to reconer their liberty, & they drew their naked swords against him. And if Claudius had not restrained them, they had surely dispatched him, but hee made him sit downe by him, and by that meanes deliuered him from the daunger. The other

Q. Pompeius the Consul with others resort to Claudius.

E Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honourably; but some of them were wounded euen then when they pressed forth to saue Claudius. Aponius retired himselfe fore vnto Claudius, desired him to vse as much lenitie as was possible in him towards the Senators, for that if any mischiete should betide them, hee should haue no other persons to command. To the which counsel of his, Claudius gaue place, and assembled the Senat in the Palace, causing himselfe to be caried thorow the cite in the companie of his soldiers, who marched before him, doing much mischiete to the common people. But amongst those that flew Caius, Chereas and Sabinus were come out into the streets, notwithstanding they were forbidden by Pollio, whom not long before Claudius had made captaine of his guard. And as soone as Claudius came into the palace, whither he assembled his friends, he pronounced sentence against Chereas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble; yet was hee condemned for this, because he was perfidious: wherupon hee was adiudged to die, to giue example to others, to the ende that Princes and Emperours may hereafter liue in safetie. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and diuers other Romanes. It is said of Chereas that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expressed not onely in that he chaunged not his countenance, but also by the reproches which he gaue Lupus who wept. For when as Lupus was putting off of his cloaths, and complained of the colde that he felt, he raunted him thus, alluding to his name which was Lupus; G That neuer any colde did harme to a woollfe. Furthermore, when he came to the place of execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the spectacle, he asked the souldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headsmen, and whether hee had a new sword, wishing him to vse that wherewith he murdered Caius. His death was happy, for hee received but one stroke; whereas Lupus was faint-hearted, and receiued diuers, because he stretched not out his necke freely. Some few daies after, at such time as the Romans solemnized their expiations, and that euery one honoured the memory of his dead friend, they gaue Chareas a part of that honour, and cast his portion into the fire, saying, that was to deface and purge their ingratitude, whereof they were guiltie towards him. Thus ended Chareas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not onely absolved him, but also suffered him to exercise his office, as before time he had done: yet thought he that he should do amisse and against iustice, if hee falsified his faith to his associates and confederates; for which cause hee shortned his owne daies, thrusting his sword thorow his body to the very hilts.

Claudius confirmeth Agrippa in his fathers kingdome.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. al. 4.
Claudius giueth Agrippa Iudæa, Samaria, and Lytania countrey.

Antiochus king of Comagena, Alexander Lyfymachus Alabarcha.

Herode Agrippa brother created king of Chalcis. Sedition in Alexandria betwixt the Greekes and Iewes.
Claudius edict in fauour of the Iewes in Alexandria.

Ncontinently after this, Claudius cashiered all those of the soldiers whom hee suspected; and published an edict, by which he confirmed the kingdome to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many praises; annexing moreover vnto his gouernment all that which Herode his grandfather had possessed, to wit, Iudæa, and Samaria, which in that they were as one lawfull inheritance appertained vnto him. He gaue him also out of his own dominions, Abela & al the countrey about the mount Libanus, that in times past appertained to Lyfianias. And he caused the alliance that was past betwixt them twaine to be engrauen and registred in an open place of the city of Rome. He tooke from Antiochus the kingdome that he had, & gaue him in exchange a portion of Cilicia & Comagena. He let Alexander Lyfymachus Alabarcha at liberty, who had bene his olde friend, and sometimes gouernour in Arabia, and otherwhiles his mother Antonius steward, who had been committed prisoner thorow Caius displeasure, and married Bernice Agrippas daughter, with his sonne Marcus: which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was coupled, was afterwards married with K her father Agrippas allowance to Herode his brother, for whom Agrippa begd of Claudius the kingdome of Chalcis. At that very time the Iewes that were in the Citie of Alexandria, mutined against the Greekes. For after Caius death the nation of the Iewes, which had bene oppressed during his raigne, and iniuriously dealt withall by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage, and instantly fell to armes. For which cause Claudius gaue commission to the gouernor of Egypt, to pacifie and appease that vprore. He sent also his letters patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the request of the two kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect. Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, Father of the people, signifieth this that followeth. Vnderstanding that the Iewes inhabitants in Alexandria, and for this cause called Alexandrines, haue at all times enjoyed the seifsame priuilegdes of the Citie, which the ancient and first Alexandrines haue had: L Which fauors they haue obtained by the largesse of those princes, that were our predecessors, as it hath been plainly made knowne vnto vs, as well by letters which haue bene written vnto vs, as by confirmed decrees: And that since Alexandria hath bene annexed to our Empire by Cæsar Augustus, their priuilegdes haue continued in force during the seuerall successions of many of our gouernours, which rights of theirs haue neuer bene called in question, no not in that time when Aquila was gouernour in Alexandria: Since in like sort Cæsar Augustus hath not letted them, but when the chieftaine of their nation was dead, they might establish other substitutes and gouernours in his place, willing that all of them should yeelde him obedience in obseruation of their lawes and customes, without constraint or impulsion to doe any thing contrarie to their religion: yet notwithstanding the Alexandrines haue mutined against the Iewes, being in the Citie of Alexandria in the time of the Emperour Caius, by reason of the folly and frenzie of Caius, who disgraced & oppressed the nation of the Iewes, because they would not violate their religion, nor acknowledge the said Caius for a god. Our wil and pleasure is, that no one of the priuilegdes of the nation of the Iewes be abolished, by reason of Caius frenzie; but my minde is to maintaine those which heretofore haue bene giuen them, to the ende they may continue and pue according to their aunient lawes and customes: Commanding you and euery one of you very

A verie carefully to prouide, that after the publication of this our ordinance, they bee in no sorte troubled. This was the tenor of that ordinance which was made in fauour of the Iewes in Alexandria.

But that which was generally made in fauour of those, who were disperfed thorow the whole world, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, High priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensueth. Our welbeloued friendes, the kings Agrippa and Herode, haue required vs that we will permit all those Iewes, that liue vnder the Roman Empire, to vse the same lawes and priuilegdes which they haue vsed heretofore, as we haue granted to the Iewes, that dwell in Alexandria. Which suite of theirs we haue willingly granted, not onely in fauour of those that require the same, but also for that I thinke them worthy such a grace: for whom I haue bene intreated in regard of the fidelity & friendship they haue alwaies exprested towards the Romans. My pleasure therefore is, that no Citie either Grecian or otherwise, shall deny any priuilege, from whence they shal be excluded, for that since the Emperour Augustus time they haue neuer bene exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that henceforth the Iewes, who liue vnder our Empire of what place soeuer they bee, may obserue their aunient customes, without any contradiction: Giuing them to vnderstand, that hereafter they vse our clemencie so much the more moderately, without neglecting the religion of other nations, in retaining their owne. And our will is, that this present ordinance be published by the Magistrates of Cities, Colonies and countries of Italy, and be sent vnto kings and foraine princes, by fit embassadours, within thirtie daies at the least, to the ende that they should be in such sort set vp, that they may be seene and read by all those that passe by.

CHAP. V.

Agrippas returne into Iudæa.

By these edicts of Claudius Caesar, which he sent both to Alexandria & other parts of the world, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the nation of the Iewes. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of honour, he sent him backe into his kingdome to gouerne the same, commanding all his presidents and lieutenants in his prouinces, thorow which hee was to passe, to giue him a friendly and honorable conuoy. But hee hauing wisely and happily dispatched his affaires, returned in all haste. As soone as he came to Ierusalem, hee offered his sacrifices of thankgiuing which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the law. Hee caused also diuers Nazarites to be pouled, and offered in gift that chaine of gold that Caius had giuen him: which was of the same weight the yron chaine was of wherewith his royall hands were manacled, in memorie of the aduerity he had past, and the testimony of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commanding that it should be hanged vp in the temple, and ouer the chamber of the treasure, to testifie vnto those that should behold the same, that the highest estates are subiect to alterations, and that God can raise men againe from obscuritie to happie fortune. For this chain that hanged in the temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly exprest vnto all men, that king Agrippa was vpon a verie small occasion despoiled of his former dignitie, and made prisoner: and then a little while after, that he being deliuered from his bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous kingdome; to signifie thereby, that humane affaires are of that nature, that that which is the greatest may bee easily ouerthrowne, and that which is declining may recouer againe his aunient honour and dignity. When as therefore Agrippa had duely and deuoutly acknowledged Gods mercies, he deposted the high priest Theophilus the son of Ananus, and bestowed that honour on Simon surnamed Canthara the son of Boethus. This Simon had two brothers, & Boethus was their father, whose daughter had bin married to king Herod, as heretofore it hath bin spoken. Simon held the priesthood with his brethren and his father, in such sort, as before time the three sons of Simon his priest, son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as wee haue declared in our former bookes. After the king had giuen order for the priesthood, he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Ierusalem had borne vnto him: for which cause hee acquired them of those tributes that euery family paid, knowing well that it became him to shew kindeesse vnto them, who had bene faithfull and well affected towards him. Hee created Silas, who had been his companion in many dangers, generall of all his army. Not long after, certaine young men that were Dnires vnder the colour of constancie in case of religion, who also had daily exprest in their actions an vnbridled rashnesse, brought the image of Cæsar into the temple of the Iewes, and erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as an act that tended to the abolition of the religion of their countrey: for which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was gouernour of Syria, & complained against these Dorites, who was no lesse displeased with the action then hee himselfe. For he supposed that such breach of religion was the meanes to further impietie, and for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this innouation somewhat sharply, to this effect following.

P Vblins Petronius, lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cesar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the countrey of Doria, health: Whereas Cesar hath published an edict, by which he permiteth the Iewes to liue according to their lawes and customes, some one amongst you haue beene so presumptuous to contradiet the same in effect (although in words you protest that you obey him) and doe all that which you can to hinder the Iewes from enioying their Synagogue, in so much as in the same you haue planted Casars image, not onely thereby opposing your selues against the Iewes, but also against the Emperour himselfe, whose image might haue beene better placed in his owne temple, then in a forraigne temple: and you haue placed it in their Synagogue; whereas by right euerie one ought to bee master of his place, according to Casars iudgement: For it should be verie ridiculous in me to alleadge mine owne iudgement after that of Casars, who hath granted the Iewes the libertie to liue according to their lawes and customes, and hath commanded that they should conuerse in equall freedome among the Greekes. For these causes I commaund you, that they, who haue beene so bold as to contemne Augustus decree (against whom their owne magistrates haue beene displeased, excusing themselves that this accident hapned not by their motion, but by the furie of the common people) be brought before me by the captaine Proculus Vitellius, to yeeld a reason of that which they haue done, exhorting the magistrates that if they will not bee accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discouer those that are guiltie, vnto Proculus, & giue order that no sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they affect, although wee & the most honoured king Agrippa, whom I take for my good and special friend, labour nothing more then that the nation of the Iewes should not assemble and take armes vnder colour of their defence. And to the end that whatsoever Augustus hath ordaiued as touching this matter, may be the better knowne vnto all men, I haue annexed his edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently knowne vnto all men, yet hath the most honoured king Agrippa read them vnto me at such time, as I sat in my tribunall seat, concluding according to right, that the Iewes ought not to be excluded nor hindered from enioying those benefits, which are granted vnto them by Cesar: I therefore charge all men, that hence forward they take heed least they seeke any occasion of mutinie or sedition, and that euerie one liue according to his religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, as also to prevent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa tooke the priesthood from Simon Canthara, and gaue it againe to Jonathan the sonne of Anani, whom he esteemed to bee more worthy then the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not desirous of this dignitie, for in effect hee refused it, saying: O King, I most willingly acknowledge the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow vpon me, and know wel that it is a dignitie which of your owne freewill you bestow vpon me; notwithstanding that God iudgeth mee vnworthy. If I suffice them that I haue once bene inuested with the sacred habite: for at that time I wore it with more holinesse, then I can now receiue it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthe of this honour then my selfe, I will informe you of one. My liege, I haue a brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend vnto you for a most fit man for that dignitie. The king tooke great pleasure in these his words, and leauing Jonathan he bestowed the priesthood on Matthias his brother, according as Jonathan had aduised him: and not long after this, Marcus succeeded in Petronius roome, and tooke vpon him the gouernment of Syria.

CHAP. VII.

Agrippa acts vntill the the time of his death.

S ilas was made generall ouer the kings armie: & for that he had alwaies beene faithful vnto him, and had neuer forsaken him in any daunger that was offered, without partaking the vtmost extremitie, but had alwaies aduentured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire & constant resolution; he made his account, that being so firme a friend to the king, he should also be partaker and companion with him in the honour. For which cause in all things whatsoeuer he submitted not himselfe to the king, but challenged to himselfe a libertie to speake what him listed. For this cause hee grew hatefull in the kings sight, for that in particular hee boasted of himselfe beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memorie of those aduersities the king had past, the rather to expresse how affectionate he had beene toward him, and his continuall talke was nothing else but of those traualles he had endured. Now for that hee obserued no measure in this his discourse, the king took it as an iniury intended to his honour, & was offended with the vnbridled licence of the mans prattle. For nothing soiideth more harsh in a mans eare, then the memorie of his forepassed miserie, & it is but the fault of a foole to rip vp the courtieses he hath emploied on another man. Finally, Silas grieuouly prouoked the kings displeasure against himselfe, that rather subscribing to his wrath then his wit, he not only dispossessed Silas of his generals roome, but also sent him bound into his countrey in that place to be held prisoner. This notwithstanding, time asswaged his displeasure, & the king drawing himselfe into better consideration, and remembering himselfe how many trauels Silas had endured in his behalfe, he reuoked the sentence that he had pronounced. At such time therefore as he was ready to celebrate the festiual day of his birth, & all his subiects were addressed to take their pleasure, he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and banquet with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had iust cause to be displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent vnto him, but spake vnto them after this manner. To what honour doth the king inuite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to deprive me thereof: for he hath not onely deprived me of those honours which he bestowed vpon me, in acknowledgement of the good affection I haue alwaies shewed vnto him; but he hath altogether spoyled me, and contumeliously intreated me: but if he thinke that he can restraine me from speaking freely, hee deceueth himselfe. For my conscience knoweth how many hazards I haue deliuered him from; and as long as I breathe, I will ring it in all mens eares, how many trauels I haue endured for his conseruation and honour, in recompence wherof I am at this day in bonds, and shut vp in an obscure prison, which I wil neuer forget. Yea and when my soule shall depart out of this body, these shall beate with her the remembrance of those benefits I haue employed on him. These words spake he with a loud voice, willing them to relate the same vnto king Agrippa; who seeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

After this the king began to fortifie the walles of Ierusalem, on the side of the new towne, vpon the common charge; increasing them both in length and bredth: & might he haue thorowly finished them, it had beene a fortresse inuincible, by all humane force. But Marcus the gouernour of Syria certified Cesar what the worke was; and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expressly to Agrippa, commanding him thence forward to desist from further building of the walles, according to that forme wherein he had begunne: whereunto he would not disobey. This king Agrippa was of a nature so ready to exercise liberalitie, and tooke so great pleasure to vse his magnificence towards all sorts of nations, that the great expences hee was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie vnto all men, & to purchase good esteeme, being euery way different in nature & disposition fro king Herod his predecessor. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing me, & irrecociliable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loued the Grecians better then the Iewes. For he beautified those cities that belonged to strangers, & gaue them money, and erected them bathes, and sumptuous Theaters, & Temples, & in some of them galleries: but as touching the cities of the Iewes, he bestowed not this bountie on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of: Contrariwise king Agrippa was verie courteous and lowly, and equally imparted his bountie vnto all men. He was courteous vnto strangers, and relished no lesse by the bountie he bestowed on them. To his countymen hee behaued himselfe affably, and in especiall hee was mercifull to all those that were in miserie. For which cause his ordinary court and the place he tooke most pleasure in, was Ierusalem. Hee was a diligent obseruer of the lawes of his countrey, and liued religiously, and with as great pietie as was possible: neither passed there one day wherein he offered not sacrifice. It happened at one time that a certaine cunning lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Ierusalem, had assembled the people by reason of the kings absence, who for the present was in Cæsarea: In which assembly hee alleadged many things against him, that hee was a prophane man, & that vpon iust cause he was forbidden to enter the temple, in that it was not lawfull nor decent for those that were vnclane, to enter thereinto. These words of Simon thus wrongfully vrged against him, were signified to the king by certaine letters sent him, by the gouernour of the citie: when as therefore he fate him downe in the Theater, hee commanded that verie Simon to sit next him, and in peaceable and kinde manner he spake thus vnto him. Tell mee, I pray thee, what thing thou seest fault worthy, or done contrarie to the law, in that which is done heere? Simon hauing not any thing to reply, besought him to pardon him. The king grew friends with him faster sooner then it could be imagined, resolving with himselfe that mercie doth farre better become a king, then wrath; and that moderation is more requisite, then haughtie courage; so as after hee had bestowed certaine presents on Simon, hee dimissed him. Now although he had many reparations in diuers places; yet honoured he those of Beryth about all the rest, and builded them a Theater surpassing all other in sumptuousnes and beautie: and besides that, he made them a sumptuous Amphitheater, and bathes and porches: in which he neither spared cost, neither scanted the beautie and greatnes of the works in any sort. The dedication also of these things was celebrated with great pompe and magnificence: he also made great shewes & plaies in the Theater, in which there were all sorts of musike and recreation. He made also diuers tournaments in the Amphitheater, expressing in all things the greatnes of his magnificence; and being desirous to delight the people with a combat, he gathered all the malefactors that he might get, and made two severall companies of seuen hundred a peece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmishing they might receiue their punishment; and besides, that by this warlike exercise hee might present the people with a pastime concluded with the punishment of wicked men: for each of these combatants slue one another.

After that he had finished these aboue named buildings in Beryth, he resorted to Tiberias a citie of Galilee, and was admired of all the other kings, so that Antiochus king of Comagena came to visit him: the like did Samsigeran king of the Emeseniens: Cotys king of Armenia the lesse, and Polemon Lord of Pontus: and besides all these, Herode prince of Chalcis and his brother, all whom hee receiued and entertained most magnificently and amiably, to shew his greatnesse; to the end that all men might perceiue, that hee was deservedly honoured with the presence of so many kings. And during the time that these princes were with him, Marfus the gouernour of Syria visited him likewise, whom to the end he might expresse the reuerence he bare to the Romans he met with, seuen furlongs off from the citie. This interview of so many kings was the originall of that discontent that grew betwixt him and Marfus; for whilest he fate in his litter, hee sent for these other Kings. But Marfus suspected this concord and so great amitie, supposing that this agreement of so many kings would be no waies profitable or beneficial to the Romans. For which cause he presently sent vnto them, charging them with all expedition to returne each of them into their owne countries: which strict commission of his Agrippa took in ill part, & for this occasion hee conceived scarce kindly of Marfus. He tooke the priesthood from Matthias, and gave it to Aclioneus the son of Cirhaus. After he had reigned three whole yeeres ouer Iudæa, he came to Cæsarea, which in times past was called the tower of Straton, and there made hee sports in honour of Cæsar, ordaining a certaine featt for his conseruation, to the celebration whereof there were assembled a great number of all those, who were of estate and dignitie thorow the whole countrey. On the second day of this solemnitie, he shewed himselfe being apparelled in a robe of siluer, made with admirable workmanship; and came in the same to the Theater in the morning: Whereas the first reflex of the rising of the sun beating vpon his Robe, he shined after such a sort, that all those that beheld him were seized with reuerence and feare. Whereupon certaine sycophants (which did not a little dishonour him) exclaimed one on the one side, the other on the other, saluting him for a God, and in speaking to him cried out thus: Bee mercifull vnto vs: hitherto haue we feared thee as a man, but henceforward we will confesse and acknowledge thee to be of a nature more excellent then mortall frailtie can attaine vnto. Agrippa reproved them not for vsing these words: neither reiected he their palpable and detestable flattery. But not long after, hee looking vpwards, perceiued an owle ouer his head perched vpon a cord, and knewe the

A same incontinently, that he was but a message of his misfortune: whereas before time he had denounced vnto him his felicitie, and conceiued thereupon a most heartie and inward griefe. And sodainly he was seized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with verie great vehemencie: for which cause turning his eyes towards his friends, he spake vnto them after this manner: Behold him (said he) whom you esteeme for a God, condemned to die, and destinie shall apparantly conuince you of those flattering and false speeches, which you haue lately vsed in my behalfe. For I, who by you haue bene adored as one immortall, am vnder the hands of death. But I must willingly entertaine that which God pleaseth to send me: For I haue not liued in obsecrity, but in so great and wonderfull felicitie, that each one of you haue reaped and helde me happy.

B Whilest hee spake thus, his griefes augmented in such sort as he was brought almost to his last: for which cause with all expedition he was conuayed into his royall palace, and the rumor was spread in euery place, that very shortly hee would be dead. For which cause the people with their wiues and children put on sackcloth, according to the custome of the country, to the end they might sollicit Gods mercy in the kings behalfe, and all the Citie was filled with teares and lamentations. The king that lay in an vpper chamber, and looking downe into the court, sawe them lying thus on the earth, could not retrain himselfe from teares. And after hee had for the space of fise daies without ceasing bene tormented with griping in his belly, hee gaue vp the ghost in the fiftie fourth yeere of his age, and the seuenth yeere of his raigne. For he had reigned foure yeeres vnder the Empire of Cæsar (hauing first of all gouerned Philips Tetrarchy three yeeres, to which was annexed the signiorie of Herode in the fourth yeere) and three yeeres vnder the Empire of Claudius Cæsar, during which time he gouerned ouer the aboue named countries: and moreover ouer Iudæa, Samaria and Cæsarea. His reuenue amounted to twelue hundred myriades, besides which, he made many loanes. For in that hee was very liberal in giuing, he spent farre more then his reuenue, and spared not any thing to shew himselfe magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herode his brother prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the kings lieutenant and friend, agreed betwene themselves to send Aristo one of their trustiest seruants to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had bene commaunded by the king.

Thus died Agrippa, leauing behinde him a son called Agrippa, seuentene yeeres old; and three daughters, one of which that was called Bernice, was married to Herod his fathers brother, D when she was sixteene yeeres olde. The two other were Mariamme and Drusilla: this Mariamme being of the age of ten yeeres, was promised in marriage by her father, to Iulius Archelaus Chelcias sonne; and Drusilla which was fixe yeeres olde, was promised also to Epiphanes, sonne to the king of Comagena.

After Agrippas death, they of Cæsarea & Sebaste forgot themselves of those benefits they had receiued from him, and vsed him no lesse despitefully, then as if hee had bene their vtter enemy. For they reprochfully abused him after his death, and reuiled him in such sort as it is vnseemelie to report the same. Furthermore, all the men of warre, who were at that time many in number, went vnto the kings lodging, and with one accord seized the statues of the kings daughters, and carried them to the brothell house; where after they had placed them, they vttered all the indignities they could possibly, practicing such shamefull matters, as they may not bee expressed. Besides this, resting themselves in the publike places, they banquetted in the open street, wearing chaplets of flowres vpon their heads, and perfuming themselves with odors to sacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for ioy the king was dead. Thus expressed they their ingratitude not onely towards their king Agrippa, who had bestowed so many liberalities on them; but also towards Herod his grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extreame charge erected their ports & temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceased Agrippas son was at Rome, and was brought vp vnder the Emperour Claudius. When Cæsar vnderstood how those of Cæsarea and Sebaste had iniuriously dealt with Agrippa, he was fore displeased, and moued with their ingratitude: & his purpose was, to send the younger Agrippa with all expedition to take possession of the kingdome of his father, and therewithall to discharge himselfe of his oath: but diuers of his free-men and friends, who were in great credit with him, dissuaded him from the same, alleadging that it would be a dangerous matter to commit the greatnesse of such a kingdome to a young man, who scarcely had as yet attained to the age of eightene yeeres: and for whome it was impossible to support the care of so great a kingdome, considering that if he were at mans estate, he should finde himselfe ouerburthened with the charge of a kingdome. This aduice of theirs was allowed by Cæsar, and for this cause hee sent Cuspius Fadus to gouerne Iudæa, and the whole realme; honouring his dead friend in this, in that he would not suffer Marsus, who had bene his G enemie, to enter into his kingdome. He gaue especiall commission also, that Fadus should sharpely punish those of Cæsarea and Sebastæ, for the outrages they had offered to his deceased friend, and the excesses that was committed against his daughters, who were yet liuing; commanding him to transport the companies of the Cæsareans and Sebastens, and the five Roman legions into the countrey of Pontus, to serue in that place, and to take thole Roman soldiers that bare armes in Syria, to serue in their place: yet notwithstanding this commandement of his they were not displaced. For they sent Embassadours to Claudius to appease him, and by this meanes they obtained the fauour to remaine in Iudæa. After this they gaue an entrance to those most grie-uous mischiefs and calamities that befell the Iewes: for they spred the seed of that warre, which was awakened vnder Florus gouernment. And for that cause after that Vespasian had obtained the victorie, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that prouince, and made them seeke their habitation eliewhere.

Calsius Lon-

of Syria.

After King Agrippas deceale (as we haue heretofore declared in our former booke) the Emperour Claudius sent Calsius Longinus to succede Marsus in the gouernment of Syria, whom he displaced of that honor in memory of Agrippa, who during his life time had oftentimes required by his letters, that he should not suffer Marsus to gouerne the estate of Syria. As soone as Cuspius Fadus came into Iewrie to take charge of that countrey, which he was to gouerne vnder Cæsar, hee found the Iewes that dwelt on the other side of Jordan in an vptore, who had taken armes against the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certaine village called Mia, which was stored with valiant men at armes. Now had those who inhabite beyond Jordan, armed themselues in this manner, without the consent of their gouernors: & had slaine a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus vnderstood, he was sore displeased, for that they had not reserued the cause to his hearing, and opened their griefes they had conceiued against the Philadelphians, but were so bolde of their owne authoritie, and without feare to betake themselues to their weapons. Hauing therefore apprehended some three of them, who

A who had bene principals and authors of the sedition, he commanded them to prison, and execucuted one of them called Annibaz, and banished the other two, whose names were Amaram and Eleazar.

Anon after this, Tholemaus the Archchiefe was also taken, and brought vnto him, who commanded him to be executed, in that hee had done many robberies in Iudæa and Arabia; and by this meanes all the countrey of Iudæa was cleared of all theeeues, by the care and prouidence of Fadus. After this he sent for the high priests, and the gouernours of Ierusalem, commanding them according to the Emperours direction, that they should deliuer vp into the Castle of Antonia the long and sacred robe, which the high priest onely was accustomed to weare; to the end that it might be at the Romans disposition, as in times past it had bene. This command of his they durst not contradict; yet notwithstanding they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Ierusalem with a great power, for feare the Iewes, by reason of this iniunction, should grow to rebellion) first that it might bee lawfull for them to send their Embassadours vnto Cæsar, to beseech him that the sacred robe might remaine in their custodie. Secondly, that it might please them to expect the answer which Cæsar would returne vpon this their request. Fa-dus gaue them this answer, that hee permitted them to send their Embassadours to Rome, provided, that before hand they deliuered him their children for hostages. Which when they had readily performed, the Embassadours were sent away. Now when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his sonne that lately died) knowing the cause of their comming, and being ordinarily accustomed to attend vpon Cæsar (according as we haue heretofore declared) besought Cæsar, that hee would grant the Iewes their request, as touching the sacred Robe, and that it might please him to signifie no leise vnto Fadus. On this his petition Claudius gaue the Embassadours audience, and tolde them that hee fauoured their suit, willing them to bee thankful to Agrippa, vpon whose suit he respected the Iewes, and allowed of their demands; and besides this answere, he deliuered them a letter to this effect:

Claudius Cæsar Germanicus, Conseruer of the people, Consul created the fift time, Emperour the fourth time, Father of the countrey the tenth time, to the Magistrates of Ierusalem, the Senate, people, and all the nation of the Iewes; Health. Being required by our welbeloued Agrippa, whom I both haue, and at this present doe bring vp with me, and whom I know to be most de-uout; I haue heard your Embassadours, who were admitted to my presence by his meanes, and haue receiued their thanks for the benefits I haue bestowed on your nation: I haue also willingly inclined to that instant and expresse request you haue made vnto me; and it is my pleasure the sacred Robe of the high priest, and the holy Miter remaine in your custodie, in such manner, as our most deere and right honoured friend Vitellius heretofore ordained: To which demand of yours I vouchsafe my allowance: first in regard of mine owne pietie, and for that I desire that e-uerie one should serue God according to his owne religion: next, for that I am resolu'd, that in so doing I shall gratifie king Herod & yong Aristobulus, whose pietie towards me I am pruiue to, & whose good affection towards you I can witnesse, with whome I haue had diuers occasions of friendship, both in regard of their vertue, as for the honour that I beare vnto them. I haue also written to this effect to Cuspius Fadus mine Agent: The names of those who haue receiued my letters, are Cornelius the sonne of Ceron, Trypon the sonne of Theudion, Dorotheus the sonne of Nathanael, and Iohn the sonne of Iohn. Given the eight and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere wher-in Rufus and Pompeius Syluanus were Consuls. At that same time Herod, who was Agrippas brother that had lately decealed, to whose hands in times past the gouernment of Chalcis had bene committed, required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power ouer the temple, and the sacred vestments and necessaries, and the authoritie of choosing the high priest. All which he obtained, and from that time forward vntill the end of the warre of the Iewes, this power remained in all his successors. According to this authoritie Herod deposed Canthara from the priesthood, & gaue the succession thereof to Ioseph the sonne of Canus.

her, and got her with child. Vpon a time it hapned, that sleeping with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whilst she lay asleepe: & him thought, that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, least he should crush the fruit that was therein, which by Gods providence should haue a happie beginning, and no lesse fortunate ending. Monobazus was foremoued at this voice, and as soone as he awoke he told it to his wife; & afterwards when the child was borne he called him Izates: Besides, he had another elder sonne by the same wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his owne name. And he had also other sons by his other wiues: yet notwithstanding Izates was most manifestly his best beloued, and so cherished by him, as if he had bene his only begotten sonne. For which cause, his other brothers enuied him: which increased their hatred, for that all the rest of them were aggrieved, because Monobazus made most account of Izates. The father manifestly perceived all this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the desire that euery one of them had to be best esteemed by his father. Notwithstanding, being affraid lest some mishap should beride Izates, by reason of the hatred his brethren bare vnto him, hee gaue him many great gifts, & sent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a fort called Spafinus, committing his sons life into his hand. Abemerigus also intertained him with kind affection, and loued him in such sort, that in processe of time he gaue him Samachis his daughter to wife; and for her dowrie hee gaue him a countrey of great renew.

Monobazus being olde, and seeing he had no long time to liue, desired before his death that his sonne might come and visit him: he therefore sent for him and receiued him verie louingly, giuing him a countrey which hee called Cæron, which bringeth forth great abundance of excellent Amomum. In this place was the remainder of the Arke, in which Noe was saued, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be seene at this day, if any man haue a desire to behold the same. Izates remained in that place vntill his fathers decease. But on the verie day of his death, Helena sent for all the Lords and Gouernours of the kingdome, and capitaines of all the Army, and vpon their assembly the spake vnto them after this manner.

I suppose (said she) that you are not ignorant of my husbands minde, who hath desired that Izates might be king in his steed, and hath esteemed him most worthie of such an honour: yet expect I your iudgement in this point. For hee that receiue the soueraignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, and hath the same confirmed vnto him by their consent, is happy. She shed this discourse vnto them to trie what their intent was, who were there assembled. They vnderstanding her minde, prostrated themselves first of all vpon the earth before the Queene, according to the custome of their countrey; and afterwards answered her, that they approved the kings election, and tooke pleasure to obey Izates, whom his father deservedly, and to all their contents, and the desire of the common people had preferred aboue the rest of his brethren: alledging moreover, that they would put his brethren and kinsmen to death before his comming, to the end that he might enioy the kingdom with all securitie: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred and enuie might be extinguished. Hereunto the Queene answered; that she gaue them thanks, for the fauor they bare vnto her and her sonne Izates; notwithstanding she required them to suspend their iudgements as touching the death of his brethren, vntill such time as Izates himselfe should giue his consent thereunto. They seeing they might not obtaine the liberty to put them to death, gaue counsaile that they should bee kept prisoners vntill his comming, to the end, at leastwise for their owne parts, that they might be out of daunger; and that moreover, vntill his comming there might one bee appointed to gouerne the estate, whom shee should esteeme most trustie and faithfull vnto him. Whereunto Helena condescended, and made his elder brother Monobazus king, and set the Diademe on his head, & gaue him his fathers seale ring, with that robe which they call Sampera; exhorting him to gouerne the kingdome vntill his brothers attuall. Izates hauing certaine notice of his fathers death, resorted thither speedily, and receiuing his brother Monobazus willing surrender, tooke vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome.

During such time as Izates sojourned in the fortresse of Spafinus, a certain merchant, who was a Iew, called Ananias, hauing access to the kings wiues, taught them the manner how to serue God, according to the religion of the Iewes: and Ananias by their meanes growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena; being drawn thereunto by his earnest intreaties, at such time as Izates resorted thither vpon his fathers sending for. It chanced also in like sort that Helena was in like manner instructed by another Iew, and retained the rites and religion of the Iewes.

- A After that Izates came into his kingdome, and knewe that his brethren and kinsfolke were imprisoned, hee was much grieved. Conceiuing therefore with himselfe that it would be a great impietie in him to suffer them to be slaine, or kept bound in prison; and that on the other side, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they should remember the euill they had endured: for this cause hee sent some of them to Rome for hostages with their children vnto the Emperour Claudius, and the rest vnto Artabanus king of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly assured that his mother was wholly addicted to the religion of the Iewes, hee endeouored himselfe the more to shew himselfe zealous therein: and supposing that hee could not bee a perfect Iew, except he were circumcised, he prepared himselfe to be circumcised. Vnto which when his mother vnderstood, she laboured to her vttermost to hinder his resolution, certifying him that in so doing he should bring himself in great daunger; for that in being king, he would draw himselfe into the dislike of his subjects, if they should haue notice that he was addicted to a new religion, and to strange ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Iew he should be their king: so she for a while by her dissuasion restrained him from his desire. But the king required counsell of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the course of her dislike, threatened Izates, that if he would not obey his mother, he would forsake him, and depart from him: for that he feared, least if the matter should be publicly knowne, hee should suffer some punishment, as being the onely author & instructor of the king in vndecent matters: that otherwise hee might serue God, although he were not circumcised; since he had resolved to liue according to the institutions and lawes of the Iewes, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true religion consisteth, more then in the circumcision of the body, though hee were not actually circumcised, since the necessitie and feare of his subjects ouerruled him. By which wordes the king for that time was won to affect the same no further. But some little while after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Iew called Eleazar, coming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the doctrine of our religion, perswaded him to bee circumcised. For, coming one day vnto him to salute him, hee found him reading of the bookes of Moses, and said vnto him; O King, contrarie to your knowledge you offend the law, and God likewise; for it sufficeth you not, that you vnderstand the same, but the chiefeft matter you are tied vnto, is to doe that which the law commaundeth: how long therefore will you remaine vncircumcised? And if as yet you haue not perused the law as touching this point, read it now.
- D to the intent you may know what impietie it is to omit it.

After the king had heard this, he would no longer deferre his circumcision: for which cause withdrawing himselfe into another chamber, he called a surgeon vnto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his mother and master Ananias vnto him, he certified them what had past; whereupon they grew strangely amazed, fearing least the king should grow in daunger of the losse of his kingdome, if this action of his should come to light; for that his subjects would not endure that such a man that followed a contrarie religion should be their king: they feared also, least they themselves should be in daunger, for as much as the cause of all this matter would be imputed to them. But God by his providence preuented, least any of those things which they feared should come to effect: for he deliuered Izates himselfe and his children likewise out of many dangers, yeelding them his assistance in their doubtful & desperat estates, declaring in effect that those that onely put their trust in him, and depend vpon his providence, are neuer deprived of the fruit of their pietie. But of these things will we speake hereafter.

When Helena the kings mother perceived that the estate of the kingdome was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both homebred and strangers, her sonne was repared happie by the good will of God, she was seized with a desire to go and visit the citie of Ierusalem, and adore God in that temple, which was so much renowned thorow the whole world, & offer sacrifice of thankgiuing therein; for which cause she besought her son that he would suffer her to performe her vowes: who willingly condescended to her desire, and furnished her royally with all things that were necessarie for such a voyage; giuing her a great masse of money with her, & bringing her onward on her way many daies journey; so that at length she arrived in Ierusalem, to the great advantage of the inhabitants of that city. For at that time the citie was oppressed with a grieuous famine, so as many died for want of food; for which cause Queene Helena sent her seruants some into Alexandria to buy a great quantitie of corne, the rest into Cyprus to buy dried figs; who returned with all expedition they might; whereupon Helena distributed the victuals among the poore, leauing a singulat memorie of her beneficence among the whole nation. Her sonne Izates also vnderstanding of this famine, sent a great summe of money to the gouernour of Ierusalem. But hereafter after will I declare what other benefits the king and Queene haue bestowed vpon our nation. Now Artabanus king of Parthia, perceiuing that the princes of his kingdome had conspired against him, resolved with himselfe to go vnto Izates, for the securitie of his life and person, hoping by his meanes, if it were possible, to recover his kingdome. He therefore retired thither, & brought with him about one thousand men of his kinsfolke and household seruants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew verie well by his royall traine, notwithstanding he were vnknowne vnto him by countenance. Drawing therefore neere vnto him, he first of all humbled himselfe on his knees, according to the custome of the countrey, and afterwarde spake vnto him after this manner.

“Dread king, forsake me not, who am thy seruant, neither reiect thou my prayers. For being dejected by the meanes of my misfortunes, and of a king become a private man, I haue neede of thy succour. Consider therefore the inconstancie of fortune, and thinke with thy selfe, that by prouiding for mee, thou shalt prouide for thy selfe. For if thou makest no reckoning of the wrong that is done vnto me, diuers men will grow audacious to enterprize vpon other kings.”

These words pronounced hee with weeping teares, and with lookes lowly fixed vpon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and saw his humble and submissive estate, he leapt incontinently from his horse and said vnto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy present and perplexed condition dismay thee, as if thy misfortunes were irreuerable. For this sorrow of thine shall sodainly bee changed, and thou shalt finde a better friende and alie, then thou hopedst for at this time. For either will I repossesse thee of thy kingdome of Parthia, or I will lose mine owne gouernment. This said, he caused Artabanus to get vp on horsebacke, and I walked by him on foote, yielding him this honour, as to a greater king then himselfe. Which when Artabanus sawe, hee was discontented, and ware by his fortune and honour to come, that he would set foote on ground, if hee would not get vp on horsebacke and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting vpon his horse againe, hee conducted him to his palace; yielding him all the honour that was possible, both in his sittings and banquets, as in his assemblies, nor respecting his present estate or condition; but his former dignitie: considering with himselfe, that such casuall misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore hee wrote vnto the Parthians, perwading them to receiue their king Artabanus, assuring them on his faith and oath, that hee would obtaine a free pardon for all that which was past, and to that intent he offered himselfe to be an arbitrator betwene them. The Parthians gaue him this answer, that they would not refuse to entertain him, but that they could not for that one who was called Cinnamus was aduanced in his place and dignitie, and that they feared least a sedition should happen amongst them. Cinnamus who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was such, wrote himselfe vnto Artabanus, who had nourished and brought him vp, exhorting him to returne vpon his faith, and to receiue againe his owne kingdome. Artabanus vpon this motion gaue credit to his words, and returned backe againe. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and prostrating himselfe before his teere, called him king; and afterwarde taking the diademe from off his own head, he set it vpon Artabanus head, who by this means was restored to his former estate by Izates mediation, after he had been driven out of his kingdome by his chiefe nobilitie. And hee did not forget the fauours which hee had receiued at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that possibly hee could imagine: For hee permitted him to weare the straight Tiara, and to sleepe vpon a gilded bed, which is a priuiledge that belongeth only to the kings of Parthia. Hee gaue him also a goodly and great countrey which he had taken from the king of Armenia. This countrey was called Nisibis, where in times past the Macedons had builded the Citie of Antioch by them called Mygdonia.

Presently after Izates was in this sort honoured, Artabanus died, leauing his kingdome to his sonne Vardanes, who repaired to Izates, praying him to ioyne with him in that warre which he intended to wage against the Romans: but he prevailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romans force and good hap, imagined that hee vnderooke a matter beyond his power. Furthermore, he had sent tunc of his young sonnes to Ierusalem to learne our tongue and discipline, and his mother likewise to adore in the temple, for which cause hee the rather held backe and dissuaded Vardanes from enterprizing against the Romans, whose power and puissant conquests he ordinarily reckoned vp vnto him, to the end he might dismay him, & by these his allegations cause him to giue over his purposed intent of war against them. But the Parthian was displeased with this his perswasion, and for that cause denounced a present warre against Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitlesse issue: for God cut off all his hopes. For the Parthians vnderstanding what

OF THE IEWES. THE XX. BOOKE.

A what Vardanes intent was, and how he was resolved to vndertake a war against the Romans, flew him, and gaue the kingdome to his brother Gotarza, whom not long after this, his brother Vologesus slew by treason, restoring to his two brothers by the mother side the provinces, that is to say the kingdome of Media to Pacorus who was the eldest, and Armenia to Tiridates who was the younger.

When Monobazus king Izates brother and the rest of his kinsfolke saw how happily all things succeeded to Izates, and how in respect of his piety towards God, he was honoured and reuerenced by all men, they also resolved themselves to forsake their religion, and to serue God after the manner of the Iewes: But this intent of theirs was discovered. Whereupon the chiefe among them grew displeased; yet did they not manifest their despire, but kept it hidden in their hearts, seeking some fit occasion to reuenge themselves as soone as they might. They wrote also to Abias king of Arabia, and promised him great summes of mony, if he would take armes against their king, promising him that vpon the first charge, they would forsake him, for that they desired to be reuenged on him; who was growne in hatred of their religion. Having therefore confirmed their promise with an oath, they incited him to make haste. The king of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth against Izates with a great power. And when as the first charge was ready to be giuen, and before they came to handy-strokes, all Izates souldiers forsooke him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great disorder, as if they had been surprised with a Panique feare; yet was Izates no waies dismayed, but hauing discovered that it was the treason and conspiracy of his greatest peeres, he retired himselfe also into his campe, where he enquired of the cause that they pretended. After he knew that they had comploted with the Arabians, he caused the conspirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and slew a great number of his enemies, & constrained the rest to betake them to flight. He pursued their king also into a fort called Arsam, which hee battered and assaulted with such spirit and diligence, that he tooke the same with a great quantitie of bootie that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but he tooke not Abias alieue; for hee himselfe had preuented his captiuitie with his death. The Lords of Adiabena seeing themselves frustrated of their former hopes, in that by Gods hand they were deliuered into the hands of their king, could not containe their displeasure, but practiced further mischief: for they wrote their letters to Vologesus king of Parthia, desiring him to kill Izates, and to bestow an other king vpon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their king, who had abolished their religion, and had embraced a strange lawe. The Parthian vnderstanding herof prepared himselfe for the warre: and hauing no iust colour or pretext to enforce the same, he sent a messenger vnto him to redemand those honours which his father had giuen him; which if he refused, he denounced warre against him. Izates was not a little troubled in his minde, when he vnderstood this message: For he thought that if he should restore the giftes, he should offer himselfe great preiudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for feare: knowing on the other side, that if the Parthian should recouer that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quiet; he therefore commended his cause to God, trusting that he would take care of him. And building vpon this, that the greatest good he might haue, was to haue God to helpe, hee shut his wiues and children in a strong Castle, and his come in his strongest towers: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage; and hauing after this manner prouided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came onward sooner then he was expected, with a great power of horsemen and footmen. For he marched forward in all haste, and encamped neere vnto the fould that separateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewise encamped not farre from thence, hauing with him about six thousand horsemen. To whom the Parthian sent a messenger to giue him to vnderstand how great his power was, which extended from the riuier of Euphrates as farre as Bactria, recounting vnto him what kings he had vnder his subiection, threatening him to punish him very seuerely, in that he behaued himselfe so vngratefully towards his benefactors, yea in such sort as the god whom he adored, might not deliuer him out of the kings hands. Hereunto Izates answered, that he knew well that the Parthian farre exceeded him in power, but that he was farre better assured that Gods power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And hauing returned him this answer he betook himselfe to his prayers, and prostrating himselfe vpon the earth, and casting ashes on his head, and fasting himselfe, his wiues and all his children, hee called vpon God, and prayed after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I haue not vainly submitted my selfe to thy protection, but haue entirely chosen thee for mine onely and true God, be thou my helpe and assistance, and not onely deliuer mee from mine enemies, but also abate and controule their pride, who haue not been affaide in their vnbridled language, to prophane thy holy and sacred name, and vtter blasphemous speeches against thy power. Thus prayed he with sighes & teares, and God heard him: For incontinently, and the very same night, Volagesus received letters by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans and Sacans taking opportunity by his absence, were entered into the kingdom of Parthia, and spoiled the whole countrey: for which cause he returned backe into his countrey without any further trouble. And thus Izates by Gods prouidence was warranted from the Parthians threats.

Not long after this, at such time as he had liued fifty five yeeres, and reigned foure and twenty, and left behinde him foure and twentie sonnes, he dyed, and appointed his brother Monobazus to succeed him in the kingdom, requiring hereby his faith and loyalty, in that during the time of his absence, and after the death of his father, he had faithfully ruled and gouerned the kingdom to his vse. His mother Helena hearing newes of his death, lamented very grievously as reason would, in that she being his mother was deuiued of a sonne that so zealously honored and feared God. Yet notwithstanding she was comforted, when shee vnderstood that her eldest sonne was to succede him in the kingdom; and hastned her selfe with all diligence, to go & meet him. As soone as shee arriued in Adiabena, she liued not long time after her son Izates: Whereupon Monobazus tooke both her body and his brothers bones, and sent them to Ierusalem, commanding that they should be buried in three Pyramides which Helena had builded, some three stades or furlongs off of Ierusalem. But hereafter will we recite the acts and gifts of Monobazus during his reigne.

By these words of his hee deceiued diuers of them. But Fadus would not permit that such a fury of theirs should breede them any commoditie: but he sent a troupe of horsemen, who charged them on the sodain, and slew a great number of them; and tooke diuers of them prisoners aliue, amongst whom was Theudas, whose head was stricken off, and was afterwards carried to Ierusalem. After Fadus succeeded Tiberius Alexander, the sonne of that Alexander who had bin gouernour of Alexandria; a man of as great riches as any one of his time and place, who surpassed likewise his sonne Alexander in pietie and seruice of God, who forsooke the religion of his forefathers. In that time there hapned a great famine in Iewry, during which Q. Helena sent huge summes of money into Aegypt, and bought corn and distributed the same to those that were in want, according as I haue forespoken. At the same time James and Simon the sons of Iudas of Galilee, who had busied themselves to incite the people to resist the gouernment of the Romans, were put to death at such time as Cyrenius valued each mans goods, as we haue heretofore declared. These did Alexander commaund to be crucified. Herode king of Chalcis tooke away the soueraigne priesthood from Ioseph the sonne of Camydas, and transferred it to Ananias the sonne of Nebedeus. After Tiberius Alexander, succeeded Cumanus. Then died Herod, who was brother to king Agrippa the Great, in the eighth yeare of Claudius Caesar. CHAP. IIII.

How a great number of the Iewes were slaine about the Temple.

AT the time of the feast of Pascha (during which time we are accustomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people assembled themselves from all parts to the cite of Ierusalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing least by this occasion there should arise some commotion, he gaue order that a company of his soldiers should be armed, & should keep their guard in the porches of the temple, to the end that if any trouble should happen, they might repress it. Those gouernours, who had bene his predecessors, had done the like in such maner of assemblies. It came to passe on the fourth day of the feast, that a certain souldier discovering those priuities which were vndecent to be seene, shewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the same, were sore displeased, & prouoked, saying, that the dishonour was not done vnto them, but to God, to whom it rightly appertained. And some of them of best resolution cast out certaine speeches against Cumanus, saying; that the souldier was set on by him. Which when Cumanus vnderstood, he was in like maner grievously offended in regard of those iniuries: yet exhorted he those, whom he saw too forward in raising factions, to keepe the peace, for feare least a sedition should grow during the time of the feast; and seeing they would in no sort obey him, but contrariwise they ceased not to iniury and reuile him, hee commanded that all the forces he had should be in armes, and retire themselves into the fortresse of Antonia that was neere vnto the temple, as we haue heretofore declared. The people seeing the armed soldiers were affraid, & began to fly: but because the places thorow which they issued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were pursued by their enemies; so that they thrust on one another in their flight, and diuers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thousand men: and after this in steed of a feast there was nothing but mourning; & without bethinking themselves of their prayers and sacrifices, all of them began to weepe and lament. So great mischiefe sprang from the insolence of one souldiour. This first lamentation was scarcely finished, before a second succeeded the same. For some of those who had a part in this mutiny, being about some hundreth stades off of the cite, robbed one Steuens that was Cæsars seruant in the high way, and tooke from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus vnderstood, he presently sent some of his souldiers to spoile those villages, which were neere to the place where the fact was committed, & to bring the chiefe inhabitants thereof in bonds vnto him. In this pillage a certain souldier found a booke of the law of Moses in one of these villages, which he took & brought, and before them all tore it in peeces, with hainous blasphemies & vile speeches against the law and whole nation. The Iewes vnderstanding hereof, sodainly assembled themselves in great numbers, and ran to Cæsarea where Cumanus kept for that present, requiring him that he would reuenge not their cause, but Gods, whose law was on that sort dishonoured, signifying vnto him, that it was impossible for them to liue, so long as their law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing least a second mutiny and vpror should be raised among the people, by the counsell of his friends cut off the souldiers head, who had committed that outrage against the law, and by this meanes appeased the sedition that was ready to take head.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 9. al. 10.

CHAP. V.

The sedition of the Iewes against the Samaritanes.

THere hapned also an enmitie betwixt the Samaritanes and the Iewes, vpon this occasion. They of Galilee, who resorted to the Cite of Ierusalem at the times of our solemne feasts, were accustomed to passe thorow the countrey of the Samaritanes. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a borough called Nais, situate in a great champain field: where a quarrell arising betwixt diuers inhabitants of the place, and certaine passengers, a great number of the Galileans were murdered. Which when the magistrates of Galilee vnderstood, they resorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute iustice on those that had murdered their countymen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritanes, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being prouoked by this contempt of his, perswaded the common people of the Iewes to betake them to their weapons, and maintaine their libertie; telling them that seruitude is of it selfe tedious; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intolerable.

Agrippa moueth Agrippina to intreat Celer to beate the cause of the Iewes.

But their gouernours laboured to pacifie them, promising them to deale so effectually with Cumanus, that he should take punishment of the murderers: but they gaue them no audience, but fell to armes, requiring Elezar the sonne of Dinaus to be their chieftaine. This Elezar was a theefe, who for many yeeres made his abode in the mountaines: They therefore spoiled & burnt certaine villages of the Samaritanes. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus eares, hee tooke a company of the souldiers of Sebaste, with foure bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritanes likewise to go and make warre against the Iewes; whom they tooke, and slew many of them, and led more of them away prisoners. When the chieft gouernours in Ierusalem saw into what an infinitie of mischiefs they were fallen, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous to forethinke themselves of the ruine of their countrey, the danger the temple was in to be burned, the seruitude both of themselves, their wiues and children, to prophane and strange nations; and desired them to change their aduice, and to lay aside their weapons, and cease to offer violence, to the end that they might hereafter liue in quiet, and that euery one of them would retire themselves peaceably to his owne habitation. By which words in the end they being perswaded, returned home, and betooke them to their busines. The theues also retired themselves againe into their strong holds, and from that time all Iudæa was replenished with thefts. The gouernours of Samaria relected to Numidius Quadratus gouernor of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuse the Iewes for that they had fired their villages, and spoiled them; telling him that their losse did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romanes were contemned by the Iewes: who notwithstanding ought to appeare before them as their competent Iudges; yet nailese that they assembled themselves in such sort, as if the Romanes were not their superiours. For which cause they addressed themselves to him, to the end they might haue redresse of those wrongs which they had receiued by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritans charged the Iewes: who answered to the contrary, alleading that the Samaritanes themselves had bene the authors of that mutiny & vprore; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money, had smothered the matter, and done no iustice on the murderers. When Quadratus heard this, he referred the iudgement till another time, telling them that he would giue sentence in the matter at such time as he came into Iudæa, and had examined the truth of both sides; so that they returned without doing any thing.

Anone after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritanes had bene the authors of the trouble: and on the other side, knowing that some Iewes likewise intended some insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence hee transported himselfe to Lydda, which is a borow of no lesse bignesse then a citie: in which place he sitting on his tribunall seat, heard the Samaritans the second time, and discovered by the report of a certaine Samaritane, that one Dortus one of the principallest among the Iewes, and foure other his confederates induced the people to rebell against the Romanes. These did Quadratus cause to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the high Priest, and the capitaine Ananias, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreouer, he commanded the chieft gouernours both of the Samaritanes and Iewes, that they should speedily repaire to Rome; whither Cumanus and captain Celer should conduct them, to the end they might be iudged by Cesar himselfe, vpon the information taken on both sides. And fearing least the common people of the Iewes should breake out into some rebellion, he repaired to the citie of Ierusalem, to giue order that the Iewes should attempt to raise no new stirres: but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the feast and offering sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed ceremonies. Being therefore assured that no man would innouate or rebell in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

But the Iewes that were sent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principall Samaritanes had a day assigned them by the Emperour to decide the differents that were betwene them: Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cesar's friends and freemen, to haue the vpper hand of the Iewes, and indeede the day had bene theirs if yong Agrippa had not bene in Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disadvantage of the Iewes, besought Agrippina the Emperours wife, that she would labour her husband in such sort, that he would be pleased to take full knowledge of that which was done, and that afterwards he should execute due iustice on those whom he found guiltie of that sedition. Claudius fauourably gaue care to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found that the Samaritanes were the

A first authors of all those mischiefs, and caused them to be put to death who came before him to pleade, and banished Cumanus: he gaue order also that capitaine Celer should be sent backe to Ierusalem, and that there in sight of all the people hee should be dragged about the Citie, vntill hee died. Furthermore, he sent Claudius Felix, Pallas brother, to gouerne Iudæa.

In the twelfth yeere of his raigne, he gaue Agrippa Philips Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and besides that, annexed therunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in times past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from him the prouince of Chalcis, which hee had gouerned for the space of foure yeeres. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cesar's hands, he married his sister Drusilla to Azizus king of the Emeseniens, who contented to be circumcised, because Epiphane king Antiochus sonne would not giue care vnto the mariage, for that he refused to entertaine

B the religion of the Iewes, although in times past hee had promised his father no lesse. He gaue Mariamme also to Archelaus Chelcias son, who by her fathers consent was before time promised him, on whom he begat a daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off, on this occasion following. At such time as Felix gouerned Iewrie, he saw Drusilla and was surprised with her loue, for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent her a certaine Magician called Simon, who was borne in Cyprus, and one of his greatest friends among the Iewes, who perswaded her to forsake her first husband, and to marry with Felix, giuing her to vnderstand that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. She vnadvised, and resolved to rid her selfe from the enuious affection, which her sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this occasion ceased not to iniure

C her) she condescended to forsake the religion of the Iewes, and to marrie with Felix, by whom she had a sonne who was called Agrippa. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died, & was burned in the fire of the mountaine Veluius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow, very long time after Herods death, who was both her vncl and her husband, and the report was that she had the company of her brother. Finally, she wrought so much, that Polemon king of Cilicia caused himself to be circumcised, to the end he might espouse her, purposing by that means to make it knowne how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gaue care, because she was rich. But this marriage continued not any long time. For Bernice threw her impudencie, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giuing ouer that marriage forooke also the religion of the Iewes. At the same time Mariamme hauing refused Archelaus her husband, married with Demetrius one of the chieft Iewes that were in Alexandria, both in

D regard of his descent, as also his riches, who at that time also exercised the office of Alubarcha, that is to say, the gouernour of Arabia. She caused the sonne she had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this, will I speake more exactly hereafter.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had raigned thirteene yeeres, eight moneths and twentie daies. Some say, that hee was poisoned by Agrippina his wife, the daughter of Germanicus Claudius brother, which was first married to Domitius Oenobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widowhood, she was finally married to Claudius, into whose house shee brought her sonne called Domitius, by his owne fathers name. Claudius had before time put Messalina his wife to death, for the ieaousie that hee had of her: although hee had had

E children by her, namely Britannicus and Ostia. He had Ostia also by his first wife Pætina, which was elder then her brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his son. Agrippina, fearing least Britannicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his father in the Empire, & delirous to make her owne sonne Emperour, as it is reported: she left nothing vnattempted that might bring her husband to his death; and presently sent Burrus, who was generall of the army, with certaine other capitaines, and those of greatest power amongst his freemen, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaime him Emperour. Hee being thus established in the Empire, caused Britannicus to be secretly poisoned; and not long after this he openly caused his mother to be put to death, yeelding her this recompence, not only for that shee had borne him in her wombe, but also for that by her policies he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murdered Ostia his wife, and diuers other noble men, vnder colour of some conspiracie intended against him. But I will no further prosecute this matter, for that there are diuers who haue composed Neros historie, of whom some haue had no regard of the truth, but haue spoken at their pleasure, for that he had bene their benefactor: other some transported with hatred and despite against him, haue not bene ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renowne, as they deserue to be condemned. Neither doe I wonder that they haue inuented so many lies against Nero, considering that in those histories which they wrote as touching the precedent Emperours, they haue not studied to speake truth, although they had not any occasion to hate them, considering that they liued a long time after their death. But let these contemners of truth write as them listeth, for that they seeme to take delight in that licence. For mine owne part I am intended to write nothing but the truth: neither stand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purposing in al truth and diligence to declare that which hath befallen our nation of the Iewes, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that haue proceeded with them. I will therefore returne to the discouerie of our affaires. Agrippa king of Emesene being dead the first yeere of the Emperour Neros raigne, his brother obtained the kingdom: Aristobulus the sonne of Herode king of Chalcis, had the gouernment of the signorie of the lesser Armenia from Neros hand. Cesar gaue Agrippa a certaine portion of Galilee, commanding those of Tiberias and Tarichæa to liue vnder him. Besides this, hee gaue him Iulias situate beyond Iordan, with fourteene boroughs neere adioyning thereunto.

BUt the affaires of Iudæa grewe daily worse and worse. For the countrey was replenished againe with theues, and enchanterers, who deceived the common people. Felix apprehended many of them daily, and caused them to bee executed and put to death. Hee tooke Eleazar also the sonne of Dinaus, who was captaine of those outlawes & theues that ranged in the countrey, and surprised him by a subtiltie. For Felix had giuen him his word, that he should in no sort be endangered: Whereupon he came and submitted himselfe, and was presently fettered and sent to Rome. And for that he had conceiued a displeasure against Jonathan the hie priest, who had diuers times admonished him to vse more circumspection in the gouernment of Iudæa, for feare he should be blamed by the people, for that he had required Cesar that Felix might be admitted to the gouernment, he thought it not amisse to cut off Jonathan, who continually solicited and vexed him. For this cause, he perswaded and bribed a certaine man called Dora, who was borne in Ierusalem, & was one of those in whom Jonathan reposed his most trust, to bring in certaine theues to murder Jonathan, who willingly listned to his demands; and desirous to gratifie the gouernour, by this meanes that ensueth brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certaine theues that came vp to Ierusalem, vnder colour to adore God, who carrying their swords closely hidden vnder their garments, accosted Jonathan & slew him. Now for that this murder was let slip, and not punished; from that day forward the theues resorted boldly to the solempne feasts, hauing their weapons hidden vnder their garments, and thronging in among the people, slew some of those who were their aduersaries; and other some to pleasure those, who had hired them with ready mony to rid them of those they misliked. And these outrages committed they not onely in other parts of the Citie, but in the temple likewise, where they slaughtered some who little suspected that any impietie should be committed in that place. For mine owne part, I thinke that God hath destroyed our Citie in detestation of that impietie: and for that he accounted the temple for an impure mansion place, hee hath sent vs the Romans, who haue let fire on the same to purge the Citie, and make vs slaues with our wives and children, intending thereby to teach vs wilddome by our owne miseries. Thus was the Citie filled with these thefts and murders. And as touching the enchanterers and deceiuers, they perswaded the common people to follow them into the desert, promising them to shew them signes and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto diuers gaue care, and at last suffered the penaltie of their folly. For Felix recalling them backe againe, punished them.

The theues also incited the people anew to make warre against the Romans, telling them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and spoiled diuers of those boroughs which opposed themselves against them. Against the Syrians that were in the same Citie, in that they stroue to haue an equall authoritie in the gouernment of the state as well as they. The Iewes pretended the title of superiority, because that Herod, who was a Iew, had builded the citie of Cæsarea: on the other side, the Syrians auowed the Iewes sayings to be true; but they replied also that Cæsarea was in times past called the tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Iew that inhabited the same. Which when the gouernours of that countrey heard, they laid hands on the authors of this sedition, as well of the one as of the other partie, and gaue them the bastinado, pacifying by this meanes the trouble for a little space. For the Iewes once more beeing puffed vp with their riches, & contemning the Syrians, iniuriously reuiled and prouoked them: on the other side, the Syrians beeing weaker in substance, but as great in hart (by reason the greatest number of those that bare armes with the Romans were Cæsareans & Sebastens) at sometimes brake out into opprobrious speeches against the Iewes, and at length the quarrell grew to that heat, that they cast stones one at another: so that on both sides diuers of them were both slaine and hurt; yet had the Iewes the vpper hand. Felix perceiuing that this debate might breed a warre, came on betwene them, requiring the Iewes to desist from further violence, and commanding his souldiers to beate downe those who should refuse to obey him: by which meanes a great number were slaine, and diuers taken prisoners. Moreover, he gaue his souldiers libertie to spoile, and rob diuers very rich haggates. The other Iewes, who besides their authoritie were renowned for their moderation, fearing least the like miserie should befall them, besought Felix to found a retreat, and to call in his souldiers, and to spare that which as yet remained, beeing sore grieved at that which had hapned: to which Felix condescended. At that same time king Agrippa gaue the priesthood to Ismael, the sonne of Phabeus. There arose also a dissension betwixt the high priests, and the other priests and gouernours of Ierusalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a troupe of proud & mutinous persons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of stones; so that no man might pacifie them. For all things were so out of order, as if there had beene no Magistrates in the citie: and the impudencie and audacioulnesse of the high priests permitted so much, that they sent their seruants into the granges, to seize the tenths that were due vnto the priests; whereby it came to passe, that some poore priests died of needesitie, and want: so much did the violence of the seditions at that time preuaile aboue all right.

The gouernment of Portius Festus: and of certaine murderers.

AFTER that Portius Festus had been sent by Nero to succed Felix in the gouernment of Iudæa, the chiefe of those Iewes that inhabited Cæsarea, repaired to Rome to accuse Felix: and without all doubt he had been punished for the iniuries hee had committed against the Iewes, if Nero had not pardoned him vpon his brother Pallas submission and intreatie, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefe amongst the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had some-times been Neros maister, & at that time was Secretarie of estate in the Greek tongue, by mighty bribes, to begge at Neros hand the reuocation of the right and title, which the Iewes enjoyed in the gouernment and administration of the common-weale. For which cause Berillus solicited the Emperour, & obtained a letter at his hands, which was the cause of those mischiefs that afterwards hapned in our nation. For the Iewes of Cæsarea, vnderstanding what commision the Syrians had gotten, were so much the more kindled and encouraged to make warre.

EAs soone therefore as Festus was arrived in Iudæa, hee found the country grieuouly afflicted with robberies, and the lower countrey was spoiled by sword and fire. The theues likewise at that time increased wondrously, and they vsed short swords after the manner of a Persian Cycmetre, and crooked like the Roman faulchion; with which they slew diuers men. For thrusting themselves into the presse of people that came in great multitudes on the festiuall daies to celebrate Gods seruice, they killed those very easily whom they list; and oftentimes repairing to their enemies villages, they spoiled and burnt the same. But Festus sent diuers forces both of horse and foote against certaine Iewes, that were seduced by an enchanter, who had promised the security and repose from all their troubles and molestations, if so be they would follow him into the desert; who slew both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time king Agrippa erected a stately building, within the palace at Ierusalem, neere vnto the porch. This palace in times past appertained to the Asmonæans; & was situate in a high place with a goodlie prospect, from from whence they that lifted, might with pleasure behold the whole citie of Ierusalem, wherein the king rooke great delight, & beheld from thence that which was done in the temple. The chiefeft men of Ierusalem seeing this building, were fore displeased. For neither doth our custome or law permit that any one should looke on that which is done in the temple, and especially forbidder that no man should behold the sacrifices and oblations. They therefore builded a high wall vpon the gallerie, which was within the temple on the West side, which did not onely dampe the sight of the roiall chamber, but also that of the gallery without the temple on the West side, where the Romaines kept guard neere vnto the temple on the festiuall daies. Herewith was king Agrippa fore displeased, and the gouernour Festus farre more then he, who commanded them to pull downe the wall. But they belought him that he would giue them licence to send their Embassadors to Nero, to this intent, alleading that it was impossible for them to liue, if any part of their temple should be beaten downe. Which beeing granted them, they sent tenne of their chiefeft nobilitie, and with them Ismael the high priest, and Chelcias the Treasurer of the temple, vnto Nero: who no sooner heard their sute, but hee pardoned them, not onely for that they had done, but he commaunded that the building should remaine as it was. Shee therefore commaunded the tenne Embassadors to returne, and kept Chelcias and Ismael for pledges with her. The king vnderstanding how all things had past, gaue the high priesthood to Ioseph, surnamed Cabi, which was the sonne of Simon, who in times past had bene high Priest.

CHAP. VIII.

The government of Albinus.

Albinus gouernour of Iudæa. Ananus the son of Ananus the high priest Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 16 al. 21. Ananus had five sons that succeeded him in the priesthood. The year of the world, 4025. after Christs birth, 53. James the brother of our Lord, stoned. Ananus accused before Albinus.

Iesus the son of Damneus possessed Ananus place.

Some forcibly gather the tenths of the priests.

Aesar beeing aduertised of Festus death, sent Albinus to gouerne Iudæa. But king Agrippa commaunded Ioseph to lead a priuate life, and aduanced in his steed a certaine man called Ananus, the sonne of Ananus, who is reported to haue been most happy. For hee had five sonnes, all which supplied the place of the high priest, after himselfe had long time before them enjoyed the roome: the like whereof hath neuer happened to any of our high priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was aduanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the sect of the Sadduces, who (as we haue already declared) were amongst all other the Iewes the most seuer in executing iustice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had a fit occasion offered him to doe what him list after Festus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet vpon his way. Hee therefore ascended and sat downe in the tribunall, assisted by the Iudges, and caused James the brother of Iesus, who was called Christ, to appeare before him, with certaine others; and accused them for transgressing the law, and blasphemy against God, and caused them to be stoned to death. They that were men of vpright conscience within the citie, and diligent obseruers of the law, were very much displeased with this act, and sent secretly vnto the king, beseeching him to prohibit Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: for that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, beeing on his way from Alexandria, to enforme him that it was not lawfull for Ananus to assemble the councill without his licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to punish him. And for the same cause king Agrippa dispossessed him of the Priesthood, after hee had held the same for the space of three months, and in his steed he established Iesus the sonne of Damneus. After that Albinus was arriued in Ierusalem, he employed all his care and studie to pacifie the country, by executing diuers of the thieues.

But the high priest Ananias daily increased in honour and credit, and purchased the good will of the citizens by his liberalitie and great gifts. But hee had certaine mischieuous seruants about him, who conuersed with those that were most intemperate and audacious, who repairing from graunge to graunge, tooke vp many tenths that belonged to the Priests, and beate those that refused to render them. The priests vsed no lesse force then did their seruants, hauing no man that might restraints them: whereby it came to passe that the priests, who were before time maintained by the tenths, died at that time for want of victuals. And the thieues renewing their entrance into the citie by night, during the feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of cap-tain Eleazar alie, who was Ananias son, who was the high Priest. And hauing bound him, ledde him

OF THE IEWES. THE XX. BOOKE.

A him out of the Citie, sending Ananias word, that they would deliuer his Secretary, if hee would labour so much with Albinus, as to deliuer them their ten companions then prisoners, who were taken by him. To the performance whereof, Ananias perswaded Albinus by manifest reason: and by obtaining his demaund, increased and begat a number of miseries. For the thieues vsed all the wile means they could deuise in apprehending some one of Ananias houle; and when they had taken any one of them alie, they would not deliuer him, except before they might haue one of their owne deliuered. So that increasing both in courage and number, they waxed more and more insolent to afflict the countrey.

At the same time king Agrippa enlarged the citie of Cæsarea, surnamed Philippi, and in honour of Nero called it Neronias. Hee builded also to his great charge a Theater in fauor of the Berytians, wherein euery yeere hee spent diuers thousands of siluer in sports. Hee distributed oyle and corne to euery one of the people, and garnished all the citie with most antique and goodly counterfaiert portraitures vpon the porches. Briefely, hee welny transported into the citie all the ornaments of the rest of his kingdom; for which cause his subjects beganne to hate him, seeing hee depriued them of their rare ornaments to adorne one strange citie. Iesus the sonne of Gamaliel succeeded in the priesthood, which the king had giuen him, and taken away from Iesus the sonne of Damneus: who resigned him his place against his will. Whereupon there arose a discord betwene them. For hauing assembled their resolute followers, they grew from bitter words to fatall blowes and stones. But amongst all the rest, Ananias was the richest in wealth, and by his bountie reconciled the more vnto him. Costobarus also & Saul gathered each of the a band of rascal-liance with Agrippa, they were well beloued. For which cause they were outrageous & violent, in spoiling and rauishing the fortunes of the weaker sort. From this time forward the estate of our citie grew desperate, encreasing daily more and more in wickednesse.

When Albinus vnderstood that Gessius Florus came to succeed him, desirous that they of Ierusalem should acknowledge some good turne at his hands, hee called before him all those prisoners that were notoriously guiltie of murder, & caused the to be executed. As for those that were imprisoned vpon any small or slight cause, vpon payment of their fines, he deliuered them: and in so doing, the prison was cleane of malefactors, and from that time the country remained full of thieues and robbers.

D The Leuites, who were ordained to sing the hymnes vnto God, solicited the king to assemble the councill, and thereby to permit them to wear the linnen Robe, which the priests were accustomed to vse, telling him that such an ordinance would dignifie his estate very much, in that hee would be alwaies famous in memory of this new establishment. This sute of theirs was easily respected & admitted: For the king after he had consulted with those, who were his assistants, suffered the Leuites that sung the hymnes, to lay aside their ordinarie Robe, and to apperrell themselves in linnen, as best liked them. Hee permitted also that another part of the Leuites, who intended the seruice of the temple, should learne to sing the hymnes and psalmes according as they had required. All which he did contrarie to the ordinances of the countrey, which beeing broken, there was nought else to be expected but punishment.

E At that time was the building of the Temple finished: And the people percciuing that more then eigheteen thousand workmen should be idle, and depriued of wages, vvhcreupon they were accustomed to liue in trauailing in the building of the temple: on the other side, beeing loath to reserue their money thorow the feare they had of the Romans; to provide for these vworkmen (in the entertainment of whom they resolved to employ their treasure: for if any one of them trauailed but one howre in the day, he was suddainly paid his wages) they requested the King that it would please him to repaire the Easterne gate on the outward part of the temple, situate in a descent, the wals whereof were in height foure hundred cubits, made of square stones of white marble, from the toppeto the bottome; and euery stone twentie foote long; and sixe foote thick.

F This worke was first builded by king Salomon; who was the first that builded our temple. But the king, to whom Claudius Cesar had giuen the commission of building the temple, thinking with himselfe that it was verie easie to breake it downe, but very hard to build it vp, & that to reedifie the porch, it would cost much time and expence, hee denied their request, permitting them neuertheless to pauer their citie with broad stone. He tooke the priesthood from Iesus the sonne of Gamaliel, and gaue it to Matthias the sonne of Theophilus. In whole time the warre betwixt the Romanes and Iewes grew to the first head:

The yeere of the world, 4026. after Christ's Nativity, 64. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 18. The succession & number of the high priests among the Iewes. Aaron and his progenie. There were 83 high priests in all.

But I thinke it not amisse, but very answerable to the course of this present historie, to speake of the priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number vntill the end of the waite. The first of them was Aaron, Moses brother, after whose death his children succeeded him, & from that time forward the honour hath continued with their successours. For it is a law obserued by our ancestors, that no man should be admitted to the priesthood, except he be of Aarons posteritie: for albeit he were a king, if so be that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtaine the priesthood. All the priests after Aaron, who (as we haue said) was the first, vntill Phanias, who the seditious created priest in the time of the war, haue been in number 83: whereof 13 haue executed the office from the time that Moses erected Gods tabernacle in the desert, vntill such time as arriuing in Iudaea, king Salomon builded a temple to God. For in the beginning, the high priesthood continued with the possessors for terme of life: but afterwards, although the priestes were yet aliae, yet were there other successors planted in their roomes. These 13 were of Aarons posteritie, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first government was Aristocratie, which is the government of the nobilitie: afterwards a Monarchie; and finally, a royall government. The number of yeeres wherein these 13 flourished, were sixe hundred and twelve yeeres, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, vnder the conduct of Moses, vntill the edification of the temple that was builded in Ierusalem by king Salomon.

After these 13 high priests, there were 18 others; who after Salomons time succeeded one after another, vntill the time that Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, hauing encamped before the citie, tooke the same, and burned the temple, and transported our nation into Babylon, & led away the high priest Iosedech prisoner. The time of the priesthood, and continuance of these 18, was foure hundredth, sixtie sixe yeeres, sixe moneths, and ten daies: so long as the Iewes haue had the royall gouernment. After the surprisall of Ierusalem by the Babylonians, vntill such time as Cyrus king of Persia dismissed the Iewes, and gaue them leaue to returne from Babylon into their owne countrey, with permission to reedifie their temple, there are 70 yeeres: and at that time the captiues being returned, Iesus the sonne of Iosedech tooke vpon him the high priesthood, who with those of his posteritie to the number of fiftene, haue gouerned in a Democratic or popular estate, vntill the time of Antiochus surnamed Eupator, for the space of foure hundredth & fourteen yeeres. This Antiochus was the first, who with his generall Lysias displaced Onias, surnamed Melaneus, of his priesthood; commanding him to be slaine at Beryth, and after hee had driuen his sonne out of the succession, he established Iacim high priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race; but not of his familie. For this cause Onias, the sonne of Onias, and nephew to the deceased Onias, retired himselfe into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometor and Cleopatra his wife, he perswaded them to build a temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not vnlike to that of Ierusalem, & to create a high priest in the same: of which temple in Egypt, we haue made very oftentimes mention. After that Iacim had held the priesthood for the space of three yeeres, he died without successor. For the Citie remained leuen yeeres without a high priest. Again, the Almonians recovered the gouernment of their nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Jonathan high priest, who exercised the office seauen yeeres: but afterwards he was slaine by an ambush, and traison conspired against him by Tryphon, as we haue declared else where. After him, Simon his brother vnderooke the priesthood, who was not long after slaine treacherously by his sonne in law at a banquet. After him succeeded his sonne Hircanus, who enioying this dignitie for the space of thirtie one yeeres, died when hee was very old, leauing behind him Judas, surnamed Aristobulus; who dying by sickness, left his brother Alexander his heire, both of the kingdome and high priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the royall gouernment, he enioyed both dignities one whole yeere. For this Judas surnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the diadem on his head, causing himselfe to be called a king. The which Alexander did continue: for he also ioyned the kingdome with the high priesthood, and reigned twentie-seauen yeeres: and feeling himselfe draw neere to his death, hee left in Alexandras his wiues hands to dispose of the priesthood as shee pleased. Shee therefore bestowed it on Hircanus; and as touching the kingdome, she kept it in her owne hands nine yeeres, and afterwards died. Her sonne Hircanus was high priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his brother Aristobulus made warre against him; and hauing overcome him, hee tooke the kingdome from him, and not onelic seized the crowne, but the priesthood. After hee had reigned three yeeres, and as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Ierusalem, and tooke it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound vnto Rome with his children. After which he restored the

A the priesthood once more to Hircanus, committing the gouernment of the nation vnto his hands, forbidding him in the meane space to weare the diadem. Besides the first nine yeeres, Hircanus gouerned twenty and foure, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus princes of the Parthians, passed Euphrates, and made warre against Hircanus, and tooke him aliae prisoner, and made Antigonus, Aristobulus sonne king. But after he had gouerned three yeeres and three moneths, Solius and Herod took him aliae perforce, & Antonius sent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created king by the Romans, there was neuer any high Priest created of the posterity of the Almonians (for he gaue the high priesthood to certain men of obscure and base condition, who were of the order of the priests) Aristobulus onely excepted. This Aristobulus was Hircanus nephew, who was prisoner among the Parthians; & hauing giuen him the Priesthood he married himself with Mariamme his sister, to the intent to continue himself in the good liking of the people in remembrance of Hircanus; but afterwards fearing, lest all of them should turne to Aristobulus side, he caused him to be slaine, by finding out a meane to cause him to be strangled, such time as he bathed himselfe in a fish pond neere to Iericho, as we haue declared before this. After him he bestowed the priesthood no more on any of the line of the Almonians, Aristobulus his sonne followed his fathers steps in respect of the priesthood, and from that time forward the Romans haue enioyed the souerainie ouer Iewry. All they then that haue exercised the priesthood from Herods time, vntill the day that Titus tooke the Citie and the temple, haue been in all twenty and eight: All the continuance of their gouernment was one hundredth and seuen yeeres. Certain of these gouerned during Herods life, and in the daies of Aristobulus his sonne: but after these two were dead, the gouernment was Aristocraticall, or of the nobilitie, wherein the Priests had the gouernment ouer the whole nation. Thus much haue we thought meet to speak at this time as touching the high priests.

CHAP. IX.

How Florus Albinus successor, offered many iniuries to the Iewes, which constrained them to take armes.

Essius Florus being sent by Nero to succeed Albinus, filled all Iudaea with many mischiefs and miseries: He was a Glazomenian borne, and was married to a certaine woman called Cleopatra, no lesse mischieuous then himselfe: who being beloued by Poppa Neros wife, obtained this dignitie for him. He behaued himselfe so outrageously and violently in all his gouernment, that thorow the great iniustice he committed, the Iewes praised Albinus as if he had been their benefactor. For he concealed his mischiefe, taking care least it should wholly be concealed or discoloured: but Gessius Florus behaued himselfe in such sort, as if hee had beene sent to make open shewe and sale of his villanies, publishing his iniustice in the eares of our nation, without omitting either rapine or iniustice in execution and inflicting punishment on the innocent. For, he was pitiless and couetous, and made no difference between noble & ignoble, and was not ashamed to be partaker with the eues of whom there were diuers that made it their profession, to steale without any feare, in that they were assured of their safetie, because he was partaker with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him, in fort as the poore Iewes being vnable to endure the insolent rapines and spoiling of their goods that they receiued by these theues, were constrained to abandon their owne houses, and to flie their countrey, and remain in some more commodious place of security, yea though it were among strangers. What need I speake any more? Hee that constrained vs to raise our swords against the Romans, was Florus, who made his account that it was better for them to die all at once in great troups, then to perish by little & little. In briebe, the war began the second yeere of the gouernment of Florus in that prouince, which was the twelfth yeere of Neros Empire. But they that desire to know exactly all that which we haue been constrained both to do & suffer, may peruse my books as touching the Warres of the Iews. For which cause in this place I wil end this ancient history, after which I haue begun to describe the history of the Warre.

This ancient history containeth all that which hath beene reported to be done since the first creation of man, vntill the twelfth yeere of Neros Empire, omitting nothing that hath befallen the Iewes, as well in Aegypt as in Syria, and Palestine. All that likewise, which we haue beene enforced to suffer vnder the Assyrians and Babylonians; as also our estate vnder the Persians & Macedons, and finally vnder the Romans. All this, as I suppose, I haue compiled and gathered together with carefull diligence, and I haue enforced my self to recite the number of those, who haue haue been high Priest for the space of two thousand yeeres. I haue also collected the succession of kings, their actions and governments, with the power of their monarchies, according as it is amply described in holy scriptures, as also I haue promised in the beginning of my historie. Furthermore, I dare boldly say, that what soeuer I haue set downe, is so assured, that there is no man either few or of what nation soeuer, yea although he should haue employed the vttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same vnto the Greekes, then I haue done. For in their confessions & opinions who are of our nation, I haue such knowledge in that which concerneth our doctrine, as I surpass them all. And as touching the Grecian disciplines, I haue studied & learnt the tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar and fit pronounciation of the same, for that I haue liued in the countrey. For amongst vs we make but slender reckoning of those, who are exercised in diuers tongues, for that this study is accounted prophane by vs, and common not only vnto free persons, but also vnto slaues: and they onely are esteemed to haue profited in wisdom; who fully know the contents of the lawe, and who can expound the holy scriptures. For this cause, although diuers haue traualled in this exercise of writing histories, yet are there scarcely two or three of them that haue written successefully, and haue recciued the fruits of their labours. And it may be that it shall not be misthought of, if I freely speake somewhat of my progeny & life, considering that there are men at this day liuing, who can approve or reprove me in that I set down. And in this place I will make an end of mine ancient historie, which I haue reduced into twenty bookes, containing sixtie thousand verses. And if God grant me life, I will shortly entreat of our wars, and the euents of the same that haue hapned hitherto, which is the thirtieth yeere of Domitianus Caesar's Empire, and the fiftie sixt yeere of mine age. Moreover I am resolu'd to discover in foure bookes the diuers opinions of the sects of the Iewes, as touching God and his essence, and our lawes: according to which certaine things are permitted vs, and other some are forbidden.

THE LIFE OF FLAVIUS IOSEPHVS, THE SONNE OF MATTHIAS, WRITTEN BY HIMSELFE.

NOW therefore that I am not basely but nobly descended, being both on the father and mothers side, deriued from the line of the priests: and for as much as some are accustomed to draw the ground of their nobility, the one from this man, the other from that; so among our nation the marke of true nobilitie is to deriue a mans pedigree from the priesthood. Touching my selfe, I am not onely lineally issued from the Priests, but I draw my original from them, who amongst the foure & twenty ranks or families of priests iustly challenge the superiority. Moreover, by my mothers side I am of the blood royall. For the heires of the Alimonians, from whom she is descended, haue for a long time exercised the priesthood and princely power among our nation. I will likewise make it knowe, how my predecessors haue succeeded the one after the other. My great grandfathers father was Simon, surnamed Pfellus, that is the stutterer, who liued at such time as Hircanus the high Priest the first of that name, & the sonne of Simon the high priest, was in office. This Simon Pfellus had nine sonnes: the one of these was Matthias, surnamed Aphias. This Matthias tooke to wife the daughter of the high priest Jonathan, by whom he had one sonne, who was Matthias surnamed Curtus, who was borne in the first yeere of Hircanus priesthood. Matthias begat Ioseph the ninth yeere of Alexandras government, and of Ioseph came Matthias the tenth yeere of the raigne of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me the first yeere of the Empire of Caius Caesar. I likewise haue three sonnes, mine eldest is Hircanus, who was borne in the fourth: my next, Iustus, who was borne in the seuenth: & Agrippa my last was borne in the ninth yeere of Vespasians Empire. This genealogie of mine doe I in this manner propose according as I haue found it written in the public registers, to put them to silence who shall pretend to reprove or detract the same.

My father Matthias was not onely famous for his expresse nobilitie, but hath also been praised by reason of his iustice and authoritie in Ierusalem, which is the mother city of all the rest in our country. My bringing vp during my tender yeeres was with Matthias, who was my brother by the same father and mother, with whom I happily profited in all kinde of science, having a good memorie and a quick apprehending spirit: so that, being as yet a child of fourteene yeeres of age, I was praised by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the priests and noblest citizens alwaies attended about me, to receiue certaine exact instructions from me in any thing that concerned our ordinances. About the age of sixteene yeeres my desire was to haue a search and insight into the sects of our nation, which (as I haue said) are three: the first of the Pharisees, which is the chiefe. The second of the Sadduces. And the third of the Essenes. For I truly thought with my selfe, that I might easily choose the better of the three, at such time as I had bene exercised and acquainted with them all: for which cause with great abstinence and no lesse labour, I passed thorow them all: and not content with this experience, after I had heard that a certaine man called Banus liued in the desert, clothing himselfe with that which the trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yeelded him, washing himselfe oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himselfe chaste: I began to imitate his course of life, and after I had liued with him for the space of three yeeres, and satisfied my desires, at last I returned into the citie.

to learning.

At the age of nineteene yeeres, I began to intermeddle with publicke affaires, following the sect of the Pharisees, which very neerely resembleth that sect among the Graecians, who are called Stoicks. After I was sixe and twenty yeeres old, it was my fortune to repaire to Rome vpon this occasion that ensueth: During such time as Felix gouerned Iudaea, there were certaine priests my familiars, men of much honour & more vertue, who vpon some slight occasion were bound and sent to Rome by his commandement, to answer to that which was objected against them in Cæsars presence. Whereupon I being desirous to labour for their liberty, having especial intelligence, that notwithstanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulness that pietie which they ought to God, but liued on figges and nuttes: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountered with many great and grievous hazards by sea. For the ship, wherein I sailed, was wrackt in the midst of the Adriaticke sea, and there were about six hundred of vs that swamme all night long, and vpon the day spring by Gods providence a Cyrenian ship came in sight, and both I and certaine others to the number of fourescore ouerswimming the rest, were taken vp into it and saued. After I had in this sort escaped: I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Iew borne, who was a plaier, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose meanes insinuating my selfe into Poppeas knowledge, who was Cæsars wife, I determined to beseech her to procure those Priests liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her meanes recovered their present liberty: and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my countrey. There found I the commonweale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and diuers too prone and readie to rebell and forget their allegiance to the Romans. I inforced my selfe to repress the seditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, representing before their eyes the qualitie of those, against whom they enterprised their war, with whom they neither might compare in experience of warre, neither in good fortune: for this cause I aduised them not to hazard and overthrow their countrey by their rashnes and rage, and with it their posterities and themselves.

To this effect spake I vnto them, and instantly intreated them to forsake their vntamed resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this warre would redound to our vtter ruine; but I preuailed nothing with them. For the fury of desperate and dissolute men preuailed above reason: for which cause fearing least by continuall inforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion among them, as if I fauoured their enemies; fearing likewise least if they should lay hold on me, they should be put to death, seeing that the sort of Antonia was already seized vpon by the seditious; I retired my selfe into the inward part of the temple. In proceesse of time, after Manahem and the chiefest among the theues were put to death, I came out again from the temple, and conuerſed with the priests, and chiefest Pharisees, who were surprisid with great feare. And grievously were we dismayed, when we saw the people in armes: and being vncertaine what to do, and wanting the meanes to pacifie these mutinies, and apparently perceiving their manifest danger, both I and the Pharisees told them our opinion was answerable to theirs, and counsailed them to containe themselves in peace, and not to prouoke the enemy. For our hope was that Gesius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chastise those peace-breakers. But as soone as he arrived, and had fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men were slaine: whereupon grew the vtter ruine of our whole nation. For such as desired the warre, were puffed vp with that victory, and conceiued an assured hope that in the end they should overcome the Romans. Besides that, this ensuing occasion presented it selfe. The inhabitants of the cities that bordered vpon Syria, laid hands on those Iewes that dwelt amongst them, and slue both them, their wiues, & children, without any iust cause or crime committed by them.

For they had not conspired any waies or intended to revolt from the Romans, or to vse any hostilitie or any secret conspiracie against any of those, with whome they were conuersant. But among all the rest, the citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impietie and wickednes. For being besieged without by certaine of the Iewes, they inforced those Iewes that inhabited amongst them to take armes, & to charge those of their own nation (which is both prohibited & vnlawfull by our lawes) who fighting against them discomfited them: but after this overthrow, they in such sort falsified and forgot their faith, that they had giuen to their associates and fellow citizens, that they slew euery mothers sonne of them, to the number of many thousands. The like misfortune also fell vpon those Iewes that inhabited Damasco. But of this we haue more amply spoken in those our bookes, which we haue written of the warres of the Iewes, and at this M present I make mention hereof, intending to signifie and certainly perswade the readers, that the warre which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a resolute intent and purpose, but for the most part of an inforced necessitie.

After that Gesius was overcome (as we haue heretofore declared) the chiefest men of Ierusalem perceiving that the theues made a partie among the seditious, and were strongly and plentifully armed and prouided, they began to feare least if they should be found disarmed, they should

A should sodainly be ouerthrowne by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards: and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly reuolted from the Romanes; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they sent me with two other priests Ioazar and Iudas, who were both virtuous and honourable men, to perswade the mutinous to lay by their armes, & to let them know that it was more behouefull for the good of the nation, that such men as were in authority and reputation, should haue the keeping thereof. The resolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwaies ready vpon all occasions, but that they expected vntill they were certified what the Romans intended to doe.

B With this commission and such like instructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no small hazard in respect of their countrey, for that they of Galilee had resolved to forrage the same in regard of their league of friendship continued with the Romanes, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus Gouverneur of Syria. But I deliuered them all of that feare and appealed the common people by permitting them, to lend at all times when they pleased, their hostages to Gesius, who lay at Dora a Citie of Phœnicia. I found likewise that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in armes, vpon this occasion following. There were in that Citie three different factions, the one of the nobilitie, whose chieftaine was Iulius Capella, & all those that accompanied him, that is to say, Herode the sonne of Miarus; Herode the sonne of Gabalus, and Compſus the sonne of Compſus (for Crispus his brother, who in times past had been gouernour for Agrippa turned the Great, was amongst his possessions on the other side of Iordan) at these I lay gaue counsel at that time to subscribe to the Romans authority, & to obey their king. But Pisus would no waies accord to this aduice, in regard of his sonne Iustus: for naturally he was vaine-glorious. The second faction was of the common sort, who concluded vpon war.

C Iustus, Pisus son, who was the ringleader of the third faction, carried himselfe very doubtfully as touching the warre; yet notwithstanding he sought and thirsted after innouation, hoping that by a change he should encrease his power. Presenting himselfe therefore in the midst of the multitude, he inforced himselfe to perfwade the common sort, that their Citie had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and that during the daies of Herode the Terrarch, who founded the same, it was the chiefest Citie, whose pleasure it was that the Citie of Sephoris should yeeld obedience to that of Tiberias. Furthermore, he showed that they had not lost that preheminance in the time of king Agrippa the father, but had continued the same till Felix obtained the gouernment of Iudæa. But D for the present wherein they had been giuen by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had fallen and lost their superiortie. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the soueraignie of Galilee, after that she acknowledged the Roman gouernment, who had abolished the table royall and publike registers. By these words and others of like nature, inforced against king Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, signifying vnto them that the opportunitie invited them to take armes, to the end that being associated with the Galileans, they might make themselves Lords, for that all of them would willingly ioyne themselves with them, thorow the hatred they bare to the Sephorites, on whom they would reuenge themselves with great force, because they continued in their allegiance, which they promised to the Romans.

E And by these words he wooon the peoples hearts vnto him: for he was a man that was very eloquent, and by his subtiltie and pollicke discourse, easily ouerthrew all that which his aduersaries produced against him. For he was not ignorant of those sciences that are knowen vnto the Greekes: but trusting to his wiiedome and good discourse, hee beganne to discouer how all things had past at that time, to the intent that by such colourable insinuations he might smother the truth. But in the proceesse of our discourse, wee will declare that he was a man of a dissolute life, and that by his and his brothers meanes, he wanted little of vtterly ouerthrowing his countrey. When as therefore this Iustus had perswaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take armes; and had constrained diuers men likewise, who were of the contrarie opinion, to do the like, he issued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadareneans and Hippenians, that are situate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this estate was Tiberias: and as touching Gischala, their estate and affaires were brought to this issue. Iohn the sonne of Leui seeing some of the Citizens waxen proud by meanes of their reuolt from the Romanes, laboured to restrain them, and required them to continue in their allegiance: but notwithstanding all his perswasion and diligence, he could not containe them. For the nations round about them, as the Gadareneans, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians assembled a great armie and with the same assailed Gischala, and took it by force: and after they had consumed it by fire and vterly destroyed the same, they returned euery one to their dwelling places. Iohn being fore displeased with this act, armed all sent to Rome by his commandement, to answer to that which was objected against them in Cæsars presence. Whereupon I being desirous to labour for their liberty, having especial intelligence, that notwithstanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulness that pietie which they ought to God, but liued on figges and nuttes: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountered with many great and grievous hazards by sea. For the ship, wherein I sailed, was wrackt in the midst of the Adriatique sea, and there were about sixe hundred of vs that swamme all night long, and vpon the day spring by Gods providence a Cyrenian ship came in sight, and both I and certaine others to the number of fourescore outswimming the rest, were taken vp into it and saued. After I had in this sort escaped: I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Iew borne, who was a plaier, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose meanes insinuating my selfe into Poppeas knowledge, who was Cæsars wife, I determined to beseech her to procure those Priests liberties, with all expedition: which done, I by her meanes recovered their present liberty: and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my country. There found I the commonweale too much addicted to factions and troubles, and diuers too prone and readie to rebel and forget their allegiance to the Romans. I enforced my selfe to repress the seditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, representing before their eyes the qualitie of those, against whom they enterprised their war, with whom they neither might compare in experience of warre, neither in good fortune: for this cause I aduised them not to hazard and overthrow their country by their rashnes and rage, and with it their posterities and themselves.

To this effect spake I vnto them, and instantly intreated them to forsake their vntamed resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this warre would redound to our vtter ruine; but I preuailed nothing with them. For the fury of desperate and dissolute men preuailed above reason: for which cause fearing least by continuall enforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion among them, as if I fauoured their enemies; fearing likewise least if they should lay hold on me, they should be put to death, seeing that the fort of Antonia was already seized vpon by the seditious; I retired my selfe into the inward part of the temple. In proceesse of time, after Manahem and the chiefeft among the theues were put to death, I came out again from the temple, and conuersed with the priests, and chiefeft Pharisees, who were surprisid with great feare. And grievously were we dismayed, when we saw the people in armes; and being vncertaine what to do, and wanting the meanes to pacifie these mutinies, and apparantly perceiving their manifest danger, both I and the Pharisees told them our opinion was answerable to theirs, and counselled them to containe themselves in peace, and not to prouoke the enemy. For our hope was that Gesius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chastise those peace-breakers. But as soone as he arrived, and had fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men were slaine: whereupon grew the vtter ruine of our whole nation. For such as desired the warre, were puffed vp with that victory, and conceived an assured hope that in the end they should overcome the Romans. Besides that, this ensuing occasion presented it selfe. The inhabitants of the cities that bordered vpon Syria, laid hands on those Iewes that dwelt amongst them, and slue both them, their wiues, & children, without any iust cause or crime committed by them. For they had not conspired any waies or intended to revolt from the Romans, or to vse any hostilitie or any secret conspiracie against any of those, with whom they were conuersant. But among all the rest, the citizens of Scythopolis exceeded all other in impietie and wickednes. For being besieged without by certaine of the Iewes, they enforced those Iewes that inhabited amongst them to take armes, & to charge those of their own nation (which is both prohibited & vnlawfull by our lawes) who fighting against them discomfited them: but after this overthrow, they in such sort falsified and forgot their faith, that they had giuen to their associates and fellow citizens, that they slew euery mothers sonne of them, to the number of many thousands. The like misfortune also fell vpon those Iewes that inhabited Damasco. But of this we haue more amply spoken in those our bookes, which we haue written of the warres of the Iewes, and at this present I make mention hereof, intending to signifie and certainly perswade the readers, that the warre which was waged with the Romanes, proceeded not of a resolute intent and purpose, but for the most part of an enforced necessitie.

After that Gesius was overcome (as we haue heretofore declared) the chiefeft men of Ierusalem perceiving that the theues made a partie among the seditious, and were strongly and plentifully armed and prouided, they began to feare least if they should be found disarmed, they should should sodainly be ouerthrowne by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards: and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly reuolted from the Romanes; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they sent me with two other priests Ioazar and Iudas, who were both veracious and honourable men, to perswade the mutinous to lay by their armes, & to let them know that it was more behoouefull for the good of the nation, that such men as were in authority and reputation, should haue the keeping thereof. The resolution that was taken by them was, that they had them alwaies ready vpon all occasions, but that they expected vntill they were certified what the Romanes intended to doe.

With this commission and such like instructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no small hazard in respect of their country, for that they of Galilee had resolved to forrage the same in regard of their league of friendship continued with the Romanes; and contrasted and ratified by Senius Gallus Gouverneur of Syria. But I deliuered them all of that feare and appeased the common people by permitting them, to send at all times when they pleased, their hostages to Gesius, who lay at Dora a Citie of Phœnicia. I found likewise that the inhabitants of Tiberias were already in armes, vpon this occasion following. There were in that Citie three different factions, the one of the nobilitie, whose chiefeftaine was Iulius Capella, & all those that accompanied him, that is to say, Herode the sonne of Miarus; Herode the sonne of Gabalus, and Compfus the sonne of Compfus (for Crispus his brother, who in times past had been gouernour for Agrippa turned the Great, was amongst his possessions on the other side of Iordan) at these I lay gaue counsel at that time to subscribe to the Romanes authority, & to obey their king. But Pisilus would no waies accord to this aduice, in regard of his sonne Iustus: for naturally he was vaine-glorious. The second faction was of the common sort, who concluded vpon war. Iustus, Pisilus son, who was the ringleader of the third faction, carried himselfe very doubtfully as touching the warre; yet notwithstanding he fought and thirsted after innouation, hoping that by a change he should encrease his power. Presenting himselfe therefore in the midst of the multitude, he enforced himselfe to perswade the common sort, that their Citie had alwaies belonged to Galilee, and that during the daies of Herode the Tetrarch, who founded the same, it was the chiefeft Citie, whose pleasure it was that the Citie of Sephoris should yeeld obedience to that of Tiberias. Furthermore, he aduised that they had not lost that preheminance in the time of king Agrippa the father, but had continued the same till Felix obtained the gouernment of Iudæa. But for the present wherein they had been giuen by Nero to the yonger Agrippa, they had fallen and lost their superioritie. For the Citie of Sephoris obtained the soueraignie of Galilee, after that she acknowledged the Roman gouernment, who had abolished the table royall and publike regifters. By these words and others of like nature, enforced against king Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, signifying vnto them that the opportunitie invited them to take armes, to the end that being associated with the Galilæans, they might make themselves Lords, for that all of them would willingly ioyne themselves with them, thorow the hatred they bare to the Sephorites, on whom they would reuenge themselves with great force, because they continued in their allegiance, which they promised to the Romanes.

And by these words he wooed the peoples hearts vnto him: for he was a man that was very eloquent, and by his subtiltie and polittike discourse, easily ouerthrew all that which his aduersaries produced against him. For he was not ignorant of those sciences that are knowen vnto the Greekes: but trusting to his wisdom and good discourse, hee beganne to discouer how all things had past at that time, to the intent that by such colourable insinuations he might smother the truth. But in the proceesse of our discourse, wee will declare that he was a man of a dissolute life, and that by his and his brothers meanes, he wanted little of vterly ouerthrowing his country. When as therefore this Iustus had perswaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take armes; and had constrained diuers men likewise, who were of the contrarie opinion, to do the like, he issued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadareneans and Hippenians, that are situate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this estate was Tiberias: and as touching Gischala, their estate and affaires were brought to this issue. Iohn the sonne of Leui seeing some of the Citizens waxen proud by meanes of their reuolt from the Romanes, laboured to reframe them, and required them to continue in their allegiance: but notwithstanding all his perswasion and diligence, he could not containe them. For the nations round about them, as the Gadareneans, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians assembled a great armie, and with the same assailed Gischala; and tooke it by force: and after they had consumed it by fire and vterly destroyed the same, they returned euery one to their dwelling places: Iohn being fore displeased with this act, armed all Varus iniuliy executeth him that brought the letters. Varus tyranny in gouerning the countrey. Varus seeketh to conceale his power and tyranny.

But those of Gamala persecuted in their faith towards the Romans, for the occasion that ensued. Philip the sonne of Iacim, who gouerned vnder king Agrippa, elcaping beyond all opinion, and flying to the royall palace in Ierusalem at such time as it was besieged, fell into another great danger; to wit, to be slaine by Manahem, and those theeeues that were with him: but certaine Babylonians his kinsmen being at that time in Ierusalem, hindered the theeeues from executing their purpose at that time. When as therefore Philip had sojourned there for the space of foure daies, on the fift he fled away, disguizing himselfe in a false haire, for feare he should be discovered: And as soone as he was arrived in one of those villages which was of his owne possession, situate neere vnto the mount Gamala, he sent for certaine of his subiects to make their repaire vnto him. But God would not permit it; but for Philips greater good, he crossed the scope of his intent, which otherwise had been the ruine of many: for being surprisid by a sodain feuer, he committed certaine letters of his, written to Agrippa and Bernice who were yet but young to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliuer them to Varus, who was put in trust by the King and Queene, to administer the affaires of their kingdome, for that they were gone to Beryth to meete with Gesius. As soone therefore as he had receiued Philips letters, and understood that he was escaped, hee tooke it very hardly, for that he thought it would bee said that the king and the Queene had no vse of him since Philip was arrived. He therefore brought him that had the charge of these letters, into the peoples presence, objecting against him that he had forged that writing, alleading that he falsely lied in that he reported that Philip was in Ierusalem, making warre with the Iewes against the Romans: and for that cause he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignorant of the cause why his free-man did not return, sent another with letters, to the intent he might discover what was become of his first messenger, & for what cause hee staid so long. But Varus accusing this second messenger also very falsely, commanded him to be executed, as hee had done the first. For the Syrians that inhabited Cæsarea, had made him proud, in so much that he aspired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa should be put to death by the Romans, in regard of those faults which the Iewes had committed; and that Varus, who was royally descended, should possesse his gouernment. For without question Varus was held to be of the blood-royall, for that he deriued his pedigree from the Tetrarch Selemus that gouerned the countrey that abutted on Libanus. For these causes, Varus grew proud, and retained Philips letters by him, hoping by these means that the king should haue no knowledge thereof; and hee set watch in euery passage, for feare least any man should flie and certify the king of that which had hapned; and to giue the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæsarea, he put diuers of those Iewes that dwelt among them to death. Hee intended also to vnder take a warre against the Iewes of Bathanea, who were called Babylonian Iewes, by confederating himselfe with the Trachonites of Bathanea. For which cause, sending for twelue of those Iewes who were of most estimation among the inhabitants of Cæsarea, he enioyned them to repaire to Ecbatane, to signifie vnto those of their nation that dwelt there, that Varus understanding that they pretended to take armes against their king, and scarcely beleeuing it, had sent them vnto them, to perswade them to lay by their armes. And that this should bee a certaine signe, by which they might perfectly expresse that hee had no reason to giue credite to their reports, who had inforced and objected so much against them. Furthermore, he commanded them that twelue of the chiefe of them should be chosen out, to answer to those accusations where-with they should be charged. These twelue arriving in Ecbatane, and entertained by those of their nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cause, they perswaded them to send their seuentie men: which they did, little suspecting that which would happen.

Varus killeth the seuentie Iewes with the embassadours. The Iewes retire themselves into the fortress of Gamala, and thither resorteth Philip also.

As soone therefore as these with the other twelue embassadours came to Cæsarea, Varus hauing inkling of their coming, met them on the way with the kings forces, and slew them altogether with the foresaid embassadours, and tooke his way towards the Iewes of Ecbatane. But one of the seuentie, who had escaped, resorted thither with all expedition preventing Varus, and certified the rest of that which had hapned. Whereupon they incontinently set to armes, & with their wiues & children retired themselves to the fort of Gamala, abandoning their villages which were stored with all kind of goods, and many thousand cattell. When Philip had tidings herof, he repaired himselfe also to the fort of Gamala: where he no sooner arrived, but the people cried out

A out with a lowd voice, exhorting him to take the soueraignie, and to make warre against Varus and the Syrians of Cæsarea. For they had intelligence that the king was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting vnto them what benefits the king had bestowed on them, & of what power the Romans were, against whom it was but a folly for them to take armes, and in the end hee perswaded them to peace. The king vnderstanding that Varus was determined to kill and murder all the Iewes that were in Cæsarea, with their wiues and children all in one day (who were as many in number) hee sent vnto him Equus Modius to supply his place, as it hath beene by vs declared in another place. Meane while Philip kept the fort of Gamala, & the countrey thereabouts, persevering in their fidelitie and loyaltie to the Romans. As soone as I arrived in Galilee, and had perceiued and learnt all occurrences that had hapned, by those who reported the same vnto me, I presently signified the whole estate by my letters, to the council at Ierusalem, to know what their pleasure was I should doe. Who gaue me this answer, that I should remaine where I was, and retaine those embassadours that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of thole tenths and tithes that were giuen them; and verie willing, because they were due, to gather them vp in right of their priesthood, resolved with themselves to returne to their owne houses. But for that I intreated them to remaine with me, vntill such time, as we had settled the affaires, they willingly consented vnto me. I therefore departed with them to the citie of Sephora, and came into a borough called Bethmaus distant from Tiberias some foure furlongs, and from thence I sent a messenger to the councill of Tiberias, exhorting the chiefe among the people to come and speake with me: who coming forth to visit me, accompanied with Iustus also, I tolde them that I was sent embassadour vnto them, with those other, by the communalie of Ierusalem, to perswade them to desist that building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein diuers figures of liuing creatures were painted; for that our lawe forbade them to allow or doe such things, and I exhorted them to suffer vs to doe that execution as soone as they might.

Gamala still faithful to the Romans. Ioseph by the commandment of the councill remaineth in Galilee.

Capella and those of his partie, did for a long time refuse to consent thereunto: but in the end wee inforced them to much, that they condescended. Now whilest we debated vpon this conclusion, Iesus the sonne of Saphias (of whom we haue spoken heretofore, declaring how he was the chiefe and conductor of the faction of failers and poore men) tooke with him certaine Galileans, and set fire on all the palace, vnder hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were certaine roofes of the house couered with gold) who spoiled many things against our consent. For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chiefe of Tiberias, wee retired our selues from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the meane time Iesus men slew all the Greekes that remained there, and who before the warre had been their enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was grievously displeased, and came down to Tiberias, and disposed of the kings moueables, for feare least they should be carried away by the robbers: and hauing recovered a candlestick of Corin. hian worke, princely tables, and no small quantity of massie siluer, I resolved with my self to referre it to the kings vse. Calling therefore ten of the chiefe Senators and Capella, Antillus Ioseph procurerth the safety of the kings goods.

E From thence, with mine associates I went vnto Iohn at Gischala, to know what his minde and resolution was, and I presently smelt out by him, that he affected innoation and tyrannie. For he besought me to grant him libertie, to transport Cæsars wheat that was stored vp in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that he would bestow the same in reedifying and repairing the walls of his countrey. But I smelling out both his drift and counsels, denied him that liberty. For I thought that that wheat would either serue the Romans, or my selfe, for that already I had the care of that countrey committed to my hands by the Citie of Ierusalem. When as therefore he could winne nothing at my hands, hee appealed to my companions, who were improuident of those troubles that were to come, and greedy of rewards, and obtained at their hands thorow his lawfull liberalitie a libertie to dispose of all the corne that was in the prouince, in that I my selfe was vnable to contradict them both. After this, Iohn vsed another subtiltie: for he said that those Iewes, who inhabited Cæsarea Philippi, being by the command of their king, to whom they were subiect, kept prisoners within their walls; being in want of pure oyle, desired to buy the same at his hands, for feare least contrary to their custome, they should be compelled to vse that of the Greekes. But this spake he not in respect of religion or deuotion, but for his filthy lucre sake. For knowing that among the Cæsareans, two sextaries were sold for a drachme, and that at Gischalis eightie sextaries were sold for foure drachmes, hee sent all that oyle that was in that place vnto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permission. But I did not willingly descend thereunto, but for feare least if I should withstand the same, the people should stone me to death. As soone therefore as I had giuen him leaue, Iohn gathered a great summe of money by this cunning shift.

From this place dismissed I my companions, and sent them backe to Ierusalem, imploying my selfe wholly afterwards in preparing armour, & fortifying cities. After this, calling the stoutest theues before me, when as I perceived that I might not recouer their weapons from them, I perswaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertaine them in their seruice, then to suffer their countrey to be spoiled by their excursions. And thus hauing taken their oathes, did I dismiss them vnder condition, that they should not come into our region, except they were called, or to receiue their due pay vnder condition, that they should abstaine from spoiling either the Romans or the inhabitants of the country. But about all things my care was to keepe Galilee in peace. And whereas my desire was to get leuenty pledges of their loyalty, chosen out amongst their nobility vnder pretext of friendship, as soon as they came vnto me in way of friendship, I made them my companions & fellow Iudges, and decreed many things according to their opinions, hauing an especiall care least thorow rashnes I should iniury Iustice, or thorow corruption of rewards distaine mine incorrupted honour. At such time therefore as I was thirty yeeres olde, at which yeeres although a man bridle himselfe from vnlawfull affections; yet hardly can he escape from the poisoned sting of detraction, especially if a great authoritie bee annexed to his greene yeeres: I neuer offered vaine and vnlawfull courting to any woman, neither could any man fasten bribe on me, in that I pretended want of nothing: yea, I refused those tenths which in right of priesthood I might haue receiued from those, that brought them me. Yet after the conquest of the Syrians, I tooke part of the spoile, which (as I freely confesse) I sent to Ierusalem to my kinsmen. And whereas at two times I had forcibly overcome the Sephorites, the Tiberians four times, & the Gadarenians once, and had brought Iohn vnder my subiection, who had oftentimes sought to intrap me; neither could I endure to reuenge my selfe on him, neither on any of the aboute named people, as in the sequel of this storie I will make manifest.

For which cause I suppose that God, who is the trier and searcher of all iust hearts, both deliuered mee at this time out of the hands of mine enemies, and afterwards, and that many times out of dangerous and seuerall misfortunes; as he after shall appeare in time and place. But so great was the faith and beneuolence of the common people of Galilee towards mee, that their cities beeing ouerthrowne, and their families led into captiuitie, they spent not so many teares for their owne calamities, as they bestowed cares for my preservation and securitie. Which when Iohn perceiued, he began to enuie mee, and besought me by his letters, that I would giue him licence for his health sake, to bathe himselfe in the hot baths of Tiberias: which I, suspecting no treason, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreouer, I wrote vnto those, to whom I had committed the trust and administration of the citie, to prepare him a lodging, & to furnish all his companions with victuals, and to prouide him also of all things necessary for his diet and entertainment. In the meane space, I my selfe past my time in a certaine village of Galilee called Cana. But after that Iohn came to Tiberias, hee wrought the townsmen in such sort, that forgetting both their faith and dutie, they reuolted vnto him; and many of them lent a willing eare vnto his entreaties, especially such as reioicing in innouations were too prone to change, and greedy of dissension: but in especiall Iesus and his father Pistus, willingly entertained this occasion to reuolt from my obedience, & to submit themselves to Iohn; yet was this conspiracy of theirs preuented by my speedy accesse. For a certaine messenger came vnto mee from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the government of Tiberias, who certified me of the citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haste to make my repaire thither, for that otherwise the citie would shortly fall into another mans hands. As soone therefore as I had perused Silas letters, I trauailed all night long with two hundred cholen men; and sending a messenger before me, who might signifie my approach to the citizens, I lost neither time nor way: And in the morning when I drew neere vnto the citie, the whole people came out to meet mee, and among the rest Iohn, who after he had beheld me, and saluted me with a suspicious countenance, fearing least his treason beeing discovered, hee should grow in daunger of his life, speedily retired himselfe into his lodging. And when as I drew neere the citie within a furlong, dismissing all my guard but one, and retaining onely ten armed souldiers with mee, I beganne to expostulate with the Tiberians from a certaine high place, from whence I might be heard, and I coun-

A failed them that they should not reuolt, least in so doing they might shortly repent them of their mutabilitie and breach of faith: for that no man hereafter would giue them credit, beeing already either suspected or guiltie of this their perfidioulnesse.

Scarcely had I spoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perswaded mee to descend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perswade them: but rather to seeke for mine own securitie, and how I might escape mine enemies. For after that Iohn had learnt that I was destitute of followers, he sent a thousand of his chosen souldiers, commanding them to kill me; who were at hand, and ready to commit the murder, had I not speedily leapt down with my seruant Jacob, and beeing relieved by Herod the Tiberian, had beene brought to the lake; where finding a barke by chance, and putting forth to sea, I escaped contrarie to mine enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

As soone as the inhabitants of that citie vnderstood how perfidiously and traiterously the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were sore displeased, and betaking themselves to their weapons, perswaded me to leade them forth against them, telling mee that they would reuenge the iniurie that was offered vnto their gouernour, and they blased this treason of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cause a number of armed Galileans came vnto me, requesting me that I would inuade Tiberias, and entering it that I would spoile the same; and in the ruines thereof, that I would sell the inhabitants with their whole families vnder the speare. The like did my friends, who escaped with me out of the Citie, perswade mee. But I in no sort would admit their sute, supposing it to be a matter vnworthy my discretion, to reuiue a cause of ciuill warre, imagining with my selfe, that such a contention ought to proceed no further then words: yea I protested vnto them, that such reuenge would be preiudicial to themselves also, if the Romans standing at gaze, they should spend themselves in ciuill discords. By this meanes at length the Galileans wrath was appeased.

But when as Iohn perceiued that he failed of his purpose, he beganne to feare: for which cause taking with him those armed men which he kept about him, and forsaking Tiberias, he repaired to Gischala, and from thence he wrote his letters vnto me, excusing the fact, as if he had beene no waies guiltie thereof, and he besought me that I would in no sort suspect him, and confirmed his words with execrable oathes, whereby he might winne the more credit to his writing. But the Galileans who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the region, knowing that hee was a wicked and perfidious man, besought me that I would lead them forth against him, promising me to ouerthrow both him, Gischala, and all his Country. After therefore I had giuen them thanks for their loue towards mee, I promised them that mine offices of loue should be answerable to their kindnesse. Yet besought I them to restraine themselves, and to grant mee pardon, for that I thought it better to appeale then procure troubles.

This request of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we presently came to Sephoris. But the townsmen, who were resolved to continue faithfull towards the Romane people, fearing my approach, induoured themselves to distrust mee with some other affaires, whereby they might liue in more securitie. Whereupon, sending their messenger to Iesus, the captaine of the thieues, that kept vpon the confines of Ptolemais, they promised him a great summe of money, if with his army of eight hundred men, who liued vnder his command, hee would wage war with vs. He allured by their promises, bethought himselfe to assault vs suddenly and vnawares: for which cause he besought me by a messenger, that I would grant him leaue and libertie to come & salute mee: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his treason, taking with him a troupe of his thieues he hastened speedily towards me: yet failed hee of his purposed treason; for when he was not far off from me, a certaine fugitiue of his troupe discovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the market place, faining that I knew nothing of his secret fraud, attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among these with certaine Tiberians.

Afterwards, sending abroad certaine spies, who should scoure the high waies, I commanded the keepers of the gates, that they should onely suffer Iesus to enter with the foremost of his company, and exclude the rest: and if they should attempt to breake in by force, they should beat them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Iesus entered with a few: and being commanded by me presently to lay down his weapons, except he desired to be slaine, he seeing himselfe inuironed with armed souldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiuing that their captaine was apprehended, suddenly betooke the flight: and leading Iesus apart, told him that I was not ignorant of those treasons which he intended against mee; neither by whose prouocations he attempted the same. Yet told I him that I would pardon him, if so be by changing changing his manners, he would be faithfull vnto mee heereafter. Who promising mee all that which I requested, I dismissed the man, & gaue him leaue to depart with his weapons: yet threatened I to punish the Sephorites, except hereafter they desisted from their treasons. About the same time there came two noble men vnto me, who were subiect to the king of Trachonitis, bringing with them both horsemen, armour, and money: whom when the Iewes would haue constrained to be circumcised, if so be they would remaine amongst them, I would not permit them to be trouble some to the Trachonites, alledging that euery man ought according to his own mind, and not by other mens impulsio, serue God: And that it was not to be suffered, that they, who for their securitie sake were fled vnto vs, should repent thei selues of their trust they put in vs. And thus hauing perswaded the multitude, I freely & abundantly furnished these men with all things necessarie.

In the meane space, Agrippa sent out his forces vnder the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the waies, & the rather troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadarchus, who had the gouernment of the great champain, hearing that I was come to a certaine village called Simonias, situate vpon the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixtie furlongs, tooke with him by night one hundred horse that attended him, and about two hundred footmen, with certaine inhabitants of the citie of Gaba their associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the borough where I was.
Against whom after I had drawne forth a valiant band of men, Ebutius laboured all that he might to rouse vs into the champaine, for that he trusted very much in his horsemen: but he easily perceiued that we might not be wonne. For knowing the aduantage which the horsemen had, if wee I should encounter them in the plaine, considering that wee were but footmen, I resolved to fight in the place where we were: and Ebutius charged vs for a while very valiantly. At length, perceiuing that he had no vse of his horsemen in that place, he founded the retreat, and departed backe again, with lost labour to Gaba, hauing onely lost three men in the battell. But I presently pursued him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is situate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twentie furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; and besetting all the passages with courts of guard, wherby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies, vntill wee had caried out the wheate, whereof there was a great quantitie stored vp in that place, which was gathered out of the townships thereabout, belonging to Queene Berenice, and loading diuers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought with me, I sent the same come into Galilee. And hauing finished this businesse, I offered Ebutius the battell: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldnesse, I tooke my course to encounter with Neopolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the territorie of the Tiberians, and foraged there. Now this Neopolitanus was a captain of horsemen, and had vnderaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies; Hauing therefore driuen him from doing any wrong in the countrey belonging to the Tiberians, I provided for the securitie of Galilee.

But Iohn the sonne of Leui, who (as wee said) liued at Gitchala, after hee heard that all things fell out fortunately with me, and that I was loued of my subiects, & feared by mine enemies, was sore aggrieved therat: and supposing his owne fortune was embayed by my felicitie, and being touched with no small enuie, and in greater hope that he should hinder my good successe, if so be that he could bring me in hatred with my subiects; hee solicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would revolt vnto him, which Cities are the chiefe in Galilee. For he told them that vnder his conduct the common-weale should be more directly gouerned: but among the rest, the Sephorites gaue least care vnto him, for that neglecting vs both, they onely held for the Romans.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebell: yet notwithstanding they promised him some friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselves vnto Iohn, by the meanes of one Simon, a principall Citizen, who was Iohns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openlie seeme to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards mee, they were long time assured of, but priuile they sought another meanes to entrap me. And truly I fell into great danger vpon this occasion. For vvhens as certaine Dabarittenians (being audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolemeis wife the kings steward, vnder the conduct of certaine horsemen should in great pompe trauell along the great Plaine, out of the kings countrey into the Romane gouernment, they suddenly set vpon them, and putting the woman to flight, they spoiled all that which she caried with her. Which done, they draue to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certaine Moyles laden with apparrell, and household stuffe of diuers sorts;

A sorts; among which there were diuers siluer vessels, and five hundred peeces of gold. Intending therefore to reserue these things for Ptolemeis, as being one of the same tribe, in that our law permitteth not to defraud, no nor our enemies, if they be of the same tribe; I told those that brought the goods thither, that they must be kept to be sold, to the end that the price of the goods might be bestowed vpon the building of the walles of Ierusalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cutte off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cause, dispersing themselves in the streetes of Tiberias, they spred a rumour that I would betray that countrey to the Romans, alledging that I onely fauined that the prey was destinated toward the repairing of the walles of Ierusalem: vvhich the truth was, that I kept the same to the intent I might restore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceived B in their opinion. For after the departure of the young men, I called vnto me two chiefe citizens, Dafion and Iannaeus the sonnes of Leui, intire friends to the king, and commaunded them that taking the household stuffe with them, they should conuay it vnto the king, threatening them with death, if they reuealed this secret vnto any man.

But when as the rumour was spredde thorow Galilee, that I would betray the region into the hands of the Romans, and all of them being grievously bent and intent against me to punish me; they of Taricheas also giuing credit to the young mens fained speeches, perswaded my guard, and the rest of the souldiers, that forsaking me whilst I was asleepe, they should come into the horse-race, and consult with other in that place how to degrade me, and giue the honour vnto another.
They being perswaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others there arriued, and all of them cried out with one content, that it was meet to take punishment on a traitor, who hath sought the destruction of the common-weale. But he that most of all incited them C to these troubles, was Iesus the sonne of Saphias, who at that time had the magistracie of Tibe-rias in his hands, a man giuen ouer to all wickednesse, and borne to breed troubles, and stirre vp seditions.

This man, bearing Moses tables in his hands, and coming out into the midst of the assembly, spake thus with a loud voice: If (said hee) you be touched with no care of your selues; yet at the least wile contemne not these sacred lawes, which this your chiefeaine Ioseph, a man worthy to be hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, & for that cause is worthy of extreame punishment.

D After he had spoken thus, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, hee leading the armed men with him, hastily repaired to the house where I kept, with a certaine intent and purpose to put me to death. Meane while, I suspecting nothing of all this tumult, and tired with labour and wearinesse, tooke my rest; when as suddenly Simon one of my guard, who at that time only remained with me, seeing the incurfion of the people, came and awaked mee: and certifying me of mine instant perill, he gaue me counsell likewise, that rather like a noble and vndaun-ted chiefeaine, I should shorten mine owne life, then shamefully die by mine enemies direction. Whilst he gaue me this counsell, I committing my safetie to Gods hands, and changing my garments, went forth into the assembly, after a mournfull manner, and wearing my sword hanging about my necke, stealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine aduersaries might E meet me: and coming into the horse race, I offered my selfe to euery mans eye, and lying prostrate on my face, and watering the earth with my teares, I moued all men that beheld me to compassion. And vvhens I perceiued that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might to diuide them in opinions, before the armed souldiers returned from my house: & confessing my selfe that I was not wholly cleere of that which was objected against mee, I besought them to vnderstand to what vse I reserued that prey that was brought vnto my hand; after which, if they list they might kill me. And whilst the multitude commaunded me to speake, the armed men returned backe, and beholding me, rushed in vpon me with an intent to murder me: but being restrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their furie, supposing that after my confession of treason, and reueration of the kings money, they might haue a better occa-F sion to finish my Tragedie.

For which cause, after silence I beganne thus: Men and brethren (said I) if in your opinion I deserue death, I refuse not to die; yet before my death will I certifie you of the whole truth: Truly when as I perceiued that this Citie was most commodious and fit to entertaine strangers, and that I perceiued that many men forsaking their owne countries, were delighted with your conuersions, and willing to partake with you in all sorts of fortune: I was resolved to build vp your walles with this money; for which being thus destituted to do you good, your indignation is prouoked againſt me. Vpon theſe words the Taricheans and ſtrangers cried out, giuing mee thanks, and willing me to be of a good courage. But the Galileans & Tiberians continued in their hatred, inſomuch as they grew to debate betwixt themſelues, the one threatening me with puniſhment; the other contrariwiſe, willing me to aſſure my ſelfe of ſecuritie. But after I had promiſed the Tiberians that I would reedifie their walles, and fortiſie other conuenient Cities, they giuing credit to my words, repaired euery one of them to their owne houſes. And I beyond all expectation eſcaping from ſo great a perill, with certaine of my friends, and ſome twentie ſouldiers, returned to my houſe.

The Tiberians letters to Agrippa. ſeuē ſtadia make almoſt a German mile. Sedition and rebellion in Tiberias.

But once againe the thieues and authors of ſedition, fearing leaſt they ſhould be puniſhed for theſe their offences, begitt my lodging with ſix hundreth armed men, intending to conſume it with fire. Of whole arriuall, as ſoone as I had intelligence, imagining with my ſelfe that it would be much diſhonour for me to flee, I reſolued to vſe valour and courage againſt them: for vvhich cauſe commaunding the gates to be ſhut, I required them from the toppe of the houſe, that they would ſend in ſome of them vnto mee, to receiue that money, for which they had bene drawne into this mutinie: whereby they might haue no further cauſe to be incited againſt me. Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſome fellows, that with the reſt came in vnto mee, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grieuous ſtrokes, and his hand to be cut off, & hung about his necke; & thus handled, we thruſt him out of doores to returne vnto thoſe who had ſent him. But they being wondrously affraid herewith, and ſuſpecting the like puniſhment if they ſhould ſtay there any longer, for that they ſuſpected that I had diuers armed ſouldiers in my houſe, they ſuddainly all of them fled away: and ſo by this ſtratageme eſcaped I the other dangers. Yet wanted there not ſome, who incited the people once more againſt me: ſaying, that the kings ſeruants, who were fled vnto me for refuge, ought not to liue, except they ſubmitted themſelues to their lawes and cuſtomes, from whom they required protection.

They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Romane faction, and priſoners, and preſently the people began to mutine, being deceived by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which when I heard of, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted vnto them for reſcous: & I ſteſt at their folly, who accuſed them of poiſoning, and that the Romans would not vainly nourish ſo many thouſands of ſouldiers; if they pretended to make away their enemies with poiſon. Being by theſe words ſome-what pacified, they had ſcarcely with-drawne themſelues awhile, but that by certaine out-caſts & wicked men, they were incited againſt the nobilitie, ſo that with armed weapons they reſorted to the houſes of the Taricheans, intending to murder them. Which when I heard, I was ſore affraid; that if this wickedneſſe ſhould be committed, no man hereafter ſhould dare to truſt his life in my hands. For which cauſe, being aſſiſted by diuers others, I haſtily reſorted to their lodging, and ſhut vp the gates: & cutting a trench betwixt it and the lake, I called for a barke, and entring into the ſame with them, I croſſed ouer into the confines of the Hippenians: and furniſhing them with money to buy the horſes, for that they could not tranſport their own with them in that ſlight, I diſmiſſed them, requiring them to digeſt their preſent miſfortunes with a conſtant mind. For my ſelfe tooke it very heauily, that I was once more inforced to land thoſe men in the enemies countrey, who had committed themſelues to my truſt: yet thinking that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they ſhould fall into the Romans hands, they ſhould bee ſafer, then if by ſuffering them to remaine in my countrey, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I aduentured them thus. Yet were they ſaued, and the king gaue them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult.

But they of Tiberias wrote vnto the king, requiring him to ſend a gariſon into their countrey, and promiſing him to reuolt and follow him. Which done, as ſoone as I came vnto them; they required me that I would build them thoſe wals which I had promiſed them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was inuironed with wals. Wherevnto I condeſcended, and gathering ſtuſſe from euery place, I ſet the workmen to their taſke. But ſome three daies after, departing from Tiberias towards Taricheas, vvhich was thirtie ſtades diſtant from thence, by chance a troupe of Romane horſemen were diſcovered, not farre from the Citie, which made the inhabitants beleeue that they were the kings armie: Whereupon they preſently beganne to venter many things in honour of the king, and more in my reproche. And preſently a certaine friend poſſed vnto me, and told me what their mind was, and how they intended to reuolt from mee. Which when I vnderſtood, I was wondrously troubled: For I had ſent backe my men of warre from Taricheas to their houſes, for that the next day was the Sabbath day: For I would by no means that the Citizens of Taricheas ſhould bee charged or troubled with entertaining ſouldiers. And at all times

A times, when I remained in that citie, I tooke no care of the guard of mine owne perſon, hauing had often prooſe of the loyaltie of the inhabitants towards me. Seeing therefore at that time attended onely with ſeauen ſouldiers, & a few of my friends, I knew not what to do. For I thought it not fit to call backe my forces, for that the day was welny paſt; and although they ſhould haue bene with me the next morning, yet they might not haue taken armes, becauſe our lawes forbade the ſame, how great ſoeuer the occaſion be that is offered. And although I ſhould haue drawne forth the Taricheans and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and if vnder hope of prey I had led them forth, yet ſaw I that they were too feeble to reſiſt their forces. On the other ſide, I alreadie perceived that if I ſtaied ouer-long, the army which was ſent by the king being already entered the citie, would haue excluded me: I therefore determined to vſe this ſtratagem. I preſently therefore garded the gates of the Taricheans with my moſt truſtie friends, ſuffering no man to paſſe out of them; and aſſembling the chiefeſt of euery familie, I commaunded euery one of theſe to lanch their boates into the lake, and to follow me with the maſters of their ſhips. After vvhich both I and my friends, and ſeauen other ſouldiers, betooke vs to a barke, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceived that they had no forces come from the king, and that the whole lake was covered with barkes; amazed and fearing the ruine of their citie, for that they ſuppoſed the ſhips to be laden with ſouldiers, they changed their former opinion. For which cauſe laying by their weapons, they themſelues with their wiues and children came forth to meet mee, entreaining me with happy acclamations: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beſeeching me that for the ſaferie of their citie, I would enter the ſame. But I drawing neere the citie, commaunded the maſters of the barks to caſt anchor ſurre off the ſhore, leaſt the townſmen might perceiue that the ſhippes were emptie: and I my ſelfe drawing neere with mine owne barke vnto them, accuſed them, for that contrarie to their oathes, they had bene ſo fooliſhly induced to reuolt. Afterwards, I promiſed them aſſured pardon, if ſo be they would deliuer mee tenne of their chiefeſt nobilitie: vvhich when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipped them in a barke, and ſent them priſoners to Taricheas: and by this policie one after another, I at laſt gotte all the Senate of Tiberias, and manie of the chiefeſt Citizens, and caried them thither alſo.

Ioseph in danger for the Tiberians ſakes.

Ioseph ſaileth to Tiberias.

Clytus the author of the ſedition in Tiberias.

Clytus cutteth off his owne leſt hand.

At length, the reſt of the multitude, as ſoone as they perceived in how great danger they were, they beſought mee that I would puniſh the chiefe author of this conſpiracie, vvhich was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. But I, that held it a wicked act to kill one of the ſame Tribe, and yet was inforced to puniſh him, commaunded Leuius one of my guard to goe vnto him, and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone to enter into ſo huge a multitude, for ſcare leaſt his cowardice ſhould be diſcouered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus vnto mee, and ſaid vnto him; Sith vngratefull and perſidious man, as thou art, thou deſerueſt to loſe both thy handes, I charge thee to become thine owne executioner, for ſcare leaſt thorow thy delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And vvhence with many prayers hee beſought mee to grant him one of his handes, I hardly condeſcended: at length of his owne accord, for ſcare leaſt hee ſhould loſe both, hee tooke a knife and cutte off his left hand: and thus was this tumult appeated.

E As ſoone as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tiberians vnderſtood what ſtratagem I had vſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloodſhed or murder. After I had ſent for thoſe of the people of Tiberias that were in priſon, amongſt whom was Iuſtus and his father Priſtus, I inuited them to ſuppe with mee: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Romane armie excelled all men of the world in power & force: notwithstanding that I kept my ſelfe ſilent in the reſpect of thoſe theues that were round about, and I counſailed them that they alſo would doe the like in expectation of ſome better daies; and yet that in the meane time they would not thinke amiſſe of my gouernment, becauſe the time afforded them not a more affable and commodious gouernour. I admoniſhed Iuſtus alſo that before I came from Ieruſalem, the Galileans had cut off his brothers hands, accuſing him to haue forged falſe letters before the warre; and that after Philips departure the Gamalites, being at odds with the Babylonians, ſlew Chares, Philips own kinsman, and had moderately puniſhed his brother in law Ieſus, who had married his ſiſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I diſmiſſed Iuſtus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedoms. But before this came to paſſe, it hapned that Philip the ſonne of Iacimus departed from the fort of Gamala vpon this occaſion that enſued. As ſoone as he vnderſtood that Varus was reuolted from king Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, hee certified certified him of his estate by his letters: which when he had receiued, hee highly reioyced at Philips safetie, and sent those letters to the King & Queene, who liued at Berytum. Whereupon the King vnderstanding the false rumour that ranne as touching Philip, that he was the chiefeaine of the Iewes armie, who vnderooke the warre against the Romans, sent certaine horsemen to Philip to bring him to his presence: before whom hee no sooner arrived but hee embraced him verie kindly, and shewed him to the Romane captaines, telling them that that was Philip, of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in rebellion against the Romans. He therefore charged him, that taking with him certaine horsemen, he should poste in all diligence to the fort of Gamala, & drawing his household seruants from thence, he should lead and reestablish the Babylonians in Batanea, and trauaile to his vttermost power that the subiect should be continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had receiued this commandement from the King, he hasted to performe the same.

Philip the ſonne of Iacimus.

Many Iewes revolt from the Romans.

Simons countaie against Ioseph.

Simons second countaie against Ioseph.

But Ioseph a certaine drougier or treacle seller, gathering together a sort of bold young men, and inciting the nobilitie of Gamala, perswaded the people to fall from the king, and that betaking them to their armes, they should recouer their former libertie: and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing those that durst contradict them. Amongst these died Chares and Iesus his kinsman, and the sister of Iustus the Tiberian, as we haue heretofore declared. After this they requested me by letters, that I would send them aide, and certaine labourers to begirt their towne vvith a wall. To both vvich requests of theirs, I easily condescended. About this time the countrey of Gaulonite, as farre as the borough of Solyma, rebelled against Agrippa. I also inclosed Seleucia and Sogon, which were two strong places vnaccessible, and fortified by nature, vvith avalles. I did the like also by Iamnia Amerytha, and Charabe, a borough of higher Galilee, although they vvere situated amongst the rocks. I fortified in like sort Taricheas also and Tiberias, and Sephoris, Citties of Galilee; and the borough of the caue of the Arbaliens, Berfobe, Selamen, Iorapa, Capharath, Comofogana, Nepapha, and the mountaine Itabyrium. In those places hoorded I vp great store of corne, and laid vp store of armour, and munition for defence.

Meane while, John the sonne of Leui, increased his hatred daily more and more towards mee, being greatly aggrieved to see my fortunes happy, and the successe answerable: and whereas hee was wholly resolu'd to rid me of my life, after he had encompassed his countrey Gischala vvith walles, he sendeth Simon his brother vvith one hundred souldiers to Ierusalem, to Simon the son of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in such sort vvith the Cittie, that my authoritie might be disannulled, and that John by the common consent of all, might be ordained gouernor ouer the affaires of Galilee. This Simon was borne in Ierusalem, noble in birth, and in sect a Pharisee (which sect of all other seemed most exactly instructed in the lawes of our countrey) a man of excellent vvifedome, who by his counsaile was able to repaire the decaying ruines of his countrey, vvho of long time had made vse of Iohns friendship, because hee was at that time mine enemy.

This man solicited by the intercessions of his friends, perswaded the high priest Ananus and Iesus the sonne of Gamala and others of his line and faction, to cut off my increasing honours, and not to permit me to attaine the fulnesse and content thereof. For it should be very profitable for them also, if I were removed from the gouernment of Galilee. Further, hee told Ananus and the rest, that they were not to delay the matter, least vpon the discouerie of their counsaile, I should invade the Cittie vvith mine armie. Thus spake Simon, yet Ananus the high priest replied, that it might not easily be done, for that diuers priests and gouernours of the people bare vvinefle for me, that I behaued my selfe honestly in that gouernment, and that it was ill done to intend an accusation against a man, who might not be touched vvith any misdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had said, he besought him & the rest also to speake nothing thereof; neither to make his motion knowne, certifying them that he had providently provided, that I should be speedily driuen out of Galilee: And calling vnto him his brother John, hee charged him to send presents to Ananus. For (said hee) in so doing they would so much worke vvith him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that vvich he long time sought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted vvith money, and accorded to cast mee from the gouernment of Galilee, vvithout the consent or allowance of any other of the Citizens. For vvich cause they thought good to send certaine noble men in birth, and no waies inferior to one another in learning, vvhereof two of them were of the common sort, and Pharises; the one called Jonathas, the other Ananias; the third was Iozarus of the tribe of Leui, vvho was also a Pharisee, and of the race of the priests. But Simon was of the order of the priests, and the youngest of

A of them all. These did they commaund, that calling together a councell of the Galileans, they should demanda why they loued me so well, commanding them that if they answered that I was a Galilean, they should likewise say that Ierusalem was their countrey. But if they allowed in me the knowledge of the law, they were likewise willed to say, that they knew their countrey customes; or if in regard of the name of priesthood, they should say they loued me, they should likewise a-uerre that two of them were priests. Being thus instructed, and receiuing fortie thousand silver drachmes of the publike treasure, for their fellow and comfort Jonathas, they set forward.

And for that at the very same time a certaine man called Iesus of Galilee, was come to Ierusalem vvith a band of sixe hundred souldiers, they sent for him and hired him, and gaue him three moneths pay, commanding him to follow Jonathas and his companions; and to doe that vvich they should commaund them: and to these annexed they three hundred Citizens, vvhome they hired vvith reward. Vvith this preparation the Legates set forward, being accompanied vvith Simon Iohns brother, vvho had one hundred souldiers vvith him, vvho had commissiion from those that sent them, that if I willingly gaue ouer armes, they should send mee aliue to Ierusalem: and if I resisted, by their authoritie they might lawfully kill me. They had letters also directed to John, vvich incited him to make warre against me. Moreover they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians to maintaine John against me. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, vvho had intelligence thereof by Iesus the sonne of Gamala, one of those vvho were present at the deliberation, and vvho intirely and familiarly loued me; I was much grieved, seeing Iosephs fathers signifieth all these newes vnto him.

C vvith how much ingratitude my countymen required mee, vvho of malice had decreed vpon my death: and for that my father inuited me by most affectionate letters to draw my selfe homeward, telling me how much he desired to see me, vvho was his sonne, before he left this life; I imparted these things to my friends, and certified them that vvithin three daies I would forsake their countrey, and retire my selfe into mine owne. Whereupon they were altogether surpris'd vvith great sadness, and besought mee vvith weeping teares, that I would not forsake them, for that they should be viterly ouerthrowne, if so bee they were left destitute of my conduct. But vvhereas by no meanes they might perswade me, and the care of mine owne securitie preuailed very much vvith me; the Galileans fearing least I should leaue them, and by that meanes the theues should be encouraged to set vpon them, they sent messengers thorow all Galilee, to signifie vnto them D the resolution of my departure. Whereupon diuers of them being made priue to these newes, resorted vnto me from all parts, bringing vvith them their vvives and children; not so much, as I suppose, for the sorrow they conceiued at my departure, as the feare that they had of their owne estates: For they perswaded themselves, that if I remained among them, there could no mischiefe befall them. They assembled therefore in a great Plaine, called Asochim, vvhere I remained.

Ioseph resolueth to returne home.

That night in my sleepe I had a wonderfull dreame: For lying in my bed, and being wholly disconsolate and troubled vvith the newes I had receiued, me thought that a certaine man from aboue spake vnto me after this manner: Pacifie thou the passions of thy spirit, and bee thou free from all feare. For that vvich discomforteth thee, shall be that vvich shall make thee great, and E happie beyond thine expectation. For not onely these things shall turne to a fortunate ende or issue, but also many other. Be not thou therefore dismayed, but remember thy selfe that thou art referred to make warre against the Romans. After I had this dreame, I awaked; and so prepared as I was, went I downe into the Plaine: and as soone as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, vvith their vvives and children, humbling themselves vpon the earth, and weeping, besought mee that I would not leaue them for a pray to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their countrey to serue for a pray and mockerie to their aduersaries. But seeing that I made small reckoning of their prayers, they constrained me by oath to remaine amongst them, and vvitered diuers iniurious outrages against the people of Ierusalem, that enuied them the peace and happines vvich they enioyed.

A number of Galileans besought Ioseph that he would not forsake them.

F After I had heard these words, and seene the desolation of the people, my heart was broken vvith compassion, and I resolu'd my selfe that in respect of so great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded then for their contentment: I therefore gaue my consent to remaine vvith them. I gaue order that five thousand of their best souldiers, vvith their prouision, should attend mee: as for the rest, I sent them backe euery owne to his owne house. When these five thousand presented themselves, I annexed them to the other three thousand that I had vvith me, and drew out vvith them foure score horsemen, and marched on towards Chabalon a borough vpon the marches marches of Ptolemais, where I vndertooke to prepare them for the battell, expecting some assault from Placidus, who was come with two companies of footmen and one of horsemen, sent by Cestius Gallus to burne the countrey townes of Galilee, and other little boroughes that bordered on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the Citie of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewise not farr from the borough Chabalon, some fixtie stades off: and diuers times drew I out my forces to bid him battell, but neuer would he offer any thing but skirmishes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardnesse to fight, was abashed thereat, and retired himselfe: yet departed he not from Ptolemais.

Jonathan's letter to Ioseph.

About that time came Jonathan with the other Embassadors, who (as wee haue heretofore declared) were sent by Simon, and the high priest Ananus, who laboured to entrap mee by policie, for that they durst not assaile me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter vnto me to this effect: Jonathan and the Embassadors with him, who are sent by those of Ierusalem, to Ioseph Greeting. We are certified by the chiefe men of Ierusalem, that John of Gischala hath oftentimes sought to betray you: for which cause we are sent to repress his malice, and to exhort him hereafter to submit himselfe vnto you: and being desirous to conferre with you, as touching that which concerneth the publike profit, we pray you to resort vnto vs as soone as you can, with some few attendants, because the borough is not able to entertaine many. To this effect wrote they vnto me, hoping that one of these two effects would fall out: either that I comping disarmed, should be easily surpris'd by them; or that bringing with me a great companie, I should be condemned for an enemy of my countrey. The messenger that brought me this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horsebacke, who had in times past borne armes for the king. The time when hee came vnto me, was two houres within night, and euen then was I banquetting with my friends, and the chiefe gouernours of Galilee. After that one of my householde seruants had certified me, that a certaine Iew on horsebacke came to speake with mee, I commanded hee (should be brought in; who embracing me but coldly, and deliuering me the letter, said vnto mee: They that are come from Ierusalem, send you this letter; giue them a speedy answer: For I am commanded to make a speedy returne. They that sat at the table with me, were amazed at the souldiers bouldnesse. But for my selfe, I willed him to sit downe, and to make merrie with me: but he refusing the same, I kept the letter in my hand in such manner, as I had receiued the same, and began to talke with my friendes of other affaires: and not long after arising from supper, and dismissing therest to their rest, I onely retained with me some of my most inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any man perceiued the same: and conceiting incontinently what they meant, I sealed them anew, and as if I had knowne nothing of the contents, hauing the letter in my hands, I gaue order that the souldier should receiue twenty drachmes for to beare the charges of his voiage. He hauing receiued the same, and giuing me thanks; I perceiued well that he was addicted to gaine, and might easily be wrought with money. Whereupon I said vnto him, If thou wilt drinke with me, thou shalt haue a drachme for euery glasse thou drinkest. To this the souldier listned willingly, and hauing drunke good store of wine, to get him the greater store of money, he grew drunken; so that he was vnable any longer to conceale his secrets: but of his owne accord he declared the treason that was prepared, and how the sentence of death was giuen by them against mee. Which when I vnderstood, I answered them to this effect. Ioseph to Jonathan, and those that accompanie him, Health. I am verie glad to hear that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, especially for that I may now redeliuer into your hands the gouernment of the affaires thereof, to the end (according as I haue long time desired) I might returne into my countrey. I will not onely therefore visit you at Xallon: but in a nicke further place also, notwithstanding you had neuer sent for mee. Notwithstanding pardon me, though I come not at this present: for I am now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Resort you therefore vnto mee, who shall reade my letters. Farewell.

Iosephs answer to Jonathan.

After I had written this answer, and deliuered it to the souldier to carrie it vnto them, I sent by the same way thirtie of my most approoued friends of Galilee, commanding them to salute them that were come, without any further speech: I assigned also to each of these one of my most resolute and best souldiers to take heede least any of those I sent should conferre with Jonathan's men. They therefore set forward on their way: and Jonathan and the other seeing their first purpose failed them, they sent me another letter, after this tenour which ensueth: Jonathan and his companie to Ioseph, Health: We command you that within three dayes, you make your appearance before vs, without any of your souldiers, in the borough of Gadara, to the ende you may letter to Io-seph.

A may answer to that which John hath obiected against you. As soone as they had written this, & saluted those whom I had sent, they went to Iapha, which is the greatest towne of Galilee, defended with strong walles, and peopled with manie inhabitants. Against these the people of that Citie, their wiues and children came forth, exclaiming against them with huge cries, charging them to returne backe, and not to deprive them of the good gouernour they had. Jonathan and his companions were prouoked with these cries; yet durst they not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer they resorted to other Cities, where they met with no lesse effectually exclaimes from the multitude, protesting with a loud voice, that no man should be able to disswade them from continuing Ioseph in authoritie in their gouernment. Whereupon Jonathan with his followers marched forth without any further speech, and came to B Sephoris, the greatest Citie of Galilee. But the inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romans, came forth to them: but for my part, they neither praised nor blamed mee. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Asochim, where the Citizens sung the same song, that the Iapheans did. Whereupon they being vnable to containe their displeasures, commanded their souldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed against them, and claimed mee for their gouernour. And when they drew neere to Gabara, John came out to meet them, accompanied with three thousand souldiers; and I hauing intelligence by their letters, that they were resolu'd to make warre against me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with three thousand souldiers; and hauing committed the campe to the charge of my trustiest friend, I went to Iotapara, because I would be within foure stades of them, and sent them this letter: If your will bee that I must needly come vnto you, there are in Galilee two hundreth and foure Cities and boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara or Gischala: for that the one is the place of John's nauitie, and the other is his associates and friends.

As soone as Jonathan had receiued this answer, he replied not any more, but sought the means to entrap mee. John was of the opinion to write vnto all the Cities and boroughs of Galilee, supposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common enemy. He gaue order also, that this his resolution should be sent to Ierusalem, to the end that those of the Citie vnderstanding that I was adiudged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirme that their decree by their opinion. For he said, that by this meanes it would come to passe, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, should forsake me for feare they had of them. This aduice of John's maliciously pleased them all, & was presently brought vnto me about the third houre of the night, by one Saccheus, who flying from them, came and brought me the newes, & particularly related to me their intent. For which cause perceiuing that the time required no longer delay, and supposing that Iacob was one of my most assured and trustiest seruants, I commanded him to take two hundreth men with him, and to belay the waies betweene Gabara and Galilee, and to send mee those whom he should surpris, that came that way; and especially those that carried letters. I sent Jeremy also, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with sixe hundreth men at armes, to keepe the passages that way towards Ierusalem, commanding him to laie hands on all thole that carried letters, and to committe the men to prison, and to send me their piqueets.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following, to take their armes, and to furnish themselves with victualles for three daies, and to attend me at the borough of Gabaroth. Those souldiers that I had distributed in foure companies, and kept those with mee in whome I reposed most confidence for the guard of my person: and hauing appointed captaines ouer them, and commanded them to be carefull, I charged them to suffer no vnknowne souldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the sixth houre of the day, where I found all the fields about the Citie full of men of warre, of those of Galilee, who resorted thither to assist mee, according as I had commanded them. Thither also came there a multitude of other men from other boroughs. As soone as I came to their presence, and was ready to speake vnto them, all of them began to crie out, calling me their benefactor, and maintainer of their countrey. After I had solemnly giuen them thanks for this fauour they had shewed me, I charged them neither to offer war, or attempt any spoyle in the champaine countrey, but to encampe amidst the fields, contenting themselves with that prouision they had brought with them. For I tolde them all in generall, that I would extinguish those troubles without effusion of blood. It hapned the same day that Jonathan's messenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment, and ac-

according to my direction the men were kept in securitie, as I gave order: and finding the letters that were brought me to be full of nothing but slaunders and lies written by the Embassadors; I said not a word to any man, but thought it best policie to set upon them. But Jonathan souldiers hauing intelligence of my coming, retired both themselves and their goods, and with them John also into Jesus house, which was a great tower, nothing different from a citadell, in which they hid a number of men of warre, and locked vp all the other gates saue one; expecting that I should come that way, to salute them. In a word, they had commanded their souldiers that when I should enter, they should suffer no man else to enter with mee, but exclude all the rest. For they made no other account, but that by this meanes they might easily lay hold on mee. But they were deceived of their hopes: for hauing notice before hand of their intents, as soone as I came thither, entring into a lodging that was right ouer against theirs, I fained that I went to take my rest. Whereupon Jonathan souldiers supposing that I was asleep, & that in troth I was safe; they came forth in all haste into the Plaine, labouring to dissuade my souldiers from their loue and alleageance, and detracting my gouernment. But all things fell out contrarie to that they thought: for as soone as they were discovered, the Galileans gaue a great shout, testifying the good will they bare vnto mee, who was their gouernour, and they blamed the Embassadors for that without any cause of iniurie, they were come to disturbe the publike peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other gouernour. When these things were signified vnto me, I made no doubt to aduenture my selfe among them: for which cause I speedily went out to heare what these Embassadors could alledge against mee. Vpon my arriuall the whole troupe shouted for ioy, and applauded mee with a loud voice, giuing me thanks for my happie and peaceable gouernment.

Jonathan and his adherents hearing this were affraid, least if the Galileans should set vpon them, they should grow in daunger of their liues, and began to be hinke themselves how they might escape. But perceiuing that they might not retire, for that I required them instantly to stay, they were altogether dismayed, and past their senses. I therefore commaunded the people to cease their shouting, and planted the souldiers of greatest trust in euery passage, to prevent least John should charge them vnawares. After this, I exhorted the people to berake them to their weapons, to the end that if the enemy should suddenly assaile them, they might not be driuen to disorder. This done, I first of all beganne to rippe vpe to Jonathan souldiers and fellows, what letters they had written, and how they had certified him, that they were sent by the communitie and inhabitants of Ierusalem, to make an end of those debates that were between me and John; and how they had incited me to come vnto them. Afterwards in the sequell of my discourse I produced their letters in open viewe, to the end they might not deny any thing, seeing themselves conuicted by their owne hand writing, and spake thus vnto them.

treachery against the embassa. ors.

In the month of two or three witnesses, confitteth truth.

If being accused by John, I should produce two or three witnesses that were men of reputation, to testifie for my life, it were a matter most euident, that thou shouldest bee compelled, O Jonathan and you my Lords Embassadors (after you had forfeinquired of their liues) to acknowledge mine innocencie, and to acquit mee of that whereof I am accused. But to the intent you may know that I haue faithfully gouerned the estate of Galilee, I suppose that three witnesses are too little for an vpright man, for which cause I produce all these. Enquire of them how I haue liued, and whether I haue gouerned this countrey in all honestie and iustice. I adiure you all therefore, who are my fellowes and friendes of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth, but that before these men, as before your iudges, you professe, if I haue done any thing that is contrarie to right. Whilst I spake after this maner, all of them with one accord called me their benefactor and defender, and gaue testimonie of my forepassed gouernment, and exhorted mee to continue the same hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a publike oth, that I had carefully prevented, least any woman should be violated, or any man by my meanes should be drawne into any iniurie, or inconuenience. This done, I publicly read the two letters in the presence of all the Galileans, which were taken from Jonathan souldiers by those, who were appointed by me to beset the waies, and were by them sent to mee, which were full of iniuries and falsehoods, alledging that I rather behaved my selfe like a tyrant then a gouernour towards them: and besides that, there were diuers other things written and yrged verie impudently. These letters (said I) were voluntarily offered me by those that caried the same. For I was vnwilling that mine aduersaries should know that I had beset the waies, fearing least they should forbear to write hereafter.

A and flocked on to murder them; and they had surely done it, had I not pacified the displeasure of the Galileans. As for the Embassadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told all of them that I pardoned whatsoever was past, if so bee they would repent themselves of that which was done, and as vpon their returne into their countrey, they would truly report vnto those who had sent them, how all things had past vnder my gouernment. This said, I dismissed them, notwithstanding that I knew they would performe nothing of that which they had promised. But the whole multitude prosecuted their displeasure against them, requiring me to giue them leaue to punish those with all rigour, who had committed this slanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perfwade them, to lay no hands vpon them, knowing full well that whatsoever mutinie it bee, it cannot but breed preiudice to the common weale. This notwithstanding the multitude would by no meanes be satisfied, but all of them ranne in heapes with great furie to the lodging, where Jonathan and the Embassadors kept. Whereupon seeing that it was impossible to restraine their furie, I incontinently betooke me to my horse, and commaunded the people to follow mee to Sogan a borough of the Arabians, distant from thence some twenty stades. By this stratageme I brought to passe, that the beginning of the ciuill warre might not be imputed to me.

Ioseph pacifi-eth the seditious without bloodshed.

After I came nere to Sogan, I assembled the people, and told them that they should not violently submit themselves to their froward displeasures, nor entertaine their vnquenchable desire of reuenge; & I commanded them to pick out an hundredth of the chiefeft & oldest men amongst them, who should make their repaire to the citie of Ierusalem; and there complaine vnto the people against those that had kindled sedition in their country. And I said vnto them, If the people be fauourable and listen to your discourse, you shall perfwade them to write vnto mee, that according to their command I remaine in Galilee; and that Jonathan and his partners depart from hence. After I had giuen them this charge, and that they were furnished with all things necessarie for their iourney, in all expedition on the third day after the generall assembly, I dispatched them, and sent five hundredth armed men with them. I wrote also to my friends in Samaria, so to further them that they might finish their iourney in all securitie. For Samaria was already in subiection to the Romans; and it behooued my men of necessitie, who would make a short iourney, to passe that way. For from Galilee by this meanes a man may in three daies arrive at Ierusalem. Furthermore I guarded the Embassadors my selfe as farre as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and guards vpon the waies, to the end that no man might easily discover or knowe of their departure. Vvich done, I sojourned for a certaine time at Iapha.

But Jonathan and his companions hauing failed of their purpose intended against me, dismissed John to Gischala: as for themselves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the same vnder their obedience; for that Jesus, who was President at that time, had written vnto them, and promised them to perfwade the people to entertaine them, and take their part if they came; & vnder this hope they also retired themselves thither. Silas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his letters, requiring me to vse all diligence: and I condescending thereunto, was brought in daunger of my life vpon this occasion that ensueth. Jonathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perfwaded diuers who were mine enemies, to reuolt from me; but after they were certified that I was there in person, they were affraid, and came vnto me, and saluting mee, told mee that they reputed mee happy, for that I had so wisely behaved my selfe in Galilee: and they reioyced also in appearance, for that I was returned with honour, telling me that the honour that was done vnto mee was their ornament, for that they were my instructors and fellow citizens, and that the friendship which I bare them was more iust then that of John: they therefore required me to repaire vnto my house, promising verie shortly to deliuer John into my hands: & these speeches of theirs they scoded with dreadful oaths, which made me thinke that I had no cause to misbelieve them. Furthermore they required me to take vp my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath day, & it were an inconuenient that the citie of Tiberias should be drawn into trouble on that day. I that suspected nothing repaired to Taricheas, leauing notwithstanding certaine of my friends behinde me in Tiberias, who might curiously obserue what the common talke was of me: and all along the way betwixt Taricheas & Tiberias I laid certaine men in wait, who from one to another might certifie mee of that which was discovered by them who remained in the citie. The next day therefore all of them assembled in the Prosceucha or Oratorie, which was an ample house wherein they prayed, and was able to containe a great multitude. When Jonathan was entred into this place, he durst not manifestly speake vnto them of a reuolt, but only told them that their citie had need of a better Gouernour. But the President Jesus without dissembling, spake plainly after this maner vnto them.

Jonathan writ-eth to Iohannes from vnto him.

"It were better for you (my friends) that you were subiect to foure men of nobilitie & great wife-dome, then to one: and therupon he shewed them those who accompanied Jonathan. Hereupon Iustus arose and praised that which Iesus had proposed, and drew some of the people to his opinion. But the greater part tooke no pleasure therein: and there had presently followed a mumme, had not the assembly bin dismissed, by reason it was midday, which is the ordinary hour amongst them to take their repast in. Thus did Jonathan comforts remit the determination of the matter vntill the next day, retiring themselves without any good done. Which being presently reported vnto me, I resolved with my selfe the next morning to repaire to the Citie of Tiberias: and on the morrow I arrived there in due time, for I found the people already assembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawne to that conuocation, knew not the cause why they were assembled. Jonathan's partners (seeing me there in person contrarie to their expectation, were verie fore troubled, and bethought themselves of this subtiltie. They tolde the multitude that a certaine friend of theirs had informed them, that he had discovered certaine Romane horsemen vpon the frontiers of that territorie, some thirrie stades off of the citie, in a place called Homonoe: and that the newes being brought to them, those of Iohannes faction had presently signified the same vnto them: to the intent they should not endure their countrey to be sackt by the enemy. They vsed this speech, supposing that vnder pretext of rescuing the countrey, they might drive mee abroad, and strengthen the Citie for themselves.

Now although I knewe verie well what their intent was, yet gaue I care vnto them, least I should drive the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and carelesse of their securitie: I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had spoken: where finding scarce a footstep or appearance of an enemy, I returned speedily without delay to Tiberias. When I came there I found the whole councill assembled with a multitude of people, & Iohannes partakers vrging against me a verie vehement accusation, that I made no account to relieue them in their warres, but that I studied nothing but mine owne pleasure. And whilest they spake these wordes, they produced foure letters, as being written vnto them by those who were vpon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come and succour them, for that the Romane horsemen and footmen would within three daies forrage and spoyle their countrey: for which cause they made haste, & would not neglect their suit who belought them. The Tiberians hearing these allegations, and supposing them to be true, cried out saying, that it behoued them not in that manner to dallie time, but to go and succour their countrey men inuironed with great dangers. Whereunto I answered, that I was ready to obey them, and promised to march forth against the enemy with all expedition. Now knewe I well the pretence of Iohannes partakers, and was of the opinion, that since those letters said that the Romans gathered head in foure diuers places, it was requisite to divide our power into five companies, appointing euerie one of them a chiefeine ouer them.
For it is an honour for good men not onely to giue counsell, but also when need required to bee the first and foremost in action: For I tolde them that it lay not in my power to leade any more then one company. This my aduice was pleasing vnto all the people, who presently constrained these men to march out vnto the warre: whereby it came to passe that they were greatly confused to see that they might not finish that which they had imagined, because I crossed all their enterprises. Hereupon one amongst them called Ananias, a wicked and peruerse man, counsailed the people to celebrate a solenne fast the next day in honour of God, and gaue direction at the same houre that all of them should gather together in that place in armes, to protest before God that if they obtained not succours at his hands, they held all sort of resist vnprofitable. Hee spake this, not for any piete that was in him, but to the ende to surprize both mee and my followers vn-armed. To this aduice of his was I enforced to condescend, to the end it might appeare that I contemned not that which appertained to the seruice of God. As soone therefore as we were retired euerie one of vs to our severall lodgings, Jonathan and his partakers wrote to Iohn, to resort vnto them early in the morning with his men of warre, and all the power he could make: for that they might easily lay hands on mee, and accomplish that which they had so long time longed after. Hee receiuing this letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my strongest and faithfullest souldiers to hide their short swords vnder their gownes, and to attend mee, to the end that if in any sort we were assailed by the enemy, we might defend our selues. I put on my curets also, and girt my sword by my side in such sort, as no man might perceiue the same, and came with them to the place of prayer.

But Iesus as soone as I was entred with my friends, hauing the guard of the gate, would not permit the rest of my followers to enter with me: and at such time as we were ready to begin our prayers,

A prayers, according to the custome of our countrey, Iesus arising demanded of me what was become of the household stuffe that was taken out of the kings palace when it was burned, & where the bullion of silver was, and with whom I had left the same: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Iohannes approche. I answered, that Capella had all, and those ten of the chiefeest nobilitie of Tiberias; and willed him to aske of them whether it were true that I spake: who confessed that they had it. What (sayd hee) are become of those twentie pieces of gold, that you receiued by the sale of a certain waight of masse silver, where are they?
I answered him, that I had deliuered the same to the Embassadors, to defray their charges in their voiage towards Ierusalem. Hereupon Jonathan's partakers said, that I had done amisse, in employing the publike treasure to the vse of priuate Embassadors. The people being displeased herewith (for I verie easily perceiued the wicked disposition of these men) and seeing that a sedition was likely to arise, I thought it best to whet and animate the people the more against them: I said, that if I had done amisse in rewarding the Embassadors on the common stocke, they should need to take no further displeasure for that: for said I, I will repay those twentie pieces of gold out of mine own purse. Hereupon the people were incensed the more against them, in that they manifestly discovered what hatred they wrongfully bare vnto me. Whereupon Iesus fearing least some change might arise, commaunded the people to depart, and required the councill to stay, for that it was vnpossible to examine matters discretely where so much trouble and tur-moile was. The people cried out, that they would not leaue mee alone among them. Whereupon there came one vnto Iesus, who secretly informed him that Iohn with his armed men was at hand, who for that cause being vnable to containe and conceale his ioy, God so providing for the conseruation of my life (for had their purpose taken effect, Iohn and his followers had utterly ouerthrowne me.) For beare (said he) ye Tiberians to enquire of the twentie pieces of gold: for Ioseph meriteth not punishment for this matter, but because he affecteth the tyranny, and that by his wordes he hath deceiued the people of Galilee, and gotten the fourtignitie to himselfe. While he spake these wordes, they sought sodainly to lay hands on mee, intending to murder mee.
But those two, whom I had with me, perceiuing their intent, drew their swords, threatening those who should dare attempt to offer me violence. The people likewise gathered stones to cast at Jonathan's partakers, and puld me away violently from mine enemies: and for that if I should haue gone but a little further, I had mee with Iohn and his army, thorow the feare I had, I turned an other way. For crossing downe a priuie way that led me to the lake, I betooke me to a boate and went by water to Tarichea, auoyding this danger beyond all hope.

Whereupon I incontinently sent for the chiefeest men of Galilee, and told them how contrary to all law and right I had almost bene murdered by Jonathan and the Tiberians. For which cause the Galileans were grievously displeased against them, and willed mee without delay to make warre against them, or if I list not my selfe, to suffer them with all expedition to cut off both Iohn and Jonathan, with all their followers. Yet did I retrain them the best I could, and pacified their displeasure, and prayed them to expect vntill such time as we knew what newes our Em-bassadors would bring that were gone to Ierusalem. For I told them that wee ought to execute no kinde of thing without their approbation and consent: and by these means I perswaded them.
But Iohn seeing at that time that his policie had but verie slender successe, returned backe againe to Gitchala.

Some few daies after, our Embassadors, who were returned from Ierusalem, certified vs, that the people of Ierusalem were sore displeased with Ananias the high priest, and Simon the sonne of Gamaliel, for that without their common consent they had sent Embassadors into Galilee, and sought to displace me of the government there, and their displeasure was so kindled that they were ready to set their houses on fire. They brought me also letters, by which the gouernours of Ierusalem vpon the instant request that the people had made vnto them, confirmed me in the go-uernment of Galilee, commanding Jonathan and his associates to returne backe againe with all expedition. After I had receiued these letters, I repaired to the borough of Arbela, where I assembled the Galileans: before whom I commanded the Embassadors to report how much the people of Ierusalem were displeased and discontented, in regard of those things which Jonathan had iniured me in; and how they confirmed me in the government of this countrey, and had called and commanded both Jonathan and his confederates backe againe to Ierusalem, to whom I speedily sent that letter that was directed to them, commanding the messenger to obserue verie carefully both their actions and acceptance. After they had receiued the letters, they were greatly troubled, and sent for Iohn and those of the councill of Tiberias, with the gouernor of Gabara, and consulted with them what they were best to do. The Tiberians opinion was that they should continue and maintaine their estates, and that they should not forsake the Citie which had already subscribed to their authoritie, especially for that I would invade them: for that I had so threatened them they were not ashamed to faime and imagine. This aduice not onely pleased Iohn, but hee furthermore gaue this counsell, that some two Embassadors should be sent from them to the people of Ierusalem, to accuse mee for that I had vniuſtly gouerned the common weale of Galilee, telling them that they might verie easily incense the people against mee, both in regard of their authoritie, as also for that the common people are by nature variable and inconstant. This counsell that Iohn gaue was allowed by them all: whereupon it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ananias should in person repaire to Ierusalem, and that the other two should remaine at Tiberias, and for their conuoye they gaue them a hundred armed soldiers.

The Tiberians had before this prouided for the securitie of their wals, and gaue commandement to all the Citizens to take armes, and afterwarde sent for some supplies to Iohn to strengthen their garrison, if they should any waies be prouoked by mee. For Iohn kept at Gischala. Meane while Jonathan trauiailing on wards of his journey came to Dabaritra, a Citie situated vpon the vttermost borders of Galilee in a great Plaine: and there met he about midnight with some of my troupes that kept the watch, who commanded the to lay by their armes, and kept them safely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Leui, who had the charge of this quarter, certified me by his letters: for which cause dissembling the matter for some two daies, I sent letters to the Tiberians, by which I counselled them that laying their armes aside, they should dismisſe euery one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an iniurious answer: for they supposed that Jonathan and his traine were already arrived in Ierusalem. But I setting light by their iniuries, resolved to circumvent them by this cunning stratageme: For I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle warre against the Citizens. Being therefore verie willing to drawe them out of their wals, I chose outten thousand of my best souldiers, whome I distributed into three bands, and lodged one companie of them secretly at Dora, to lie there in ambush: I encamped also an other thousand in a certaine borough situate in a mountainous place, some foure stades distant from Tiberias; commanding them that as soone as I gaue them a watchword or signe, they should breake forth: as for my selfe, I withdrew my selfe and kept in the open field, and late me downe on the grasse. Which when the Tiberians perceiued, they made continuall excursions towards me, vying many bitter and iniurious taunts against me: and to great folly possessed them, that they spread a magnificent couch in the open Plaine, and marching round about the same, they scornfully seemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whilest in the meane time I tooke pleasure to laugh and looke vpon their follies.

But being verie desirous to surpriſe Simon by some policie, and Idazar also with him, I sent vnto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their walles, attended by their friends and guard for their securitie sake; for that I was determined to conferre with them vpon a peace, and to confirme the one halfe of the gouernment vnto them. Hereupon Simon deceived by his folly, and overcome and blinded with greedy desire, came forth with all expedition: but Idazar suspecting some stratageme, would not aduenture without the wals. As soone as I saw Simon attended by his friends and guard, I went out to meete him, and embraced him kindly, giuing him thanks for that he was come downe; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate somewhat with him in secret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I deliuered him to my friends to lead him into the borough, and gaue a signe vnto my souldiers that they should come downe, and with them I assaulted the Citie of Tiberias. There was a sharpe skirmish on both sides, and the Tiberians had welne gotten the victory: For my souldiers began to flie; but perceiuing how the matter went, I animated those of my companie, and with them gaue a valiant onset on the Tiberians, who almost had the better, and chased them into their Citie, and sent another company by the lake to set fire on those houses which they should first fall vpon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their Citie was taken by force, and cast downe their weapons for feare, praying me to haue compassion of their wiues and children, and to pardon their Citie. For this cause being moued with compassion, I restrained the furie of my souldiers; and for that it was late I retired my selfe with my souldiers, both to the intent I might spare the Citie, and relieue my wearie and wounded souldiers. Hereupon I sent for Simon to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promising him to send him to Ierusalem, and to assure him in his journey homeward, and to furnish him for

A his ordinarie expences with all things necessarie. The next day I assembled ten thousand souldiers, and presently made mine entrie into Tiberias, and hauing assembled the chiefeſt Citizens in the horse rafe, I commanded them to discouer vnto me who they were that were the authors of that rebellion: who hauing satisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and sent them incontinently to Iotapata. As for Jonathan and his consortes, I let them at libertie, and gaue them money for their charges, & sent them back to Ierusalem with Simon & Idazar, and true hundred souldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reassembled themselves before me, beseeching me to pardon their misdeeds, promising me to recopence by their future fidelitie their forepassed and foule faults: beseeching me also to restore those goods vnto the citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gaue a present command, that all the pray should be brought and laid before mee: and whereas the souldiers delayde to performe the same, I spying one of those souldiers that stood by mee, better apparelled then hee was wont to bee, asked him where hee had gotten that garment: who confessing that hee had taken it in the spoyle of the citie, I chastised him with strokes, and threatened a worse punishment to all those that would not restore that which they had taken away: whereby recovering a great part of the pray together, I gaue euery citizen that which he knew to be his owne.

Ioseph sends the authors of the rebellion to Iotapata.

Those goods that were taken from the citizens are restored.

In this place I cannot chuse but in some fort I must reprehend Iustus, who wrote vpon this argument; and others, who promising a historie are not a raid in contempt of truth, either for fauour or hatred, to commit lies to their posteritie. For they differ nothing from counterfeiters of euidences, and racers of records; but that these men are more corrupted by impunity. For he to the ende he might seeme to employ his time wel, vnder taking to set downe the events of this warre, hath belied me in many things, and hath not bene ashamed to belie his owne country. For which cause I am necessarily enforced in this place to discouer that which hitherto I haue concealed, & to reprove that which he hath falsely testified of me: neither is it to bee wondered at that I haue to long time deferred the performance thereof. For whosoever writeth a historie ought of necessity to speake the truth; yet is it not lawfull for him to inueigh against the wickedder fort too vehemently, not for that they are worthy of this fauour, but for his owne modesties sake.

A reproofe of Iustus the historiographer, that falsely accused Ioseph.

Tell me therefore Iustus (for thou desirest to be held for the man of greatest note amongst all other historians, and art not ashamed to vaunt and boast thy selfe of that title) tell mee I pray thee in familiaritie (for I must to take with thee as if thou wert present before me) how I & the Galileans haue bene the authors of that rebellion, which thy country began both against the Romans and their king. For before I was chosen gouernor of Galilee by the people of Ierusalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not onely vp in armes, but had already made warre against the ten Cities of Syria. Thy selfe hadst burnt their villages, and one of thy seruants died in that country: yet not I alone protest this, but it is extant also in writing in the records of the Emperour Vespasian, how the inhabitants of these tenne cities cried out to Vespasian in the citie of Ptolemais, requiring that thou mightst be punished, as the author of their mischiefs: and assuredly thou hadst bene punished by the Emperour, had not Agrippa, who had receiued commission to execute thee, vpon the instant request of his sifter Berenice spared thee life, and kept thee bound in prison for a long time. Furthermore, thy politicke behaviours do sufficiently expresse what the rest of thy life hath bene, and how thou hast caused thy country to rebell against the Romanes: whereof I will produce hereafter most euident arguments, and for thy cause will I vige somewhat against those other Tiberians; and I will make it plaine to those that shall read these histories, that thou hast bene no friend to Rome, nor faithfull to thy king. And I enforce these my authorities from the greatest cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Iustus wert borne. For Sephoris is situate in the heart of Galilee, hauing round about it a number of villages, and being a citie sufficiently able in it selfe to attempt and execute any noble action at their pleasure; yet notwithstanding the citizens thereof resolved to oblerue their faith to the Romanes, and thrust mee out of doores, forbidding euery man among them to beare armes for the Iewes. And to the end they might bee more assured in my behalfe, the inhabitants deceived me in that they intreated me to incompassse their citie with a wall: and that done, they willingly entertained a garrison which was sent them from Cestius Gallus, who was general of the Roman Legions in Syria in contempt of me, although at that time I had a great power, and terrified the country round abouts. But when our great citie of Ierusalem was besieged, and that temple which was common to all our nation, was in danger to fall into the enemies hands, the Sephorites sent no succours, to the end it might not be said that they tooke armes against the Romanes:

Tiberias, Iustus country. Sephoris and Tiberias two chiefe cities of Galilee.

But

But thy countrey Iustus being situate vpon the lake of Genazareth distant from Hippus thirtie G stades, from Gadara sixtie, from Scythopolis sixscore, in a countrey obedient to the king, hauing not any citie of the Iewes round about it, might haue verie easily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had list. For both the citie and people were furnished with munition in all abundance, But as thou saist, I was the cause at that time. And who afterwarde? For thou knowest that before the siege of Ierusalem, I was in the Romans hands, & that Iotapata was taken by force, & diuers other castles; and that many other Galileans were spent in diuers battels. At that time shouldst thou haue deliuered thy self of that feare thou hadst of me, laying thine armes aside, & presenting thy selfe to the king & the Romans, when thou vndertookst armes not of thine owne accord, but enforced. But the truth is, you expected Vespasians coming, euen vntill such time as he begirt your citie wals with a siege, & then laid you your armes aside for feare of danger: yea euē thē had your citie bin ouerthrowne, except the king in excuse of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Vespa- H sians hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your offence, that behaued your selues like enemies. Do you not remember how often times I haue obtained the victorie against you, and how fewe times you could complaine of bloudshed? But you falling at dissension one with another haue bene the instruments of your owne ruine; & not for the loue you bare either to the King, or the Romanes, but of your owne malice slewe one hundredth eightie and fise citizens, at such time as I was besieged by the Romanes in Iotapata. Nay more, is not this true, that during the siege of Ierusalem, whereof I haue made mention, there were more then two thousand Tiberians slaine, or otherwise taken prisoners? But perhaps thou wilt alledge, that at that time thou wert no enemy, for that thou wert fled to the King; but I tell thee that thou fleddest thither for the feare thou hadst of mee. I am a wicked man, as thou sayst: but what art thou? whom King Ag- I grippa, vpon many presents deliuered from punishment, at such time as thou wert condemned by Vespasian to lose thy head. For what cause hauing made thee prisoner twice, and hauing so many times past the sentence of banishment against thee, & hauing once commanded thee to be thine owne murderer, hath he giuen thee life vpon the importunate sollicitation of his sister Ber- nice? And after so many crimes committed by thee; hauing entertained thee for his secretary, whē he found thy corruption in that office, he banished thee from his presence.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with these matters, yet notwithstanding I wonder at thine impudence, that hast openly protested, that thou hast written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, then any man: whereas thou art vtterly ignorant of those things that were done K in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the king, and wert no waies priuie to the siege of Iotapata; seeing thou didst not follow vs. Neither couldst thou be able to learne how I behaued my self therein, for that there was no one left aliue to giue thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps say, that thou hast carefully described that, which hapned during the siege of Ierusalem. And how may this bee possible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that warre; neither hast thou read the commentaries of Vespasian. But I coniecture hereby that thou hast not read them at all, forasmuch as thou hast written clean contrarie to that which is contained therein. And if thou art so confident, that thy historie is truer then other mens, why didst thou not publish it during Vespasians and Titus liues, who were the generals of that warre; neither before king Agrippa and those of his race, who were all of them very expert in the Greek tongue? L For thou hast kept it written by thee about twentie yeeres, and mightst haue produced wines of thine exact diligence before them, who were priuie to all things. But now when they are dead, & thou thinkest that no man liueth that may reprove thee, thou hast vnderaken this boldnes to publish thy work. But I haue vsed no such policie or feare in my bookes, but haue presented them to the Emperours themselves, who haue bene eie witnesses and actors thereof. For I knewe in mine owne soule that I had set downe all things truly: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover I communicated the same historie with diuers others, whereof some of them were present at the warre, as was king Agrippa, and some of his kinted. And Titus the Emperour himselfe was so desirous that men should search for the truth of that historie out of these bookes, that he placed them in a librarie, and caused them to be published, being M subscribed with his owne hand. As for king Agrippa, he sent me seuentie two Epistles, testifying the truth of my bookes, whereof two of them are vnderwritten, to the end that the truth may appeare thereby. King Agrippa to his deere friend Ioseph, Health. I haue with great contentment over-read thy book, wherein thou seemest in my opinion to haue handled this matter more exactly, then any other. For which cause I pray thee send me the rest. Fare well my deere friend. King Agrippa to Ioseph his deere friend, Health: I perceiue by thine owne writing, that thou needest

A needest no intelligence from me, how matters haue passed from the beginning: yet when wee meet next, I will betweene me and thee certifie thee of certaine things which thou knowest not. Thus was he a witness of the truth of my accomplished historie: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, as you perhaps may obiekt; for farre was it from so noble a mind to be subiect to so seruile a folly: but only to this end, that the truth of my writings might be commended to the reader by the worth of his testimonie. And thus much haue I thought good to set downe in way of answer to Iustus.

Now as soone as I had pacified these troubles in Tiberias, and had established a counsell of such as were well affected towards me, I bethought my selfe of that which concerned me to doe in respect of Iohn. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I should atone them all, and that B in battell array I should march against Iohn, and doe iustice vpon him, as he that had been the author of all this mischief. But for mine owne part, I misliked their counsels, for that my desire was to extinguish these troubles without bloudshed; and for that cause I incited them with all diligence that was possible, to learne the names of all those who serued vnder him: which being done, and I made priuie what they were, I published a proclamation, by which I promised both safetie and pardon to all those, that would forsake Iohn, assigning them the terme of twentie daies, to determine of that which seemed best for their owne securitie: and I threatened to set fire on their houses, and confiscate their goods, except they gaue ouer their armes. They hearing these things, were greatly troubled, and forsooke Iohn: and after they had laid downe their weapons, they came vnto me to the number of foure thousand: so that onely fiftie hundred men remained with Iohn or thereabouts, either of Citizens, or strangers of Tyre. When Iohn perceiued that he was circumvented by this policy, he euer after remained quiet in his country in great feare.

At that time the Sephorites grew so bold, that they tooke armes vnder the confidence and strength of their wals, and for that they saw me distracted with other businesse. They therefore sent to Cestius Gallus gouernour of Syria, praying him to reparaire vnto them, with all expedition, to take possession of their Citie, or to send them a garrison of men at the least. Gallus promised to come vnto them, but he set downe no certaine time of his approche: whereof when I was aduertised, I tooke the men of warre that I had, and marched against the Sephorites, and tooke their Citie by force. The Galileans verie glad of this opportunitie, and supposing the time was D come wherein they might satisfie the insatiable hatred that they bare against that Citie, marched on with that intent, as if they would haue wholly ruined the Citie, with all the inhabitants. They therefore traquailed the streetes, and set fire on the houses, which they found wholly desolate: For the inhabitants were fled away for feare, and were retired into a forresse. They therefore ranfackt all things, and left nothing vnspoyled: neither was there any kinde of miserie which they inflicted not on their countremen. Which when I sawe, I was sore grieved; and commanded them to giue ouer, signifying vnto them that it was impieie in them, to shew themselves so sauage towards their countremen. And seeing that neither by any prayer or commaund that I made, I could draw them to obedience, for that their hatred surpassed my counsels, I commanded those that were about me, and whom I most trusted, to spread a rumour that the Romanes charged vs on the other side of the Citie, with great force. All which I did, to the ende that by this rumour I might pacifie the furie of the Galileans, and saue the Citie of Sephoris: and this policie tooke good effect. For when they heard this newes they were affraid, and forsooke their pillage, to trust to their heeles, in especial for that I who was their general did the like. For I made a shew, that I beleued the rumour to be as true, as they beleued it: and by this stratageme the Citie Sephoris was saued beyond all hope.

And hardly escaped Tiberias from being spoyled by the Galileans, thorow this occasion which ensueth. The chiefe of their counsell wrote vnto the king, that he should come vnto them, and take possession of their Citie. The king promised to satisfie them verie shortly, and answered the E by his letters, and deliuered them to one of his chamber, called Crispus a Iewe borne, to carrie them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this messenger, tooke him and brought him vnto me: which when the common people vnderstood, of meere spleene they fell to armes, and the next day diuers of them assembled themselves from all parts; and came to the Citie of Ascho where I made my abode, and made huge exclamations, calling the Tiberians traytours, and the kings friends, and demanding of me licence and libertie that they might reparaire to Tiberias, and raise it to the ground, being as much displeased against the Tiberians; as they were against the Sephorites.

Iosephus prosecuted his historie, and taught to rebate with Iustus.

Four thousand of Iohns followers forsake him, and follow Ioseph.

Tiberias in danger of ruine.

The Galileans wrath pacified, concerned against the Tiberians.

Iustus desired to command Galilee.

Joseph assaileth the walls of Sephoris.

Silas captaine of the kings guard.

Joseph putteth the kings souldiers to flight.

Which when I heard, I stood in great doubt how I might deliuer the Tiberians from that G displeasure, which the Galileans had conceiued against them: for I could not denie but that the Tiberians had written and sent for the king: for the answers which he made them, did evidently expresse the truth. And hauing a long while debated the matter with my selfe, I sayd vnto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians haue offended: neither will I hinder you from spoiling their Citie; yet must you proceed to the execution thereof with some iudgement. For the Tiberians alone doe not betray our libertie, but others also, who are more accounted of in the countrey of Galilee. Stay therefore vntill such time as I am thorowly informed, who they be that are authors of this treason; and then you shall haue them all vnder your hands, with all those amongst them, whom you may particularly thinke worthie punishment. By these perswasions I wonne the people, who departed from me wholly contented and pacified. As for the messenger H that was sent by the king, I caused him to be imprisoned, hauing respect to an vrgent necessitie of mine owne, which constrained me to depart out of the kingdome within a little while. And calling Crispus secretly vnto mee, I charged him to make those souldiers drunke, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all securitie flee backe to the king. Thus Tiberias being ready to be destroyed, the second time by my government and prouidence, auoyded at that time a great and fatali danger.

At the same time Iustus, the sonne of Pisus, fled vnto the king without my knowledge: the cause of which flight of his, I will orderly expresse. As soone as the Romans had begun their warre against the Iewes, the Tiberians concluded to obey the king, and in no sort to rebell against the Romans. But Iustus egged them on to take armes, thirsting after alteration, and hoping both to obtaine the government of Galilee, as of his owne countrey: but his hope failed him of a successfull end. For the Galileans being enuiously bent against the Tiberians, for those iniuries they had suffered at their hands before the warre, could not allow Iustus to be their gouernour. My selfe also, whom the people of Ierusalem put in trust with the government of Galilee, was oftentimes so much moued, that I failed little of killing Iustus; so intolerable was his wickednesse. Hee therefore fearing least my displeasure should shorten his daies, went vnto the king, supposing that hee might liue more freely and securely with him. The Sephorites beyond their expectation hauing escaped this first danger, wrote vnto Cestius Gallus the second time; requiring him to come vnto them, to the end that hee might be the sooner seized of their Citie; or that he should send them forces to withstand the incursions of their enemies: and finally they K wrought so much, that Gallus sent them store of horsemen, and after them footmen, who came by night, and were receiued into their Citie. But seeing that the countrey round about them was but in poore estate, by reason of the Roman horsemen, I tooke my souldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twentie stades off of Sephoris, and by night I approached the same, and set ladders to the wall, with which I entered a number of my souldiers, and became master of the better part of the Citie; from whence notwithstanding we were afterwards constrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelue Roman footmen and two horsemen, with some Sephorites, to the onely losse of one of ours. Afterwardes a fight hapning betweene vs and their horsemen in open field, wee fought for a long time with disadvantage: For the Romans hauing inuironed mee on all sides, my reward thorowe the feare L they conceiued, began to retire. In this skirmish I lost one of my guard, called Iustus, who in times past had serued in the verie same place vnder the king. At that verie time the kings forces both of horse and foote came thither, vnder the government of Silas captaine of the guard, who encaping some fiue stades off of Iulias, beset the high waies that bended towards Cana with men of warre, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiuing any commodities from the countrey of Galilee.

As soone as I receiued newes hereof, I sent out two thousand souldiers, with Jeremy their coronell: who shrouding themselves within a stade of Iulias, neere vnto the floud Iordan, offered nothing els but light skirmishes, vntill such time as I had gathered three thousand souldiers more, and was come vnto them. The next day hauing planted an ambush in a certaine trench M neere vnto the enclosure of their campe, I couled out the kings souldiers to skirmish, hauing first forewarned my souldiers toaine a flight, vntill such time as they had drawne their enemies as far as the ambush: which they cunningly executed. But Silas supposing that our men fledde for cowardize, set forward to follow them as fast as he might possible: but they that lay in ambush charged him on the backe, and discomfited his armie: and I presently turning and making head against them, constrained the kings forces to trust to their heeles. At that time the estate of the country

A countrey was at a good point, had not some cursed spirit thwarted mine honest purposes, for the horse whereon I rode, falling into a certaine bog, cast mee on the ground, whereby mine hand being thrust out of ioynt about the wrist, I was carried into a borough of Cepharnom. My souldiers hearing hereof, and fearing least some more sinister misfortune had befallen mee, then indeed had done, restrained themselves from pursuing the enemy any further; and turned their backs thorow the griefe they had conceiued by reason of mine accident. Hauing therefore sent for Physicians, and caused my selfe to be dressed, I staid there for that day; and being seized with a feuer, I was carried by night to Taricheas, according to the aduice of my physicians.

Silas and his souldiers hauing newes of mine accident, recovered their courages: and vnderstanding that we kept but slender watch in our campe, they laid an ambush by night on this side B Iordan, with their horsemen, & as soone as the day appeared, he drew out our souldiers to fight, who willingly condescended thereunto, and being come into the Plaine, they perceived the enemy that lay in ambush, by whom they were put to flight, and six of our men were slaine. But they pursued their victory no further: For hauing newes that certaine souldiers had past the water of Taricheas to Iulias, they were affraid and returned backe.

Not long after Vespasian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with king Agrippa. Against whom the Tyrians began to utter many reproaches, telling Vespasian that the king was both an enemy to the Tyrians & the Romans, alleading that Philip his Generall had betrayed the kings palace and the Roman army in Ierusalem, and that by the kings commission. Which when Vespasian vnderstood, hee reprooued this impudent boldnesse of the Tyrians, for blaming a king of that C power, and a friend to the Romans: and aduised the king to send Philip to Rome, to yeelde account of his actions. But notwithstanding that Philip was sent thither, yet presented he nothing self before Nero; for finding him extremely busied with troubles and ciuill warres, he returned vnto the king without doing any thing. VVhen Vespasian was arrived at Ptolemais, the gouernors of the ten cities of Syria cried out against Iustus the Tiberian, accusing him for burning of their boroughs. Vespasian therefore deliuered him bound vnto the king, to the end that the subiects of his kingdome might haue him punished. Bet the king before that time, vnwitting to Vespasian, had kept him prisoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites also referred to Vespasian, to salute him, and receiue a garrison from him, with their commander Placidus, who made many roades into the countrey, and pursued them vntill such time as Vespasian arrived in D Galilee: of which arrivall I haue amply spoken in my booke of the Warres of the Iewes; how he came, how he fought against me, the first time neere to the Citie of Tarichea: how I departed from thence to repaire to Iotapata, my taking, my deliuerance, and all my actions and fortunes during the warres of the Iewes, and the siege of the Citie of Ierusalem. But now mee seemeth that it is necessarie, that I describe other things exploited by mee during my life time in other places then in the warres of the Iewes. After the siege of Iotapata was ended, I was prisoner with the Romans and kept very carefully: yet notwithstanding Vespasian did me much honour. For by his commandement I married a virgin, that was one of those that had been taken captiue in Casarea. But she remained not long time with me: for after I was set at libertie, and that I followed Vespasian, shee retired her selfe to Alexandria. After which, I married another woman E in Alexandria, from whence I was sent to Titus to the siege of Ierusalem, where I was oftentimes in danger of death. For the Iewes laboured what they might to take and punish me: and the Romans supposing that as many and oftentimes as they were repulsed, it was by my treason, cried out continually to the Emperour to execute mee for a traitor. But Titus well experienced in the changes of warre, pacified the violence which his soldiers intended against me, by his silence. And after the Citie of Ierusalem was taken, Titus often solicited mee to take that which I liked among the ruines of Ierusalem, promising to giue it me: But I making but small account of any thing after the ruine of my countrey, besought him that hee would giue me certaine free men, and the sacred Bible, which I receiued for a great consolation in my miseries. All which he graciously granted me. Not long after hauing begd my brother and fifty other of my friends, F they were giuen me, and I was refused in nothing. Entering into the temple by Titus permission, I found a great number of prisoners shut vp therein; and all those women and children of my friends and familiars, whom I knew, I deliuered them, to the number of one hundredth and ninety, without paying any ransom: and I restored them to their former free condition. Being sent with Cerealis and one thousand horse into the Citie of Thecoa by the Emperour Titus, to espie if the place were fit for a campe, in returning from thence I saw diuers prisoners, who were on the gibbet, amongst which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieved in my soule, and

and I came and signified the same vnto Titus with teares: who incontinently commanded that they should be taken downe, and as carefully drest and cured as might bee; two of which died notwithstanding the vtmost diligence of the Physicians, and the third suruiued.

After that Titus had appeased the troubles of Iudæa, coniecturing with himselfe that the possessions which I had in Ierusalem, would yeeld mee but little profit, by reason of the Roman garriſon that should be placed there; hee planted me in a possession in a champaign country: and intending to embarke himselfe to depart for Rome, he tooke me with him in his owne ship, & did me great honour. As ſoone as we came to Rome, Vespasian had great care of me, for hee lodged me in his owne house, where he kept before he was Emperour, and honoured me with the title of a citizen of Rome, and gaue me an annuall pension in money; and as long as he liued, continued his good affection towards me, forgetting no kinde of bountie which he might vse towards me. Whereupon I was so much enuied, that I grew in danger thereby to lose my life: For a certain Iew called Jonathan, hauing stirred vp a sedition in Cyrene, and gathered about him some two thousand inhabitants of the country, was the cause of their ouerthrow: & as touching himselfe, being bound by the gouernour of that countrey, and afterwards sent vnto the Emperour, he said it was I that had sent him armes and money. But Vespasian knew his falshood, & condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies objected diuers crimes against me, in regard that I was in good reputation: but God so wrought that I escaped them all. Moreover, I receiued in gift from Vespasian an ample possession in Iudæa, & at that very time I forsooke my wife, because her manners pleased me not, although she were the mother of my three children, of whom two are deceased, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet aliue. After this I married a wife that was borne in Candie, and was by nation a Iew, and by birth noble, and one of the greatest reputation amongst the inhabitants, endowed with as laudable manners as any other vertuous woman whatſoever; as her after-life most plainly expressed. By her I had two sonnes, Iustus who was the eldest, and Simonides, who also was surnamed Agrippa. Thus far as touching my domesticall affaires. That bountie which I receiued from the hands of the Cæsars, hath alwaies continued mine. For after *Vespasian*s death, Titus who succeeded him in the Empire, continued the same fauour which his father had shewed mee. For although I were oftentimes accused, yet were not mine aduersaries beleecued. Domitian, who succeeded him, augmented mine honours. For he punished those Iewes that accused me, and gaue order that the Eunuch & slave whom I kept to teach my sonne, and by whom I was accused, should be punished. He granted me exemption also from all the tributes of Iudæa, which is one of the most greatest honours that a man may receiue. And as touching Domitia the Emperours wife, shee alwaies continued her good affection towards mee. Behold heere the short recitall of my whole life: whereby let each man coniecture of my manners, as him listeth. But O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I haue giuen and offered thee all this auncient historie of our nation,

I will for this present pause in this place.

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPFUL HIS esteemed friend, M. Anthony Palmer Esquire.

I R, my affection, that had rather bee an A&or then an Orator (do well, then speak well,) hath pickt you out to be the patron of this tragicall historie of the wars of the Iewes. The reasons that draue me here-vnto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefits, nor the fruitlesse vp-shot of ostentation: but your virtue (which is not beloued respectiuely, but onely for it selfe) hath created this good conceit in me, which (if you so please) your acceptance maie continue. Now since as the Philosopher supposeth, it is an action worthy a good man, to do good vnto his friend; so it is no lesse commendable to accept an office of kindness from a friend. For by giuing, wee bewray our well wishing; and by receiuing, we proportion and continue friendship: vpon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my present, and nourish this good custome in me (which was vsuall both amongst Grecians and Latins) I meane my translation: which if it please you, I haue my wish. As for my maligners, I expect no worse from them then Iason the Thessalian, who being assailed and wounded by an enemy (who had an intent to kill him) had an impostumation opened that saued his life: their stabbe and stroke of disgrace shall cure and heale the hidden and neglected infirmities of my minde; and notwithstanding I shall both Genio & ingenio liue to loue you, and lament their want of charitie. Thus heartily commending me, I hastily take my leaue, beeing tied prentise of late to other mens importunities.

Your louing Friend,

THE PRÆFACE,

In which the author taxeth diuers Historiographers of vntruth: and declarer his intent, and specifieth the princi-pall points of this Historie.

Or as much as the warre which was enterprised betwixt the Iewes and Romans, hath (amongst all other) bene the greatest that ey-ther hath bene attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either betwene citie or citie; or nation against nation: there haue been some, who (rather building their discourse on the vaine and improbable report of others, then their owne iudgements) haue (according to the manner of orators) made a historie of their hearsay, & haue filled their discourses not onely with vanitie, but also with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they were eie witnesses or actors of the same) haue according to their owne fancies preferred many lies; either to flatter the Romans, or exercise their hatred against the Iewes: forging some willes accusations, otherwhiles breaking out into praises, without any obseruation of historie: all veritie. For this cause, I Ioseph the sonne of Matthias, by birth an Hebrew, and a citizen and priest of Ierusalem: who in the beginning of these wars bare armes against the Romanes, and after wards (being therunto forced by necessitie) was present at all those things, which were attempted and prosecuted in these warres; haue thought good to discourse in the Greeke tongue (in fauour of all those who acknowledge the soueraigntie of the Roman Empire) all that, which heretofore in my owne language I haue imparted to those Barbarians that inhabit the East. For at such time (as I haue already spoken) as the most bitter and busie warres tooke their beginning; the Romanes were at ciuill warres among themselues: and as touching the Iewes (who were in yeeres valiant, and in wits turbulent) they being both strong in power, and rich in money, did so insolently abuse the time, that being animated by the greatnes of those seditions and troubles; they somewhiles swamme in hope, sometimes sweltered in feare of possessing or losing certaine soueraignties in the East. For the Iewes hope was, that all those of their nation (euen they who inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) would haue both followed them in their rebellion, and seconded their follies with their forces. Moreover, at that time the Frenchmen (who bordered vpon the Romans) suffered them not to liue in peace: and the Germans also began to take armes. Finally, after the death of Nero, seditions raigned euery where: so that by reason of the opportunitie of these tous desire of gaine, desired nothing more then trouble and alteration. For which cause, I thinke it a matter both worthy reproofe, and ill becomming my reputation, if in so waightie affaires, I should suffer the truth to be smothered in incertainties, and should permit the Parthians, Babylonians, and the farthest distant Arabians, and those of our nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenes, to obtaine the true knowledge of those euents by mine industrie; whilst the Gre-cians, and diuers of those, who haue not borne armes with the Romans, being distracted with fashions, & decciued by adulation, should be ignorant hereof. Yet some of these there bee, who (notwithbefore.

The glory of the Romans is diminished if you derogate from their labours at the siege of Jerusalem.

Titus his piety towards the Iewes.

All calamities that happened since the beginning of the world being compared with those the Iewes suffered are of no moment.

The Grecian Historiographers euer praise the wars of the Iewes, with silence.

Who may rightly be called a Historiographer.

standing their false informations) stick not to write histories, not onely void of all truth, but also no waies answerable to the subiect which they undertake. For whilest they labour to dignifie & extoll the Romans, they altogether suppress the same and fortunes of the Iewes: yet cannot I coniecture by what means they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure & abiekt. Nay whilest they thus extoll the Romans valour in conquering the Iewes, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the wars, nor the multitude of the Roman soldiers, nor the honour of their captaines; whose titles are much embased if they (having laboured so much to conquer Jerusalem) should have anything derogated from the honour & prosperitie of their attempts. For mine owne part I am not resolved to contradict those who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romans, neither to extol and dignifie the deserts of mine own nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sincerity to set downe each occurrent, without respect or partialitie towards either part. In performance whereof I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreat of, and as my griefe and sorrow shall invite me to lament the miseries of my country: For the ciuill dissension that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those tyrants that raigned amongst vs, were such, who forcibly drew the Romans with sword & fire to seeke the desolation of our holy temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himselfe can iustifie, who destroyed the same; who during all those warres still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceiued) were kept in awe by the seditious: And who oftentimes of his owne accord deferred the surprisall of the Citie, purposely protracting the siege, to the intent that in the meane time the authors of the sedition & bloody warres might haue leasure to repent and submit themselves. Now if any man thinke that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the tyrants and their theueries; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost country, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgresse the limits of a historie, let it bee imputed to my griefe, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that were euer gouerned by the Romans, our citie only attained to the top of felicitie, which now alas is brought into extreame miserie, captiuitie, and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the world from the beginning hath scene, be compared with the infelicitie and fall of the Iewes, they are slight and of no moment.

And to encrease our sorrow, no forrainers but our own familiar friends, & countymen haue been the actors of our tragedy. This considered, if any man of too seuerer & stoicall iudgement shall reprehend this my lamentation, let such a one attribute the deeds I recount, to the historie which I write; and reuerse the lamentations and sorrows thereof to me, who am the historiographer: although in my mind I may iustly challenge the smooth tongued Grecians, for that (notwithstanding these our so miserable, & so memorable wars hapned in their daies, in respect whereof al other former troubles were obscure & of no reckoning) they haue restrained their tongues & pens, and undertaken an ouercurious silence, to the end they might carpe at those with greater liberty, who undertake the publishing thereof: whom though in learning and eloquence they both exceed and outstrip, yet are they inferiour vnto the in the matter and subiect they intreat of. For they forsooth discipule and set downe the valiant acts of the Assyrians & Medes, as who should say the ancient writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: & yet God knoweth they come so far behind those auncient authors in their writings, as they neither second them in sense, nor equal them in understanding. For such as in times past published any worthy historie, endeouored to write that which they themselves had scene: and for that each of them were eye witnesses of those affaires they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised; the rather for that they accounted it to bee an act of dishonesty, to report and publish lies in stead of a historie. And truly in my opinion that man is both worthy commendation and praise, who strueth by his studious indeuours, to register not onely the occurrences of times past, but also those memorable euents that haue hapned in his daies: and hee only and truly is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans workes, but he that of himselfe compileth a historie, whereof no man hath before time written.

For mine owne part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I haue bene enforced to my no small labour and expence, to register the memory and truth of these euents in the eares of the Greeks and Romans. For as touching their owne learned men, their mouthes are alwaies open to games and controuersies, and to this purpose their tongues still runne on pattens: many if they come to a historie wherein they should both tel truth, & with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mum, the trauell is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leaue the matter to their performance, who are incapable and vnapt both in stile and study, to register the noble actions of royall princes.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of historie, it behooueth vs both to esteeme and honour it. Now to discover vnto you the original of the Iewes, what their estate hath been in times past, and after what manner they departed out of Aegypt, to shew what countries they conquered,

A red, and what colonies they planted, were in my iudgement both impertinent and to little purpose: considering that diuers of mine own nation haue before my time made and written an exact historie of the noble attempts of our ancestors: yea many Greeks also haue translated these mens writings into their own tongue, & haue as truly, as rhetorically exemplified the same. I wil therefore begin my historie in that time where these writers and our own prophesies ceased, and set downe at large all those wars that hapned in my time: and as for those things that exceeded my knowledge and remembrance, I will only touch them briefly, and in a word or two. First how Antiochus (surnamed Epiphanes, who tooke the citie of Jerusalem, and possessed the same for the space of three yeeres & six moneths: and finally how he was driuen out of that country by the Asmoneans. After this I wil set downe the dissensions that hapned amongst Antiochus successors for the kingdome; and how by this means they drew Pompey and the Romans into the managing and medling with their affaires. How Herod likewise the son of Antipater, being assisted by Solius, utterly ouerthrew & cancelled their felicity and authority: and how in Augustus Cæsar's time & after the death of Herod, and during the gouernment of Quintilius Varo, a sedition was raised among the people: and how in the twelfth yeere of Neros raigne the war began to take head and continuance. This likewise which hapned in Cestius time, & what warlike executions the Iews performed in their first attempts and reuolts, how they strenghtened the cities and forts about the, & how Nero (hearing of the great overthrow which his army reueined vnder Cestius their Generall, and fearing lest he should lose all made Titus Vespasian the General of his army: who being attended by his eldest son, came into Iudea accompanied with as great a company of Romans as he could possibly gather: what number of their allies inuaded & spoiled Galilee, what cities they surprisid in that place, either by forcible assault, or by any other composition. Besides al these things, I wil expresse what order & discipline the Romans obserue in their wars, and wherein they are are accustomed to exercise their soldiers. I wil note downe also the places & nature of the country of Galilee, & the description of Iudea, together with the mountaines, lakes & fountains thereof, with all the properties of the same, not forgetting those miseries which the captiue cities suffered: neither how they were surprisid, al which (together with al these euils & miseries which during those troubles befel me) wil I discover, and discourse with all truth and diligence, the rather in that I publish them in their eares, who are no waies ignorant of them. After this I wil set downe how (upon the declining and downfall of the Iewes) Nero died; and how (at such time as Vespasian had undertaken the expedition to Jerusalem) he was withheld from the action, to receive and enjoy the imperiall dignity: how at that instant when he retired himself into Egypt to establish that estate, the Iewes began to mutiny among themselves; how many tyrants arose among them, who hatched much ciuill discord and debate in their gouernment. I gaue, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the second time into Iudea, and ranged ouer the country, and how and where he leuied & encamped his armies. How and how oftentimes the city hath been vexed by sedition, especially at such time as hee himselfe was present. What onsets he gaue, and how many mounts he raised in beginning the city with a treble wal: the strength and prouision of the city, the situation and plat of some of the temple, and the altars therein: the rites and ceremonies which were used upon festiual daies, the 7. purifications & offices of the priests: the garments also of the high priest, and the holy sanctuary of the temple. Al which I will recount without any dissimulation, or strauing from the truth of historie. After this I wil relate what cruelty the tyrants used against their owne countymen, and what humanity the Romans shewed towards strangers, and how oftentimes Titus (who aspired the safety both of the city and temple) prouoked and inuited the seditious to mutual amity. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Iewes (after these many & grievous wounds which they both suffered and sunke under, sometimes by war, otherwhiles by sedition, and many times by hunger) were at length ouerthrowne to their utter confusion. Neither wil I omit the slaughter of such as reuolted, neither the punishment inflicted on those that were captiue: but I wil set downe how the temple was burned against Cæsar's will, & what an infinit masse of sacred treasure was deuoured by the fire. But to shut vp the historie, I will annex the surprisall of the citie, and what signes and wonders hapned before the same: the captiuitie also of the tyrants themselves, and the number of those that were led away into captiuitie: and what miserie they endured: how the Romans continuing their warres, utterly rased the fortresses of their captiues: finally, how Titus in traouailing thorow the whole countrey, established a forme of gouernment therein; and after ward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All these things haue I comprehended in Ieuon bookes: indeuouring as much as in me lieth, to flye and auoide all the occasion of reproofe and reprehension from those men, who knew these affaires and were actors in the wars. All which I haue done for their sakes, who rather affect truth, then follow their pleasure: and according to that order and forme I haue proposed, I will begin and prosecute my stile and historie.

At such time as Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, made warre against Sextus Pompeius for the whole gouernment of Syria, there arose a sedition among the Iewes: wherein euery one indeuoured himselfe to haue the soueraigntie ouer others; and those of chiefe authority and nobilitie amongst the rest, disdained to submit themselves to such as were their equals. At that time a certaine man called Onias (who was one of the high priests) hauing gotten the vpper hand, did driue the sonnes of Tobias out of the Citie; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in al humility that he would leade his forces into Iudæa; offering themselves to be his guides in that expedition and voiage. Antiochus (who long before that time desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their requests; & leuying a great army, entred Antiochus entred their country, and tooke the citie by force, and slew the most part of them, who fauoured Ptolomy: and giuing his souldiers libertie to sacke the citie, he himselfe spoiled the temple also; and for the space of three yecres and fixe moneths, forbad all sacrifices & ceremonies, which before time were accustomed and vsed in that place. Whereupon Onias the high Priest fled vnto Ptolomey, and hauing obtained a grant of a peece of ground from him, within the liberties and precinct of Heliopolis, he built a towne and temple in that place, resembling the citie and sanctuarie in Ierusalem.

But neither was Antiochus satisfied with the v unexpected surpris of the citie, nor with the pillage & slaughter of the citizens, but was so far transported by his passions, & incensed with the remembrance of those euils which he sustained during the siege of the citie, that he compelled the Iewes to forsake the customes of their country; commanding them from that time forward to vse no more circumcision of their children, but that they should immolate swine vpon the Altar: which when all of them iointly refused to obey, the most constant among them were for that cause put to death. Bacchides being made chiefe of the garrisons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innated cruelty, & the impious commandement that was left him, omitted no occasion to further his wicked impietie, in so much as hee particularly tormented such as were of noble birth, and qualitie: that each day for the most part, hee represented vnto them the fresh face and memorie of the deuoliation of their citie: till all of them at the last being prouoked and whetted on through the grievousnes of that which both themselves and others indured, addressed themselves with confidence to prosecute their reuenge. At length Matthias the son of Asmoneus, one of the Priests, who was borne in a village called Modin, accompanied with his siue sons and his own household armed with sword, slue Bacchides: and fearing the power and multitude of the enemies garrisons, speedily retired himselfe into the mountaines. Thither resorted diuers of the people vnto him: for which cause he waxing more confident and courageous, came down from the mountaines, and ouercomming the captaines of Antiochus, draue them out of the borders of Iudæa. At such time therefore as through his happy successe he became potent, and was by common consent of the people (for that he had deliuered them from the subiection of strangers) made their Ruler: he died, leaving his eldest sonne, who was called Iudas to succeed him in the gouernment. VVho fearing least Antiochus would still continue warres against him, gathered together an armie of his countymen, and was the first among the Iewes that made a league with the Romanes; and draue backe Antiochus Epiphanes at such time as hee enforced himselfe once more to invade the borders of Iudæa, repelling him with a great ouerthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet fresh in mens minds and memory, hee assaulted the garrison of the citie: For as yet they were not destroyed (in which conflict he forced them to forsake the highest part thereof, which is called holy) and to betake themselves into the lower part: and hauing obtained the temple, he made euery place cleane, and compassed it with a wall, and made new vessels for the seruice of the temple, and planted them therein, because those that had been before time consecrated there, were prophaned. He builded likewise another Altar, and began to renew the accustomed sacrifice, and obserue the rites of religion.

Scarcely was the citie brought to the former estate, but Antiochus died; who left a sonne and heire behind him, who was not onely inheritor of his kingdome, but also of his hatred against the Iewes: who hauing gathered together fiftie thousand footmen, & almost siue thousand horsemen, and fourescore Elephants, entred by the mountaines of Iudæa; and tooke a towne named Bethsara, neere which Iudas met him in a place called Bethzacharie, where the passage was something streight: and before the armies ioyned battell, Eleazar, Iudas brother, seeing one Elephant higher then the rest, bearing a great tower on his backe, and adorned with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had been there, ranne from his company, and breaking the ranks of the enemies, came vnto the Elephant: but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the king) hee was so highly mounted; for which cause wounding the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell vpon him, and pressed him to death: which act of his had no other successe but this, that by attempting so great a matter, he gaue a manifest testimonie that hee preferred his renowne, before his life.

Now he that gouerned the Elephant was but a priuate person, and although by hap Antiochus had beene there, Eleazar had atchieued nothing else in this valiant attempt; but yet hee aduentured his life vnder hope to performe some valiant exploit. And this act of his was a preface vnto his brother of the euent of the v whole warre that ensued. For the Iewes fought stoutlie, and a long time: but yet Antiochus armie (being both more in number and more prosperous) obtained the victorie; so Iudas therefore after the losse of many of his company, fled vnto the Gophonites, with those of his side who escaped: And Antiochus went to Ierusalem, frō whence after some stay he departed for want of necessaries, leauing a sufficient garrison; as for the rest of his armie, he led them for the winter time into Syria. Yet notwithstanding the kings departure Iudas rested nor, but encouraged by many of his nation, who daily came vnto him, and gathering also together those who escaped out of the former battell, at a village named Adasa hee fought with Antiochus captains, whereafter much & many approbations of his valour in assaulting & slaughtering a great number of his enemies, hee himselfe at length was slaine, and within a few daies after, his brother Iohn also was betrayed and slaine by their treacheries, who fauoured Antiochus.

CHAP. II.

Of the succession of Princes, from Ionathas vntill Aristobulus.

Ant. lib. 13. c. 1. The yeere of the world, 3805, before Christ's birth 159. Ionathas taken by Tryphon's subtilty, is slaine.

After him succeeded his brother Ionathas, who carefully studied for the peace and securitie of his people, and fortified himselfe by the friendship of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his sonne; yet did none of all these things profit him, or acquit him from danger. For the tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and seeking to spoile him of his friends, took Ionathas at such time as he came with a small companie to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an army against Iudæa: from whence being repulld by Simon, Ionathas brother, and overcome by him, in displeasure and reuenge thereof, he slew Ionathas.

Ant. lib. 15. cap. 9. The yeere of the world, 3823, before Christ's birth 141.

But Simon valiantly bestirring himselfe in the government & guide of the affaires of the common-wealth, rooke Zara, Ioppe, and Iamnia (which were bordering townes;) and overcoming the garrison at Accaron, hee destroyed the citie, & assited Antiochus against Tryphon who besieged Dora, before that expedition which hee made against the Medes. Yet would not the greedie mind of the king be satisfied, notwithstanding that Simon had thus faithfully serued and assited him in the death of Tryphon; but that within short time after, he sent vnto Cendebeus (who was the generall of the army) commanding him to sacke and spoile Iudæa, and to take Simon, and make him a slaue. But Simon though aged in yeeres, sought both youthfully and valiantly, & sent his sons with the most resolute men he had, before, against Antiochus, and himselfe with the residue of his army, assaulted another quarter of their enemies campe; and hauing laid many ambushes euen in the mountains, hee in euery place was victorious: and after this his most famous victorie, he was proclaimed high priest, and deliuered the Iewes from the government of the Macedonians, vnder which they had bin 270 yeeres. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolemaeus his son in law, he was murdered at a banquet, who imprisoning his wife & two sons, sent certaine men to kill the third son, whose name was Iohn, otherwise called Hircanus. But the young man vnderstanding the successe of his fathers voiage, hastned vnto the citie accompanied with a great multitude; for hee greatly hoped that the people would remember his fathers provelse, especially because Ptolemaeus iniquitie was hated of all men; Ptolemaeus also hastned to enter the citie at another gate: but he was speedily repulld by the people who had already receiued Hircanus. For which cause he presently retired himselfe into a Castle named Dagon, situate beyond Iericho.

The yeere of the world, 3831, before Christ's birth 133. Hircanus obtained the honour of the high priesthood which his father had. Ptolemaeus cruelly against Hircanus mother & brethren.

After that Hircanus had obtained the office of the high priest, which was left him by his father, and had offered sacrifices vnto God, he led forth his forces with all speed against Ptolemaeus, hoping to help and deliuer his mother and brethren that were detained prisoners with him: and assaulting the Castle, notwithstanding that in all other things he had the better hand, yet was he overcome by iust griefe and compassion. For at such time and so often as Ptolemaeus perceived himselfe to be in danger, hee brought Hircanus mother and brethren vpon the walles, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatening to cast them down frō the wall except Hircanus would presently depart. For which cause Hircanus was more moued with compassion & feare, then with anger and wrath. But his mother being no waies dismayed with stripes which she endured, nor with death wherewith she was threatened, lifted vp her hands to her sonne, beseeching him that in regard of her miseries he would not be moued to spare so impious a person, for she esteemed her death threatened by Ptolemaeus dearer then immortallitie it selfe; if so be hee might receiue iust punishment for the villany which hee had impiously committed against their house. But when Iohn had perceived the resolute mind of his mother, and heard her intreatie, he was moued to assault the Castle, and straight way seeing her beaten and torne, hee related with

A with compassion, and was euen filled with griefe. By which means the siege continued long, and the Iubilee yeere was come, which falleth out euery seauenth yeere: wherein the Iewes ceale from all affaires, as their wont is euery seauenth day. Ptolemaeus deliuered from the siege by this accident and occasion, put Iohns mother and his brethren to death, and afterwards fled to Zeno the tyrant of Philadelphia, who was also surnamed Corylas.

In the meane while, Antiochus being grievously vexed at that which Simon had done vnto him, sent his army into Iudæa, and besieged Hircanus in Ierusalem, who opening Dauids Sepulchre (who had been one of the richest among all the kings of Iudæa) rooke more then three thousand talents of money from thence; and wrought so much with Antiochus, that vpon the payment of three hundred talents of money, he made him raise his siege & depart the country. This Hircanus was the first of all the Iewes that with his owne goods maintained outlanders and souldiers. But so soone as Antiochus had bent his power and forces against the Medes, he took handfast of that opportunitie he had offered him, to reuenge himselfe, & presently assaulted the townes of Syria, assuring himselfe he should find them (as indeed they were) void of souldiers to defend them. VVhereupon hee rooke Medaba and Samea, with the places thereunto adioyning, Sichem and Garizim, which bordervpon the Chuthæans, who inhabite the places adioyning to the Temple, that is made after the imitation of that which is at Ierusalem. Moreouer, hee rooke many cities of Idumæa, and amongst the rest Doreon, and Marisa: and comming into Samaria (where now Sebaste is situate, which was builded by Herod) he besieged it on euery side, and left his two sons Aristobulus and Antigonus, to continue the siege, who diligently besieged the place. There was such a famine in the citie, that they were constrained to eate vnaccustomed meats. For which cause, they required aide of Antiochus, surnamed Spondius, who willingly assited the, but he was overcome by Aristobulus and Antigonus, and was pursued by the afore said brethren vnto Scythopolis, whither he the retired himselfe: but they retiring againe vnto Samaria, besieged the citie, & at last taking it by force, destroyed the same, & led away the inhabitants captiues. Whilst thus fortune fauoured them more and more, they ceased not to pursue their good successe, but led their army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they diuided and spoiled all the country.

CHAP. III.

Of Aristobulus, Antigonus, Iudas Essæus, Alexander, Theodorus, and Demetrius.

His felicitie and good hap of Iohn and his sonnes, was accompanied with the enuie of many of his countymen: and this discontent of theirs, was the cause of a mutinie. For diuers of the Iewes rising vp in armes against them, were so much ouer-ruled by their ambitious passion, that they could not containe themselves from the prosecution of an open and bloody warre: wherein notwithstanding they were put to the worst. From that day forward Iohn passed the remainder of his life in all felicitie and happinesse; and after hee had gouerned the common-wealth for the space of thirtie three yeeres, hee departed this life, leauing behind him five valiant sons. He was a man truly happy, & so fauoured by Fortune, that he had no occasion to complaine of her niggardie in bountie. Finally, hee alone might iustly boast himselfe of three excellent endowments. First of all, that he was the Prince of his country: secondly, that he was high priest: thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God so spake, that hee was ignorant of no future accidents: he fore-saw & fore-told that his two eldest sonnes should not continue long in the gouernment (whose liues are worth reherfall, although they much declined from their fathers felicitie) for the eldest sonne Aristobulus, after his fathers death, translated the principallitie into a kingdome; and was the first that put a crowne on his head; foure hundredth, eightie and one yeeres and three moneths, after the deliuerance of the people from the captiuitie of Babylon. As for Antigonus (who was his second brother, and whom in appearance he seemed to loue most intirely) he made him partaker of his dignitie, and committed the residue of them to prison. Hee imprisond his mother also, for that shee had contended with him as touching the principallitie, (which Iohn had solely committed to her dispose) & was so farre giuen ouer to all kind of cruelty, that he not onely kept her prisoner in bonds, but also put her to death by famine. But the reuenge of this his impietie was this; that hee slaughtered his owne brother Antigonus whom hee intirely beloued, and made both a competitor and partner with him in the kingdome. For by reason of those scandalous slanders, which his enuious and malignant courtiers contriued & inuen-ted against him, he commanded him to be put to death. Naithelasse, vpon their first information, Arifobulus (ouermastered by brotherly affection) gaue them no credit, the rather for that he was certainly assured, that all things for the most part which were objected against him, were rather enforced vpon enuie, then alleaged on good ground.

Antigonus in honour of his brother ascended vp into the temple. Antigonus falsely accused to his brother.

Arifobulus commandeth his guard that if Antigonus came armed, they should kill him.

The Queene cunning Stratagems against Antigonus.

Antigonus suspecteth not his brother.

Judas the prophet foretold Antigonus death.

Arifobulus throw the grieft he conceived at his brothers death, saith his wife. Arifobulus in the house where Antigonus was slaine.

But when as Antigonus returned from the warre, attended with many testimonies of his valour and prowesse, vpon that festiuall time, wherein according to the custome of our country, wee celebrate the feast of Tabernacles; it hapned at that very time, that Arifobulus fell sick and was diseased. Antigonus therefore about the end of those festiuall daies being attended by his armed men, ascended vp into the Temple to offer sacrifice, & the rather resorted he thither in greater pompe and maiestie, because hee intended to honour his brother. Heere vpon, certaine cursed and wicked detractors repaired to the king, buzzing in his eares, that this great guard of soldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughtie resolution and kingly presence, was rather for a soueraigne, then a subiect: inferring hereby, that he entred the citie in this Equipage, with an intent to murder him, not contenting himselfe to haue the onely honour of the kingdom, except hee might reduce the power and possession thereof into his owne hands. Arifobulus though vnwillingly, yet at last being wonne to belieue them, desirous (in seeming not to suspect) to shew himselfe prouident, commaunded his guard to hide themselves in a certaine obscure place vnder the ground: as for himselfe, he tooke vp his lodging in a certaine Castle, which in times past was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: giuing his archers this commission, that if Antigonus came vnarmed they should let him passe; if otherwise, that they should kill him. Hee sent certaine messengers also to Antigonus, requiring him to repaire vnto him disarmed. But the enuious Queene preuented this good intent of his, by a subtill stratageme complotted and acted by those, that with her conspired against him. For shee perfwaded those that were put in trust to discharge this message, to discouer nothing of that, which the king had commaunded them: but to signifie vnto Antigonus, that his brother hauing intelligence, that he had made himselfe many accomplished & compleat armours, with other faire and worthy furniture for the warre in Galilee (which by reason of Antigonus sodaine departure fro that place & his owne instant infirmities he might not behold) would count it no little fauour & felicitie to behold and see him in his warlike ornaments. VVhich when Antigonus vnderstood (who by reason of his brothers disposition suspected no mischiefe) he armed himselfe, and resorted vnto him, intending to delight and content him with his musters. But no sooner arriued hee in the streight which is called the tower of Straton, but the guard of Arifobulus sette vpon him, and slaughtered him, yielding by this meane a demonstration and certaine testimonie, that detraction distracteth & destroyeth all good nature & friendship, and that amongst all our most accounted affections, there is no one so defended and fortified as may abate the edge of enuie.

At this time also who would not wonder at a certaine man called Judas? who being by birth an Effician, was blessed with this felicitie in his prophesies, that his predictions were neither touched with mistaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiuing how Antigonus passed thorow the temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no small number (for ordinarily diuers of his disciples did attend vpon him): Ah, how happy were it for mee at this present, if I were dead, such that truth dieth before me; and some one of my predictions are found faultie and deficient: For behold Antigonus yet liueth, who should this day haue dwelt with death. The place which was destinated for his departure is the towre of Straton, which is distant from this place some six hundred foulds, and yet notwithstanding there are but foure hours of the day to be past: now therefore is the time wherein my diuination shall be fulfilled. Hauing spoken to this effect, the old man fate him downe being altogether disconsolate and pensieue, vntill such time as within a while after it was told him that Antigonus was slaine in a place vnder ground, which was called the tower of Straton, being of the same name with Cæsarea which is situate vpon the sea coast; which was the occasion that Judas staggered in his diuination.

The sorow which incontinently seized Arifobulus, for committing this hainous murder, augmented and increased his sicknesse in such sort, that his soule was continually troubled with the thought of his sin, & his body thorow extreame heat of passion dried vp; & the grieft that he felt was so vehement, that his entrailles became exulcerate, so that hee voided blood in great abundance. And it so fell out by the diuine prouidence, that one of his seruants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that blood which came from him, missed his way, & came vnto that place where Antigonus had bin slaine, wherein as yet there appeared some signes & staines of the bloodshed of Antigonus, on which he powred out the blood of the murderer Arifobulus. VVhich when they

A they perceiued who stood hard at hand, they beganne to cry out with a loud voice, as if the seruane had purposely spilled the blood in that place. Arifobulus hearing this cry, demanded the cause thereof, and the more that each man fledde and feared to discouer the same vnto him, the more instantly sought he to vnderstand the truth; so that at length after hee had vsed threats and violence, he was certified by some one of that which had past. Wherevpon his eyes were suddenly filled with teares, so that in vehement agonie of mind, he at last cried out and said: It is impossible, but that the great eye of the diuine Maiestie should see my wicked acts, and the suddaine vengeance of my brothers bloodshed should pursue and ouertake me. How long, O thou impudent body, wilt thou detain a soule already condemned and adiudged to my mother and dead brother? How long shall I thus lingeringly languish in spending a parcell of my blood vnto thee? B let them take it all at once, and let not the diuine vengeance laugh any longer to see the effusion of mine entrailles. This said, he died after he had scarcely reigned one yeere.

His wife after his death deliuered his brother Alexander from prison, & annointed him king, who was both the eldest and seemed to be the most staicdest among the rest of his brethren. VVho growing by this meane to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aspyring and hunting after the kingdom: as for the other that remained aliue, in that hee contented himselfe with a priuate and contemplatiue life, he kept him neere about him. Hee made warre also against Protonius that was called Lathyrus, who had surprised the Citie of Asoth, & put a great number of his enemies to the sword: naithelasse, Protonius side obtained the victory, who retyring himselfe into the countrey of Egypt, by reason that his mother Cleopatra pursued him with open warre; Alexander forcibly entred the Citie of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greatest of all those that were round about Iordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos sonne had hoorded vp his chiefeft & most precious moueables, who suddainly setting vpon him, recovered all that which was his, and furthermore laid handes on the kings carriage: in seizing which, hee slaughtered many Iewes, to the number of tenne thousand. But Alexander after hee had recovered this losse, inuaded the frontier townes vpon the sea coast, and wan Raphia, & Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by king Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered & overcome these places; the common sort of the Iewes raised a mutinie against him during a certaine solemne and holy feast: for all mutinies and seditions are commonly raised at banquets: and it is thought that he could not haue preuailed against those treacheries, had he not bin D alisted by the Prisdians and Cilicians, whom he hired to helpe him; for the Syrians he refused to hire them, by reason of their naturall hatred they bare against the Iewes. Hauing therefore slaine eight thousand of the rebels, he warred vpon Arabia; and ouercomming the Galaadites, and Moabites (and imposing vpon them a tribute) hee returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodorus was daunted with his prosperous successe, he finding the Castle without any to defend it, raised it vnto the ground. After this, he presently assaulted Oboda, king of the Arabians: who hauing laid ambushments in the countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for such a purpose, discomfited him & his whole armie, being driuen thence into a deepe valley, where they were pestered with a multitude of Camels.

But Alexander escaped vnto Ierusalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred against him, being encouraged by his great losse and slaughter of men, began againe to rebell: but then also hee ouercame them, and in six yeeres space, at sundry battels hee slew about fiftie thousand Iewes; notwithstanding, hee neuer reioyced in his victorie, because the strength of his countrey was consumed thereby. For which cause giuing ouer his warres, he began to seek the peoples fauour by sweet and mild speeches: but they so much hated his inconstant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he might doe to win their fauours, they answered, if hee would die, for that scarcely they would pardon him if so hee were dead, who had committed so many hainous crimes. And therupon the Iewes sent vnto Demetrius, surnamed Acarus for helpe, who in hope of great rewards came and ioyned his forces with the Iewes about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thousand horsemen & sixe thousand footmen, that were E hired (hauing at that timen thousand Iewes his fauourites) and of the contrary part there were three thousand horsemen, and fortie thousand footmen. Before the fight beganne the two kings sent messengers one vnto anothers armie, perswading one anothers men to forsake their colours and capitaines: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would haue forsaken Alexander & come vnto him, & Alexander hoped that the Iewes that followed Demetrius would haue left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parties perceiued that the Iewes continued obstinate in their purpose, and the Græeks kept their fidelitie; the two armies encountered; in vvhich encounter Demetrius had the vpper hand (although Alexanders hirelings euidentlie shewed strength and courage.) But the end of this victorie was such as neither partie expected, for they who sent for Demetrius, after his victorie did forsake him; and fortune changing her colours, sixe thousand Jewes fledde vnto Alexander into the mountaines, whither for safetie hee had betaken himselfe. This recruiting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for hee now thought that Alexander uniting his forces was able to bid him battell, and he feared that all the Jewes would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause hee returned home. Yet the rest of the Jewes hauing thus lost the helpe of Demetrius, would not for all this desist from their rebellion; nay they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slaine) he draue the rest into the citie of Bemeslin, and when he had surprised and sackt the citie, he led them captiues into Ierusalem. But immoderate anger turned his crueltie into impietie, for hauing crucified eight hundred captiues in the midst of the citie, he killed their wiues, and the children he massacred before their mothers faces: and this pittifull spectacle hee beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his concubines. Whereat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the countrey of Iudæa, who staid in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after hee had by those actions sought for the tranquillitie of his kingdom, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficultie, hee ceased to make waire against his countrey.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the warre of Alexander with Antiochus, and Arctas, and of Alexander, and Hircanus.

Alexander feareth Antiochus, Demetrius brother.

After this Antiochus (who likewise was called Dionysius the brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised vp new broiles against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared warre against the Arabians, drew a deepe trench along that ground which lieth betweene Antipatris, and the Seacoast of Ioppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keepe out Antiochus, but that burning the towers, & filling vp the trenches, he entred and passed ouer them with his forces. And not tarrying at that time to reuenge himselfe of him who had thus forbidden him K passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. But the king of Arabia retiring himselfe into certaine places of his country which were fittest for defence, & returning suddainlie to battell with his horsemen (who were in number 10000) rushed hastily vpon Antiochus souldiers, and found them vnprouided: so that a hot skirmish began betwixt them, in which the souldiers of Antiochus, whilst hee liued, shewed themselves valiant (though they were on euery side massacred by the Arabians) but so soone as hee was slaine (who was alwaies ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slaine in the battell and in flight: as for those that escaped, they fled into the towne of Cana, where they all (except verie few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the son of Mineus, sent for Arctas, and established him king ouer Coelosyria, who warred against Iudæa, & ouercomming Alexander in battell, retired himselfe vpon composition. Alexander hauing taken Pella, resorted once more to the towne of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus riches: & took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with 3 wals: & that vpon euery wall there was planted a garrison. He tooke Gaulan & Seleucia, & that towne which is called the valley of Antiochus. Moreover, hauing taken Gamala, which was a most strong castle, and imprisoned the gouernour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person, he returned into Iudæa; after hee had spent three yeeres in warre: where for his prosperous successe he was ioyfully receiued of his nation. But no sooner ceased he from war but he fell sick, and falling into a quartane ague, he thought that hee should drue away his sickness, if hee employed himselfe in some businesse: for which cause being not rid of his discale, he applied himselfe to warre, and labouring about his strength, amidst those tumults yeelded vp the ghost in the seauen and thirtieth yeere of his raigne: leauing the kingdom to Alexandra his wife, fully accounting that the Jewes would in all things obey her, because that shee alwaies by misliking and seeking to hinder his crueltie and iniquitie, had won the hearts of the people. Neither was hee deceived; for shee being admired for her pietie amongst them, obtained the principallie: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the customes of her countrey, & euen from her childhood detested Hircanus first made high priest, and afterwards king.

A detested them, who violated the holy law. She had by Alexander two sonnes, the eldest was called Hircanus; whom by reason of his yeeres she proclaimed high priest & because of his dull nature shee thought that though he were in princely authoritie, yet he would molest no man: and therefore also made him king. As for the yongest sonne Aristobulus, because hee was of a hot spirit, she was willing that he should liue a priuate life.

Now there was a certaine sect among the Jewes which were called Pharisees, who ioyned themselves with the Queene: these people were thought to bee of the godliest sort, and to bee more skilfull then other in interpreting the scriptures: & and for that cause Alexandra fauoured them the more, because she was superstitiously giuen to religion. These hauing by little and little insinuated themselves into the fauour of a simple woman, now did domineere at their pleasure, displacing, deposing, imprisoning, and restoring to liberty whom they pleased, for no other purpose, but that they might enioy the profits and commodities of the kingdom; and Alexandra bare all charges. This Queene was alwaies desirous of high attempts, & daily studied to encrease her wealth: she leuied two armies, and hired a great many strangers; whereby she did not onely strengthen her owne countrey, but also made her selfe to be feared of other nations. Shee ruled others, but her selfe was ruled by the Pharisees, who at last killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in fauour with king Alexander; affirming that through his counsell the king commanded those eight hundred before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perswaded the Queene Alexandra, that shee should put to death all others, through whose counsell Alexander her husband had beene incited against those eight hundred. The Queene being blinded with superstitition, thought it vnlawful to deny any thing which they requested: so that they put to death whom they pleased, till such time as the chiefe of those, who were in this danger, in humble wise came to Aristobulus, who perswaded his mother to spare them for their dignitie, and banish others, whom she thought had deserued punishment: who hauing obtained their liberty, dispersed themselves through the whole country. Now Alexandra sent an armie to Damascus, and because Ptolomeus daily vexed the citie, shee tooke it without doing any thing worthy of memory: shee did sollicite Tigranes king of Armenia with gifts and promises (who with an armie had besieged Ptolemais, wherein Cleopatra was) but he for feare of troubles in his owne countrey, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himselfe from thence.

In the meane time Alexandra being sicke, her yongest sonne Aristobulus with his seruants (which were many in number, all trusty, & in the heat of their yong yeeres) got all the castles: & hiring souldiers with the money he found in those castles, he proclaimed himself king. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) imprisoned the wife and children of Aristobulus in a castle neere vnto the North part of the temple, which in olde time was called Baris (as wee said before) afterwards Antonius being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like maner Sebastus and Agrippas other cities, were named of Augustus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before she could reuenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Aristobulus had done him. This Queene reigned nine yeeres, and left Hircanus in possession of all, whom during her life time she had aduanced to the kingdom. But Aristobulus being both stronger in power, and more esteemed in authoritie, encountered with his brother about Iericho, where many of Hircanus souldiours forsaking their king fled vnto Aristobulus: for which cause, both he and the remnant of those that followed him, were forced to fly into the castle called Antonia, where he found hostages to redeem him. For (as we haue already said) Aristobulus wife and children were imprisoned in that place: and least any worse mishap should betide him, he concluded a peace, vpon condition that Aristobulus should be king, and that hee as brother to the king, would content himselfe with other dignities. Vpon these conditions they were made friends in the temple, where in the presence of all the people, they in most friendly sort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houses and Aristobulus went into the kings palace, and Hircanus vnto Aristobulus his house.

Of the warre betweene Hircanus and the Arabians, and of the taking of Ierusalem.

Now a sodaine feare inuadeth all the enemies of Aristobulus when the law him (contrary to all expectation) made king; and especially Antipater about all others, whom Aristobulus a long time had hated. This Antipater was an Idumæan borne, and for his nobilitie and riches was the chiefe and best reputed of his nation. This man perswaded Hircanus to fly vnto Aretas king of Arabia, & craue his helpe to fer him in his kingdome. Furthermore, he perswaded Aretas likewise to receiue Hircanus, and to helpe him to recouer his kingdome, speaking much against the manners of Aristobulus, & praising Hircanus: adding that he being king of so famous a nation ought to assit those who were vniuſly oppressed; and that Hircanus had manifest iniury offered him, being forced to forsake his kingdome, which by the right of succession was due vnto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus and fled with him forth of the citie: and making all haste possible, they arrived at a towne called Petra, with safety (which is a towne where the kings of Arabia were accustomed to keepe their court) there he deliuered Hircanus into the kings hands, and through many gifts and intreaties obtained the fauour that he might be conducted into his kingdome. And to the effecting of the same, Aretas gaue him an army of fifty thousand horse and foote: which power since Aristobulus was not able to resist, hee was ouercome vpon the first onſer, and was forced to flee vnto Ierusalem: and he had been surely taken, if Scaurus a captaine of the Romans by taking opportunity at those troubles, had not raised the siege. For Pompey the Great (who warred against Tigranes) sent him out of Armenia into Syria: who coming to Damascus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius, who dismissing them from thence, and finding how matters stood in Iudaea, hastened thither in hope of a bootie. So soon as he entred into the confines of the country both of the brethren sent embassadours vnto him, desiring him to take their parts: but Aristobulus having sent him three hundred talents he neglected to doe Iustice; for hauing received that summe, Scaurus sent messengers vnto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatening the displeasure of the Romans and Pompey, except they would presently raise their siege: for which cause Aretas being much abashed, returned out of Iudaea vnto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired vnto Damascus. Yet sufficed it not Aristobulus, that he had escaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces together, he pursued his enemies: and ioyning battell with them about Papyron, he slew six thousand of them, in which number was Cephalon Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being destitute of the Arabians helpe, were driuen to hope for succour euen at their aduerſaries hand. For which cause, as soone as Pompey after hee had entred Syria came to Damascus, they in humble maner came to him, and giuing him many gifts protested vnto him that which before they had done to Aretas, earnestly requesting him, that he would consider the violence offered by Aristobulus, and restore Hircanus to the kingdome: to whom both by yeers and manners it was due.

Meane while Aristobulus slept not, but hauing corrupted Scaurus, came in as royall pompe as hee could; but not abiding to debate himselfe, and thinking it disparagement in more abieſt manner then beſeemed a king to seeke his owne commoditie, returned from Dioſpolis. Whereat Pompey being angrie, at the request of Hircanus and his followers, he went against Aristobulus, accompanied both with the Roman army and the Syrians, who assisted them. When they had passed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Iudaea begin) as they passed thorow the midst of the country, they vnderſtood that Aristobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Castle richly built and situate vpon a very high hill.) Pompey arriuing in that place sent messengers vnto him, commanding him to descend; but hee because hee was called in question about the kingdome, determined rather to hazard himselfe, then obey. But when he saw that the people began to feare; and that his friends willed him to thinke of the power of the Romans, whose strength hee was no waies able to resist; hee allowed their counsaile and came vnto Pompey: where hauing alledged many reasons to shew that he had iust title vnto the crowne, he returned againe into the Castle. And afterward being vrged by his brother to come and plead his title, hee came and returned thither againe, without any contradiction from Pompey. Thus wandred he betwixt hope and feare, and doubting how the matter would go with him, he came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all, and returned againe vnto the mountaine, least hee should seeme to derogate any thing from the maiesty of a king; yet because Pompey willed him to depart from his Castles and to warne his gouernours therof to do the like (whom he had commanded to disobey, except they received letters written by his owne hand) in this hee fulfilled Pompey's minde: yet being angrie and discontented, he departed into Ierusalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it best to let him haue time to prepare himselfe, followed him with all speed, and so much the willinger, because that nere vnto Iericho he had news of Mithridates his death, euen in the fruitfullſt place of Iudaea, where there are great store of palmes and balme: This balme is a shrub whose stem being cut with sharpe stones droppeth balme out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from the wounds

A wounds therof. After he had rested there that night, hee in the morning hastened to Ierusalem: At whose sodaine arriuall Aristobulus being daunted, in humble maner came vnto him; and promising him money, and to yeld himselfe and the Citie into his hands, he by this meanes appealed Pompey's anger. But hee performed no part of his promise; for Aristobulus his associates would not suffer Gabinus (who was sent for the mony) to enter into the citie: For which cause Pompey being moued to displeasure, put Aristobulus in hold, and committing nere the citie, hee tooke a view at what place it might be easiest entred, for he did not lightly perceiue how he might batter the walls, they were so strong. Moreover, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple so strengthened, that although the Citie were taken; yet it might be a second refuge for the enemy. Whilest thus he long deliberated what to doe, there arose a sedition within the citie, wherein Aristobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliuer the king out of prison: but those that fauoured Hircanus would that the gates should be opened to Pompey. At last Aristobulus friends hauing the worst, fled into the temple, and to the end that they might fight it out to the last, they cut downe the bridge, by which men goe out of the citie, into the temple. When the rest had receiued the Romans into the citie, and deliuered vnto them the kings palace, Pompey sent a captaine called Piso with souldiers to seize the same; who leauing a garrison in the towne (seeing he could perwade none of them that were in the temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends shewed themselves ready to helpe them with counsell, and to doe whatloeuer they were commanded. Pompey at the north side filled the ditch and valley with all kinde of matter: which his souldiers carried, although that by reason of the huge depth, and for that the Iewes made resistance, it was a thing hard to be done: and it had beene left vndone, had not Pompey (obſeruing the seventh day, wherein the Iewes religion forced them to abstaine from all labour) caused it to be filled vpon those daies; forbidding the souldiers to fight at that time, to the intent hee might fill the ditch more conveniently (for it is lawfull for the Iewes onely to fight for their bodies vpon the Sabbath.) At last when the ditch was filled, and the towers were built vpon the rampire, he beat the walls with those engines which hee brought from Tyre; but they were beaten backe by those who resisted from the top of the walls, who darted diuers stones at them. Against the violent power wherof, the towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great & goodly building, resisted as valiantly and as long as they possibly could. But the Romans found but hard measure in this place, and Pompey admired the constancie of the Iewes; who being amongst the thickest of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremonie: but (as though they had firme peace) they euerie day obserued their ceremonies, offered sacrifices and offerings, and most diligently obserued all honour and diuine seruice: yea in the very taking of the place, although euerie day they were killed at the altar, yet did they not cease for the lawfull rites of their religion. At last in the third moneth of the siege, whereas scarcely one tower was beaten downe, they brake into the temple, and the first that attempted to climbe ouer the wall was Faustus Cornelius Syllus sonne, and after him two Centurions Eurius and Fabius with their regiments; who compalsing the temple about (while some sought to hide themselves, and other some resisted) they slew them all. There were many priests also among the rest; who, although they saw the enemies with naked swords rushing vpon them, yet being nothing at all dismayed thereat, continued still their sacrifices; and were slaine euen whilest they offered & incensed in the temple: preferring the duty they ought to religion euen before their owne safetie. Many also were slaine by their owne countrimen that fauoured the aduerſe part: and many cast themselves downe headlong vpon the rockes; otherwise in their furie hauing desperately fired all things vpon the walls, burned themselves for company. So that there twelue thousand Iewes were slaine, but very few Romans: yet many were hurt, and amongst all that massacre there was nothing to lamentable, as that the holy sanctuarie (which neuer any man saw before that time) was revealed to strangers. Finally, Pompey accompanied with his followers, came into the temple; where it was lawfull for none but the high priest to come, and saw the candlestickes, lampes, table, censers, and all the golden vessels, and whatloeuer was within the temple. Moreover, hee beheld the great quantitie of odoriferous drugges which were kept in store in that place, and two thousand talents of holy money: yet did he not take away these things, nor any thing else belonging to the temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacrificians to purge and make cleane the temple, and to offer solemne sacrifice. He likewise proclaimed Hircanus high priest (who had in all things shewed himselfe very forward, and especially at the time of the siege;) as also for that hee hindered a multitude of swaines (who addressed for warre) from ioyning themselves with Aristobulus; and there-

In the meane time Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped from Pompey) gathered together a great army, and desperately set vpon Hircanus, waisting all Iudæa, which hee hoped quickly to winne; yea the wall which was destroyed by Pompey at Ierusalem had been builded vp againe as he hoped, had not Gabinus (who was sent into Syria to succeed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that hee could to make resistance, so that hee had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and five hundred horsemen: hee fortified also the commodious places of the country, to wit Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Macherunt, which were neere vnto the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinus sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the army, and followed after with the rest; and certaine chofen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Iewes, whereof Malichus and Pytholaus were made chiefe, joyned themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinus, with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

A Gadara, and Azorus, and many more began to bee inhabited; so that their inhabitants ioyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more vrgent siege: whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon his offences, promising to render vnto him the castles of Macherunt and Hircanium, which were in his power, and besides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinus by counsell of Alexanders mother destroyed, least they might be occasion of new wars. This woman accosted and flattered Gabinus, for that she feared least her husband and the rest of the captiues at Rome should be any waies indemnified. After this Gabinus carried Hircanus to Ierusalem: and committing the temple vnto his charge, he made others of the nobility rulers of the commonwealth, and diuided the whole nation of the Iewes into five parts & gouernments, the whereof one was established at Ierusalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Iericho, the fifth at Sephoris a citie of Galilee: & the Iewes being deliuered from the gouernment of one man onely, willingly suffered themselves to be ruled by the nobility. But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping frō Rome raised new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of those that desired a change, partly of them that loued him before, took Alexandrium, & began to compass it again with a wal: but hearing that Gabinus had sent Sisenna, Antonius, & Serulius against him with an army, he went to Macherunt; and forsaking those that were not fit for war, he tooke with him almost 8000. armed men, amongst whom was Pytholaus gouernor of them that were reuolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Ierusalem. But the Romans followed & pursued them: & ioining battell with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, til being by force overcome, the Romans slue five thousand of them, and almost two thousand fled into a mountaine; & the other thousand breaking the ranks of the Romans with Aristobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the king hiding himselfe the first night amongst the ruines, hoped that hauing respite hee might gather another army, & fortifie the castle: but hauing for two daies sustained the forces of the Romans although vnable to doe it; at last he was taken, & with his son Antigonus, who had bin imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinus, and from thence to Rome, & the Senat put him in prison: but his sons they sent into Iudæa, because Gabinus writ that hee had ioyned Aristobulus his wife vpon condition the castles might be yielded. Now Gabinus being prepared to war against the Parthians Ptolomeus hindred him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leauing Antipater & Hircanus his friends to dispose of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corne, and men, and he perswaded the Iewes who kept the waies that lead vnto Pelusium, to suffer Gabinus to passe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinus there began a commotion, and Alexander Aristobulus sonne once more incited the Iewes to rebellion; & hauing gathered a mighty power purposed to destroy all the Romans that were in that country: which Gabinus fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who perswaded some of the rebels to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cause he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell; the Iewes came against him, and neere vnto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were slaine, and the rest were put to flight: and Gabinus returned to Ierusalem through the counsell of Antipater: who hauing established that estate, went frō thence and overcame the Nabathæans in battell: he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanes priuilege to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, saying that they had escaped from the souldiers. In the meane time Craffus who was appointed to be his successor, had Syria deliuered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars tooke all the golde that was in the temple of Ierusalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had forborne to doe: who passing ouer Euphrates was both himselfe and his whole army vterly ouerthrowne: of which thing it behooueth vs not to speake in this place. After the death of Craffus, the Parthians endeaoured themselves to enter Syria; but Cassius who succeeded him in the gouernment, repulled them: and hauing gotten the vpper hand he speedily resorted into Iudæa, and taking Tarichea, he caried away about 3000. men captiues; & put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of seditious people vnto Aristobulus his part. He that caused and counsailed his death was Antipater, who was married vnto a noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had foure sons, Phaëlas and king Herode, Ioseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who sought the friendship of al potentates round about him by courtlesie and hospitality, and especially hee got the good will of the king of Arabia by affinitie, vnto whose fidelitie he committed his sonnes, because he had vnderaken the wars against Aristobulus. Amongst others that were captiues there was Aristobulus father in lawe, who was also his vn- cle: as for those that had been the chiefe cause of these wars; Pompey caused them to be beheaded. He rewarded Fausus likewise, and those who fought valiantly with him, with very rich gifts, & imposed a tribute vpon Ierusalem, & tooke from that nation the Cities which they had gotten in Coelosyria: & appointed them to be gouerned by him who then was president for the Romans; making them keepe within the bounds of their owne country. And in fauour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara, which the Iewes had destroyed: he deliuered the Mediterranean Cities from their gouernment (for they had not as yet destroyed them, because they were sodainly preuented) namely, Hippon, and Scythopolis, and Pella, and Samaria, and Marisa, and Azotum, and Iamnia, and Arethusa. The townes also vpon the sea coasts, Gaza, and Ioppe, and Dora, which before was called Stratons tower, and afterward by Herod was altered, who builded most sumptuous buildings in that place, and called it Cæsarea: All these Cities hee restored vnto the inhabitants and made them vnder the rule of Syria. And of this place and Iudæa, and of all places from the borders of Egypt vnto Euphrates, he made Scaurus gouernour, leauing him two legions of souldiers. Which done, hee tooke his journey to Rome by Cilicia, leading Aristobulus and his family captiues, who had two daughters and two sonnes, the elder wherof called Alexander escaped in the way; as for the younger whole name was Antigonus, he with his sisters was carried to Rome.

A that time Scaurus tooke his journey into Arabia: but by the difficultie of the place he was so hindered, that hee could not cometo Petra, yet wasted hee all the country adioining to Pella; although whilest hee staid to doe this, hee endured much euill: For there arose a great famine in his army, notwithstanding that Hircanus by Antipaters meanes lent them victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Hircanus as his familiar friend vnto Aretas, to perswade him that by disbursing some money, he should worke his peace. Vpon whose motion Aretas condescended and gaue him K three hundred talents, and so Scaurus with his army departed out of Arabia.

In the meane time Alexander the sonne of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped from Pompey) gathered together a great army, and desperately set vpon Hircanus, waisting all Iudæa, which hee hoped quickly to winne; yea the wall which was destroyed by Pompey at Ierusalem had been builded vp againe as he hoped, had not Gabinus (who was sent into Syria to succceed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that hee could to make resistance, so that hee had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and siue hundredth horsemen: hee fortified also the commodious places of the country, to wit Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Macherant, which were neere vnto the mountaines of Arabia. Gabinus sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the army, and followed after with the rest; and certaine chosen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Iewes, wherof Malichus and Pytholaus were made chiefe, ioyned themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinus, with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiuing himselfe vnable to encounter with all their vnited forces, fled: but drawing neere vnto Ierusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight; where losing to the number of six thousand (wherof some three thousand were taken aliue, and other three thousand slaine) he escaped with the rest. But Gabinus as soon as he came to the castle called Alexandrium, vnderstanding that many had forsaken their places, he by promising the pardon sought to vnite them vnto him before the warre began: but when he perceived that they hammered on no abiect resolution, he slew the most of them; as for the rest he shut them vp in the Castle. In this battel captaine Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renowne, & although hee had alwaies and at all times shewed himselfe valiant, yet there especially his valour appeared. Gabinus leauing some to winne the Castle went vnto the Cities, and strengthened those that were not yet assaulted, and reedified those that were destroyed, and by his commaundement Scythopolis and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Iamnia, and Raphia, and Marisa, and Dora, and Gadara,

A Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to bee inhabited; so that their inhabitants ioyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more vrgent siege: wherat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon his offences, promising to render vnto him the castles of Macherunt and Hircanium, which were in his power, and besides them Alexandrium: All which Gabinus by counsell of Alexanders mother destroyed, least they might be occasion of new wars. This woman accosted and flattered Gabinus, for that she feared least her husband and the rest of the captiues at Rome should be any waies indemnified. After this Gabinus carried Hircanus to Ierusalem: and committing the temple vnto his charge, he made others of the nobility rulers of the commonwealth, and diuided the whole nation of the Iewes into siue parts & gouernments, B wherof one was established at Ierusalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Iericho, the fifth at Sephoris a citie of Galilee: & the Iewes being deliuered from the gouernment of one man onely, willingly suffered themselves to be ruled by the nobility. But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping from Rome raised new troubles: who gathering a great army partly of those that desired a change, partly of them that loued him before, took Alexandrium, & began to compass it again with a wall: but hearing that Gabinus had sent Sisenna, Antonius, & Serulius against him with an army, he went to Macherunt; and forsaking those that were not fit for war, he tooke with him almost 8000. armed men, amongst whom was Pytholaus gouernor of them that were reuolted, who with 1000. men fled out of Ierusalem. But the Romans folowed & pursued them: & ioyning battell with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, til being by force ouercome, C the Romans slue siue thousand of them, and almost two thousand fled into a mountaine; & the other thousand breaking the ranks of the Romans with Aristobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the king hiding himselfe the first night amongst the ruines, hoped that hauing respite hee might gather another army, & fortifie the castle: but hauing for two daies sustained the forces of the Romans although vnable to doe it; at last he was taken, & with his son Antigonus, who had bin imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinus, and from thence to Rome, & the Senat put him in prison: but his sons they sent into Iudæa, because Gabinus writ that hee had so promised Aristobulus his wife vpon condition the castles might be yielded. Now Gabinus being prepared to war against the Parthians Prothomus hindered him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leauing Antipater & Hircanus his friends to dispose of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corne, and men, and he perswaded D the Iews who kept the waies that lead vnto Pelusium, to suffer Gabinus to passe. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinus there began a commotion, and Alexander Aristobulus sonne once more incited the Iewes to rebellion, & hauing gathered a mighty power purposed to destroy all the Romans that were in that country: which Gabinus fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who perswaded some of the rebels to be quiet, yet 30000. remained with Alexander. For which cause he was very forward to fight, and went out to battell; the Iewes came against him, and neere vnto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000. were slaine, and the rest were put to flight: and Gabinus returned to Ierusalem through the counsell of Antipater: who hauing established that estate, went from thence E and ouercame the Nabathæans in battell: he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanus priuilege to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, saying that they had escaped from the souldiers. In the meane time Crassus who was appointed to be his successor, had Syria deliuered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars tooke all the golde that was in the temple of Ierusalem, and 2000. talents which Pompeius had forborne to doe: who pausing ouer Euphrates was both himselfe and his whole army vtterly overthrowne: of which thing it behooueth vs not to speake in this place. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians endeauoured themselves to enter Syria; but Cassius who succeeded him in the gouernment, repulsed them: and hauing gotten the vpper hand he speedily resorted into Iudæa, and taking Tarichea, he carried away about 3000. men captiues; & put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of seditious people vnto Aristobulus his part. He that caused and counsailed his death was Antipater, who was married vnto a noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had foure sons, Phaëlus and king Herode, Ioseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who fought the friendship of al potentates round about him by courties and hospitality; and especially hee got the good will of the king of Arabia by affinity, vnto whose fidelitie he committed his sonnes, because he had vnderaken the wars against Aristobulus. But Cassius made a truce with Alexander, & in the meane time went to Euphrates to hinder the passage of the Parthians; of which we will speake hereafter.

After that Cæsar had forced the Senate & Pompey to fly beyond the Ionian sea, and by that meanes made himselfe sole master of al at Rome, he let Aristobulus at liberty; & with two legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his meanes speedily to win both it & also all places adjoining to Iudæa: but both the hope of Cæsar and the forwardnes of Aristobulus was ouerthrowne through enuy: for he was poisoned by Pompeis fauorites, & euen in his own country his body lay vnburied; which notwithstanding was preferred from putrefaction with hony, till such time as Antoni sent it vnto the Iewes, commanding them to bury it in the kings sepulcher. His son Alexander also was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pompeis letters accused before the tribunall seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romans. Ptolomæus the son of Minaus, who ruled Chalcis which was vnder Libanus, hauing taken his brechren sent his son Philippio with them to Alcalon; & he violently taking away Antigon & his sisters fro the wife of Aristobulus brought them to his father, and falling in loue with the yongest, tooke her to his wife: for which cause hee was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomæus hauing slaine his sonne, married Alexandra; & for that affinitie sake, was more careful for her brechren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all meanes to get Cæsars fauour: & when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the garriſon at Pelusium to passe any further, with an army into Egypt, & was by that meanes staied at Alcalon, he perswaded the Arabians to asist him the rather, because hee was but a stranger, and he himselfe also seconded him with almost three thousand armed Iewes.

Moreover he incited the potentate of Syria, & Ptolomæus who inhabited Libanus, & Jamblicus and another Ptolomæus to asist him; for whose sakes the cities of that country did willingly vndertake the wars. And now Mithridates strengthened by Antipaters meanes came to Pelusium, & because they would not suffer him to passe, he besieged the city; in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the citie, and so Pelusium was taken. But the inhabitants of Onias country who were Egyptians & Iewes, suffered him not to passe any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not onely suffer him to passe, but also provided victuals for his army. Vherupon the citizens of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their own accord vnto Mithridates: so that passing through Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the tents of the Iewes; & being with al his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the riuer side, set vpon & discomfited the left wing of the enemies batel, & rushing vpon them that pressed vpon Mithridates, he slew many, & pursued the rest that fled til he got their tents, & all with the losse of fourescore men. But Mithridates flying lost eight hundred men, & being against all hope preferred out of those wars, was without all enuy a true witnes before Cæsar of al that which Antipater had both done & deserued. Vherupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise & promises vnto him, & made him forward to hazard himselfe for him. In a word, he proued & shew'd himselfe a stout warrior, & hauing many wounds in euery part of his body he bare a badge & testimony of his valour & vertue. Afterward when the state of Egypt was quiet he returned into Syria, where he made him a citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities therof: & did so honour him in other things & vie him so friendly, that he made him a patterne for all to imitate: and for his sake he confirmed Hircanus in the high Priesthood.

AT the same time Antigon the sonne of Aristobulus repairing to Cæsar, against his will was a cause of Antipaters greater felicity: for comming to complain of his fathers death, (who was as it was thought through Pompeis enuy poisoned) and to accuse Scipio of cruelty which was vsed against his brother; whereas hee should haue abandoned all passion which moued him to miſgale hatred with his miseries, contrariwise he accused Hircanus and Antipater

As though they had vniustly driuen him and his brechren out of their native soile, and grieuouſly iniured the people, to obaine their intent; alleading that they had sent aide into Egypt to Cæsars forces, not for good will, but for feare of auncient enmitie, and that hereby they might acquire themselves of the good will they bare to Pompey. At these wordes Antipater (casting away his vesture) shewed the number of his wounds, saying, it was not needfull to vie words to proue what affection he had borne to Cæsar, for his very body would shew it, although hee himselfe hold his peace: adding, that hee admired the impudent boldnesse of Antigon, who becing sonne to an enemy of the Romanes, and a fugitiue from the Romanes, and still continued his fathers purpose of noueltie and sedition, should dare to accuse others before the Romane Emperour; demanding of him how hee durst hope to obtaine any good thing, who ought to be contented with his life onely: alleading, that hee craued not maintenance for that hee wanted, but that he might raise a rebellion amongst the Iewes, and against them who should bestow any thing vpon him.

Which when Cæsar heard, he said that Hircanus was most worthy to be high priest, and bade Antipater with what dignitie he would haue: who leauing that to the pleasure of the giuer, he was made Gouvernour of all Iudæa. And moreover, he obtained to recedifie the rased wals of his country, and Cæsar commanded that those honours should be engrauen in the Capitoll, that it might be a token in time to come of Antipaters iustice and vertue. Antipater hauing attended Cæsar out of Syria, first of all repaired the ruined walles of his country which Pompey had rased: and going thorowout all the countrey, he threatened the obstinate, & perswaded the seditious to obedience, admonishing them, that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might liue in wealth and peace, and enjoy happinesse & an vniuersall felicitie: but if they suffered themselves to be led with the vaine hopes of those, who for their priuate comodities, sought for alteration, that then they should find him in steed of a Procurator, the Lord of all, and Hircanus in steed of a king, a tyrant, and the Romanes and Cæsar, in steed of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not suffer his power to be ouerthrowne, whom they themselves had established for king. But notwithstanding he spake these words, yet (because he saw Hircanus more dull, and not of so fervent a spirit as the care of a kingdom required) he himselfe settled the estate of the countrey, and made Phasaclius his eldest sonne governour of the army, & the Lord of Ierusalem and of his owne liuing, & sent Herod his yongest sonne to gouerne Galilee (although hee was very young): who becing by nature of a valiant courage, found out a present occasion to shew his braue mind: for he tooke Ezechias which was captaine of thieves, who as hee vnderstood was wont to prey vpon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other thieves: which thing was so gratefull vnto the Syrians, that in all townes and villages they made songs of Herod, as though hee had restored them to peace, and to their possessions.

At length, the glory of this fact came to the eares of Sextus Cæsar, who was Cæsar the Emperours kinsman, who then ruled Syria. Phasaclius also did strue to ouercome the towardnesse and good reputation of his brother, by daily increasing and winning to himselfe the good wils of the inhabitants of Ierusalem: so that during the time he gouerned the Citie, he did nothing insolently through might or power: for which cause the people honoured Antipater as their king, & reuerenced him as Lord of all, yet was his fidelitie and good will neuer the lesse towards Hircanus. But it is impossible that any man that liueth in prosperitie, should not be enuied. For Hircanus, although before time hee were moued something at the glory of these young men, and especially with the prosperous successe of Herod, becing often annoied with frequent messehgers, who spreadde his praise for euery thing he did: yet in particular he was stirred vp by many enuious persons, who are wont to haunt the courts of Princes, who were grieved that Antipater and his sonnes ruled without offence. These men told Hircanus that hee onely enjoyed the bare name of a king, and that Antipater and his sonnes ruled all, and that hee so long would permit & wink at them, till that at last they would make themselves kings; for they now did no more so much as pretend themselves to bee Procurators. But leauing that title, they tooke vpon them the dignities of Lords and maisters, without any regard or reuerence towards him: for Herod had put to death a great multitude of Iewes against the law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the king had giuen him any such authoritie: and that Herod if hee were not a king, but a priuate person, was to be brought into iudgement, there to answer the matter and shew the king a reason, & satisfie the lawes of his country; which permitted no man to be put to death before by law he was conuicted. By these perswasions Hircanus grew angry: so that not concealing his wrath, he caused Herod to be sent for to answer the matter: who both for that his father aduerted led him thereto: and because he trusted to the equitie of his cause, first leauing a garrison in Galilee, he repaired vnto the king; and came accompanied with a strong guard, least either he should seeme to derogate from Hircanus dignitie, if he should lead forth many; or that for want of defence he should expose himselfe to the enuie of his aduersaries. Sextus Caesar also fearing the young man least any euill should befall him amongst his enemies, sent vnto Hircanus manifestly warning him to free Herod from the crime of murder. For which cause Hircanus who loued Herod, and was willing so to do of his own accord, did acquite him. Whereupon, he supposing that he had escaped against the kings will, went to Damalcus vnto Sextus, purposing not to obey, if hereafter he were sent for. Naithelasse, Hircanus was once againe incited by bad people against Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprife something against him: which Hircanus believing, knew not what to doe; seeing his enimie more potent then himselfe.

Shortly after, Sextus Caesar proclaimed him Generall of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: so that now he was greatly to be feared, not onely for that he was highly in fauour with the commonaltie, but also for the forces which he commanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extreme feare, verily perswading himselfe that Herod with his whole army would presently come against him. Neither was his suspition in vaine: for Herod angry at the pretended crime wherof he was accused, came with a great army to Ierusalem, intending to depose Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and his brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that he would account that terror (wherin he had put his enemies) and his owne indignation for a sufficient reuenge, and that he should spare the king, by whose fauour hee came to be so potent: I adding moreouer, that he should not thinke it a disdaine that he was called to answere his accusations; but seeing that he was acquitted of them, he should shew himselfe grateful to the king. Neither ought he so to reuenge the discontent he had taken, that he should shew himselfe vnthankful to him who had saued his life. Moreouer, he was to consider the fortune of warres, together with the cause thereof, and thinke that the warres hee now pretended, were very vniust; bidding him not to be too confident of the victorie, being to fight against his own king, who had alwaies bin gracious vnto him, and neuer cruell; onely beeing as it were vrged therunto by some of his counsell, who beeing meerly enuious, rather to satisfie their owne dislikes, then in regard of his disgraces, framed a shadow of an accusation. Herod pacified heerewith, supposed it to be sufficient for him to obtaine the thing he hoped for, to haue shewed his forces vnto his nation.

At this time began ciuill war among the Romans neere vnto Apamia: for Cacilius Bassus, for the loue hee bare to Sextus Pompey, (sue Sextus Caesar at vnwares, and made himselfe gouernour of his army: and other captaines of Cæsars to reuenge his death, made after Bassus with all their forces; vnto whom Antipater by his two sonnes sent aide both for Cæsars sake that was slaine, as for Cæsars sake that was yet aliue: for he was an entire friend and welwiller vnto them both, and these warres continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to succed Sextus.

CHAP. IX.

Of the dissension amongst the Romans after Cæsars death, and of the treacherie of Malichus.

At this time arose great and bloody ciuill warres amongst the Romanes, at such time as Caesar was traiterously slaine by the treason of Cassius and Brutus, after hee had ruled the Empire three yeeres & seauen moneths. By reason of which murder their troubles daily increased, & the nobility being at variance amongst themselves, euery one followed that course, that they thought most expedient for themselves. Whereupon Cassius presently marched into Syria, to take possession of the gouernment of the army which was about Apamia, where hee made Marcus and the legions that were at variance, and Bassus friends: and raising the siege from Apamia, and leading the army in his owne person, he forced euery citie to be tributarie: so that he grew to exact without measure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Iewes to contribute seauen hundred talents; Antipater, who feared his displeasure, appointed his sons, and other of his friends presently to gather the money; & especially among the rest he gaue this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, beeing by necessity inforced therunto. But Herod first of all got Cassius his fauour, who brought a hundred talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or prouince: for this cause Cassius accounted him as a deere friend. As for the rest, hee accused

The decree of fate laugheth at humane hope. Herods tribunes murder Malichus.

Accused them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that for that cause hee destroyed Gophna and Ammautes, and other two of the basest cities, marching onward as if hee intended to kill Malichus, for that he had bin so carelesse and negligent in gathering the tribute money. But Antipater presently (disbursing vnto Cassius a hundred talents) saued both him and all the rest of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficiall Antipater had been vnto him, but oftentimes did treacherously lie in wait for to murder Antipater, who hindered and withstood his villanous pretence; notwithstanding that himselfe had often confessed that Antipater had saued his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtiltie, passed ouer the riuer Iordan to gather an army that hee might reuenge those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, by his impudencie outcrimed Antipaters sonnes: for through manie oaths and excuses, he won Phasaelus chiefe of the garrison in Ierusalem, and Herod also who was master of the armorie, that they should be a meanes to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon, Antipater intreating Marcus (who was Generall of the army in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was saued. The reason that Marcus would haue put him to death, was because Malichus sought to make an alteration.

Now Caesar being young, and Antonius warring against Cassius & Brutus; Marcus and Cassius hauing gathered an army in Syria, in consideration that Herod had stood them in steed where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria; giuing him a band of horsemen add footmen. Moreouer, Cassius promised him that if the warres had a happy end, hee would make him king of Iudæa. But it came to passe, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cause of Antipater his fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in feare, hired one of the kings officers for a certaine summe of money to poison Antipater, by which meanes he died, being thus vniustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to gouerne, who had recovered the kingdome being lost, for Hircanus. Malichus (who perceived that the people was incited against him, because they suspected that he had poisoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be stronger, he gathered about him a guard of armed men: for hee thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but that he would presently come with an army to reuenge his fathers death. But by the counsell of his brother Phasaelus (who sent him word that he should not openly be reuenged vpon Malichus, least a sedicion might arise among the people) hee patientlie permitted it to be, and suffered Malichus to purge himselfe, and permitted him to be freed from suspition, and celebrated a most solemne funeral for his father: which done, hee went vnto Samaria, and appeased the sedicion, wherewithall the Citie was disquieted. After this, he returned to Ierusalem, intending in that place to celebrate the festiuitie, sending certaine of his armed men before him, and appointing the rest to accompanie him. But Malichus who feared this approach of his, had solicited Hircanus to giue order that no strangers should intermingle themselves among the people who were at that time purified.

But Herod, contemning both him that commanded, and his commission, entred the citie by night: whereupon Malichus once more came vnto him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his displeasure, yet dissembled he the same: and sent letters vnto Cassius, wherein he complained of his fathers death: the memorie of whose hate being refreshed by this offence, he writ againe vnto Herod, willing him to reuenge his fathers death: which that hee might the better effect, hee secretly commaunded the captaines of his regiment that they should asist Herod. Now for that after the surprisall of Laodicea, all the best of the citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crownes, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended reuenge. Now Malichus suspecting that Herod would worke reuenge at Tyre, purposed secretly to get away his son, who was there a pledge; and hee himselfe purposed to flie into Iudæa: But despaire of his owne safetie vrged him to greater matters; for hee hoped to incite the Iewes to take armes against the Romanes, for that Cassius was now busie in the warres against Antonius: so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and so make himselfe king. But he was preuented by the destinies: for Herod suspecting his purpose, inuited him and Hircanus to supper: at which time hee made a shew as though he had sent one of his seruants to cause a banquet to be prepared, but indeede hee sent him to the captaines to foretell them that they might lie in wait for Malichus: who remembering what charge Cassius gaue them, came forth of the Citie vnto the shore next adioyning vnto the towne, all armed with swords; where compassing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat astonished, fell in a swoone, and beeing scarcely come to himselfe, he demanded who killed Malichus? One of the captaines answered; that Cassius gaue that led him thereto: and because he trusted to the equitie of his cause, first leauing a garrison in Galilee, he repaired vnto the king; and came accompanied with a strong guard, least either he should seeme to derogate from Hircanus dignitie, if he should lead forth many; or that for want of defence he should expose himselfe to the enuie of his aduersaries. Sextus Caesar also fearing the young man least any euill should betide him amongst his enemies, sent vnto Hircanus manifestly warning him to free Herod from the crime of murder. For which cause Hircanus who loued Herod, and was willing so to do of his own accord, did acquite him. Whereupon, he supposing that hee had escaped against the kings will, went to Damalcus vnto Sextus, purposing not to obey, if hereafter he were sent for. Naitheliefe, Hircanus was once againe incited by bad people against Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprise something against him: which Hircanus belieuing, knew not what to doe; seeing his enemy more potent then himselfe.

Shortly after, Sextus Caesar proclaimed him Generall of the army, both in Syria and Samaria: so that now he was greatly to be feared, not onely for that he was highly in fauour with the commonaltie, but also for the forces which he commanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extreme feare, verily perswading himselfe that Herod with his whole army would presently come against him. Neither was his suspition in vaine: for Herod angry at the pretended crime wherof he was accused, came with a great army to Ierusalem, intending to depose Hircanus; which he had effected, had not his father and his brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, inuincing that he would account that terror (wherin he had put his enemies) and his owne indignation for a sufficient reuenge, and that he should spare the king, by whose fauour hee came to be so potent: I adding moreover, that he should not thinke it a dildaine that he was called to answer his accusations; but seeing that he was acquitted of them, he should shew himselfe grateful to the king. Neither ought he so to reuenge the discontent he had taken, that he should shew himselfe vnthankful to him who had saved his life. Moreover, he was to consider the fortune of warres, together with the cause thereof, and thinke that the warres hee now pretended, were very vniust; bidding him not to be too confident of the victorie, being to fight against his own king, who had alwaies bin gracious vnto him, and neuer cruell; onely beeing as it were vrged therunto by some of his counsell, who beeing meely enuious, rather to satisfie their owne mislikes, then in regard of his disgraces, framed a shadow of an accusation. Herod pacified heerewith, supposed it to be sufficient for him to obtaine the thing he hoped for, to haue shewed his forces vnto his nation.

At this time began ciuill war among the Romans neere vnto Apamia: for Cacilius Bassus, for the loue hee bare to Sextus Pompey, slue Sextus Caesar at vnawares, and made himselfe gouernour of his army: and other captaines of Caesars to reuenge his death, made after Bassus with all their forces; vnto whom Antipater by his two sonnes sent aide both for Caesars sake that was slaine, as for Caesars sake that was yet aliue: for he was an entire friend and welwiller vnto them both, and these warres continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to succeed Sextus.

CHAP. IX.

Of the diffension amongst the Romans after Cæsars death, and of the treacherie of Malichus.

At this time arose great and bloody ciuill warres amongst the Romanes, at such time as Caesar was traiterously slaine by the treason of Cassius and Brutus, after hee had ruled the Empire three yeeres & seauen moneths. By reason of which murder their troubles daily increased, & the nobility being at variance amongst themselves, euery one followed that course, that they thought most expedient for themselves. Whereupon Cassius presently marched into Syria, to take possession of the government of the army which was about Apamia, where hee made Marcus and the legions that were at variance, and Bassus friends: and raising the siege from Apamia, and leading the army in his owne person, he forced euery citie to be tributarie: so that he grew to exact without measure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Iewes to contribute seauen hundred talents; Antipater, who feared his displeasure, appointed his sons, and other of his friends presently to gather the money; & especially among the rest he gaue this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, beeing by necessitie enforced thereunto. But Herod first of all got Cassius his fauour, who brought a hundred talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or prouince: for this cause Cassius accounted him as a deere friend. As for the rest, hee ac-

A cused them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that for that cause hee destroyed Gophna and Ammautes, and other two of the basest cities, marching onward as if hee intended to kill Malichus, for that he had bin so carelesse and negligent in gathering the tribute money. But Antipater presently (disbursing vnto Cassius a hundred talents) saved both him and all the rest of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficiall Antipater had been vnto him, but oftentimes did treacherously lie in wait for to murder Antipater, who hindered and withstood his villanous pretence; notwithstanding that himselfe had often confessed that Antipater had saved his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtiltie, passed ouer the riuer Iordan to gather an army that hee might reuenge those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, by his impudencie outcrimed Antipaters sonnes: for through manie oaths and excuses, he won Phasaelus chiefe of the garrison in Ierusalem, and Herod also who was master of the armorie, that they should be a meanes to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon, Antipater intreating Marcus (who was Generall of the army in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was saved. The reason that Marcus would haue put him to death, was because Malichus sought to make an alteration.

Now Caesar being young, and Antonius warring against Cassius & Brutus; Marcus and Cassius hauing gathered an army in Syria, in consideration that Herod had stood them in speed where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria, giuing him a band of horsemen and footmen. Moreover, Cassius promised him that if the warres had a happy end, hee would make him king of Iudæa. But it came to passe, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cause of Antipater his fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in feare, hired one of the kings officers for a certaine summe of money to poison Antipater, by which meanes he died, being thus vniustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to gouerne, who had recovered the kingdome being lost, for Hircanus. Malichus (who perceived that the people was incited against him, because they suspected that he had poisoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be stronger, he gathered about him a guard of armed men: for hee thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but that he would presently come with an army to reuenge his fathers death. But by the counsell of his brother Phasaelus (who sent him word that he should not openly be reuenged vpon Malichus, lest a sedicion might arise among the people) hee patientlie permitted it so to be, and suffered Malichus to purge himselfe, and permitted him to be freed from suspition, and celebrated a most ioleme funeral for his father: which done, hee went vnto Samaria, and appeased the sedicion, wherewithall the Citie was disquieted. After this, he returned to Ierusalem, intending in that place to celebrate the festiuitie, sending certaine of his armed men before him, and appointing the rest to accompanie him. Now for that after the surprisall of Laodicea, all the best of the citie came to Herod, bringing gifts and crownes, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended reuenge. Now Malichus suspecting that Herod would worke reuenge at Tyre, purposed secretly to get away his son, who was there a pledge; and hee himselfe purposed to flie into Iudæa: But despairing of his owne safetie vrged him to greater matters; for hee hoped to incite the Iewes to take armes against the Romanes, for that Cassius was now busie in the warres against Antonius: so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and so make himselfe king. After Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition amongst them in Ierusalem: for Felix came with an armie against Phasaelus, thinking so to be reuenged vpon Herod for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damascus with Fabius a Romane capitaine, who coming to assest Phasaelus, by the way fell sicke; so that he could not succour him: but it so fell out that Phasaelus without any help, did of himselfe overcome Felix, and therewithall reprobued Hircanus as vngratefull, who had both fauoured Felix, and suffered Malichus his brother to take and keepe his castles (for already had hee seized many of them, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada) yet all thesedid not protect him from the violence of Herod, who was no looner recovered of his sickness, but presently he tooke all the rest, & Massada: and at Hircanus humble sute, permitted him to depart fro thence. He also chased Marion the tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied 3 castles in that country: as for all the Tyrians that he tooke, he spared their liues, and sent some away with rewards; wherby he got the good wil of the citie, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Cassius, who through the meanes of such like instruments had gotten into his hand all Syria: & Marion for the hatred he bare to Herod, tooke with him Antigonus, Aristobulus his son, & by Fabius his means, whom Antigonus had gained vnto himselfe for money, he also got Ptolemæus to assest him in this expedition. Now Ptolemæus who was father in law to Ant-igonus, furnished him with all necessaries: Herod likewise preparing himselfe against them, gaue them battell in the entrance into Iudæa, and got the victory: & hauing put Antigonus to flight, he returned into Ierusalem, where he was honored by all men for his desert in that victory, so that euen they that before despised him, by reason of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship & familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that country, named Doris, & had by her a son named Antipater: but he then married Mariamme, Alexanders daughter, who was Aristobulus his son, & Hircanus his neece, by reason wher-of he came to be familiar with the king. But when Cassius was slaine neer vnto Philippi, Cæsar departed into Italy, & Antonius into Asia: at which time the chiefe of the Iewes came and accused X Phasaelus and Herod, alledging that they by force got vnto themselues the rule & disposition of the country, & left Hircanus only the bare name of a king. But Herod being then present, so wen & wrought himselfe into Antonius fauor by a great sum of money, that hee permitted no chieftie to speak one word more; who therupon returned home. Afterward a hundredth men of the most honorable amongst the Iewes, repaid to Daphne neer Antiochia vnto Antonius (now doting on the loue of Cleopatra) who being chosen first amongst the rest, because of their eloquence & nobility of birth, propounded an accusation against the two brethren. Messala presented himselfe to return them an answer, being assisted by Hircanus by reason of the affinity that was between him & Herod. Antonius hauing heard both parties, demanded of Hircanus whom hee thought to be the fittest to gouern their common-wealth? who answered Herod & his brethren. Whereat Ant-onius was exceeding glad (for he had bin their fathers guest, and was most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinus into Iudæa) and thereupon he made them both Tetrarchs, leauing vnto them the rule of all Iudæa: which when the Iewes Embassadors misliked, he took 15 of them & put them in prison, where he almost killed them, & reiected & derided the rest: wherupon there arose greater tumults amongst them in Ierusalem. At last the Iewes sent another embassage of a thousand men vnto Tyre, where Antonius sojourned with an intent to come to Ierusalem with violence. Antonius hearing their exclames, sent out the Magistrates of Tyre against them, commanding them to kill all they could catch of the Iewes, charging them also to confirme their authority, whom he himselfe had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod & Hircan-us went before them toward the sea shore, admonishing the earnestly to be contented, least they by this their indiscreet proceedings should become not only the cause of their own deaths, but also of war against their country: but for that they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions Antonius sent out certaine armed men, who killed many of them, & wounded the rest. Hircanus after this disaster both caused the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured: notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not containe themselues in peace, but they so troubled the citie, that Antonius in his displeasure slue those that he had in hold.

Of the warre of the Parthians against the Iewes: of the flight of Herod and his fortune.

Wo yeeres after this, Barzapharnes gouernour of the Parthians, accompanied with Pacorus the kings sonne, leized vpon Syria; & Lyfianias who succeeded his father Prolomaus, son of Minaus, promising a thousand talents and five hundredth women; perswaded him to put Antigonus in possession of the kingdom of Iudæa, and depose Hir-canus. Pacorus induced by these promises, went himselfe along the sea coast, giuing commaunde-ment to Barzapharnes to passe through the midst of the country; but amongst the rest of the places bordering on the sea, the Tyrians would not receiue Pacorus (notwithstanding that the citizens of Prolemais and Sidon had giuen him entertainment) wherfore he gaue part of his hor-men vnto one who was the kings butler, called Pacorus, as himselfe was; commanding him to passe into Iudæa, and learne what their enemies meant to do, & to help Antigonus where need required. Who as they wasted the country about Carmelus, many Iewes came of their owne accord and ioyned with Antigonus, shewing themselues very prompt to fight; for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos, where hauing fought with his enemies and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speed as far as Ierusalem: & his number being augmented, he came vnto the kings house. But Hircanus and Phasaelus met them with a strong company, and fought with them in the market-place: where the enemies were forced to flie, & part of them were by Herod shut vp in the temple; and he appointed sixtie men to keep them, which he placed in the houles next adioyning: but the people bearing a grudge to the two brethren, burnt them with fire: wherat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) sette vpon the people, and killed a great many of them, and euery houre one laid wait for another; so that euery day some was murdered. Now the feast of Pentecost drawing nigh, all places about the temple, and all the whole citie was filled with people of the country, whereof the most part was armed, & Phasaelus kept the walles, and Herod with a small company kept the kings palace, who assaulting their enemies vpon a suddaine as they were in the suburbs, killed a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight: part of them he couped vp in the citie, others he shut in the temple, & the rest between the vttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come & conclude a peace betwixt them. Phasaelus moued by these his praies receiued the Parthian into the citie, & entertained him into his house, accompanied with five hundredth horsemen, who came vnder a pretence to make peace; but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus: he craftilie conspiring against Phasaelus, perswaded him to repaire vnto Barzapharnes as an Embassador to treat a peace; notwithstanding that Herod altogether dissuaded him, willing him to kill the traitor, and not to trust his subtiltie: adding that the Parthians were naturally vnfaithfull.

Pacorus departing out of the citie, tooke Hircanus with him that he might be the lesse suspected, & leauing some horsemen with Herod named Elutheri, he followed Phasaelus with the rest.

When they came neer vnto Galilee, they found the inhabitants at variance and vp in armes, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courtelie and friendship hid his treache-rie) who after hee had bestowed gifts vpon them, and that they were retired, laid an ambush for them: wherof they had intelligence at such time as they came vnto a place of the sea coast named Ecdippion. For in this place they understood of the thousand talents that were promised, & how that Antigonus had giuen the Parthians more then five hundredth women of those that were amongst them, and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and that they had bene lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod was surprised in Ierusalem, for feare least he hearing what was become of them, might provide for himselfe. Now they might perceiue that these were not only words: for they might behold their keepers not far off, yet would not Phasaelus for sake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Offilius often exhorted him to flie (vnto whom Saramalla the richest amongst the Syrians had declared all the platform of their treason:) but he chose rather to go vnto Barzapharnes, & to vpbraide him to his face that hee had treacherously laid wait for him: but especially for that in regard of money he had suffered himselfe to be corrupted, wher-as he himselfe would haue giuen more for his life & liberty, then Antigonus had done for the kingdom. At these words the Parthian with oaths & protestations craftily freed himselfe fro suspition, & no sooner repaired he to Pacorus but presently the Parthians, who staid behind, & had charge to doe, laid hands on Phasaelus and Hircanus, who openly exclaimed against their falsehood and G perjurie.

In the meane time a butler was sent out for that purpose, who sought to surpris Herod, and by some stratageme to rouse him out of the Citie, who wrought by all the meanes hee could, according as he was instructed. But Herod who was alwaies wont to mistrust the perfidious practices of barbarous nations, being certaine that those letters which discovered the treasons, were fallen into the enemies hands, would not goe forth; though Pacorus pretended a iust cause, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phasaelus, nor the treasons, but onely what Phasaelus had done. But long before this, Herod by others vnderstood, that his brother Phasaelus was taken, and Mariamme a very wife woman Hircanus daughter, with many intreaties perswaded Herod not to goe forth: but that hee should beware how he trusted himselfe to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it were openly assault him. Whilst Pacorus was consulting with his accomplices how hee might priuile effect his treasons (seeing it was not possible openly to circumuent a man of so great wisdom) Herod in the night time whilst his enemies neither knew nor suspected his intent, took his neereft kinsfolke and fled into Idumæa: which beeing once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cause, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden despoised, and her mother and youngest brother to keep on their iourney, and hee with his seruants warily assaulted the Parthians; and hauing in euery assault killed a great number of them, hee hasted towards the Castle of Massada, and in his retreat sustained more harme by the Jewes, then by the Parthians: who as they had been alwaies troublesome, so now some threescore furlongs from the towne, set vpon him; where Herod obtaining the victorie, killed a great many of them, and in remembrance of that valiant act, hee builded vpon that place a most rich palace for the king and erected there a most strong tower, which by his owne name he called Herodium. And when he fled many ioyned with him: but when hee came to Thersa, a towne of Idumæa, his brother Ioseph met him, and perswaded him to lessen the number of his followers: for Massada would not receiue such a multitude (for the number of the multitude was about nine thousand:) for which cause Herod according to his counsell dismissed those that were vnfit for his turne, and sent them into Idumæa, giuing them necessaries for their iourney. As for those that were chosen men and fit for his purpose, he retained them with him, and so was he receiued into the Castle: where leauing eight hundred souldiers to defend the women, and prouision sufficient for those that were within, he himselfe went vnto Petra, a citie of Arabia.

Now the Parthians at Ierusalem beganne to sack the houses of them that were fled, & the kings palace; they onely abstained from Hircanus mony, which did amount to more then three hundred talents: as for other mens goods, they found not so much as they expected; for Herod long before that time suspecting the infidelitie of the Parthians, had caried all his riches and iewels into Idumæa; & euery one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the spoile, they were so impious that they left no place of the whole countrey free frō their tyrannous war. They destroyed the citie of Masada also, and bound Phasaelus and Hircanus, and deliuered them to Antigonus to be scourged, who presently with his teeth bit off Hircanus eares, to the end that if by some alteration he chanced hereafter to get loose, he might be no more high priest: for none might offer sacrifice that wanted any member of his body. But Phasaelus his fortitude preuented the crueltie of Antigonus, who hauing neither weapon nor his handes at libertie, beat out his owne braines against a stone and died, demonstrating himselfe by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: hee died manfully by a worthy death, and answerable to so famous a life. Yet some reported that hee recovered after that hurt, and that Antigonus sent a Chirurgion vnder pretence to cure the wound, who filled the same with venomous medicines, and so killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him a gallant resolution.

It is reported likewise, that vnderstanding before his death by the meanes of a certaine woman that Herode was escaped, he spake these words: Now I shall die with a courage, who leaue behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and so he died. Although the Parthians had not yet receiued the women (which was the chiefest thing they looked for) yet leauing them, M they established Antigonus in Ierusalem, and led Hircanus prisoner into Parthia. But Herod with all speede hasted into Arabia, as if his brother had bene yet aliue, to the intent hee might borrow money of the king of Arabia, vvhewith onely hee hoped that the crueltie of those barbarous Parthians might be mitigated towards Phasaelus; for his opinion was that although the Arabians had now forgotten his fathers friendship and were hard harted, yet at least he would lend him

A him money seeing it was to redeeme his brother, whose sonne he meant to leaue in pawne for it. For Herod tooke with him a sonne of his brothers into Arabia that was seuen yeeres old, & purposed to haue giuen three hundred talents for his ransom, and had made the Tyrians intercessors for him to the Parthians: but fortune preuented his endeouours, so that his loue and care for his brother preuailed nothing. He found also that the Arabians had now cast away the league of amity: for Salathus their king sent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all speede to depart out of his dominions, framing an excuse that the Parthians had sent Embassadors vnto him, to request him to driue him out of his countrey; but indeed the cause was, that he would not repay that which Antipater had deserued, nor recompence his sonnes now comfortles, for those good turnes that he had receiued at their fathers hands: and those who counsellled him to this, were such as offered to forswear those summes, which Antipater had put the in trust with, who were the chiefest men about him. For which cause, Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes, for that which hee thought would haue procured him friendship, answered the messenger according as grieffe moued him, and tooke his iourney towards Egypt: and the first night hee lodged in a countrey temple; to the intent that those of his company that were behinde him might ouertake him. The next day comming to Rhinocolura, his brothers death was told him; where after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

Antipaters to impudence. Herode perceiue the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the king of Arabia (though too late) repented himselfe of that which hee had done to Herod, and sent speedy messengers after him, to will him to returne, repenting himselfe that hee had so iniuriously entreated him. When Herod was come to Pelusium, the watchmen of the city would not permit him to passe: for which cause he himselfe in person went to the gouernors, who reuerencing the fame & dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no sooner reioiced, but Cleopatra receiued him very honorably, intending to make him the generall of her army which she was preparing at that present. But he neither regarding the offers and request of the Queene, nor yet discouraged by the hard winter season, nor the dangers of the seas, tooke his iourney towards Rome; and being in great danger of shipwracke neere vnto Pamphilia, both he & the rest of the passengers were enforced to cast away the most part of their loading: with much adoe he arriued safe at Rhodes, which had been fore molested by Cassius warres; there was he entertained by certaine of his friends, Protolaus and Saphinius: & although his money grew scant, yet there he builded a great galley with three rankes of oares, and in it (being accompanied with Herod in great dangers repaireth to Rome.

D his friends) he sailed to Brundisium, and from thence went presently to Rome. Where first of all (in regard of familiaritie betweene his father and him) hee went to Antonius, declaring vnto him both his own calamity, and the miserable desolation of the whole countrey; and how leauing his dearest friends besieged a Castle, himselfe in humble manner through the stormie winter seas was come vnto him, humbly crauing succour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compassionating his calamitie and remembering his familiaritie with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who stood before him, determined vpon the present to make him king of the Iews; whom hefore he himselfe had made Tetrarch: for he loued not Herod so well, but he hated Antigonus as much: for he held him both for a seditious person, and for an enemy to the Romans. Now to the accomplishing of this, he found Cesar farre more ready then himselfe, who called to minde the seruice that Antipater did in Egypt vnder his father, and his entertainment and friendship in all things: and beside all these, he was wrought and wooen by Herods courage and valour. For which cause, hee procured the Senate to be assembled; at which time Messala and after him Aratinus in the presence of Herod recounted his fathers deserts & fidelitie towards the Romans, declaring Antigonus to be an enemy, not only because that not long before he had revolted, but for that now lastly in despite of the Romans he had by the assistance of the Parthians vsurped the kingdome. Vpon which considerations the Senate being moued, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Roman warres, that Herod should be created king, the whole Senat concended: and after the Senate was dismissed, Antonius and Cesar went forth with Herod between them, and the Consuls went before accompanied with other Magistrates to offer sacrifice, and

T this time Antigonus besieged those that were left in the Castle of Masfada, who had great store of victuals and wanted nothing but water. For which cause Iosephus Herods brother purposed to flie vnto the Arabians with two hundred of his dearest friends, for that he had intelligence that Malchus repented him that he had given Herod no better entertainment. Yea he had forsaken the Castle, had not great store of raine fallen that very night, wherein he intended to fly for the wells and cisternes being now filled with water, there was no cause to fly: so that voluntarily issuing out of the Castle, he assaulted Antigonus souldiers, and killed very many of them; sometime in open war, and sometime by policy: yet fought they not alwaies with fortunate success; but returned sometimes with losse. In the meane time Ventidius (who was General of that Roman army which was sent to expulse the Parthians out of Syria) after hee had repulsed them reformed into Iudæa, vnder pretence to succour Ioseph and the rest that were besieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neere vnto Ierusalem and had receiued the money he looked for, he departed with the greatest part of his army, leaving Silo behind him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a second supply from the Parthians, feed Silo nor to molest him for the present, seeing hee was in great possibilitie. By this time Herod hauing failed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great army of strangers & his owne countermen together, came into Galilee against Antigonus, being assisted with the forces of Ventidius & Silo, whom Delius who was sent from Antonius, perswaded to establish Herod in his kingdome. But Ventidius was busie in appeasing the broiles that the Parthians had made in the cities; & Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want aide, for euery day the further he marched into the country, the more his army encreased, for al Galilee (a very few excepted) yielded vnto him. Whereupon he purposed first of all to goe to Masfada, to deliuer his friends that were there besieged, but Ioppe hindred his purpose; which for that it was an enemy towne, he thought it best to take it before he went further, least that whilest he was going to Ierusalem, his enemies should haue a place behinde him to fly vnto. Now Silo ioined armies with Herod, reioicing that he had found occasion to resist, because he was persecuted by the Iewes; whom Herod with a loose wing of his army and a small company of men, terrified, and presently put to flight, and saved Silo also who had much adoe to make resistance against them. This done and Ioppe taken, hee halted to Masfada, and the people of the country (some of them for his fathers sake, other some for his owne, and many for both) ioyned themselves vnto him: many also came vnto him for hope, because he was now king, so that now he had a very puissant army: but Antigonus hindred his iourney, by planting certaine ambushes in places conuenient where Herod was to passe, and yet for al this he little harmed him.

Herod hauing easily taken Masfada, and rescued his friends from thence, hee went to Ierusalem; where both Siloes souldiers, and many of the Citie came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatnes of his forces: there pitching their tents at the west side of the towne, they that guarded that part assaulted them with darts and arrowes; and others issuing by troupes forth of the Citie, assaulted the forefront of the army. Whereupon Herod caused one to goe about the wals of the Citie, and to proclaime how that he was come for the good of the whole Citie, and that he would not take reuenge of any, though hee were his open enemy; and that he would pardon euery man that had been most seditious. But whē Antigonus his followers with lowd exclamations hindred the criers voices from being heard, least any man should alter his minde: Herod presently commanded his men to beat the enemies off of the wall, who with their arrowes speedily forced all that were in the towers to fly. At this time Silo was detected to haue been hired with money: for he solicited many souldiers to crie out, that they wanted all things; and to aske money and victuals, and to craue to be dismissed and sent into some place of opportunity, there to abide during the winter, nay hee himselfe sought to be gone. But Herode went vnto the captaines that serued vnder Silo, and called many of the souldiers together, requeesting them not to forsake him at that exigent, whom Cesar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had sent thither, promising them that within one day he would relieue all their necessities. When he had thus entreated them, himselfe went about the fields, and brought them

A so much prouision that he cut off all Siloes excuses: and forecasting least hereafter there should be any want, hee sent letters to Samaria (for that citie about this time had rendered it selfe vnto him) willing them to bring victuals, and wine and oyle, and cattell vnto Iericho. Antigonus hearing this, presently sent certaine of his men to lie in ambush in the fields, & sodainly to let vpon those that came for prouision, and kil them, & so hinder them from carrying any victuals to the campe: who obeying his commandement, went with a great number of souldiers to Iericho, and placed themselves vpon the mountaines, with an intent to espy if any body carried prouision to the armie. In the meane time Herod rested not; for taking with him ten companies (five of the Romans, and five of the Iewes, amongst whom were mixed three hundred that were hired, and besides them a few horsemen) he came to Iericho, where he found the citie without inhabitants, & five hundred with their wives and families had placed themselves vpon the tops of the mountaines; whom when he had surprized, he permitted them to depart. But the Romans brake into the citie, and sacked it, where they found the houses stored with all manner of riches: and the King leaving a garrison at Iericho, returned. He sent likewise the Roman souldiours to the cities which were on his side, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was past. Antigonus also through Silo his meanes (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius sake: and the Romans being now discharged from the warres, abounded in all things.

All this time Herod was not idle, for accompanied with two thousand foemen and five hundred horse, he went about Idumæa, & sent also his brother Ioseph, least by Antigonus his meanes the people should rebell. And he himselfe hauing carried his mother and the rest of his kindred, whom hee tooke from Masfada, into Samaria; and hauing placed them where no danger might betide them; himselfe went into Galilee, to subdue that part of the country, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expell from thence the garrisons left by Antigonus. And when hee was come to Sephoris, notwithstanding it shew mightily, he easily took it; for the garrison before he assaulted it fled; and finding there great store of prouision, he refreshed his souldiers, which now with winter weather were fore tired, and then sent them against the thecues, that lay lurking in denes and caues; who making often incursions vpon the countrey, molested the inhabitants no lesse then if they had beene an armie of enemies. And sending before three companies of footmen, and one troope of horsemen, into a village called Arbela, himselfe forth daies after came thither with the whole armie. For all this the thecues feared him not, but arming themselves, came to meete him, trusting to their experience in warlike affaires, and their owne desperate courage: and ioining battell, the right wing of their battell put the left wing of Herods to flight: but hee with his right wing presently succoured them, and recalled his men that fled; & rushing violently vpon his enemies, hee a little asswaged the forces of the enemy, till at last the forefront of their battell, not able to stand any longer, fled. Herod pursued them euen vnto Iordan, and killed many of them; those that escaped fled ouer the riuer; and thus hee freed Galilee from that feare, saue that yet he had left some lurking in the caues, and therefore hee was constrained there to make a longer abode. Wherefore first of all he gaue the souldiers the fruit of their labours, and distributed to euery one of them an hundred and fiftie drachmes of silver, and vnto the captaines more, and so sent them where they should passe the winter. Also hee writ vnto his youngest brother Pheroras to provide necessaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the castle of Alexandria: which he performed.

In the meane while Antonius passed the time about Athens, and Ventidius sent for Silo and Herod to asist him in the warre against the Parthians, charging them, that before their comming they should settle the estate of the Iews. Now Herod gladly & willingly sent Silo vnto Ventidius: and in the meane time hee with his army went against the thecues in the caues. These caues were in verie steepe mountaines, so that there was no way to come vnto them, save onely by crooked and very narrow passages; and these mountaines were all rocks of stone cleine throughout, hanging ouer the valleyes; so that the king a great while was doubtfull what to doe, seeing the place was so difficult to come to. At last, Herod deuised a way scarcely heard of before; for he put the valiantest of all his men into coffers, and so let them downe into the edge of the caues, & they killed the thecues and their families, and cast fire at them that resisted. And Herod seeking to saue some of them, caused a crier to bid them come vnto him: but there was not one that willingly came vnto him, and those that were forced chose rather to die, then to be his captiues. So that an old man hauing seuen sonnes and a wife, who all requested that they might go forth to the king, and saue their liues, killed them all after this manner: Himselfe stood before the doore of the caue, and bade them come forth one by one, & alwaies as one of them came forth he killed him. And Herod being in a place where he might behold this spectacle, being moued with compassion stretched forth his hand & requested him to spare his children: but he being nothing moued to compassion by Herods words, vpbraided Herods base mind: and hauing butchered his sonnes, he also killed his wife, and casting the dead bodies downe into the vallies, finally he cast himselfe likewise downe headlong.

Herod hauing thus taken the caues, and slaine those that were in them, leauing a part of his army, so much as he thought might suffice to repress any that should attempt any rebellion, and making Ptolomeus chiefe ouer that part; returned into Samaria, carying with him three thousand footmen, and six hundred horsemen against Antigonus. After whose departure those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, and molest it, hauing now (as they thought) opportunity, assailed Ptolomeus at vnwares and killed him: and wasted the country, retiring themselves into marshy grounds & secret places. Which when Herod vnderstood, he presently came to succour the country, and killed the most part of the enemies; and hauing taken all the castles by force, he exacted a hundred talents for recompence of that reuolt to bee paid by the cities. Now the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slaine, Ventidius being willed thereto by letters from Antonius, sent vnto Herod a thousand horsemen, & two legions of footmen to assist him against Antigonus. Now Antigonus writ letters to the generall of the foresaid company named Machara, desiring him to helpe him; and complaining that Herod iniured him, promised him a summe of money. but he thinking it not best to forsake him that he was sent to succour, especially seeing that Herod would giue more, would not be suborned by him: yet counterfeiting himselfe to be Antigonus his friend, meaning vnder that pretence to creepe into the knowledge of his secrets, which not regarding Herods counsel, he went to discouer, notwithstanding that Herod dissuaded him from it: But Antigonus perceiuing his intent, shut him out of the city, & like an enemy draue him away from the walles, till such time as Machara was ashamed of that he had done; and so returned to Amathunt vnto Herode. And being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, he killed all the Iewes he found, not respecting whether they fauoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was moued, and thought to be reuenged vpon Machara as vpon an enemy; yet he bridled himselfe and hastened to Antonius to let him vnderstand Macharas cruelty. Machara remembering how hee had offended; followed the king, and with many entreaties besought him to be friends, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his journey to Antonius, and hearing that hee was now with a great army besieging Samosata (which was a very strong citie neere vnto Euphrates) hee made the more haste; thinking it now a fit time to shew his vertue, and that hereby he might win Antonius fauour the more. So soon as he came to Antonius he ended the siege, killing a great number of enemies, and had for his labour a great part of the spoile: and Antonius though before that hee admired his vertue; yet then was his opinion increased, so that he had a greater hope of his honour and attaining to the kingdome. So Antiochus was constrained to render the Citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the death of Ioseph: how Herode besieged Ierusalem; and how Antigonus was slaine.

Ant. lib. 14.
cap. 25.

IN the meane season Herods affaires in Iudæa went backward: for he left his brother Ioseph gouernour of all, commanding him to doe nothing against Antigonus till his returne. For he little trusted to Macharas helpe, because of the parts hee had plaied before. But Ioseph vnderstanding his brother to bee farre off, not regarding what charge was left him, went to Iericho accompanied with five companies which Machara sent with him, thinking now in harvest time to haue taken away their corne: but being assaulted by the enemy vpon the mountaines and in difficult places, himselfe was there slaine, shewing himselfe in that fight a worthy and valiant man: and there was not one left alieue of all the Roman souldiers; for they were all newly gathered out of Syria, and they had no olde souldiers amongst them to assist them who were ignorant in warfare. Antigonus not contented with the victorie became such a tyrant, that hee caused the dead corps of Ioseph to bee scourged: and hauing the dead bodies in his power, hee cut off Iosephs head, although Pheroras his brother offered fiftie talents to redeme the same.

After Antigonus had obtained this victorie, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who

A who fauoured him, tooke the chiefeest of Herods fauourites, and drowned them in a ponde. Also there arose a great change in Iudæa; where Machara repaired the wails of a certaine Castle called Githa. All this while Herode heard nothing of the newes; for after Samosata was taken, Antonius made Sesius gouernour of Syria, leauing order with him, that hee should helpe Herode against Antigonus, and so hee departed into Egypt. Sesius sent two companies of souldiers with Herod into Iudæa to helpe him, and he himselfe with the rest of the army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia neere Daphne, his brothers death was manifested vnto him in a dreame: And whilst hee was troubled thus, so that hee leapt out of his bed, even at the same instant the messengers who brought tidings of his death, entred into the house: and weeping a little for griefe, as it were deferring his sorrow till another time, he went towards his enemies; so that hee hastened about his strength. When he came vnto Libanus, hee tooke eight hundred inhabitants of that mountaine to helpe him, and ioyned vnto them one of the Romane legions; and not expecting the day time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, he forced them to fly vnto the place from whence they came; and every day he assaulted their Castle: But before he could take it, being wearied with cruell winter, hee was constrained to leade his armie into the next village. Within a few daies his number being increased by one other legion which Antonius sent, he put his enemies in such a feare, that they in the night time fled and forsooke the Castle. And now hee hastened to Iericho to be reuenged vpon those that killed his brother: where there befell him a most strange accident, from the which being against all hope deliuered he perswaded himselfe that God bare a speciall loue vnto him. For when many nobles that night had supped with him, supper being ended, and euerie one being gone forth, incontinently the house wherein he slept fell downe: Herod tooke this as a Prælagium both of the dangers & prosperous successe he was to haue in his warres. And the next morning early he remoued from thence, and about sixe thousand of the enemies descending from the mountaines assaulted the vauntguard, but they durst not ioine battell with the Romanes, but molested them standing as farre off with stones and darts, and they wounded many: so that also Herod himselfe passing along, was wounded in the side with a dart. Antigonus desirous to shew himselfe most potent, as well in multitude of men, as also in courage, sent Pappus a friend of his with an army into Samaria, who there got the victorie of Machara. Herod went about the enemies country & tooke there five townes, and destroyed two thousand of the inhabitants, and firing the houses, hee returned to his armie neere vnto a village called Cana.

Every day there came flocking vnto him a very great number of Iewes, both from Iericho and from other parts of the country, some of them hating Antigonus, other some louing Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reason desired an alteration. Whilst thus hee hastened to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude nor strength of their enemies, came fiercely vpon them, and offered battell. The battell beeing begun, the others a while abstained, only Herod remembering his brothers death ventured more then the rest to the end to be reuenged vpon them that were the authors thereof: and so he easily ouercame the enemies army; and still assaulting the fresh men, hee put them all to flight. There was a mighty slaughter: for many being forced to flie into the village from whence they came, he pursued them and slew an infinite number. Lastly, rushing amongst the enemies that fled, he brake into the village, where all the houses were full of armed men, and euerie house toppe full of men to defend it; and because he easily ouercame those that were abroad, hee ouerthrew the houses, and so forced them that were within to come forth. Others hee killed in companies with the ruines of the houses wherein they were; and if any one chanced to escape, the souldiers without that were ready armed, with swords killed them: so that there were such heaps of dead bodies, that they who had the victorie could not passe thorow the streets for them. The enemies were so discouraged with this ouerthrow, that the whole multitude of them (seeing those that were slaine in the village) fled away: and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had euen then come to Ierusalem, had not winter stormes hindered him, which was the onely cause that hee at that time got not a full conquest; and that Antigonus was not utterly ouerthrowne, who thorow feare and desperation was purposed to leaue the Citie. But Herod towards night hauing giuen his friends leaue to depart to rest their weary bodies, being himselfe heated with his armour, after the manner of souldiers went to wash himselfe, accompanied onely with one Page. And before hee came to the bathe, one of his enemies met him hauing a sword drawne in his hand; and then another; and afterwards a third; and after them more: and these escaped out of the bathe, and came to the bath to hide themselves; and seeing the king there, they were sore affraid, and sought to hide themselves, and so passed by him being astonished and amazed, although the King at that time was naked G and weaponless: & in so much as none were present there to surprisethem, they escaped; and Herode was very well contented that hee had no harme by them. The next day after, he beheaded Pappus who was the Generall of Antigonus his army, and sent his head to his brother Pharoras, who was ruler of his army, in reuenge of his brother that was slaine: for Pappus was he that slew Ioseph.

The winter beeing past, hee with his army came to Ierusalem, and besieged it, pitching his tents before the temple, where it was easiest to take the Citie, and where before time Pompey had entred it (which was about the third yeere after Herod was made king in Rome.) Now when hee had quartered his army as he thought best for his purpose, and cut off the suburbs, he caused three rampiers to be raised, & towers to be builded vpon them: & leauing there his trusty friends H that would not slacke their businesse, hee went into Samaria to visit his betrothed which was the daughter of Alexander, who was sonne to Aristobulus, who (as wee before made mention) was despoised vnto him: and he wedded her euen in the time of the siege, as who should say, now he contemned his enemies: after his marriage rites were performed, he returned to Ierusalem with a farre greater army: Sofius also seconded him with a great army of footmen & horsemen, whom he sent before him through the midst of the countrey; and he himselfe came after by Phoenicia. Now when all his whole army was assembled together, to the number of about some 11. legions of footmen, and six thousand horsemen, beside the Syrians that came to helpe him, which were no small number, he laid his assault and batterie to the northermost wall, and the rather because he thought himselfe warranted by the decree of the Senate, whereby he was declared to be king. I

Sofius also was warranted by Antonies letters, whereby he commanded him to help Herod with all the armie that was vnder his government. Meane while those Iewes that were within the citie were diuerfly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker sort, gathering themselves together about the Temple, grew to this resolution; that whosoever should fortune to die in this attempt should bee most happy and beloued of God. But those who were hardiest amongst them, ioyning themselves together, robbed and tooke away from the rest what they could, but in especial they tooke victuals from that part that was next the citie: so that they neither left meat for horses nor men, and the valiantest of them all being set to defend the wals against those that besieged them, hindred the aduersarie from erecting their rampiers; so that they still found some new deuice to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any waies preuaile so much as by their mines which they made. As for the theeues, the king sought to repress their incursions by placing an ambush of men to intercept them; by which meanes hee relieued the want and scarcitie of victuals, by fetching prouision from places farre distant: But notwithstanding they in their fight failed in no sort to expresse their incredible valour; yet did that militarie experience which the Romans had, ouer-master them by ods. Naithelasse, notwithstanding the imminent danger wherein they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romans by digging two seuerall mines, brake all at once into the midst of them; yet suddenly repaired they the breach that was made in the wall, and fortified the other part thereof. In a word, they neither spared hands, nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out euen vnto the last cast: & although they were besieged with so huge an army, yet they defended the town L from them five moneths, till such time as certaine of Herodes chosen men valiantly scaling and clearing the wals, brake into the Citie, and after them Sofius his Centurions. Those places that neere adioyned the temple were the first of all that they intercepted; and the whole armie entering the citie, it was lamentable to see how in euery corner the people were massacred: for the Romans being displeased that the siege continued so long time, became more cruell, and Herods army endeouored to let no one of the aduersie part escape. By which meanes many were slaine, both in the narrowest places of the streets, as also in their owne houses: yea euen then also when they fled into the temple, without respect of age or womanhood. For although the king intreated the souldiers to spare the people: yet for all that, they neuer restrained their cruell hands, but like madmen they raged against all; men, women, and children. At that time also Antigonus neither respecting his former condition, nor his present estate, came and prostrated himself at Sofius M his feet, beseeching him to be mercifull vnto him; but Sofius nothing compassionating his calamitie, cruellly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in prison.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, hee endeouored to the vttermost to appease the furie of the souldiers; for all the whole multitude were desirous to see the temple, and the holy

A holy vessels therein: but he resisted them, appealing some by threatnings, reclaiming others by force, and the rest by intreaties, supposing that it had been better for himselfe to haue bene conquered, then by obtaining the victorie, to minister a meanes whereby those things should be dis- covered which were not lawfull to be reuealed. Hee therefore presently repressed the souldiers from sacking the citie, inueying much against Sofius, and obiecing against him, that the Romans would desolate the citie both of men and money, and leaue him king of a place without subiects: adding further, that he esteemed not the Empire of the whole world to be a recompence for such a massacre of his Citizens. Hereunto Sofius replied, that in equitie the souldiers were to haue the sacking of the towne, in recompence of that labour they had spent in the siege. But Herode gaue him this answere, that he had rather recompence euery man out of his own treasure; and by this B meanes hee redeemed as it were the reliques of his desolate countrey: and in the end performed that which he had promised. For he bountifullly rewarded euery souldier and captain, according to his merit, and gaue Sofius a kingly reward: so that no man went away without money. This done, Sofius dedicated a golden crowne vnto God, and so departed, leading Antigonus captiue with him, to the intent to present him vnto Antonius. This man desirous to continue his life, and entertaining himselfe with this cold hope euen vntill the last, receiued in the end that reward which his faint hart desired, and was beheaded.

Herode beeing now king, made a distinction between the Citizens; and those who had fauoured him, hee vsed very honourably, and put those to death, who had followed Antigonus: and when money failed, hee distributed all his kingly ornaments, and sent them to Antonius and his C company. Yet did not he quite redeeme himselfe from all annoiances: for Antonius being now captiue through Cleopatra her loue, in all things yeelded vnto her desire: and Cleopatra hauing raged so against her owne kindred, that shee had not left one of them alieue, now turned her furie vpon strangers; and accusing the nobilitie of Syria vnto Antonius, shee perswaded him to put them to death, that shee might thereby the easier obtaine their possessions. Afterward, her courteous mind sought to effect the like against the Arabians, and the Iewes also: in so much that shee secretly went about to cause the kings of those places, Malichus and Herod to be put to death. Antonius made a shew as though he would haue granted her request; yet he thought it great impie- tie to kill good men and so great kings: yet notwithstanding, hee no more accounted them his friends, but tooke a great quantitie of ground from the limits of both their countries, & a vine- D yard in Iericho, where Balme grew, and gaue her all the Cities on this side the riuer Eleutherus (Tyre and Sidon onely excepted.) Now when she had obtained the dominion of these Cities, she followed Antonius vnto Euphrates, who set forward to make war against the Parthians, & afterward by Apamia and Damascus shee came into Iudæa: where Herod hauing something pacified her angry mind with great gifts) obtained to pay her yearly two hundred talents for that part of his countrey, which Antonius had giuen her; and seeking by all meanes possible to get himselfe an interest in her fauour, he conducted her vnto Pelusium: and not long after, Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artabazes the sonne of Tigranes captiue, & gaue him vnto Cleopatra: for all the money and riches which he had got, and the captiues likewise, were bestowed on her.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the treacherous practice of Cleopatra against Herod: of Herods warre against the Arabians, and of a very great earthquake.

A Bout such time as the Asiaticum warre was on foote, Herod prepared himselfe to attend Antonius; for that for the time present all troubles were pacified in Iudæa: and hee had already gotten the castle of Hircanion, which Antigonus sister had in her possession. But Cleopatra craftily preuented him in this his iourney; so that he could not goe with Antonius: for she desiring the ruines of both the kings (as was before mentioned) perswaded Antonius that hee should cause Herod to make war against the Arabians: whom if he ouercame, then shee should be Queen of Arabia; & if so be he himselfe were ouercom, then shee should be queen of Iudæa: intending hereby that one of these potentates should ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gaine: For first of all making head against those of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horsemen he could make; which was very many, and meeting them at Diofolis he ouercame them, although they valiantly resisted: who hauing the ouerthrow, stirred red vp a mightie armie of the Arabians to helpe them, so that an infinite company was gathered together about Coelosyria, expecting the Iewes nere vnto a citie called Canatha. Where king Herod meeting them, purposed not to fight vnadvisedly, but to compasse his owne armie round about with a wall: but his armie remembering their former victorie, would not be counselled, but violently assaulted the Arabians, and at the first onely put them to flight. Herod pursuing his enemy was greatly endangered by the treason of the inhabitants of Canatha (who were sette on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras captaines, who had alwaies borne him ill wyl) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned againe to battell; and they two ioyned their forces together, & set vpon Herod in stonie and difficult places, and put his armie to flight, and killed many of them: & those that escaped fled vnto a little village hard-by, called Ormiza; where the Arabians compassing the about, took both the men & their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herods souldiers, he came & brought help, but too late, & to little purpose: but the cause hereof was, for that the captaines of his armie would not obey his commaundement: for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunitie to worke him thar iniurie; yet was he reuenged vpon the Arabians, and daily made incursions vpon their borders, & ceased not to invade and spoile them, vntill by many, hee had cried quittance with them for their one victorie.

While thus hee pursued his enemies, a great calamitie befell him in the seauenth yeere of his raigne, and in the midt of the Aetian warre: for about the beginning of the spring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which slew an infinite multitude of beasts, and thirtie thousand people: yet the army had no harme, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof the Arabians were highly encouraged (for such as report an euill occurrent, doe alwaies redouble the miserie thereof in relating it) for which cause, the Arabians making account that all Iudaea was overthrowne, and that there was no man left alieue to resist them, entred into Iudaea, assuring themselves to conquer the country: and before their coming, they slew the Embassadors of the Iewes that were sent vnto them. Herod perceiuing his countymen terrified by the suddaine approach of their enemies, and not onely broken, but wearied with the greatnes & continuance of their calamities, rowled vp their drouping spirits that were tired with suspight, & encouraged them after this manner. I see no reason of your present feare, neither doe I admire, that you were terrified with the punishment of Gods indignation: but it is a cowardly mind to bee daunted by the comming of your enemies, who are but men, and whose violence, if your selues please, yee may repress. For mine owne part, I am so farre from being discouraged by the approach of my enemies, that I rather thinke that God hath of his prouidence sent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Arabians to invade vs, to the end that through our meanes hee may punish them: for the cause that moueth them to assault vs, is not the trust they repose in their owne valour and great armie, but it is our misery that inuiceth them. Yet who knoweth not that the hope is frustrated, that is founded not vpon a mans priuate vertue, but vpon another mans misfortune? There is nothing assured in humane affaires, in respect either of prosperous successe, or aduerse fortune, which a man may perceiue to alter vpon all occurrents: as wee our selues may witnes by our owne experience. For in the first conflict you ouercame; in the second ye were ouercome; & now the third time (for ought I can coniecture) they thinking themselves sure of the victorie, shall by vs be ouercome: for they who misdoubt nothing, are rash in their proceedings, whereas they that are fearefull and timorous, prouidently seeke to prevent their dangers: so that I am encouraged to hope for victorie euen by your feare.

For when as you were too confident, and against my will and direction rushed in vpon your enemies, Athenio found opportunitie to hurt vs: but now sith I perceiue in your minds a certain remission, and a forecast, it is an euident token vnto mee of assured victory. It behooueth you therefore not onely before the conflict to continue your accustomed minds, but also in the conflict, to shew that yee are men, armed both with harts and hardines; to the end that our impious enemies may well see, that neither anie humane calamitie, nor diuine punishment can daunt the courage of the Iewes, whilst the breath is in their bodies: and that neuer a one of you all will suffer the Arabians to domineere ouer your goods and possessions, whom many times you haue almost made your slaues. Be not therefore terrified with this motion of a bodie that hath no soule: neither yet perswade your selues, that the earthquake portendeth anie massacre; for euen the elements themselves by their owne nature are subiect to such defects, and portend no other mishappe, but that which they bring with them. Perhaps the plague and famine, and earthquake haue some tokens demonstrating them before they come: but when they are once come, they signifie nothing else, but at last end, and cease of themselves. But say wee should be Herods oration to Augustus Caesar.

Herod freebeth freely before Caesar.

A be ouercome, can warre enforce more harme against vs, then the earthquake hath done? Truly it is an euident token of our enemies ruine, and that by their owne cause, who most cruelly contrary to the law of all nations, butchered our Embassadors, offering to God such sacrifice for the good successe of their warres. They cannot hide themselves from the sight of God, and from his mighty power, but presently they shall see punishment for their offence, if filled with the courageous spirit of our nation, we be stirred vp to reuenge that impious violating the law of all nations, and so euery one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or countrey; but to reuenge the murder of our Embassadors: who will lead our armie, and know better then we that are alieue to direct the same. For mine owne part (if you will be ruled by me) I will be the first that will lead you, and will hazard my selfe for you: for you know full well, that if your valour be not eclipsed by some headlong rashnes, there is nothing that may make head against you.

After he had by these or such like perswasions sounded his souldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged thereby, he offered sacrifice to God. And presently after with all his army he passed ouer Iordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them as farre off, desirous to draw them to the battell: for the enemies had sent to intercept the castle, but Herods forces gaue them the repulse, and in despite of them kept the hill. Thus euery day made hee an offer to fight, brauing the Arabians: & seeing that they would not come to the shock (for they were in a great feare, and Athenio their generall for very feare was ready to giue vp the ghost) hee assaulted them in their trenches, and cast downe their rampier, so as they were constrained to come forth to battell, without any order; and their horsemen and footmen were confusedly mixt together. And although the Iewes in number were inferior vnto them, yet they were inferior vnto the Iewes in courage; yet they became now more hardie, because they despaired of the victorie: and so long as they stood to it, they had no great losse: but when they turned their backs, the many were slaine by the Iewes, and many perished being troden on by their fellows. Those that escaped, were forced to retire themselves into their trenches, where Herod besieged them: and although they were all ready to be put to the sword, yet was there such penury of water, that for drinke they were all like to perish. For which cause they sent Embassadors vnto the king, offering him fiftie talents to let them goe: but he contemned them, and so much more earnest was he, by reason that their want of water was so great, that comming out by flocks of their owne accord they offered themselves to the Iewes: so that in this sort there came forth foure thousand in thre daies, and the sixth day the whole multitude (despairing of their liues) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, slew about seauen thousand. Having in this sort weakened the Arabians, that he had now extinguished all their strong men, the countymen admired him, and were so much daunted at his puissance, that they wished him for their Ruler.

CHAP. XV.

How Herod was exalted vnto the kingdome.

Notcontinent after this his prosperous successe, there did betide vnto him a sea of cares and griefes, in respect of the loue which he bare vnto Antonius, whom Caesar had now lately ouerthrowne at the battell which was fought at Actium: yet was he more afraid then hurt by this suspicion: for Caesar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, so long as Herod and hee kept together. For which cause the king timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Caesar abode: in which place, in the habite of a priuate man, and without a crowne, but with a kingly courage, he presented himselfe before him, and with vniuersall constancie spake vnto him in such manner as followeth. I was (O Caesar) made king of Iudaea by Antonius his meanes, and I must confesse that I haue bene a king, who what in mee lay haue serued his turne, and sought his profit: yea I must not deny but that (had not the Arabians hindred me) I had with all the power I could haue made, seconded and assisted Antonie against thee: yea although personally I could not goe, yet did I what I could to helpe him, and sent him many thousand measures of corne. Nay, though hee had the ouerthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deserued wel at my hands: & although I was not able to asist him with force of armes, yet I confirmed him by my counsell the best I could, inculcating oftentimes vnto him, that there was one onely way to redresse his aduersitie, to wit, by the death of Cleopatra; whom if he killed, I promised him to asist him with money, strong holds, and an army; yea and with mine owne person against thee: but the loue of Cleopatra, & God who had already designed the victory vnto thee, stopped his eares. For which cause, O Cæsar, I am conquered with Antonius, and haue forsaken my crowne and dignitie with his fortunes: & am come vnto thee, hoping that at thy hands I may obtaine pardon. To this Cæsar answered: Liue in safety, and raigne now with greater securitie then before; for thou deseruest to rule others, who with such constancie didst defend and maintaine thy friendship. At this time endeouour thy selfe to continue faithful toward them that are more fortunate then Antonius was: for, for my part I haue conceiued a great hope and expectation of thy valour and prowesse; yet did Antonius well, in that he rather obeyed Cleopatra then thee: for by his follies, haue we now purchased thy friendship. That thou hast begun to do well, it hereby appeareth, because Ventidius hath signified vnto me, that thou hast sent him succours against his enemies. For which cause, by this my present decree, be thou established in thy kingdome, and I will shortly let thee know that I will be beneficiall vnto thee: so as thou shalt haue no cause to bewaile the losse of Antonius. By this speech hee exhorted the king not to misdoubt of his friendship, and withall put a crowne vpon his head, and made a decree, and sealed it, testifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his kingdome, & rehearsed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praise. Herod (hauing first pacified Cæsar with many gifts) requested him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends, who earnestly and in humble manner desired the same: but Cæsar being very angry, answered, that he for whom hee entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and so repeld Herod with this answer.

Herod made gouernour of Syria.

Afterward, Cæsar traouailing into Egypt through Syria, was entertained by Herod with all royall pomp possible: and that was the first time that he shewed himselfe to take part with Cæsar, when neere vnto Ptolemais he tooke a view of the souldiers with Cæsar, and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feasted the whole armie likewise. And in as much as hee traouiled to Pelusium through dry grounds, when they returned againe, he prouided water for them, & furnished the armie with all necessaries: so that both Cæsar and the souldiers, thought the kingdome a small recompence for his deserts. For which cause after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not onely increase his honour, but also restored vnto him that portion of his country which was taken away, and given to Cleopatra: and besides that, Gadara, and Hippion, and Samaria, and other cities, about the sea-coast; to wit, Gaza, & Anthedon, and Ioppe, and Stratons tower: and moreouer gaue him foure hundredth Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her guard: and there was nothing that so much moued Cæsars liberalitie, as the courageous mind of him vnto whom he was so liberall. After the first Aetian solemnitie, hee added vnto Herods dominion Trachon, and Batanæa, and Auranitis bordering vpon it. For this cause Zenodorus (who for money hired Lyfanius his house) continually sent theues out of Trachon to robbe the people of Damascus: who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time gouernour of Syria) entreating him to informe Cæsar of their calamitie. Cæsar vnderstanding thereof, writ back againe, commaunding him to extinguish all the theiues: wherupon Varus with an armie went to those places which were most suspected, and ridde the country of the theiues, and tooke the territorie from Zenodorus: and Cæsar (least it should againe be a refuge for theues to spoile Damascus) gaue it to Herod, and made him ruler ouer all Syria. And tenne yeeres after, returning to his owne countrey, hee commaunded the gouernours to doe nothing without Herods counsell. But that which Herod esteemed aboue all the rest, was that Cæsar loued him best of all next vnto Agrippa: & Agrippa loued him most of all men next vnto Cæsar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicitie: and so increasing in high mind, he employed himselfe chiefly to pietie.

IN the fifteenth yeere of his raigne hee repaired the temple, and enclosed twise so much ground as was before about the temple with a strong wall, whercon hee bestowed great costs and charges to beautifie it: as the great porches will testifie, which hee built about the temple, and a Castle on the north part thereunto adioyning, which hee builded euen from the foundation. The Castle was so rich and sumptuous, that it was equall vnto the kings palace, and

In the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. Hee builded himselfe a palace also in the vpper part of the Citie, and in it two houses, huge, and richly adorned: so that the Temple was not to be compared vnto them. And calling them by his friends names, hee reamed one of them Cæsarcia, and another Agrippa; whose names and memories hee did not onely solemnize, and write in his priuate houses, but also throughout all the whole country, and in euery part of the citie. For in the countrey of Samaria he compassed a rowne with a wall, which was about twenty foulds, and called it Sebaste; & he sent thither sixe thousand inhabitants, giuing them a most fertile soile and demesnes. There also amongst other buildings, hee erected a very huge temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar, and gaue the inhabitants of that place especiall priuiledges. About the temple was there a peece of ground containing three foulds and a halfe. For this monuments sake, Cæsar added vnto his dominion another countrey; for which cause hee erected another temple vnto him neere vnto the head of Iordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountaine rising an infinite height into the ayre, at the side whereof there is an obicure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: so that the water standing in their concavities till they run ouer, falleth downe with a streame of such a length as is admirable. At the foote of this valley on the out side, there spring certaine fountaines, and many thinke this to be the head of the riuer Iordan; which whether it be true or no, wee wil declare hereafter.

The fountain

dan.

At Iericho also (between the castle of Cyprus, and the other auncient kings houses) he erected other buildings, fairer and more commodious for them that came thither, calling them after the names of his friends. Finally, there was no conuenient place in the whole kingdome, wherein he erected not some thing in the honour of Cæsar: and hauing in euery place of his own kingdome, deuiled and dedicated temples vnto him, he in Syria also where he ruled did the like, founding in very many cities, temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiuing that amongst the cities of the sea coast, there was one called Stratons tower, the which being very old, was ruined; and for the situation thereof, deserved reparation and cost; hee repaired it all with vvhite stone, and built a very roiall palace therein, wherein chiefly he shewed a mightie mind. For this citie standing in the midst betweene Dora and Ioppe, there was no port or haven in that coast: so that whosoever sailed from Phoenicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reason of the violent winds that blew from Africa, which blowing but a very easie gale, enforce the water with such a violence against the rocks on the shore, that the waues rebounding back againe a good way within the sea, make the whole sea tempestuous. But the king with his liberalitie and cost ouercoming nature, builded a port or haven in that place, far bigger then that of Piræum, and within it made most safe stations for ships. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrarie to his intent, yet he so ouercame that difficultie, that the sea could do that building no harme; and it was so gallant and beautifull to behold, as though there had been no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For hauing measured out such a place (as we haue spoken of) for the port, he layd a foundation in the bottome twentie elles deepe of stone, wherof most of them were fiftie foote long, nine foote thicke, and tenne foote broad, and some bigger; and all the bottom of the haven where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a wall of two hundredth foote; wherof a hundredth foote was builded to breake the violence of the waues, and had a name according to the vse it serued for. The other hundredth foote serued for a foundation of the wall whereof the haven was compassed, which was replenished with many goodly rowers; the greatest and fairest wherof, he named Drusus, after the name of Cæsars kinsman. There were very many vautes also to conduct such things into the towne as were brought into the haven, and about them a paved place for them to walke in, that came out of the ships: The entrance thereunto was on the north side; for by reason of the situation of the place, the north-wind there is the calmest.

Before the entrance, were 3 great colossus held vp on euery side with pillars: they which are on the left hand, are propt vp by a tower which is a solid rock of stone. But at the entrænce on the right hand, were two huge stones ioined together, which make a greater tower then the other. There is also a house adioyning vnto the haven builded of white stone: The streets of the cities coming to that place, are of one bigness & proportion. Vpon a hill opposit to the mouth of the haven, was there builded a temple very beautiful & exceeding great, which he dedicated vnto Cæsar, wherein was placed Cæsars colossus, fully as great as Iupiters at Olympus: for it was made after that example, equal to that at Rome, & that of Iuno at Argos. Cæsar, and by his name called it Cæsarea. He also made other buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, which are worth the memorie. And he every fift yeere ordained certaine sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himselfe first proposed verie ample rewards in the 192 Olympiade; insomuch that he not onely gaue roiall gifts to the victors, but also to the second and third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroyed by the wars, and called it Agrippium: and louing Agrippa very dearly, hee caused her name to be engrauen ouer the portall that he builded in the temple. Neither was he vnmindfull of his parents; for in the richest soile of the whole kingdome, he built a citie for a monument of his father: & by his name called it Antipatris, being a very rich soile, both for trees and riuers. At Iericho also he built a verie gorgeous and strong castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his mother. Hee likewise builded a tower in memorie of his brother Phasaelus, at Ierusalem, and called it Phasaelus his tower (of the compasse and beautie of this tower we will speake hereafter.) He also called another citie Phasaelus, which is situate in a valley beyond Iericho, toward the north.

Having thus eternized the memorie of his friends and kinsfolke, hee did not forget to doe the like to himselfe: for he built a castle on a mountaine neer Arabia, hauing on one side a strong place of defence, and this castle hee called Herodium after his owne name. By the same name also hee called a tombe, which he builded sixtie founts from Ierusalem, artificially made in manner of a womans dug, which he richly adorned: for within compasse of the toppe of it, hee caused round turrets to be placed: & round about it he builded princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with great cost and charges, & made a paire of staires of pure white mable, to go vp, which had two hundred steps. For the whole hill was made by arte, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the foote thereof, likewise hee builded another palace, and houses to receiue his friends, and their cariages: so that this castle for the abundance of all necessarie places, seemed a citie; and yet was it all the kings palace. Having erected thus many buildings, he shewed his braue mind in strange cities likewise; for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais hee builded publique bathes, which are called exercises. Hee builded the wall of Biblus; and faires, porches, temples, and markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon & Damascus hee builded a Theater, and a water conduit at Laodicea a sea towne. At Ascalon hee builded fountaines or lakes very sumptuous, and bathes with pillars, that for greatnesse and gallant worke were miraculous. To other places he gaue woods and ports: and vnto many cities headed fildes, as though they had been fellow cities of his kingdome. Also toward the maintenance of the bathes, hee gaue a yeerely annuitie for euer: as namely to those at Cous, to the intent hee might be an eternall benefactor. Moreover, he gaue all poore people corne; and he often and in sundry places gaue the Rhodians money to build a naue of ships. At his owne proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberalitie, which hee extended vnto them of Lycia & Samia? or the magnificent gifts which hee vsed toward all the people of Ionia; yea all things which their hearts could desire: whereby hee relieued all their necessities? Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the citizens of Pergamus in Mysia, receiued very many benefites at his hands. He paved also a large street in Antiochia of Syria, which was in length twentie founts, and that with faire marble. This street before that time was so full of dirt, that no man could goe thorow it; and all along it, hee builded galleries, that people might goe drie thorow it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefites that he thus bestowed, were done for the proper vse of those people, on whom he bestowed them: but no man can deny, but that which hee did for the citizens of Elis, was not onely common to those of Achaia, but vnto all the world, where the games called Olympica Certamina, were solemnized. For Herod seeing the decay onely for want of maintenance, and that this was the onely remainder of all the ancient monuments of Greece, hee not onely in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which hee assisted when hee went to Rome; but also gaue a yeerely stipend to maintaine the same, least for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted; for hee deliuered the Phasaelites and Balaneotes, and other rownes of Cilicia, from the payment of a yeerly tribute: yet was hee not so liberall vnto them as he would haue been, fearing lest the enuy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if hee should bee more bountifull vnto the cities then those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind: for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein hee had alwaies his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he killed forty wilde beasts. That country hath many Bores, but it hath more store of Harts and wild Asses. He was such a warriour as no man was able to counter

CHAP. XVII.

Of the disagreement betweene Herode and his sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus.

BUT his priuate and domestical sorrows seemed to enuy him his publike felicitie, & most Baduerse fortune befell him through the meanes of a woman, whom hee loued as himselfe. For being now made king, he put away his wife, which he first married (which was a Lady borne in Ierusalem, whole name was Doris) and married Mariamme the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus sonne, which caused troubles in his house, both before, but especiall after he returned from Rome. For hee banished his eldest son Antipater, whom hee had by Doris, out of the citie, onely for his childrens sake that hee had by Mariamme; licensing him only at festiual times to come vnto the citie in regard of some suspicion of treason intended against him. And afterward he slew Hircanus his wifes vnkle (notwithstanding, that he returned out of Parthia vnwilling to him) because after he suspected that he intended some treason against him; whom Barzapharnes, after hee had taken all Syria, tooke away prisoner with him. But his owne countrimen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in consideration redeemed him from thraldome; & had he been counfelled by them & not come vnto Herod, hee had not been killed: but the marriage of his neece caused his death: for, for that cause, & especially for the loue of his native soyle, hee came thither. That which moued Herod to kill him was, not for that hee sought the kingdome, but because hee had right vnto the kingdome. Herode had fise children by Mariamme, two daughters, & three sonnes. The yongest was sent to Rome to study, where hee died. The other two he brought vp like Princes, both for their mothers nobility sake, and for that they were borne after he was king. But that which aboue all other was most forcible, was the loue hee bare to Mariamme, which from day to day tormented him more violently, in such sort, that he felt not any part of those griefes which this his best beloved enforced against him. For Mariamme hated him as much as hee loued her: and hauing a iust cause and colour of discontent, and moreover being emboldned by the loue which hee bare her, shee every day vpbraided him with that which hee had done vnto Hircanus her vnkle, & vnto her brother Aristobulus. For Herod spared him not, although he was a child; but after hee had made him high Priest in the seuenteenth yeere of his age, hee presently put him to death, after hee had so honoured him: who when he came to the altar clothed in sacred attire vpon a festiual day, all the people wept: and the same night was he sent to Iericho, and drowned in a lake by the Galatheans, who had receiued commision to performe the murder. These things did Mariamme daily cast in Herodes teeth, and vpbraided both his mother and sister, with very sharpe & reproachfull words: yet hee so loued her, that notwithstanding all this hee held his peace. But the women were set on fire: and that they might the rather moue Herod against her, they accused her of adultery, & of many other things which bare a shew of truth: obiecing against her that shee had sent her portraiture into Egypt vnto Antonius; & that through immoderate lust, shee did what shee could to make her selfe knowne vnto him, who doted vpon womens loue, and was of sufficient power to doe what wrong hee pleased.

EHEREAT Herod was sore moued, especially for that he was iealous of her whom hee loued, be- thinking himselfe vpon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whose sake king Lysanias and Malichus king of Arabia were put to death; and now hee measured not the danger by the losse of his wife, but by his owne death which he feared: For which cause being drawn by his affaires into the country, he gaue secret commandement vnto Ioseph his sister Salomes husband (whom hee knew to be trustie, and one who for affinitie was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if so be Antonius should haue killed him. But Ioseph not maliciously, but simply to shew her how greatly the king loued her, disclosed that secret vnto her: and shee when Herode was returned, and amongst other talke with many oaths sware that he neuer loued woman but her; indeed (quoth she) it may well be known how greatly you loue me by the commandement you gaue to Ioseph, who you charged to kill mee. Herode hearing this which he thought to be secret, was like a mad man, and presently presently perswaded himselfe that Ioseph would neuer haue disclosed that commaundement of G his, except hee had abused her; so that hereupon hee became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked vp and downe the palace: whereupon his sister Salome hauing sio opportunity, confirmed his suspition of Ioseph. For which cause, Herod growing now raging mad with iealousie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance, and after his anger ceased, the affection of loue was presently renewed: yea so great was the power of his affection, that hee would not beleue she was dead, but spake vnto her as though she were aliue, vntill in proceesse of time being ascertained of her funerall, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemencie of his passion for her death. Mariammes sonnes succeeded their mother in her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their father as a mortall enemy, both before and after they went to studie at Rome, and especially after they came againe into Iudæa. For as they encreased in yeeres, so did the violence of their minde increale. And they beeing now marriageable, one of them married the daughter of their aunt Salome, who accused their mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus king of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was there ioined a liberty to speake more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldnes many were animated to caluminate them: so that some did openly tell the king that both his sonnes sought to worke treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an armie to help the other to reuenge the death of their mother; & that the other (to wit he that was sonne in law to Archelaus) purposed to flie, and accuse Herod before Cesar. Herod giuing eare vnto those calumniationes, sent for Antipater whom hee had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two sonnes, & sought to aduance him about them. But they thought this alteration intolerable; seeing one, whose mother was but a priuate woman, so preferred: & they moued with their owne noblenes of birth could not containe their indignation, but vpon euery occasion shewed themselues offended; yet were they euerie day lesse accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himselfe into fauour: for he knew how to flatter his father, and raised many slanders vpon his two brethren, partly inuented by himself, partly diuulgated by some of his fauourites, whom he set a worke about the matter, till that at last he put his brethren out of all hope of hauing the kingdome. For he was now by the kings Will and Testament declared king, so that hee was sent as a king vnto Cesar in a kingly habit and pompe, onely he wore no Crowne: and in time he so preuailed, that he wrought his mother into Mariammes steed; and with flatteries and calumination so moued the king, that hee began to delibe- rate about the putting to death of his sonnes. For which cause, he conducted his sonne Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cesar, that he had giuen him poison. But hee with much adoe hauing obtained libertie to pleade his own cause, and that before an vnskillfull Iudge, yet more wise then Herod or Antipater, hee modestly held his peace in all things that his father had offended in: and first of all he purged his brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter vpon himselfe, he in very good sort acquitted himselfe thereof. And afterwards he inueighed against Antipaters subtiltie, and complained of those iniuries, which had been offered him, hauing besides the equitie of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himselfe: for hee was a vehement orator; and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, hee obiected that his father hauing a desire to put both him and his brother to death, had laid an accusation vpon him: wherat the whole audience wept, and Cesar was so moued, that not regarding the accusations that were laid vnto them, he presently made Herod and them friends, vpon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient vnto their father; and that their father should leaue the kingdome to whom he pleased.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though hee seemed to haue forgiven his sonnes; yet laid he not his iealousie and suspition aside. For Antipater still vrged his argument to make Herod hate his other two sons, though for feare of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himselfe an enemy vnto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arriued at Elæusa, where Archelaus receiued him very courteously, thanking him for the safetie of his sonne in law, and very ioyfull for that they were made friends: for he wrote vnto his friends at Rome with all speed possible, that they should be fauourable vnto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod vnto Zephyrius, giuing him gifts to the value of thirtie talents, and so tooke his leaue of him. Herod so soone as hee came to Ierusalem assembled the people together. & being assisted by his three sons, he shewed vnto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked Cesar, who had appeased the discord of his house, and that had made his sons friends; which he esteemed more then his kingdome: & I (quoth he) will

A will make their friendship firme. For Cesar appointed me king, & gaue me leaue to chuse whom I pleased for my successeur, for the which I giue him hartly thanks. And now I here constitute all three of my sons kings: which purpose of mine first I beleech Almighty God, and secondly you to fauour: for the one of them for his yeeres, the other for their nobilitie of birth, haue right to the crowne and kingdome: which is so large, that it may suffice many; so that you for your parts reuerence them whom Cesar conioyned, and I their father ordained, giuing them not vnite, nor vnlike honours, but such as they haue deserued. For a man cannot do a greater pleasure vnto him whom he honoureth about his yeeres, then he shall giue discontent vnto him whom hee dishonoureth. For which cause, I will constitute to euery one of them such friends and wellwillers, as with whom they be most conuerfant, and of them I will require pledges of a concord and vnite amongst them. For I know that discords and contentions arise by malice of those who are conuerfant with Princes, and that if they be wel disposed, they will increale friendship. And I request not onely these, but also all such as beare rule in my army, that they hope in me onely for the present: for I giue not my sonnes the kingdome, but the honour and dignitie thereof; and they shall haue pleasure as though they were kings themselues, yet I my selfe will beare sway, although I am vnwilling to do it. Let euery one of you consider my age, my course of life, and pietie: for I am not so olde that any one may quickly despaire of me, nor I haue not accustomed my selfe to such kind of pleasure, as is wont to thorten yong mens daies; and we haue been so religious that we are in great hope of long life. But if any one despise me, and secke to please my sonnes, such a one will I punish. I doe not forbid them to be honoured, whom my selfe haue begotten, for that I enuie them: but because I know well that such applauses nourish pride and arrogancie in the fierce minds of yong men. VV herefore if all they that apply themselues in their seruice, consider that I will be ready to reward the good; and that those who are seditious, shall finde their malice to haue an vnprofitable euent at their hands, whome they so flatter: I easily perswade my selfe that all men will be of my minde, that are of my sonnes minde. For it is good for them that I raigne, and that I am friends with my sons. And you O my good sonnes, retaine in your minds that sacred nature, which maketh the very brute beast to entertaine naturall affection: then reuerence Cesar who reconciled vs: & last of all obey me who request, and entreat that at your hands, which I might command, namely that you remaine brethren. And I will now giue you both kingly attire and honour, and I pray God that if you will continue and remaine friends, I may continue in this minde.

After he had thus spoken, he saluted them very louingly and dismissed the people, some praying that it might bee as hee had said: others (who desired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the dissension amongst the brethren was not appeased, but each of them mistrusting worser euent, departed from one another. For Alexander and Aristobolus stomached the matter, that Antipater had his desert confirmed, and Antipater was grieved that his brethren should haue the second place after him; yet he could craftily to carry himselfe, that no man could perceiue his hatred towards them. And they deriued of a noble race spake all they thought, and many endeouored to let them on, and others as friends insinuated themselves into their company, to leane what newes: so that Alexander could not speake a word, but presently it was carried to Antipater, and from him to Herode with an addition; so that when Alexander spake any thing simply, meaning no harme, it was presently interpreted in the worst sense possible: and if hee chanced at any time to speake freely of any matter, presently it was made a great thing. Antipater suborned men to set him on, that so his lies might bee shadowed with a colour of truth; and that if hee could prooue any one thing true, all lies and tales else diuulgated might thereby be iustified to be true. Now all Antipaters familiars were either naturally secret, or else hee stopped their mouths with bribes, least they should disclose his intents: so that one might iustly haue tearmed his life a secrecy of malice. All Alexanders friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering speeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, & made them theepes and proditors of such things as were either done or spoken against him: and himselfe doing all things, he dealt so warily, that at last those calumniationes came vnto Herodes eare: and hee counterfained his brothers person, and suborned other tale-carriers, telling what they could against Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at first faintly reproued them, and afterward seriously allaged their sayings as accusations: so that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treason, and sought to kill his father: and nothing made so much credit be giuen to these calumniationes, as that Antipater colourably excused his brother. Herod incensed hertat, euery day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, brethren, and daily encreased his loue towards Antipater. The nobilitie also were inclined after the same manner: partly of their owne accord, and partly for that they were so commanded: so did Protonotarius the chiefe of all the nobilitie, and the kings brethren, and all his kinred; for all mens expectation was vpon Antipater. And that which grieved Alexander the more, was, that all these mischiefes, wrought to his ouerthrow, were done by the counsell of Antipaters mother; for shee being a stepmother, was cruell, and hated them being borne of a Queene, farre more then a stepmother doth her sonnes in lawe. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him, yet were they also compelled thereunto by the kings command, who gaue an especiall charge to their dearest friends, that none should follow Alexander or his brother: so that he did not onely terrifie those of his owne kingdome, but also those of other forraigne nations. For Cesar had giuen him such authoritie: for he gaue him licence to take any one that was a fugitiue from him, out of any Citie, although it were not vnder his dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laide vnto their charge, and so were more easily entrapped being vna-ware of them: for their father did not openly tell them of any matter, but they euerie day perceiued their fathers good will towards them to decay, which so much the more encreased their griefe. In like manner Antipater by little and litle moued Pheroras their vncle and Salome their aunt against them, daily consulting with his wife, whom hee should incite against them.

Now Glaphyra Alexanders wife encreased their malice euerie day, recounting her own nobility, and bearing her selfe aboue all that were in the whole kingdome: for she deriued her pedigree by the fathers side, from Timenus; by the mothers side, from Hyslaspis his sonne called Darius: in-ueying verie much against the baseness of Herode wiues, and his sister, who were chosen for their beautie, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as wee haue said) had many wiues, both for that it was lawfull by the custome of their country, & because Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious speeches. And Aristobulus made Salome his enemy, although shee was his wiues mother: for shee was before moued by Glaphyras speeches, and hee often vpbraided his wife with her base birth, still telling her that hee had married a priuate woman, and his brother Alexander a Queene. And his wife often with weeping teares told this to her mother: adding moreouer, that Alexander and Aristobulus threatened, that if they got the kingdome, they would make their other brethrens mothers weaue with their maids; and that they would make them notaries of villages, deriding that they applied themselves to learning. Salome moued hereat, could not containe her selfe, but told all to Herod, who easily beleued her, because she spake against her sonne in law. Moreouer, another accusation was laide to their charge, whereat the king was greatly moued: for he was informed that Alexander and Aristobulus did often bewaile their mother, and lament her hard happe with sighes, and cursed him: and that often when he bestowed some of Mariamms clothes vpon his latter wiues, they threatened that in short time in steed of princely attire, they should wear a black habite. Whereupon Herod, though hee feared the constant mindes of the young men, yet because hee would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them vnto him (for he was to siile to Rome) and as a king threatened them in few words, and like a father gaue them many admonitions, and requested them to loue their brethren, promising them forgiveness of their former offences, so that hereafter they amended all: But they beseeching him not to beleue accusations forged against them vpon malice, and answering that the effect of matters would easily acquite them, requested him not so easilie to beleue tales, but refuse to giue malignant people opportunity & recourse vnto him: for that there would alwaies be some that would maliciously inuent tales to tell, whilst there was any one that would giue them the hearing and beleueing thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their vncle, and both of them bare cruell minds, and were hard hearted; & especially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, sining onely the crowne, and had his owne reuenues amounting to a hundred talents a yeere, and receiued all fruits of the whole countrey beyond Iordane, which was giuen him by his brother. Herode also had obtained of Cesar to make him Tetrarch, and bestowed vpon him a princeesse for his wife, despoising vnto him his wiues sister, after whose decease he desposed vnto him his eldest daughter, & gaue him three hundred talents with her for a dowrie. But Pheroras fell in loue with his maid, and forsooke a princeesse: whereat Herod being angry married his daughter vnto his brothers sonne, who was afterward slain by the Parthians; but Herod presently pardoned Pheroras offence. Diuers before this time were of opinion that in the life time of the Queene, he would haue poisoned Herode; and Herode although he loued his brother very

A very well; yet because many who had access vnto him told him so, he began to misdoubt: and so examining many that were suspected, lastly he came to Pheroras friends, & none of them confessed it: yet they confessed that he was determined to fly vnto the Parthians with her whom he was so in loue withall, and that Costabarus Salomes husband was priuite thereunto, vnto whome the king married her, after her first husband for suspicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her selfe also was not free from accusation: for Pheroras accused her that she had contracted matrimony with Sylleus, who was procurator to Obada king of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the kings: and she being conuicted both of this and all things else, whereof her brother Pheroras accused her, yet obtained pardon as likewise Pheroras did: so that the whole tempest of all their family was turned against Alexander, and light vpon his head.

B The king had three Eunuches whom he loued dearly, and euerie one knowne by their offices: for one of them was his butler; the other was his cooke; and the third got him to bed, and lay with him: these three Alexander with great gifts overcame. Which the king vnderstanding, by Alexander's torments forced them to confesse it, & declared with what promises they were thereto by Alexander induced: and how he had deceiued them: affirming that there was no trusting to Herode who was a shamelesse old man; and that he died his haire, to make himselfe seeme young: & that he in despite of him would be his successor, and then hee would bee reuenged vpon his enemies, and make his friends happie, and especially them: and that the whole nobilitie did secretly obey him, and the captaines of the armie and gouernours did priuily come vnto him. Hereat Herod was so terrified, that he durst not presently diuulgate their confessions, but night and day hee sent

C spies to learne what was said or done, and whom hee suspected, then hee presently killed: so that his whole kingdome was full of iniquity. For euerie one as his malice moued him fained calumniation, and many desirous of bloodshed abused the Kings wrath as they pleased against their enemies, and credit was giuen to euerie lie, and no man was so soone accused, but presently he was punished; & he who presently before accused others, was now accused himselfe, and carried to be punished with him whom he accused. For the kings perils shortned the time of triall for their liues, and he became so tyrannous, that he afforded not a good looke vnto them that were not accused, and shewed himselfe most fierce and violent euen to his deereft friends: so that hee banished many out of his kingdome, and railed against such as he had no power ouer. Antipater increased this mischief more & more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, hee

D omitted no kinde of calumniation. The king likewise was terrified by the rumours and tales of pickthankes, that he thought alwaies that hee saw Alexander before him with a drawn sword. For which cause hee sodainly tooke him and cast him in prison, and tortured his friends, many of which died in torments, because they would not confesse more then in conscience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confesse that Alexander and his brother Aristobulus thought to haue wrought treason against their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; resolving in themselves that hauing killed him, they would presently flie to Rome. Although these and such like calumniationes were no waies probable, yet extremitie of paine forced men extempore to inuent them, and the king willingly beleued them, as it were comforting himselfe thereby in that hee might not bee thought to haue imprisoned his sonne vnjustly.

Herode casteth Alexander into prison and tortured his friends.

E Alexander perceiuing that it was impossible for him to abolish his fathers suspicion, thought it better to yeeld himselfe guilty: and so wrote foure bookes against his aduersaries, and confessed the treason: affirming that hee had many partakers therein, namely Pheroras, and Salome, who were the chiefe; auouching that before that time he had had the vse of her body in the night time: and how though he himselfe was vnwilling, yet shee forced him thereunto. Now the bookes came vnto Herods hands, which charged the greatest amongst the nobilitie with most hainous matters. Archelaus fearing his son in law and daughter to be in great danger, speedily came into Iudea, & ingeniously appealed the kings wrath: for so soon as he came vnto Herod, he cried, Where is that wicked sonne in law of mine, or where may I see the face of that wretch that goeth about to murder his father, that I may tear him in pieces with mine owne hands, and marry my daughter anew to a better husband? for although shee be not priuie to his

F counsell, yet is shee defiled for that shee was wife to such a man. Nay I admire thy patience who art in such danger, and sufferest Alexander yet to liue: for I came thus hastily out of Cappadocia, thinking hee had bene put to death, to talke with thee concerning my daughter, whome I married to him for thy sake and honour. Wherefore now let vs take counsell what to doe with them both: and seeing thou art too fatherlike and not able to punish thy sonne, thy treacherous sonne; let vs change rourmes, and let me be in thy place to reuenge thee: with such like inuocations Archelaus and Herode consult vpon Alexanders bookes.

Herod is incensed against his brother Pheroras.

Pheroras attended in a mourning garment with teares falling before Herods feete and craueth pardon. Pheroras by Archelaus meanes pacifieth Herod.

Archelaus compelleth Herode of his own accord to be entreated for Alexander. Herod diminisheth Archelaus and his friends with great presents. Antilib. 16. cap. 11. Eurycles the Lacedemonian secretly accuseth Alexander to his father, and is the cause of his death.

he deceived Herod (though otherwise firme in his purpose.) Then Herod shewed him the bookes that Alexander had written reading euery chapter with deliberation, Archelaus tooke occasion fit for his purpose, and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and those that were accused in the booke. And perceiuing the king to giue eare vnto him, let vs (quoth he) consider whether the yong man was not circumvented by the treachery of so many lewd persons, & notwithstanding by the yong man: for there appeares no cause why he should fall into such wickednes, who now enioyed the kingdome and hoped to succeed thee therein, had hee not bene perswaded thereto by other men, who seeing him a yong man, entised him vnto such naughtines. For wee see that through such men, not only yong men, but also old men, and most noble families, yea, and whole kingdomes are ruined. Herod vpon these speeches began somewhat to relent, so that he appeased his wrath toward Alexander, and encreased it towards Pheroras; for hee was as it were the subject of the whole booke. VVho perceiuing the king so to trust vnto Archelaus friendship, that he was ledde by him to do what he pleased, leauing Alexander, he in humble maner came to Archelaus, seeking impudently for succour at his hands, of whom hee had not deserued any fauour. Archelaus answered him, that he knew no waies to obtaine his pardon, who was guilty of so heinous crimes, and conuicted manifestly to haue practised high treason against the kings own person, & to be the cause of all these miseries that had now befallen the yong man, except that hee would lay aside all subtil dealing, and denying of his fact, and confesse the crimes whereof he was accused; and so in humble wise goe vnto his brother who loued him dearly, and craue pardon; promising him that if he would so doe, he would doe him what good he could. Hereupon Pheroras obeyed Archelaus his counsell, and putting on a blacke attire, he in pitifull maner and with teares prostrated himselfe at Herods feete, and crauing pardon obtained it, confessing himselfe to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was objected against him, and that the cause which moued him to doe all those things, was the franticke & madde fits he fell into for the loue of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his owne accuser, and a witness against himselfe, then Archelaus endeauoured to mitigate Herods wrath towards him, and excuse his faults with fit examples: for he alleadged that his brother attempted greater matters against him, whom notwithstanding for natures cause he pardoned: adding that in euery kingdome as in mighty bodies, alwaies some part began to swell, which notwithstanding was not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by easie means.

Archelaus vsing many speeches vnto Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath toward Pheroras, still counterfuiting himselfe to be angrie with Alexander, affirming that hee would take his daughter away with him, till at last he forced Herod of his owne accord to entreat for the yong man, requesting him againe to despoise his daughter vnto him. Archelaus after much entreatie answered, that hee was willing that the king should bestow his daughter vpon a my loue Alexander, for he greatly esteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if he did not disuorce his daughter from Alexander, he should thinke that he bestowed his sonne vpon him: for they had no children, and his daughter was dearly loued of the yong man; so that if hee would permit her to stay still there, for her sake hee would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much adoe agreed, and so was reconciled vnto his sonne in lawe, and he vnto his father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome to speake with Cesar, for hee had written the whole matter vnto Cesar. Thus Archelaus craftily deliuered his son in law from danger, & after his reconciliation was made, they spent the time in feasting and mirth. Vpon Archelaus departure, Herod gaue him seuen ty talents, and a throne of pure gold adorned with precious stones, and Eunuches, and a concubine named Pannychis; and rewarded euery one of his friends according to their deserts. And all the kings kined by the kings appointment and consent, bestowed rich gifts vpon Archelaus, and both hee and all his nobilitie accompanied him to Antiochia.

Not long after there came one into Iudæa far more subtil then Archelaus, who both disannulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man was a Lacedemonian borne named Eurycles, who by money sought to haue obtained the kingdome. This man brought vnto Herode rich gifts as it were for a bait of that he intended; hee had so behaued himselfe in Greece that it could no longer tolerate his exccesse: and Herod againe rewarded him with farre greater gifts then those were that he gaue him: but hee esteemed his liberalitie as nothing, except he bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cause hee circumvented the king, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him fainedly, and especially by his owne craft and subtiltie: and quickly perceiuing his inclination, hee both in word and deed sought to please him;

As for that the king accounted him amongst his chiefeft friends. For both the king and all the nobilitie honoured him the more for his country sake, in that hee was a Lacedemonian. But hee very easily perceiuing the feeble stay of Herods house, and the hatred betwene the brethren, and how the king was affected towards euery one of them, he first of all entertained himselfe at Antipaters house, making a shew in the meane while of good will towards Alexander; pretending and protesting, that in times past he had been Archelaus companion; & by this meanes hee quickly crept into fauour with him, as an approued friend: which was the cause that he was suddenly entertained for a faithful man. Hee presently likewise brought him into friendship with Aristobulus, and hauing founded euery mans disposition, he accommodated himselfe vnto all humours: and to begin withall, he became Antipaters pensioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And hee often vied here words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldest of the brethren, so slenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him besides the crowne, which was his right. Hee manie times likewise vied the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was borne of a queene, and husband to a queen, and yet would permit such a one who was descended of a priuate woman to succeed in the kingdome, especially seeing hee had such occasion & opportunitie to effect the contrary: for he might assure himselfe of Archelaus his help in any thing. Alexander supposed he had spoken as he thought, because he counterfeited friendship with Archelaus: so that he misdoubting nothing, disclosed vnto him all his mind concerning Antipater, saying, that it was no wonder though Herod disinherited them of the kingdome, sith before time he had slaine their mother.

Eurycles, counterfeiting himselfe both to pitie them, and to bee sorrowful for their mischance, entised Aristobulus to speake the like: and hauing animated the both to complaine in this sort against their father, he presently went to Antipater, and disclosed to him all their secrets, forging also the treachery which those two brethren intended against him, which was to dispatch him with their swords. For this cause Antipater gaue him a great summe of money, and commended him to his father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, he himselfe became their accuser: Whereupon hee came vnto Herod & told him how in regard of those benefites which he had receiued at his hand, he would now bestow his life vpon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hospitalitie; affirming that Alexander had lately stretched forth his hand with his sword drawne to kill him, and he onely was the cause that hee performed it not by staying his hand, and promising him to asist him in the matter: adding that Alexander vied these speeches; that Herod was not contented to enioy a kingdome which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to dismember his kingdome after Mariammes death, but hee would also leaue the kingdome belonging vnto their ancestors, vnto a pernicious bastard Antipater: and for that cause hee would reuenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not conuenient to receiue the kingdome from such a father without blood; and euery day he had occasion giuen him so to doe: for he could speake nothing without calumnniation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones nobilitie, presently hee was vpbraided without cause, for his father would presently say, there is none noble but Alexander, whose fathers base birth is a shame and discredite vnto him. And that going a hunting, if hee held his peace, his father was offended; if hee praised, then it was said hee mocked: so that in euery thing he found his fathers affection turned from him, and that he was onely fauourable to Antipater: so that hee would die with all his hart if he failed of his purpose; if he killed him, his father in law Archelaus would worke his safety, to whom he might easily flie. And after he would goe to Cesar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for hee would not stand before him then, as hee did before, being terrified because his father was present: neither would he onely speake of his owne wrongs, but of the wrongs of the wholenation, who were oppressed by exactions euen vnto death. And then he would lay open in what pleasure, and after what sort the money gotten with blood was consumed; & vvhoy and what kind of men they were that were thereby enriched; and what was the cause of the affliction of the citie; and that there he would bewaile the death of his vnkle, and his mother, and vnfold all Herods wickednesse: vvhich beeing once made manifest vnto the world, no man would account him a murderer of his father. Eurycles hauing falsly reported this of Alexander, fell presently to praise and extoll Antipater, affirming that hee onely loued his father, and hindered such practices.

The king yet not thoroughly appeased for that which had past, grew into an exceeding agonie, and Antipater once againe suborned other falsse witnesses against them, who affirmed that they were wont to haue secret talke with Incundus and Tyrannius, who sometime were generals of the kings horsemen, who were then displaced for some offence they had committed. Whereupon Another falsse accusation of Alexander & his brother Herode to indignation.

The yeere of the world, 3956. before Christs Nativity, 8.

Diophantus the kings notary, writeth in Alexanders name.

Herod being verie angry, presently tortured them: and they affirmed that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought vnto the king a letter, as though it had bene written by Alexander, vnto the Gouvernour of the Castle of Alexandria; requesting him, that he would receiue him and his brother Aristobulus into the Castle, when he had killed his father, and to asist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander affirmed that this letter was counterfeited by Diophantus the kings Secretarie, who was both bold, and could counterfeite any ones hand; and hauing counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Herod caused the Gouvernour of the Castle to bee tortured, but hee confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although hee had no good prooffe of any thing, yet hee commaunded his two sonnes to be kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, and the breeder of all the mischief) author of his safetie, and one who had wel deserved at his hands, and gaue him fiftie talents: who departing from Iudæa before matters were well knowne, went to Archelaus, and faining that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he receiued there a peece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that which he had euilly gotten, in as bad manner as he got it. Lastly, he was accused vnto Cæsar, that he had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the Cities: for the which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted vpon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Euarat.

It is not amisse here in this place to compare Euaratus of Cous vnto this Eurycles; who being a deare friend vnto Alexander, and arriuing about the same time that Eurycles did, being put to his oath, swore that hee heard the young men say nothing: yet his oath nothing preuailed nor it profited them poore foules. For Herod would only heare and giue eare vnto accusations; and he highly esteemed them that would belieue them with him, and shewe themselves moued thereat.

Ant. lib. 16. cap. 12.

Moreover, Salome increased his crueltie towards his sonnes: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with himselfe, who was his mother in law and his Aunt, sent vnto her, willing her to looke to herselfe, as though the King was minded to put her to death. Who being now called into question for the matters whereof she was before accused, to wit, that shee purposed to marrie with the kings enemy Syllæus the Arabian, to whom she priuileie reuealed the Kings secrets: this was the vtter ruine of the young men, where-with-all they were overthrowne as it were with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went vnto the King, & told him what Aristobulus had admonished her of: and hee being now outrageous, caused both his sonnes to be bound and imprisoned in seuerall places. Then sent he Voluminius, who was the Generall of his Armie, and Olympus one of his familiar friends, vnto Cæsar, to carie him the informations against his sonnes in writing: who sayling to Rome, after their arriuall deliuered the kings letters. And Cæsar was very forie for the young men, yet he permitted the father to doe what he would with his children: and so wrote vnto him, that hee should haue licence to doe what hee thought good: yet he signified vnto him, that he should doe better to call his Nobles together, & let them make enquire concerning the treasons; and then if he found them guiltie of these things whereof they were accused, to put them to death.

Ant. lib. 16. cap. 13.

Herod gathered in a council against Alexander and Aristobulus.

Heereupon Herod, according to Cæsars letters and appointment, came vnto Berytum, and there gathered an assembly to sit in iudgement; the chief in that iudgement were the Gouvernors that Cæsar in his letters appointed, Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadors, & with them Voluminius Procurator: next, the kings kinned, and Salome & Pheroras: and then the nobilitie of Syria, Archelaus onely excepted, who because he was father in law to his sonne, Herod suspected him to be partiall. But hee suffered not his sonnes to come into iudgement: for hee knew that the verie sight of them would haue moued all men to compassion. And moreover, if they were permitted to speake for themselves, that then Alexander would easily haue acquitted them both: for which cause they were kept in Platane, in a Castle of Sidonia. The king beginning his oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spake; and he was halfe afraid to object any treason against them, for that he had no prooffe thereof: and therefore hee prosecuted their opprobrious words, iniuries and offences which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grievous then death.

Herod accused his sons in open iudgement.

Herods sentence against his sonnes.

At last (when no man contradicted him) hee began to lament, as though by ouercomming in such sort, himselfe was also ouercome, & therupon requested euery one to giue their verdict. And first of all Saturninus condemned his sonnes, but not to die: saying, that hee had three sonnes present, and he thought it not lawfull to adiudge other mens sons to death. The two Legats also affirmed,

A affirmed the same, and many followed their aduise: But Voluminius was the first that pronounced the sorrowfull sentence: after whom all the rest followed, some to flatter Herod, some for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation against the young men. Then all Iudæa & Syria expected an end of this tragedy; yet no man thought Herod to be such a tyrant, as that he would haue put his two sonnes to death. Herod caused his sonnes to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ship he conueyed them to Cæsarea, bethinking himselfe what death he should put them to. In the meane time, there was an old souldier of the kings named Tiro, who had a sonne belonging to Alexander, and highly in his fauour, and he himselfe greatly loued the two young men: who being verie much grieved in mind at that which had past, went about crying, that iustice was trodden vnder foote, truth oppressed, that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquitie; and whatsoeuer else griefe put into his mind, who nothing esteemed his owne life. At last, this Tiro came boldly vnto the king, and said vnto him: O king, thou seemest to me most unhappy, who doost giue credit vnto wicked and vile persons against thy dearest sonnes. For Pheroras and Salome thou believest before thine owne children, whom notwithstanding thou hast often found to haue deserved death; and thou doost perceiue that they doe this, to the intent to make thee want lawfull successors, and leaue thee none but Antipater, whom they with their harts would haue king, because they can rule him as they list. But bethinke thy selfe (O king) how all thy souldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth not pittie the two young men, and many of the Nobility are displeased hereat. After hee had spoken this, hee named them who were displeased: vwhereupon the king commaunded them, and him, and his sonne to be laid hold on; and presently one of the kings Barbers named Tryphon, shewing himselfe to be in I know not what furie, came forth, and laid vnto Herod; Tiro perswaded mee to kill thee with my razour, promising me, that if I would so doe, Alexander would giue mee great rewards. Herod hearing this, caused Tiro, and his sonne, & the Barber to be tortured, and they denied all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more then he had already said. Then hee commaunded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his sonne moued with compassion towards his father, promised to disclose all the matter vnto the king, so that he would pardon his father: who being released of his torments, presently declared how his father through Alexanders meanes & procurement, was purposed to haue killed him. Many that were present, thought this was a deuise of the young man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perswaded that it was true.

D Vpon this Herod made a speech vnto the people, wherein hee inuighed against the Gouvernors of his armie, and Tiro, and made the people arme themselves, & kill both them and the Barber with stauies and stones. Now hee sent his sonnes vnto Sebaste, which was not farre from Cæsarea, and there he caused them to be strangled: and hauing quickly dispatched the matter, he caused them to be brought into the Castle Alexandria, there to be buried with their mothers vncle. And this was the end of Alexander and Aristobulus.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Antipaters conspiracie against Herod his father.

E BVt Antipater now hoping without all controuersie to succeed in the kingdom, was generally hated of the whole nation: for it was openly knowne that hee by false calumniation had caused his brethrens deaths. And on the other side, hee stood in no little feare of his brothers children, whom he perceived now to beginne to grow to yeeres: for Alexander had by Glaphyra two sonnes, Tigranes and Alexander: and Aristobulus had by Berenice, daughter to Salome, five children, to wit, three sonnes, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus, & two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod, after hee had put Alexander to death, sent away Glaphyra with her dowrie into Cappadocia, and married Berenice Aristobulus his wife vnto Antipaters vncle: For Antipater deuised this match to become friends with Salome, whom he before time hated and eniued. He also by his great gifts sought to get Pheroras fauour, and the friendship of such as were friends vnto Cæsar, sending to that end great summes of money vnto Rome. Hee gaue Saturninus and all the rest great riches in Syria. But the more he gaue, the more hee was hated of all men; for euery one iudged that hee did not consume such wealth, for that hee was liberal, but that hee launified it out for feare; so that he got not the loue of them, vpon whom he bestowed it; and they to whom he gaue nothing, were so much the more his enemies. Yet he became euery day more bountifull, seeing against his expectation, Herode made much of their children: whose parents he had slaine, intending to shew how much hee repented their deaths, by the pittie and and compasſion he tooke vpon their children. For assembling together his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the teares standing in his eyes, he said: Hard, cruell, and sinfull fortune tooke away from me the fathers of these children: but I pitie to see them orphans, and naturall affection commendeth them vnto me. Wherefore I will endeavour, that seeing I have bin an infortunate father, I may be a wiser and happier grandfather, & leaue them who are most deare vnto me, to raigne after me. Wherefore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter vnto Alexanders eldest sonne, that for that cause thou maist be carefull to provide for him, and asist him: & vnto thy sonne Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist be a father to her who wants a father; and my sonne Herod, whose mothers vncl was high priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who touch mee seek to alter this. And I beseech Almighty God, for the good of my countrey, and of these my Nephewes, to prosper these mariages, & to looke vpon these children with a more fauorable eye, then he did their fathers. Having thus spoken, hee wept, and ioyned the childrens hands, & courteously saluting euery one, he dismissed the Councell.

Vpon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceiued how sorrowfull he was. For now he thought himselfe dishonoured by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders son was like to haue both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreouer, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compasſionate the children, for that they were fatherlesse, and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, and were terrified at his wickednesse. Wherefore he attempted all meanes possible to breake off the mariages, yet he feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now verie seuer, and warie, & mistrustfull. And therefore went openly vnto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leaue him without honour, nor deprive him of that dignity, which before time he had iudged him woorthy of, giuing him onely the bare title of a king, and leauing the substance of the kingdome in others mens powers. For it would bee impossible for him to obtaine the kingdome, if Alexanders sonne (beside Archelaus his fauour) were by marriage made sonne in law vnto Pheroras. Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the mariages: for the king had nine wiues, and by seauen of them he had children: Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme daughter of the high Priest, & Antipas and Archelaus by Malthace the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Joseph married; and by Cleopatra of Ierusalem, Herode and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasaelus: & he had two other daughters also, Rexane and Salome, one of them by Phedra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wiues by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece: and beside these he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Aristobulus and Alexander. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, he requested the mariages to be altered.

The king well perceiuing his mind and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sonnes, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared lest Antipater by some false accusations should ouerthrow them, & so with sharpe words did driue him off for that time; yet after ward he so flattered Herod, that he got the mariages to be altered. And first of all he ioyned Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himselfe, and his sonne to Pheroras daughter. Heere one may see what Antipater could doe by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed although that she was his sister, and procured many times Iulia Cæsars wife to speake for her, that shee might marie with Syllaus the Arabian: yet was not she permitted so to doe. But Herod (ware that he would account her as an vtter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her will hee married her vnto one Alexander a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders sonne, and the other to Antipaters vncl.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater his sisters sonne, the other vnto Phasaelus his brothers sonne. VVhen Antipater had quite ouerthrowne the hope of the Orphans, and ioyned affinitie, as he thought good, he now held himselfe on a sure ground: & adding confidence to his malice, hee became intolerable to all men. And seeing hee could not auoid their hatred, hee now sought by feare to worke his owne safetie; and so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed and established for king. Also the women in the court fell at variance, and raised a new broile: for Pheroras wife with her mother, & her sister, and the mother of Antipater did vse themselves very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the kings daughters verie contumeliously: to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater who hated them, hauing the others at his commaund, onely Salome hindred their agree-

A agreement: who went vnto the king, and told him that their meetings were not for his profit.

The women vnderstanding how he had informed the king, & that Herod was offended the more, they came no more together openly, and abstained from their wonted familiaritie, and in the kings hearing faigned themselves to fall out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stuck not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithstanding, they had meetings & banquets in the night, and the vnitie was the more confirmed because they perceiued themselves to be noted: for Salome knew all this, and told it vnto the king. The king was very angry, and especially against Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and hauing called together his kinred & friends, he laid many accusations against her before them; and told them how contumeliously she had behaued herselfe toward his daughter, and that shee hired the Pharisees against him, and that by her poison she had made his brother his enemy. And turning himselfe vnto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather haue him for his brother, or haue his wife. And hee answering, that he had rather die then lose his wife: Herod doubtfull what to do, turned him to Antipater, and commaunded him neuer to talke with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging vnto them after that time. But hee obeyed his fathers commaund openly in shew, but secretly lay in their house: and fearing that Salome should perceiue it, he by his friends in Italy caused himselfe to make a voiage to Rome, by letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commaunded, that shortly after the receipt thereof, Antipater should be sent to Rome vnto Cesar. Wherefore Herod vying no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessarie, and a great summe of money: giuing him likewise his last Will and Testament to cary with him to Cesar; wherein was written, that Antipater should be king, and after him, Herod, the sonne of Mariammes, daughter of the high Priest. But Syllaus the Arabian, neglecting Cæsars commaundement, at the same time failed to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controuersie between him & Nicholaus. He had also a great contention with Aretas his king, whose friends he had slaine, and also Soemus, the most potent in all the towne of Petra: and seeing Fabatus, Cæsars Procurator, he vsed his fauour also against Herod. But Herod giuing Fabatus a greater summe of money, alienated him from Syllaus, and by this meanes dispatched that which Cesar commaunded: and because Fabatus restored nothing vnto him, he accused him that hee was Procurator, not for Cesar but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moued; and being as yet in great estimation with Herod, he did disclose Syllaus his secrets, and signified vnto the king, how that Syllaus corrupted Corinthus one of his guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the king followed his counsel: for this Corinthus, though he was alwaies brought vp in the kings court, yet was he borne in Arabia. Wherefore he presently tooke him & two other Arabians that were found with him; one of them was Syllaus friend; and the other Phylarchus: who vpon their examination, confessed that Corinthus for a great summe of money was hired to kill the king. After this, they were sent vnto Saturninus the gouernour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

CHAP. XIX.

How Herod should haue bene poisoned, and how it was knowne.

Herod still urged Pheroras to forsake his wife: for hee knew not how to punish her, hauing many matters against her: at last he was so moued that he banished his brother & sister. Pheroras taking this iniury patiently, departed into his Tetrarchie, taking an oath that his banishment should endure so long as Herod liued, & that whilst hee liued, he would neuer come any more vnto him; In so much, as he would not come at his brother to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay now on his death-bed, & would gladly impart something vnto him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, & afterward Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble mind: for hee went vnto him, and very kindly sought help for him; but hee was too far spent, for a few daies after he died: and although Herod loued him vntill his dying day, yet was it bruited abroad that hee poisoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought vnto Ierusalem, and commaunded all his nation to mourne, and buried him with a sumptuous funeral. And thus one of the murderers of Alexander and Aristobulus came to his end: but shortly after, the reuenge of that wicked fact did fall vpon Antipater, who was the chiefe author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For certaine that belonged to Pheroras came in mournfull wise vnto Herode, and complained vnto him how that his brother Pheroras was poisoned, and that one of his wiues gaue him meate that was not seasoned after the accustomed maner: which when hee had eaten, hee presently fell sick. G And that two daies before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was sent for by his mother and his sister, to giue Pheroras a loue potion, and she in steed thereof, through Syllaus inducements, gaue him poison, for she was of Syllaus acquaintance.

The king, daunted with so many suspitions, caused diuers of Pheroras maids and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient therein, exclaimed in this wise: O thou God, ruler of heauen and earth, reuenge vs vpon Antipaters mother, who is the cause of these our euils! When the king vnderstood thus much, he ceased not to search out the truth: and then the women disclosed Antipaters mothers familiaritie with Pheroras, and his women, & their secret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater after they came from the king, vsed to drinke with them all night long, nor suffering any seruauant or maid to be in the roome with them; and one of the Libertines wiues reuealed this. And when euery one of the maids were tortured apart, at their examinations agreed; so that now it was euident, wherefore Antipater had compacted to goe to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the riuer Jordan. For they were often wont to say, that Herod hauing killed Alexander and Aristobulus, now he would come to them and their wiues: and that it was vnlike that he would spare any one, who spared not Mariamme and her sonnes: and therefore it was best to flie as farre as it was possible from such a beast. And that Antipater was wont often to complaine vnto his mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father waxed young & lustie; and that it might so chauce, that hee should neuer liue to be king; or if euer his father died, he should enjoy the pleasure of the kingdome but a short time. And moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to say, Alexanders and Aristobulus sonnes, beganne to spring vp againe: and that his father had iniuriouly cutt off all hope from his sonnes, appointing none of them to succeed him, but the sonne of Mariamme: wherein he was perswaded that hee doted, if so be hee thought his will should be of force; for he would take such an order, that hee would leaue none of all his progenie aliue, and that Herod was the greatest hater of his sonnes of any father in the world: and was not therewithall contented, but he also hated his owne brethren. Furthermore, that hee not long ago gaue him an hundreth talents that he should haue no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater answered, I would to God that hee would take away all men else, and leaue onely vs two naked, so that he would grant vs life: but, quoth he, it is impossible to escape this dangerous beast, who will not suffer men openly to shew friendship to one another. Lastly, though we now secretly meet, yet if wee beare the harts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talke and meete openly. The maids in torments disclosed these speeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flie with them into Petra. Herod believed all their sayings, and the rather for that which was said concerning the hundreth talents. For hee said nothing of them to any one but to Antipater.

And first of all hee bent his furie against Doris, Antipaters mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had bestowed vpon her, and bought with many talents, he banished her. When his wrath was somewhat appeased, he released Pheroras maids from torments: and now he became timorous and fearful, and prone to any suspicion, torturing many that were innocent, for feare he should let any escape that were guiltie. Hereupon hee set vpon Antipater the Samaritan, who was Procurator for his sonne Antipater; who through torments confessed that his sonne Antipater had procured poison out of Egypt to kill him, by the meanes of a friend of Antiphilus; which poison Theudion, Antipaters vnckle tooke of him, and deliuered to Pheroras: who Antipater charged to dispatch Herod whilst hee was at Rome, far from suspicion, and that Pheroras gaue his wife the poison to keepe. VVherefore the king calling for her, commaunded her to bring forth that which was deliuered vnto her. And shee making as though shee would haue gone forth to fetch it, cast herselfe downe from a house toppe, thereby to preuent the torments, which if she were couisted, they would inflit vpon her. But by the prouidence of God (as it should seeme) it came so to passe that she fell not on her head, but vpon her side, and so escaped death, to the end that God might inflit punishment vpon Antipater. And beeing brought vnto the king, so soone as he began to come to herselfe (for she was amazed with the fall) the king demanded M of her, wherefore shee had done so, and swaue vnto her that if shee would truly disclose all, hee would pardon her for all; but if shee told an vntruth, her body should be torne in peeces with torments, and not be buried. Shee awhile held her peace, and at last said: Wherefore should I keepe any thing secret, seeing Pheroras is dead, to saue Antipater, who hath caused all our overthrowes? Heare O king, & God be witness of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceiued. When I late weeping by Pheroras, as he lay dying, he called me vnto him and said; See wife how much

A I am deceiued concerning my brothers loue towards me, for I hated & sought to kill him, who thus loueth me, and sorroweth so much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am iustly rewarded for my iniquity. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyson which was left by Antipater in thy keeping for my brother, & make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to hell a guilty conscience for that crime. So I brought it as hee willed mee, and the most part of the poyson I cast into the fire, where it was consumed, & kept a little thereof to my selfe, for feare of mi'chances, and of thee. And hauing thus sayd, she brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poyson. And then the king tortured the brother and mother of Antiphilus, & they also confessed that Antiphilus brought a box out of Aegypt, & that hee receiued poyson from his brother, who practised physicke at Alexandria. The ghosts also of Alexander and Aristobulus went all about the whole kingdom, and became as it were spies, to giue notice of such things as were vncertaine; who also caused those that dwelt in the vttermost parts of the kingdome, to come & giue euidence of such things as were suspected. At last it was proued that Mariamme the daughter of the high Priest was acquainted with these conspiracies, for her brethren being tortured did confesse it. VVherefore the king reuenged the mothers fault vpon her child: for hauing writ in his wil, that Herod her son should succeed Antipater in the kingdom, now for her fault hee blotted that out.

CHAP. XX.

C How ANTIPATERS malicious practices against HEROD were known and reuenged.

AFTER all this, Bathyllus ioyned himselfe with Antipater, as it were to adde the last hand vnto all his practices. This Bathyllus was one of his libertines, who brought another sort of poyson, to wit, of Aspes, and the poyson also of other serpents; that if the first proued too weake and took not effect, that then Pheroras and his wife should make an end of the King with these. And beside these shamefull practices of his against his father; hee also had letters which hee had counterfeited against his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the kings sonnes were at that time at Rome to studie, who were very toward young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be some hinderance to him, in that which he expected, hee hastened by all meanes possible to make them away. And the better to effect this purpose, he counterfeited letters in his friends names that were at Rome, and he for money got others to write, that these two young men vsed in taunting wife to raile against their father, and openly to complaine of the death of Alexander and Aristobulus: and that they took it in bad part that they were sent for home (for their father sent word that they should come away) and thereat Antipater was most troubled. For he before his departure from Iudæa to Rome procured such like letters to be forged against them at Rome; and so deliuering them to his father, that he might auoid all suspicion, seemed to excuse his brethren, affirming some things that were written to be lies; other things to be offences, whereunto yong men were prone. At which time hee gaue great summes E of money to them in whose names he had counterfeited the letters against his brethren: heereby as it were hiring them to be secret. He gaue them also rich apparell, and Tapistrie of curious worke: also siluer and golden cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he bestowed, he might haue all things kept close; so that at his returne hee made his father account that hee had spent two hundred talents, the greatest portion whereof was consumed in following the law against Syllaus. Antipaters small faults were all hid by a greater: for all they that had beene tortured gaue euidence against him, how that hee practiced his fathers death, and the letters witnessed how againe hee went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of those who came out of Iudæa to Rome, bare him so much good will as to giue him intelligence what troubles were in the court at home, although F it was seuen moneths after that he was conuicted, before he came to Iudæa from Rome. Peraduenture they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace by the ghosts of them who were put to death. At last he sent letters from Rome to his father, that now he would shortly return home, and that Cæsar had dismissed him very honorably. The king desired greatly that the Traitor were in his power; and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that hee would looke to himselfe, fained great kindnesse towards him, and sent back againe vnto him very louing and familiar letters, willing him to hasten his return: for if he made haste, it might be he should obtaine pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater vnderstood that she was banished. Then his re-

Herods accusation against Antipater.

About this time he receiued a letter at Tarentum, whereby he understood the death of Pheroras, and greatly lamented it, which diuers thought well of. Yet as farre as one may coniecture, the cause of his griefe was, that his treason went not forward as hee wished; and hee did lament Pheroras so much, as though hee had lost one to effect his treacherie. Moreouer hee feared lest that which had passed should come to light, and least the poyson should be found: yet when hee came to Cilicia, and there receiued his fathers letters, which before we mentioned, he then made great haste homewarde: yet when he came to Celenderis, hee began earnestly to thinke vpon his mothers mishap, his minde as it were presaging some sinister fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him counsell'd him not to goe to his father, till such time as hee were certaine for what cause his mother was banished and diuorced. For it was to be feared, that he should bee accused also of the same that was laide to his mothers charge: But the vnwiler sort being more desirous to see their country, then to bethinke themselves what was expedient for Antipater, admonished him to make haste, least that his long delay should breed any suspicion in his father, and least thereby he should giue occasion vnto malignant people to raile vp slanders. For (sayde they) if any thing hath passed against you, it was in your absence, & were you in presence no man durst do nor speake against you; and it were a very vnwile part, for vncertaine suspicions to depriue himselfe of certaine felicity, and not to returne speedily vnto his father, and receiue the kingdome at his hands, who had him in whom only his hope was. This counsell (for fortune would haue it so) Antipater followed, & so arriued in theauen of Cæsars passing Sebastus, where contrarie to his expectation, he fell into great sorrow and admiration: for all men eschewed his companie, and no man durst come neere him. For although that he was alwaies hated of them, yet then they had libertie to shew their hatred. Many abstained from comming to him for feare of the king: and now the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was knowne in euery City, and to euery man, only Antipater himselfe was ignorant thereof. For there was neuer any man brought thither with more maiestie then he, when hee was to saile to Rome, nor neuer any man more basely entertained at his returne. And now vnderstanding of the massacre at home, he craftily made himselfe ignorant thereof, and notwithstanding that he was almost dead for feare, yet in his countenance he counterfained confidence. For hee could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himselfe out of those present daungers: and yet hee heard no certaine newes of matters at home, nor there: for the king, by an edict had forbidden all men to giue him notice thereof: So that many times he comforted himselfe thus, that either all matters concerning him were yet secret, or if any thing was come to light, that he by policie and impudencie could acquite himselfe thereof; for these two were his refuge and hope. Being thus determined, hee went into the kings palace alone without any of his friends and followers; which at the verie first gate were most contumeliously repulsed. And by chauce Varus the ruler of Syria was there within: then hee boldly going in to his father, came neere vnto him, as though hee would haue saluted him. But Herod stretching forth his hand and shaking his head, cried out, O thou that hast attempted to murder thy father, dar'st thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, who art guilty of so many treacheries! God confound thee, wicked wretch, and come not neere me till thou hast cleared thy selfe of all that which is laid against thee: for thou shalt haue iustice, and Varus shall be thy iudge, who is by good fortune now here. Go and premeditate how to acquite thee against tomorrow, for I will giue thy subtil and crafty braine some time to do it.

Hereat Antipater was astonished with feare, that hee was not able to reply any thing; but so went his way. Presently his mother and his wife came vnto him, and told him all the proofes of treasons against him. Then he calling his wies together, bethought himselfe how to answer euery point. The next day the king caused an assembly of his friends and kinsfolks, and to them admitted Antipaters friends: and he and Varus sitting in iudgement, commanded all proofes to be brought, and witnesses to appeare: amongst whom were certaine of Antipaters mothers seruants, lately apprehended, who had letters from her to carry vnto him, to this effect. Forasmuch as all those things are now known vnto thy father, beware that thou return not vnto him before thou hast obtained some warrant of thy safety from Cæsar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in with them, and prostrating himselfe before his fathers feete, he said: I beseech thee, O father, beare no preiudicate opinion against me, and lend me an open eare whilst I purge my selfe: for if you please to giue me leaue, I will proue my selfe guiltlesse. But Herod with a vehement voice commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus vnto Varus. I know Varus, that both thou, or anie other iust and indifferent Iudge, will adiudge Antipater to haue deserued death: and I feare me least you also should disdaine me for my bad fortune, and think me worthy of

A of all calamities, who haue begotten such tonnes as you see. And yet this should moue thee so much the more to pittie me, who haue bene so mercifull and careful for such wicked cattifes. For I had alreadie appointed those young men that are dead to be kings, and brought them vp at Rome, & gotten them Cæsars fauor: but they whom I had so much honored, and exalted vnto the crowne, became traitors against mine owne life, whose death was much auailable to Antipater. For his securitie I sought therein, because he was a young man, and the next that should succede me: but this cruell beast being more then full gorged with my sufferance and patience, hath emptied his stomacke euen vpon my selfe, and thinketh my life too long, & is grieved that I liue to be old, & hath attempted to make himselfe king, nor any other way but by murdering his father. And for what cause did this come to passe? for that I recalled him out of the field, where hee was contemptible; and casting them off whom I had begotten of a Queene, appointed this to bee heire of my kingdome. I confesse vnto thee, Varus, my error: for I incited them against mee, because that for Antipaters sake I depriued them of their right. For wherein had I so well deserued of them, as at this mans hands? vnto whom, being yet aliue, I committed the sway and rule of my kingdom, and openly in my will and testament declared him to be my heir and successor: whose charges I with mine owne money haue still supported, notwithstanding that I had bestowed vpon him the yearly reuenues of fiftie talents. And lately when he was to saile to Rome, I gaue him three hundred talents, and commended him vnto Cæsar, as the onely man of all my house, who had preserued his fathers life. And what was their offence, if it bee compared with Antipaters? and what proofe was there of that, for which they suffered? none but that which this fellow treacherously inuented. Nay, I may boldly say so of him, who hath attempted to murder his father, and now dorth hope to colour all againe with craft and deceit. Beware Varus, that hee deceiue not thee: for I know this beast, and I euen now see by his fained teares, how probable a tale hee will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whilst Alexander liued I should beware of him, and not put euerie one in trust with my person. This is he who was wont to go before mee into my bed-chamber, and looke about in euerie corner, least some should haue lien in waite to haue effected any treason against me. This is he who watched me in my sleepe, and through whom I thought my selfe secure: who comforted me when I mourned for them that were put to death. This is he who censured the good will of his brethren when they were aliue. This was my defender & champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and subtilties, and all his counterfeittings, I scarcely thinke my selfe aliue, admiring how I escaped the hande of such a traitor: and seeing that Fortune stirreth vp those of mine owne house against me, and that those whom I most esteeme of, are my greatest enemies, I will bewaile mine owne fortune, and alone lament mine owne desolation; and not one that hath thirsted after my blood shall escape, although proofe bee brought against euerie one of my children. And thus his heart being surcharged with sorrow, hee was forced to brake off his speech: and presently he commaunded Nicholaus, one of his friends, to shew all the proofes and euidences.

All this while Antipater lay prostrate at his fathers feete, and lifting vp his head, hee cried aloud: Thou thy selfe, O father, sufficiently purgest me. For how should I be one who sought to murder thee, when thy selfe dost confesse, that I alwayes haue preserued thee from all dangers? Or if, as thou sayst, I did it fainedly, was it probable that I would be so circumspect in other affairs, and at other times, and now in so weightie a matter, play the part of a foolish and senselesse man? Nay, I might well thinke, that although such a thought might haue bene kept secret from men, yet it could not be hidden from God, who seeth all things. Was I ignorant what befell my brethren, whom God so punished for their wicked intents towards thee? Or what should cause me to enuie at thy life? The hope of the kingdome. Why? I had the kingdome. Or a suspicion of thy hatred towards mee? I knew thou loudest mee. Or any feare which I had of thee? Nay, in obeying thee I was feared of others. Perhaps want might cause mee thereto. Much lesse. For who might spend more then I? Truly, if I had bene the wickedest person in the world, or the cruelllest beast vpon the earth, yet should I haue relented, being overcome by the benefites of so louing a father; seeing, as thy selfe hast said, thou didst recall and preferre me before so many tonnes. And thou yet aliue, didst proclaim me king, and made me a spectacle to all men for to emulate, through the benefites thou bestowedst vpon me. O wretch that I am! O vnhappie time of my absence out of my country! What an head did I giue to enuy, & what opportunitie to malicious & deceitfull people? Yet, O father, it was for thy sake, and about thy affaires that I went to Rome, that Syllaus might triumph ouer thy old age. Rome can witnesse my pietie, and Cæsar the Prince of the whole world, who did often call me a son of my father. Receiue here, O father, his letter, farre truer then these fained calumniationes against me: let these plead my cause, let these shew my affection towards thee: remeber how vnwilling I was to faile to Rome, knowing I had here in thy countrey many secret enemies. Thou like an vnwile father hast cast me away: thou forcedst me to giue enuie time to frame accusations against mee: but now I will come to the proofes of these matters. Behold here I am, who notwithstanding a murderer of my father, yet did I neuer suffer any misfortune by sea nor land: Is not this, O father, a sufficient argument of my innocence? For I know father, that before God and thee I am condemned: and being condemned, I beseech thee, giue not credit to reports extracted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments vpon me, spare not my wicked bodie. For if I be a murderer of my father, I must not die without torments: crying out aloud after this manner, and weeping, hee moued all that were present, and Varrus also to compassion; but Herode onely abstained from teares, for his anger gaue attention to the truth. And preleny Nicholaus at the kings commandement making a long speech of Antipaters craft and subtiltie, tooke away all hope of mercie, and began a verie bitter accusation, alcribing all mischiefe which had befallen that kingdome vnto him, and especially the death of the two brethren, who through his calumniationes were made away: affirming also that hee vied treacherous practises against those, who were yet aliue, fearing least they should seek to succeed in the kingdome: for he who had prepared poyson for his father, would much lesse spare his brethren. And then comming to the prooffe of his pretence to poyson his father, he declared in order all euidence thereof, aggravating his offence by Phororas; as though Antipater also were the cause why he purposed to murder his brother; and how hee had corrupted the kings dearest friends; and so filled the wole court with wickednes. And when he had accused him of many other things, and brought prooffe thereof, he ended his speech.

Then Varrus when he had commanded Antipater to make aunswere vnto those things, and that he said nothing more, then God is a witnes of my innocence, hee called for the poyson and gaue it to one that was condemned to die, who hauing drunke thereof presently died. Then Varrus talked secretly with Herod; and what was done there in that counsel he wrote vnto Cesar. Yet notwithstanding whē Herod had sent Antipater to prison, he sent messengers vnto Cesar, to shew him his hard fortune and calamitie. After this it was prooued that Antipater wrought treason against Salome. For one of Antipaters seruants came from Rome, and brought letters in the name of Acemes, who was one of Julia her maides, which she writ vnto the king, telling him that she found a letter of Salomes amongst Julias letters, and so for good will she had sent it him: the letter which she affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter inuestiues against Herod, and many accusations. But these letters were written and faued by Antipater, who for money had per-luded Acemes to doe, as we haue said: for the letter which shee writ to Antipater evidently shewed it to be so, for she wrote as followe. h. I haue written vnto thy father as you requested me, and sent also other letters: and I assure my selfe he will not spare his sister, if he doe but reade the letters: and you may do well, seeing I haue performed all your requests, that now you would be mindfull of your promise. This letter against Salome and others being found to be counterfaired, the king began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterfaired letters: and he was verie angrie that he had almost put his sister to death, through Antipaters deuile. Wherefore he no longer delaid to punish him for all, yet he was hindered by a great sicknesse from accomplishing his purpose. He also sent letters vnto Cesar concerning Aceme the maid, and Salomes false accusation, and changed his testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his roome wrote Antipas, leauing our Archelaus and Philppus, who were the elder brethren, because Antipater had accused them. And he bequeathed vnto Cesar a thousand talents, beside many other rich gifts: and to his wife and children, and kinred, and libertines, about fise hundredth, and gaue euery one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his sister Salome with most rich gifts. And thus he corrected his will.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the golden Eagle, and of Antipaters and Herods death.

Herods disease encreased, partly through age, and especially for his griefe and sorrow, for he was now threecore and ten yeares olde, and his mind was so troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health; yet he tooke no pleasure in any thing: and his sicknes was so much the more grievous vnto him, because that Antipater was yet aliue, for he purposed to put him to death when he was recouered of his sicknes. To encrease his calamity, there arose a tumult amongst the people. For there were in the City two sophisters, who made a shew as though they were very skilful in their country laws, & for that were renowned all ouer the countrey. One of them was named Iudas who was sonne vnto Sepphorus: the other was called Matthias sonne vnto Margalus. These two were followed by a great many yong men, so that when they expounded the law they had an assembly like a great army, all yong men. These two hearing that the king partly by griefe, and partly by his disease was very like to die, spake vnto their acquaintance, laying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be reuenged, and those things which were made against their countrey lawes taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit the Images or shapies, or likenesse of any liuing thing to bee in the temple. This they said, because the king had set a golden eagle vpon the chiefest porch of the temple, which the Sophisters now willed the yong men to take away, laying that it was meritorious, although danger might ensue thereon, yea euen to die for their country lawes. For, they that died for such a cause should haue their soules immortal and enioy euerlasting blisse: and that many vnwile men ignorant of that doctrine, so loued their liues, that they chose rather to dy by sicknesse then to spend their liues in a vertuous quarrell. Whilest they sayd thus, there was a rumor spred that the king was now at the last cast: whereat the yong men beeing encouraged, about noone when many were walking in the temple, they let themselves downe from the top of the temple with great ropes, and so with hatchets cut downe the Eagle: Whereof the Captaine of the fouldiers being aduertied, accompanied with a great many soldiers, went speedily to the temple, and took almost forie of the yong men, and caried them to the King. Who first of all asked them if they were so bold as to cut downe the golden Eagle: and they confessed they had done it: then he demaunded by whole commandment? they answered by the commandment of their country lawes. After this it was asked them why they who were presently to die were so iouful? they answered, for that after death they hoped to enioy many good things and eternall blisse. The king hereat greatly moued with anger, ouercame his disease and went forth and made a speech to the people, wherein he inueighed against them as Church-robbers, and that vnder pretence and colour of their country laws and religion they attempted great matters, and adiudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learne who fauoured that act, requested him that first the authors of that crime, & then those that were found guilty therein should receiue punishment: and that he would remit the offence to all the people besides. The king with much ado entreated, caused the yong men that let themselves down in cords, and the Sophisters to be burned, and the rest which were taken in that act to be beheaded. After this the kings sicknesse spred ouer his whole body, and he was afflicted with most grievous pain: for he had a vehement ague, and an itch ouer all his whole body, which was intolerable, and a daily colicke, and his feete were swollen, as though he had the dropie: his belly was swollen, and priue members putrified, so that wormes bred in the putrified places. He was also short winded, and he was grievously tormented with difficultie of breath, and a conuulsion of the whole body: so that some said that this was a punishment laid vpon him for the death of the two Sophisters. Herod notwithstanding he was afflicted with so many & grievous sicknesse, yet was he desirous to liue, and sought remedy wherby he hoped for health. At last he passed ouer Iordan, where he used the warme waters of Calliroe which runne into the lake of Alaphatites, and are so sweet that men vse to drinke of them. There the Physicians caused his body to be bathed in hor oyle, and it was therewith so dissolved that his sight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat those that were about him being troubled with their cries caused him to looke vp, & now despairing of life he willed fiftie Drachmes to be distributed vnto euery fouldier, and great summes of money to the captains and his friends.

As he returned, when he came to Iericho, he was in very great likelihood to die of melancholy, and there he deuised a wicked fact: for he caused the chiefe men of euery towne and village in all Iudæa to be assembled together, and then he shut them vp in a place called the Hippodrome: and calling vnto him Salome his sister, and Alexas her husband; I know quoth he, that the Iewes will make feasts for ioy of my death, yet if thou wilt do my command, I shall be mourned for, and I shall haue a princely funeral. Therefore so soone as I haue giuen vp the ghost, cause foundours to compasse these men, whom I haue here in hold, and kill them all: for to all Iudæa, and euery household thereof shall against their will bewaile my death. As thus he commanded this to be done, the Legates came which he had sent to Rome, bringing him letters, wherein was shewed how Acemes Julia her maid, was by Cesars command put to death, and Antipater condem-to also. Herod with this newes was something refreshed, yet presently with paine he was ouer-come: for he both was troubled with a vehement cough, and almost pined with fasting, so that he thought to hasten his owne death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for he was accustomed to cut the meate which he did eate; and then looking about him, least any standing by might hinder him, he lifted vp his arme to strike himselfe. But Achiabus his cousin ran hastily vnto him, and stayed his hand: and presently there was made great lamentation throughout the kings palace, as though the king had bene dead. Antipater hauing speedy newes hereof, was glad, and took courage, and promised the keepers a peece of mony to let him go. But the chiefeft of them did not only deny to doe it, but also went presently to the king, and told him all what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted vp his voice with more strength then was meete for a sicke man, and commanded his guard to goe and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Castle called Hyrcanium. And then againe he altered his testament, and writ Archelaus his eldest sonne, who was brother to Antipater, for king, and appointed Antipater for Terrarch. Five daies after the death of his sonne Antipater, Herod died: hauing reigned thirty and foure yeares after he flew Antigonius, and thirty seauen yeares after that the Romans had declared him king. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man: for he being but a private person, got the crowne and kept it, and left it vnto his posteritie: but in his household affaires hee was most infortunate.

Salome, before it was knowne that the king was dead, went forth with her husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the king commanded to be slaine; saying, that the kings minde was now altered, and therefore he gaue them all licence to depart: and after their departure the kings death was made knowne to the souldiers, who together with the other multitude were assembled in the Amphitheater at Iericho. Where Ptolemaus keeper of the kings seale made a speech vnto them, and began to say that Herod was now happie; and comforted the multitude, and so he read vnto them a letter which the king left, wherein he earnestly requested the souldiers to fa-uour and loue his successor. After the Epistle read, hee recited the kings testament, wherein Philip was appointed heire of Trachon, & the places therunto adioining; Antipater designed Tetrarch, and Archelaus king. Him also he commanded to beare his ring vnto Cesar, and withall notice and intelligence of the estate of the kingdome, wherof he had bene gouernour, fast sealed in writing: for he appointed Cesar to be ouersee of all his ordinances, vnto whose pleasure he left the performance of his testament.

This was no sooner read, but presently the skies were filled with the voyces and cries of the people, who did congratulate Archelaus, and the souldiers and the people came in companies vnto him, promising their fauor and furtherance, and desired God alwaies to assist him. This done; euery one was busied about the kings funeralls: where Archelaus spared no cost, but buried the King with all royall pomp possible. The Beere wheron he was carried was adorned with gold and precious stones: vpon it lay a bed wrought with purple, wherupon was laid the dead corps of the king covered also with purple, with a crowne on his head, and a diadem of pure gold, and a scepter in his right hand. About the Beere were his sonnes and kinsfolke: and the guard, & bands of Thracians, Germans, and Gauls all went before in order, as though they had gone to warres.
The rest of the souldiers in warlike order did follow their Captaines and leaders, and 500. ser-uants and libertines carried perfumes. And thus the corps was carried the space of two hundred furlongs into the Castle named Herodion: where, as himselfe had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of king Herode.

CHAP. I.

Of Herods successor Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutinie that arose for the reuenge of those that were executed for taking downe the golden Eagle.

Archelaus being appointed successor in the kingdom of Herod late dead, neces-sitie constrained him to go to Rome, which iourney gaue occasion of new broyles. For after that for seauen dayes space he had celebrated his fathers funerals, and largely feasted the people (for this is a custome amongst the Iewes, which bringeth manie of them to pouertie; yet he that doth not so is reputed impious) he went vnto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great ioy receiued of the people; and he himselfe sitting in a tribunall seat & a throne of gold, did verie curiously admit the people to his presence: and thanked them for their diligent care vsed in his fathers funerals, and for that they exhibited honour vnto him, as though he were alreadie King. Yet he said that he would not take vpon him the authoritie nor name of a king, till such time as his succession was approued by Cesar, who by his fathers testament was Lord and maister of all: and for that cause he withstood the souldiers at Iericho, when they would haue crowned him. But he promised, that if he were confirmed king by those who were in authoritie, he would largely recompence both the souldiers and the people for their good will; & that he fully purposed to be better vnto them then his father was. The multitude hereat greatly reioyced, and made present triall of his mind and purpose; for some cried out, requesting that the tribute might be no more exacted. Others desired that the yearly payments might cease. Others requested to giue all prisoners libertie. Archelaus in fauour of the people graunted all their requests: & then offering sacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when suddenly after the noone time of the day, a great multitude desirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the kings death being ceased) began a priuate mourning, bewailing their mischance, whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the golden Eagle from off the porch of the Temple. This sorrow was not secret, but the whole cite did resound with laments for them, that were thought to haue lost their liues for the temple and their countrie lawes. They also cried that reuenge was to be taken vpon them, whom Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that first of all, he who by Herod was constituted high Priest, was to bee reiected, and another more holy and deuout to be put in his place. Archelaus, although he was hereby moued to reuenge, yet because he was presently to take such a iourny, abstained fro it, fearing least that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherefore he sought rather by admonishing them, then by force to reclaim those that were feditious, and lent the Gouernour of the souldiers to request them to be pacified. But the authours of that sedition so soone as he came to the temple, before he spake one word, threw stones at him: and in like manner they vied others sent after him to appease them (for Archelaus dispatched many messengers vnto the) whom they spitefully intreated, making a shew that if they had beene more in number, they would not haue bene appeased. Therefore when the feast of vnleavened bread drew nigh, which the Iewes call Easter, wherein an infinite number of sacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all villages thereabout for deuotion sake to that solemnitic, and they who so lamented the death of the Sophisters, remained in the Temple, seeking by all means to nourish their sedition. Which Archelaus fearing, sent a band of souldiers and a Tribune with them, to take the chiefe of the feditious, before such time as they had drawne vnto them the multitude of the people: against whom the whole number being stirred vp, slew a great many of them with stones, and the Tribune himselfe being sore hurt, had much ado to escape. And when they had so done, they presently went and offered sacrifice, as though that no hurt had bene done. But Archelaus perswaded himselfe that the multitude would not be appeased without slaughter: wherefore he sent vnto them the whole armie, the footmen into the cite, and the horsemen into the field, who inuading the seditious people as they were sacrificing, slew of them almost three thousand, and scattered the residue into the mountaines neere adioyning. There were also Criers who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his command, that euerie one should depart home to his house: so euerie one notwithstanding the holiness of the day departed. But he accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolemey and Nicholaus his friends, went vnto the sea coast, leauing Philip for Gouernour of the kingdom, and ouer his household: with them departed Salome and her children, and the kings brethren & kindred, vnder pretence to asist Archelaus to the crowne, but indeed it was to informe Cesar of that which was done in the Temple against the law.

When they came to Casarea, they met with Sabinus Gouernour of Syria, who was coming toward Iudaea to take into his custodie Herods treasure: whom Varus forbade to go any further, being sent for by Archelaus, and Ptolemey requesting him thereunto. And so Sabinus for the loue of Varus, neither entred the Castles, nor shut vp Herods treasure from Archelaus, but promised that he would let all alone till Cesar vnderstood thereof. But so soone as one of them that hindered him was gone to Antiochia, and the other, to wit Archelaus, to Rome; he still remaining at Casarea, now hastened vnto Ierusalem and tooke the kings palace: where calling for the chiefe of the guard, and the Purueyors, he exacted of them an account, and sought to take into his custodie the Castles and strong holds. But the Capitaines of the garrison, mindfull of the charge which Archelaus gaue them, kept vnto themselves the custodie of all, affirming that they kept them more for Cesar then Archelaus. At this time Antipas made a claime to the

A crowne alleging that Herods first testament was of more force then the last, and that hee in the first was declared king; and both Salome and many more of his kinred, who layled with Archelaus, promised him their aid. He looke with him his mother, and Ptolemey, brother vnto Nicholaus, perswading himselfe that they for their trustinesse and loyaltie vnto Herod, would stand him in great steed: for this Ptolemey was Herods dearest friend. He had also great confidence in Ireneus his orator, because he had an excellent grace in pleading, in so much as he refused the counsell of them who sought to perswade to yeelde vnto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the last testament of his father. Now he was well beloued of all his kinred at Rome, because they hated Archelaus, and especially those that desired to liue at libertie, and either to be gouerned by the Romans, or else to haue Antipas for their king. And to further him the more, hee vsed Sabinus letters vnto Cesar, wherein Archelaus was accused, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the rest of their complices brought the accusations vnto Cesar. And after them Archelaus deliuered all that which he had done, in writing, & withal his fathers ring by Ptolemey; & the reasons of that which he had done he sent inclosed vnto Cesar. Cesar pondering with himselfe what both parties alleged, and the greatnesse of the kingdom, and large reuenues, and number of Herods children, reading also the letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chiefe of the Romanes to counsell. Wherein Caius the sonne of Agrippa, and his daughter Julia, by his assignment, sate in the first place (this Caius was Cæsars adopted sonne) and so he licenced the parties to plead their rights. Then Antipater Salomes sonne being the most eloquent of all Archelaus aduersaries, offered himselfe to be his accuser, for that Archelaus seemed now in wordes to contend for the kingdome, which he had alreadie possessed himselfe of: and that hee did now trouble Cæsars eares with vaine cauations, whom he would not wish to iudge of his lawfull succession. For after Herods death, he laboured some to put a diademe vpon his head, and then sitting in a throne of gold in kingly manner, he partly changed, partly aduanced the orders of the souldiers, and granted vnto the people their requests, which could not be effected but by a king. He had also let at libertie many men, who for great crimes were imprisoned by his father: and hauing done all this, he came now vnto Cesar, to craue the shadow of the kingdome, the substance and bodie whereof he alreadie occupied: so that herein he left nothing vnto Cesar but a bare title. Moreover, he alleged that Archelaus did but counterfeit sorrow for his fathers death, faining himselfe to mourne in the day time, and in the night he would be drunke and rioted. Finally, hee said, that the sedition of the people came by hatred thereof. But the force and drift of his speech was altogether bent to declare the multitude slaine about the Temple: for he said, that they only came against that festiual day to offer sacrifice, and that they themselves were sacrificed, as they were offering their sacrifices which they brought; and that there were such heapes of dead bodies in the Temple, as neuer by any foraine warres were slaine the like. Therefore Herod foreseeing his crueltie, neuer iudged him worthe of the kingdome, till such time as his memorie layled him: and that now being more sicke in mind then bodie, hee knew not whom he named his successour in his last will, especially for that he had nothing wherein he could blame him, whom in his former wil he appointed his successour, when he was in health both of mind and body. Yet (quoth he) put case Herod in his extremitie knew what he did, yet (said he) Archelaus hath depriued himselfe of all kingly dignitie, hauing committed many things against the lawes. For (said he) what will he be after he hath receiued authoritie from Cesar, who before hee receiued any, hath murdered so many. Antipater hauing spoken much to this effect, and a euerie accusation taking witness of his kinred that stood by, ended his speech.

Then Nicholaus stood vp, and first of all he shewed that the slaughter of them in the Temple was necessarie. For they, for whose death Archelaus was now accused, were not only enemies of the kingdome, but also of Cesar: and for other crimes objected, hee shewed how that they were done euen by the counsell and perswasion of the aduersaries. He also requested that the second testament might be of force, for that therein Herod requested Cesar to be a confirmer of his succession. For he who had such remembrance, as to leaue the performance of his will to the discretion of him who was Lord of all, did neither mistake himself in appointing his heire, nor yet was depriued of his eues, seeing he knew by whom he should be established. When Nicholaus had ended his speech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus comming in to the midst of the Counsell, prostrated himselfe at Cæsars feet: whom Cesar courteously taking from the ground, shewed that he was worthe to succeed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive sentence: but the same day the Counsell being dismissed, he deliberated with himselfe, according to the euidence he knew, whether any of those nominated in the two wills should succeed

BEfore such time as Cesar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malchace the mo-ther of Archelaus fell sicke and died; and many letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Iewes had rebelled. Which Varus foreseeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went vnto Ierusalem to repress and resist the authours of that sedition: and because the multitude would not be quiet, hee left one legion of the three which hee brought out of Syria, in the Citie, and so hee returned vnto Antiochia. But Sabinus comming afterward to Ierusalem, was the cause that the Iewes beganne a new broyle. For one while he forced the guarriisons to render to him the Castels, another while he rigorously made search for the kings treasure; and he was not onely assisted by those that Varus left there, but also hee had a great multitude of his owne seruants all armed to further his auarice. And in the feast of Pentecost (so called because of the number of fenen weekes) the people assembled themselves together, not for religion sake, but for anger and hatred: so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee and Idumæa, and Iericho, and the Countreies beyond Iordan. Yet the Iewes which were inhabitants of the Citie surpassed the rest both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themselves into three bands, and made three camps: one vpon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, neere vnto the Castle called Hippodromus; the third on the West part neere the palace, and so they besieged the Romanes on euerie side. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude, and for their courage, sent many letters vnto Varus, earnestly requesting him with all speed to bring succour: for if hee did not, the whole legion would be extinguished. Hee himselfe got him into the highest tower of the Castle Phasaelus, which is so called by the name of Herodes brother, whom the Parthians killed: and from thence he gaue a signe vnto the soldiers to issue out suddenly vpon their enemies: for himselfe was in such a feare that he durst not come downe to the souldiers of whom he was gouernour. The souldiers obeying his commaund, issued into the Temple, and there fought a sore battell with the Iewes, who hauing no bodie to assist them, being vnexperienced in warlike affaires, were soone conquered by them that were skilfull. At last many Iewes got vpon the Porches, and cast darts at them from the toppe thereof, so that they killed many: but the other could not reuenge themselves of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustaine the force of them, who ioyned battaile with them; till at last they fired the porches, which for greatnesse and curious worke were admirable. And so, many were either destroyed with the sodaine fire, or else leaping downe amidst their enemies, were by them slaine: others going backward were cast headlong from the wall: others despairing of life killed themselves with their owne swords: and they who priuily came downe the walles, and assaulted the Romanes, being astonished with feare, were easily ouercome: till at last, all being eyther put to the sword, or caste downe through feare, the treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of keepers; so that the Souldiers tooke away thereof about foure hundred talents, and that which they left Sabinus tooke away.

But this losse of men and money stirred vp many more Iewes, and those more warlike then the first, against the Romanes; who besieging the kings palace, threatened all their destructions, unless they would presently depart from thence: promising Sabinus and the legion leauero depart if he so liked. Part of the kings souldiers, who of their owne accord fled vnto them, did assist them. But the most warlike and valiant amongst them were three thousand of Sebastes whole Makers were Rafai and Gratus; but, leader of the foot-men, and the other of the horse-men; both which, although they had had no souldiers with them, for their valour of bodie, and counsaile, might yet haue bene a great helpe vnto the Romanes in those warres. The Iewes earnestly continued the siege and assaulted the castle walles, crying vpon Sabinus to depart, and not to hang them now after so long time to haue their countreies libertie. Sabinus though with all his hart he wished himselfe away, yet durst he not trust them; but he suspected that their countreies was but a plot

A plot to entrappe him: and on the other side hoping that Varus would come and helpe him, still induced the danger of the siege. At the same time there were tumults in many places of Iudæa, and many through opportunitie of the time aspired to the kingdome. For in Idumæa two thousand olde souldiers, who had borne armes vnder Herod, gathering together and hauing armed themselves, came and fought with the kings forces, whom Achiabius the kings cousin resisted in the strongest villages, alwaies eschewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris also a towne of Galilee, Indas the sonne of Ezechias the capitaine of the theuees, who before was taken by king Herode, and had wasted that countrey, gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the kings armory, and armed all his company, and fought against them who affected the royall dignitie. Also beyond the riuier, Simon one of the kings seruants being faire and of a huge stature, put a crowne vpon his owne head, and gathering together a companie of theuees, went about with them vnto Iericho and burned the kings palace and many faire and sumptuous houses there, and so got great prey by burning the houses: and he had surely fired all buildings of account, had not Gratus captain of the kings footmen made haste to meete him with the bowmen of Trachon, and the most warlike men of Sebastes, where many footmen were slaine. But Simon though he fled into a streight valley, yet he ouertooke him, and cut him ouerthwart the necke, and so hee fell downe. In like manner other of the kings palaces neere Iordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands from beyond the riuier. At this time a shepheard named Athrongeus presumed to vsurpe the crowne: he was thereunto induced by the courage he bare, and the disdain of death. With this resolution he armed his foure brethren, and euerie one of them had a companie armed, and they were as his captaines and champions to make incursions: and he like a King medled onely with great affaires, and then he put a crowne vpon his head; and thus he continued a long time wasting the country, and killing especially the Romanes, and also the kings souldiers; so that none of the Iewes escaped if they were in hope to gaine by them. They also presumed to meete a companie of the Romanes at Ammauns, who caried corne and armour vnto the legion, where they killed with darts one Arius a Centurion, and forie of the most valiant amongst them; and the rest being in the like danger, through the helpe of Gratus with the souldiers of Sebastes, escaped. When they had done many things in this manner against the inhabitants & strangers, at last three of them were taken: the eldest by Archelaus; & the two others who were eldest after him, fell into the hands of Gratus & Ptolemaus; and the fourth yeelded himselfe vnto Archelaus vpon composition; and thus at last they came to their end. And all Iudæa by their example was filled with theuees.

Of Varus his deedes concerning the Iewes that were crucified.

When Varus had receiued the letters of Sabinus, and of the nobles with him, fearing the whole legion, he hastened to succour them: Wherefore hee came to Ptolemais with two other legions and foure cornets of horsemen, where he willed the kings forces, and the nobles to meete him. Moreover as he passed by Berytum, they accompanied him with 15. hundred armed men. Aretas also the King of Arabia, for the hatred he bare to Herode, was come with a great number of horsemen and footmen. As soone as the host was assembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his armie into Galilee adioyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his the sonne of Caius for their gouernour, who presently put them all to flight against whom he was sent; and hauing taken the castle of Sephoris he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-slaves. Varus with the rest of the armie went into Samaria, and tooke it; yet hee did the Citie no harme because he founde that amidst all those tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his tents at a villa called Aun, which was in the possession of Ptolemaus, the Arabians sacked it, for they hated them who loued Herod. From thence they went to Sappho an other strong borough, which they in like manner sacked and destroyed, with all the fruits & ieuencues they found there. All was filled with the slaughter and fiers which the Arabians made, and there was no end nor hinderance of their auarice. Also Varus commaunded Ammauns to be burned, being angrie for the death of Arius, and the rest that were slaine there: and the inhabitants thereof were scattered, euery one by flight seeking to save himselfe. From thence hee went to Ierusalem, and at the sight of him the Iewes fled and scattered themselves, some here, some there, all about the country: they that remained in the Citie excused themselves, that they were not consenting to that tumult, but that for the celebration of the feasts sake, they permitted the to come G into the citie, affirming that they had rather beene besieged together with the Romans then to haue conspired with those of the sedition: and so they laid the cause of that tumult vpon others. But first, Iosephus Archelaus his cousin, with Gratus & Rufus came to meet him, leading the kings armie, and the Sebastians & the Roman souldiers adorned in their accustomed apparell. Sabinus durst not beleeue of Varus, and therefore got him out of the towne before, and went vnto the sea coast. Varus diuided his armie, and sent it into the fields against the Authours of that tumult: and those that were brought vnto him who were in lesse fault, hee committed to prison, and those who were the chiefeft he crucified, to the number of two thousand.

And vnderstanding that in Idumæa there yet remained ten thousand of armed men, he presently sent the Arabians home, because he perceived that they did not warre as those that came to H helpe him, but as they themselves pleased, wasting the country against his will: and so accompanied with his owne armie, he hastened against the enemies. But they without any fight, through Achab counsell, yielded themselves to Varus. And he pardoned the common souldiers, and sent the Captaines to Cesar to answer the matter. Who pardoning the most of them, yet punished some that were the kings kinsmen (for some of them were a kin to Herod) because they altogether rebelled against their king. Varus hauing thus quieted the estate of Iudæa and Ierusalem, leauing the same legion that was there before, departed to Antiochia.

NOW Archelaus had a new proceffe at Rome against the Iewes, who before the sedition with the leaue of Varus were gone to Rome to craue the liberty of their country. These who came as Embassadors in their countries behalfe, were fiftie in number, and they were assisted by more then eight thousand Iewes that liued at Rome. Wherefore Cesar called a Councell of the Nobilitie of Rome in the Temple of Apollo, which was situate vpon mount Palatine, and ioyned to Cesars priuate palace, which was most sumptuously adorned: & the multitude of Iewes, appeared with the Legats against Archelaus and his friends. Archelaus kinned neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Iewes: with him they would not ioine, for enuie; and with the Iewes they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous manner to assist his brother; or if that it pleased Cesar to diuide Herods kingdome amongst his children, that then he might haue a part. The aduersaries were commaunded to shew what Herod had committed contrarie to the lawes: First of all they answered, that they found him not a King, but the most cruell tyrant that euer was, and that he murdered many, & those whom he left aliue endured such miserie, as they thought themselves far vnhappier then those who were so butchered. For (said they) he was not onely contented to teare his subiects bodies with torments, but also defacing and ruining the cities of his owne countrie, he adorned and reedified the cities of strangers: and permitted forrainers to massacre the Iewes without reuenge. And in stead of their ancient and wonted happinesse, and their lawes inuiolated, their countrie was by him made so poore, and so filled with iniquitie, that within those few yeares that Herod reigned, they had sustained more murders and massacres then all their ancestors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, vntill the beginning of his raigne: being then prouoked to take armes when Xerxes was king of Persia. Yet they by enduring such miserie, being now accustomed thereunto, would willingly be subiect to such a successour of his as they knew would make them liue in most bitter seruitude: for they when Herod his father was dead, presently called Archelaus king, notwithstanding he was the sonne of such a tyrant, and with him mourned for the death of Herod, and offered sacrifice for the prosperitie of his successor. But he to shew himselfe Herods son, began his reigne with the slaughter of three thousand citicens; and because he had so well deserved the kingdome, he offered so many men to God for sacrifice, and on a festiuall day filled the Temple with so many dead bodies. Wherefore M they who had escaped that massacre, had iust occasion to consider their calamitie, and after the law of armes, to turne their faces to them who wounded them, and beseech the Romans, that they would thinke the remnant of the Iewes worthe of compalsion, and not to abandon and expose the residue of their nation as a prey vnto the, by whom they should be most cruelly butchered: but that it might please them to adioyne their country to the borders of Syria, & to let them be ruled by the Romans; and so they should find that the Iewes, who now were accounted sediti- ous,

After this, Nicholaus stood vp against them, and first of all acquired the kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reprooed his coun- trey-men, for that they would not be easily gouerned, and by their owne nature would not, except they were forced, obey their king: and he also blamed the kinsmen of Archelaus, who ioyned with his accusers. Cesar hauing heard what both parts could say, dismissed the Assembly. And within few daies alter hee gaue Archelaus halfe of the kingdome vnder the title of an Ethnarch, promising him moreouer to make him king, if hee behaued himselfe well: the other halfe he diuided into two Tetrarchies and gaue them to the rest of Herods sons: one vnto Philip; the other vnto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the crowne. Antipas his part lay from Ga- B lilee beyond the riuer Iordan, the reuenues whereof was two hundred talents a yeere. And Philip had Batanæa and Trachon, and Auranitis, and part of Zeno his house neere Iannia, the reue- nues wherof amounted to one hundred talents a yeere. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchie Idumæa and all Iudæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of their tribute, because they rebelled not with the rest. And these Cities were giuen him, ouer which hee was Lord, Stratons tower, Sebalte, Ioppe and Ierusalem. The rest, Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippō Cesar took from the kingdome, and ioyned them to Syria. Archelaus yearly reuenues amounted to foure hundred talents a yeere. Cesar also (beside that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Iannia, Azotus & Phasaelis, and the Palace at Alcalon, all which amounted to threescore talents a yeere. But Cesar made her house subiect vnto Archelaus his Ethnarchie. And hauing distributed C vnto the rest of Herods kinned that which in his testament he left them, he gaue his two daughters that were virgins, ouer and aboue, siue hundred thousand drachmes of siluer, and married the vnto Pheroras ionnes: and hauing diuided Herods patrimonie amongst them, hee also distributed that which Herod bequeathed vnto him, amounting vnto a thousand talents, leauing himselfe onely some iewell of small value, which he reserved in honour and remembrance of the dead.

CHAP. V.

Of the false supposed Alexander, and how he was taken.

AT the same time a certaine young man, a Iewe borne, brought vp by a Libertine of Rome in the towne of Sidonia, being verie like vnto Alexander whome Herode put to death, went to Rome, hauing one of his countrymen for his companion, who knewe very well all the estate of the kingdome: by whome hee receiuing instructions, affirmed, that they who should haue put him and Aristobulus to death, being moued to compassion, let them goe, and tooke two others in their roome like them: With this tale he deceiued many Iewes liuing in Crete, where hee was honourably receiued, and from thence hee failed to Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pompe, and enriching himself he used such means, that he got his hostes (which gaue him entertainment) to sail with him to Rome: and after arriuing at Dicæarchia, he receiued al manner of rich gifts of the Iewes which dwelled there, and there by his fathers friendes was honoured as a King. For hee was so like vnto Alexander, that they that had seene Alexander, and knewe him well, would haue sworne hee had beene Alexander. Wherefore all the Iewes at Rome desired to see him, so that an infinite multitude followed him whithersoouer hee went in the streetes: and they so doted vpon him, that they carried him in a horflitter, and at their owne proper cost and charges prepared for him a royall traine.

But Cesar well remembred Alexanders visage (for Herode accused him before him) and although before hee saw him hee iudged that it was some that presumed because of his likeness vnto Alexander, to say that hee was the same, yet he made as though he beleueed all, and sent one Celadus, who knew Alexander well, to will this yong man to come vnto him. Who no sooner beheld him, but forthwith hee perceived the difference betwixt them, and especially when he felt his hard flesh and feruile shape, hee presently vnderstood the whole matter. But hee was greatly moued with his bold speeches: for when they demanded of him what was become of Aristobulus, hee answered, that he was aliue: yet he vpon purpose taried behinde and liued in Cyprus, fearing some treason: for they being asunder could not so easily be intrapped. Celadus taking him apart from the rest of the companie, told him that Cesar would saue his

He accepting of this offer, followed him to Cesar, and declared himselfe to be a Jew, who for lucre sake (being verie like him) counterfeited himselfe to be Alexander: affirming that hee had receiued such great gifts of the Cities by which hee passed, that he thought if Alexander had bene aliue, hee should not haue receiued the like. Cesar laugh't at this leſt, and made false Alexander (for the abilitye of his body) a galley slaue, and put him to death who induced him thereto. And as for the Jewes of Milo, he thought that they had punishment sufficient, if they lost all that which they had laid out, and bestowed vpon him.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembered the discord past, and in reuenge thereof he tyrannized not onely ouer the Jewes, but also ouer the Samaritans: and in the ninth yeere of his raigne the Jewes and Samaritans sent Embassadors against him vnto Cesar: and finally he was banished and sent to Vienna, a Citie of Gallia, and all his patrimonie was confiscated vnto Cesar. Before hee was summoned to appeare before Cesar, he reported that hee had a maruellous dreame: for he saw nine great eares full of corne deuoured by oxen; and presently sending for Prophets and Chaldeans, he demanded what that dreame betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and some another: but one Simon an Eſſean told him that the eares of corne betokened yeares, & the oxen signified the changes and mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned vp and altered it: and therefore he was to raigne so many yeares as there were eares of corne in number; and then, after he had abidden many mutations, he should die. Fiue dayes after this interpretation, Archelaus was sent for to Rome, to answer that before Augustus, whereof he was accused. I also thought it worth rehearsing to set downe the dreame of his wife Glaphyra daughter to Archelaus king of Cappadocia, who was first married vnto Alexander brother vnto this man, and sonne to king Herod, by whom he was put to death, as wee haue sayd before: after whose death shee was married to Iuba King of Lybia, and he being dead, she returned home to her father: and liuing in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was to inflamed with her loue, that presently being diuorced from his wife Mariamne, he married her. Who shortly after shee came into Iudaea, dreamed that she saw Alexander her first husband standing before her, and saying vnto her, It had bene enough for thee to haue married the king of Lybia: but thou not contented therewith, comest againe to my house, greedy of a third husband; and which is worst of all, now married to mine owne brother. I will not conceale nor dissemble this iniurie which thou doest mee, but I will recover you against your will. And she scarcely liued two dayes after she had recounted this dream.

Of Simon the Galilean, and the three sects amongst the Jewes.

Three sects among the Jewes, which the Eſſeans were the best. The Eſſeans doctrine of marriage. Among the Eſſeans goods are common.

After that Archelaus his dominions were made a prouince, a certaine Romane knight called Coponius was made gouernour thereof, receiuing authoritie from Cesar to punish and put to death. In his time a Galilean named Simon incited his countrymen to revolt, reprouing them for paying tribute to the Romans, and for being subiect to any mortall men, but God. This Simon was a Sophister, hauing a sect of his owne deuising, nothing like other sects. For there are three sects of Philosophers amongst the Jewes: one is that which the Pharisees do follow; another which the Sadducees do follow; the third is that which the Eſſeans follow, which is the most famous of the three. The Eſſeans are Jewes borne, but they are most friendly to one another, who beside all other pleasures do eschew witchcraft: neither do they suffer themselves to be led with their own affectiōs, but account it a great vertue to abstaine from all vices & to keep chastitie. For they refuse marriage, & account other mens children, put to them to be taught whilest they be young, as their kinsmen, whom they do diligently instruct in their manners and opinions; not for that they condemne marriage and propagation of mankind, but for that they thinke men should auoyd womens intemperance, for they think that none of them keep themselves truly to one man. Also they contemne riches, and all things with them are common, & no man amongst them

A them is richer then other. And they haue a law amongst themselves, that whosoever will followe their sect, hee must make his goods common to them all: for so neither any amongst them shall seeme abiekt for pouertie, nor any great for riches sake, but they haue as it were all equall patrimonies like brethren. They account it a shame to vie oile, and if any man against his will bee appointed therewith, they vie all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelines best; & all their clothes are white. They haue amongst them procurators, to ouersee and vie all things for their common benefit, and euerie one seeketh the good of all, who are chosen from among them by a common consent. They haue not one certaine citie, but are in many cities: and if any of their sect come vnto them from another place, they giue him any thing they haue, as if he himselfe were owner thereof. And in brieſe, they goe boldly into those, whom they neuer in their liues did see before, as though they were verie familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a iourney, they only arme themselves against theues, & cary nothing with themselves. In euery city there is one of them appointed, whose office it is to haue a care of the guests, and see that they neither want cloathes, nor any thing els necessarie for them. All children vnder gouernment, brought vp by them, go apparelled alike, & they neuer change their apparel, nor shooes, except they haue cleane worn their first apparell, or that by reason of long wearing they wil do no more seruice. They among themselves neither buy nor sell, but euerie man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giueth him it, and taketh that of him which him selfe needeth: yet euerie one of them may take any thing he hath neede of from whom he please, without any change. About all, towards God they are verie religious: for before the sunne rise they haue no profane talke, but they make certain vowes & prayers after the custome of their countrey, as it were, praying that it may rise vpon them. After this, euerie one is dismissed to practise the art hee knoweth, and when euerie one hath diligently laboured till siue of the clocke, they all gather themselves together againe, and being couered with linnen cloathes, so they wash their bodies with cold water: & hauing thus purged themselves, they haue a secret assembly, vnto the which no man that is not of their sect is admitted: and so they come into the refectorie as into a holy temple, all sitting down with silence, & the baker setteth euerie man in order a loafe, & the cook euerie man a messe of pottage of one sort. Then before meate the Priest giueth thanks, and no man may taste anie meate before they haue made their prayers vnto God. Likewise when dinner is ended, they pray againe: for both before and after they giue thanks vnto God the giuer of all, and then putting off that apparell as sacred, they apply themselves vnto their worke till euening. This done, they doe as before, causing their guests to suppe with them, if by fortune any come. Their house is neuer troubled with cries or tumults, for euerie one is appointed to speake in his turne: so that they who are without the house esteeme their silence as some sacred myſterie. The cause hereof is their continuall sobriety, and that euerie one is limited how much he should eate or drinke. And although that in all other matters they are ruled by their gouernour, yet in these two, to wit compassionating and helping, they may doe as they thinke good: for euerie one may when hee please helpe those whom he thinketh deserue helpe: and when they please, giue meate to them that are in need. Yet may not they giue any thing to their kinsred without the leave of their Gouernour. These men giue not place to anger, but refraine from wrath, keepe their promise, and maintaine peace, and account euerie word they speake of more force, then if they had bound it with an oath: and they shun oathes worse then perurie: for they esteeme him condemned for a lyer, who is not beleueed without he call God to witnesse. They studie diligently auncient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is most conuenient for the soule and the bodie. Out of them they learne remedies for diseases, and medicinable hearbes, and what is the proper effect of euerie stone. Those who are desirous to be of their order, doe not straightway conuerſe with them, but for a yeare before they liue out of their Colledge, and haue the same diet, giuing them also a litle hatchet, and such a girdle, as is before spoken of, and a white garment. But at the yeares end, if they perceiue him to be continent, then they take him into their refectorie, and he is made partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaste) yet is hee not admitted in common amongst them: for two yeares after this his trial, they obserue his life and manners: and at last, when he is thought worthy, then is he admitted to their common companie. And before he be receiued to the common table, first he protesteth with great and solemne oaths, that he will worship God, and obserue iustice & fidelitie towards all men, and neither willingly hurt anie man, nor iniure any one for another mans command, but that he will alwaies hate the wicked, & assist the good, and euer keepe his faith to all, but especially to his superiours. Adding moreouer, that they will neuer deliuer any doctrine, saue that which they haue receiued; and that they will auoid theft, and diligently keepe the bookes of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with these oaths they trie, and as it were arme those who enter into their order: Those of their congregation, who shall be condemned, they thrust out of their companie: and whosoeuer is so punished, for the most part dieth a miserable death; for hauing once taken this oath, it is not lawfull for him to take meat of any stranger; so that feeding on grasse like beasts, at last hee perissheth through famine. For which cause oftentimes they moued with compassion, receiue many into their order againe, euen ready by famine to yeeld vp the ghost, iudging them to haue endured penance inough for their offences, who with famine were almost brought vnto deaths doore. They are verie seuer, and iust in their iudgement; and to decide any matter, there is neuer fewer of them then a hundreth, and that which by them is agreed vpon, is an irreuocable sentence. Next after God they reuerence the lawmaker, inso much as if one reuile him, they forthwith condemne him to death. They greatly reuerence olde men, and a multitude: so that if ten of them sit together, no man of them must speake without hee be licensed thereto by nine of the companie. They also must not spit in the midst of the assembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more seuer then any other Iewes in observing the Sabbath: And they do not onely abstaine from dressing meate vpon that day, but also they may not remoue any vessel out of his place, nor go to the priuie. Vpon other daies they dig a pit a foot deepe into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before said) euerie one at his entrance into their order hath given him, and then couering themselves diligently with their garment, least they should doe iniurie to the light of heauen, in that pit they ease themselves; and the couer their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit: & this they do in most secret places.

And although this purging of their bodies be naturall, yet do they by washing purifie themselves after it, as after great vncleannes. Furthermore they amongst themselves are diuided into foure orders, according to the times which they haue taken to follow this exercise of life; & they who are iuniors, are so farre different from the seniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they presently purifie themselves, as though they had beene prophaned by a stranger. They are long liued, so that most of them liue a hundreth yeeres, which I iudge is by reason of their well ordered diet and their temperancie. They contemne aduersitie, and by counsell and discretion ouercome torments. They preferre an honourable death before life. And the wars which the Iewes made against the Romans, shewed what courage and hardines they haue in all things. For being then compelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, and fire torments, & all kind of tortures which were laid vpon them to reuile the lawmaker, and to eate any meate forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of these; neither wold they entreat the torturers, nor shew any sorrow amidst their torments. Nay in the verie midst of their griefes and paines they scoffed at their tormenters, and laughing ioyfully yeelded vp their soules, as though they hoped to recouer the same againe. For it is an opinion amongst them, that the bodie is corruptible, and that the matter thereof is not perpetual: but yet the soules remaine for euer immortal; who passing out of a most pure and subtle ayre, wrap themselves in bodies as in prisons, being as it were drawn thercunto by a naturall inclination. And when they are deliuered out of these carnall bonds, then presently as freed from a long bondage they ioyfully mount aloft. And of the good soules they say, as did the Grecians; that they liue beyond the Ocean seas in a place of pleasure, where they are neuer molested with raine, nor snow, nor heat, but haue alwaies a sweet and pleasant ayre comming out of the Ocean. But the wicked soules (as they say) go into a place very tempestuous, where there is alwaies as it were winter weather, alwaies full of lamentations of those, who for euer are to be punished. But I iudge that the Greekes are of this opinion, when they say there is an Isle for the veracious, whom they call Heroes and halfe-gods; and that the soules of the wicked goe to a place in hell, where as it is fained, some to be tormented, as Sisyphus, Tantalus, Ixion, & Tityus. Which they did first inuent for this purpose, because those who are of good disposition, are made better in this life by hope of some reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby restrained for feare of eternall torments, which if they continue in wickednesse they shall endure. This is the Effians Philosophie touching the immortalitie of the soule: wherein they propose an eneuicable

There are also some amongst them, who promise to foretell things to come, who from their tender age haue studied and followed holy bookes, diuers purifications and sayings of the Prophets: and their diuinat. O feldome faileth.

There is another college of these Effians agreeing with the former, both in apparrell, meate, and kind of life, and obserue the same lawes and ordinances; onely they differ in the opinion of marriage, affirming that they who abstaine from marriage, do cut off the greatest part of mans life, to wit, succession of mankind. For (say they) if all men should follow that opinion, presently all mankind would perissh: yet notwithstanding these people are so continent, that for three yeeres space they maketriall of the women they are to marrie, and when they haue proued the fit to beare children, then they marrie them. None of them must lie with their wiues when they are with child, to shew that they do not marrie to satisfie lust, but for to haue children. When their wiues with themselves they are covered with a garment as the men are, and this is the manner and custome of this sect. Of the two former sects, the Pharisees are said to be most skilful in interpreting the law, and are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate: and that euerie man may of his owne power doe good or ill, yet (say they) destinie helpeth in euerie action: and that the soules of men are all incorruptible, but onely the soules of good men goe into other bodies, and the soules of wicked men are sent into euerlasting paine. But the Sadducees denie Fate and Destinie, and affirme that God is the author of no euill, auowing likewise that a man hath free will to doe well or ill, and euerie man may chuse whether he will be good or bad: and they generally denie both paines and rewards for the soules after this life. The Pharisees are sociable & louing one to another: but the Sadducees are at discord amongst themselves, liuing like sauage beasts, and as vn courteous to their owne sect as to strangers. This is all which I haue to speake concerning the Philotophers amongst the Iewes. Now I will returne to my purpose.

Of the cities which Philip and Herod builded, and of Pilates government.

A Rehelaus his Ethnarchie being now made a prouince, the rest of his brethren, to wit Philip and Herod who was surnamed Antipas, gouerned their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying left vnto Iulia by her testament the Toparchie which shee ruled, as also Iamnia and the ground set with palme trees in Phasaelis. When Tiberius Cesar after the death of Augustus was made Emperour of Rome, after that he had reigned seuen and fiftie yeeres, sixe moneths, & two daies, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies; Philip builded a citie neere vnto the head of Iordan in the countrey of Paneade, and called it Casarea; and another hee build in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Iulias. Herod in Galilee build the Citie called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this side Iordan, which also he named Iulias. Pilate being sent by Tiberius to be gouernour ouer the Iewes, caused in the night time the statua of Cesar to bee brought into Ierusalem couered: which thing within three daies after caused a great tumult amongst the Iewes; for they who beheld it, were astonished, and moued, as though now the law of their countrey were profaned: for they hold it not lawfull for any picture or Image to be brought into the citie. At their lamentation who were in the citie, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adioyning, and they went presently to Pilate then at Casarea, beseeching him earnestly that the Images might be taken away out of Ierusalem, and that the law of their countrey might remaine inuiolated. When Pilate denied their suit, they prostrated themselves before his house, and there remained lying vpon their faces, for fise daies and nights neuer mouing. Afterward Pilate sitting in his tribunall seat was verie careful to cal al the Iewes together before him, as though there he would haue giuen them an answer: when vpon the Iodain a company of armed souldiers (for so it was prouided) compassed the Iewes about with a triple rank: the Iewes were herat amazed, seeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told the that except they would receive the Images of Cesar, he would kill them all; and to that end made a signe vnto the souldiers to draw their swords. The Iewes as though they had agreed thereto, fell all downe at once, and offered their naked neckes to the stroke of the sword, crying out that they would rather lose their liues, then suffer their religion to be prophaned. Then Pilate admiring the constancie of the people in their religion presently commanded the statuaes to be taken out of the Citie of Ierusalem.

After this hee caused another tumult amongst them, for they haue a sacred treasure called Pilate foreseeing that tumult, caused soldiers secretly armed to mingle themselves amongst the people in priuate apparrell, and commanded them not to vte their swords, but to beat those with clubs, whom they saw make such clamours. And when he had thus plotted the matter, sitting in his Tribunall, he gaue a signe vnto the souldiers; and presently the Iewes were beate, and many of them, partly with blowes, and partly troden vpon by the multitude, died miserably. The multitude amazed at the calamitie of those that were slaine, held their tongues. For this cause Agrippa sonne to Herod the Tetrarch, whose father Aristobulus Herode the king put to death, went to Rome, and accused him to Caesar. Tiberius not admitting his accusation, he remained still at Rome, and sought the fauour of other potentates there, and especially he reuerenced Caius the sonne of Germanicus, he being yet a priuate person: & vpon a certain day being with him at a banquet, he stretched forth his hands, & openly began to beseech Almighty God that Tiberius Caesar might quickly die, that he might see him Lord of all the world. CHAP. IX.

Of the pride of Caius, and of Petronius the President.

Caius Caesar so abused himselfe and his authoritie, that he would be thought to be a God, & so be called. Also he put many Noble men of his countrey to death. He likewise exalted his impietie euen vnto Iudaea: for he sent Petronius with an armie to Ierusalem, commanding him to set his statues in the Temple, & if the Iewes refused to receiue them, that those who withstood him he should put to the sword, and lead the rest away captiue. Almighty God did otherwise dispose this proud commandement. But Petronius accompanied with three legions, and many assistants out of Syria, came with all speed from Antiochia to Iudaea: many of the Iewes would not beleue any warre towards, notwithstanding that they heard a generall report thereof: and they that beleued it, could not bethinke themselves of any meanes to resist. So dauidly all were in a great feare: for the armie was now come to Ptolemais, which Citie is situate by the sea shore in Galilee in a large field, and on the East side it is compassed about with mountaines, distant from it threescore furlongs, which appertaine vnto Galilee; on the South side it is inclosed with the mount Carmel, which is an hundred and twentie furlongs off from it: on the North side it is inclosed with an exceeding high mountaine, which the inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountaine is an hundred paces distant from the Citie. Two miles from this Citie there is a tiuer running by, called Belesus, a very little one, neere vnto which is the sepulchre of Memnon, hauing adioynning vnto it a place of the compass of an hundred cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley covered with sand like glasse, which when many ships comming together take away for ballast, so that they emptie the place of it, that place is presently after covered with the like sand againe. For there are winds, which as it were vpon purpose carrie this sand from the higher places round about it thither, and whatsoever is within the mine of metall there, it is presently changed into crytall or glasse. And that which in my mind is more to be wondered at, is, that the sand being turned into glasse, if afterwarde any part thereof be cast vpon the brinke of this place, it is againe turned into ordinarie sand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Iewes with their wiues and children gathered themselves together in the field where the Citie Ptolemais is situate, and humbly besought Petronius, first not to violate their countie Atrie lawes; and next, to be good vnto them. Petronius seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued vnto him, and how earnestly they besought his fauour, left his armie, and Caesar's statues at Ptolemais, and himselfe went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Iewes & their Nobilitie together, recounting vnto them the force of the Roman armie, & Caesar's deuotion: adding moreover, that the Iewes supplication was indeede a contumelie, seeing all nations vnder the dominion of the Romans (the Iewes onely excepted) had already placed Caesar's statues in their Temples amongst the rest of their Gods: & herein they did as it were reuolt from the Empire, & iniure the President. They answered, that it was against their lawes & custom of their Countrey: for it was not lawful for them to haue the image of God, much lesse the image of a man; & that they were not only forbidden by the law, to haue an image in the Temple, but also to haue it in any other prophane place. Petronius sodainly answered: Well, I must do my Lords command: for if I do not, but spare you, I shall be iustly punished: and not I, but he that sent mee, will fight against you. For I my selfe as well as you must do as I am commanded. At these wordes the whole multitude cried out at once, that before they would see their religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselves to be destroyed. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius sayd, Are yet then prepared and minded to fight against Caesar? The Iewes answered, Wee euerie day offer sacrifices for Caesar and the Romans. But if Caesar would needes place his image in the Temple, hee must first offer their whole nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wiues and children offer themselves to any that would kill them. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, being moued to compassion when he beheld the constancie of the Iewes in their religion, and so great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled onely the Nobilitie of the Iewes, one by one, compelling them to accord to Caesars command, and spake publicly to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatening them, and putting them in minde of the power of the Romans, and Caesars indignation, and that hee must of necessitie doe as he was commanded. But they were moued by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would bee left vntilled (for it was now seedetime, and all the people had remained idle in the Citie for fittie dayes space) calling them together, he said, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger himselfe. For (said he) I will either (God working with me) appease Caesars wrath, or else I will lose mine owne life to saue such a multitude as you are. And dismissing the people, who made dayly prayers to God for him, he led the armie from Ptolemais vnto Antiochia, from whence he pre-early sent vnto Caesar in all hast, recounting vnto him with how great an armie he went into Iudaea, and that all the whole nation made supplication vnto him: whose request and humble suit if hee denied, hee must utterly destroy the men and their countrey; for they had constantly remained in their countrey religion, and vehemently resisted any new law. Caius writ an answer of these letters vnto Petronius, threatening that it should cost him his life, because hee made no more haile to execute his command. The messengers that brought these letters were tossed in a tempest vpon the sea three whole moneths together, and others comming after them to bring newes of Caius his death, had a prosperous winde: so Petronius receiued the letters of Caius Caesars death twentie and seven daies before the other threatening letters came.

CHAP. X.

Of the Empire of Claudius, and of the raigne and death of Agrippa.

Caius Caesar being slaine by treason when hee had reigned three yeares and fixe moneths, Claudius was made Emperour by the army which was at Rome. The Senate by the intigation of the Consul's Sentius Saturninus and Pomponius the second, commanded three legions of Souldiers to keepe the Citie, during the Councell holden in the Capitol: and for Caius Caesars crueltie they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to reduce the Empire to the ancient government; that as before time, so for euer after, those should rule that the Senate iudged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent vnto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councell. Claudius also desired him to take part with the armie, intending to vte his helpe where neede required. Agrippa perceiuing that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, hee tooke part with him, who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the Souldiers whether he would or no, set him in that dignitie: and it had bene in him an vndiscree part to haue forsaken such an offer at the souldiers hands, who did it for good will: G nay, if he had refused it, his life should be in continuall danger; for it was sufficient cause of enuie that hee had bene elected Emperour. Moreouer, hee purposed to rule, not as a tyrant, but as a most mild prince: for he would bee contented only with the title of an Emperour, and doe nothing without the common consent of them all. And although hee was not naturally inclined to modest and courteous behauiour, yet he had a sufficient example to beware that he abused not his authoritie, by Caius Cæsars death. Agrippa bare this message to the Senate, who answered (as though they trusted vnto their souldiers and learned counsell) that they would not thrust themselves into wilfull bondage. Claudius receiuing this answer, sent Agrippa againe to tell them, that nothing could cause him to betray them, by whome hee was made Emperour: and that he was forced to make warre against them, with whom hee was verie loth to strive, and therefore willed them to chuse a place out of the Citie for the battell to be fought in: H for it stood with no realso to deface the city with ciuill wars & massacres for the obstinacie of som few. Agrippa did also this message vnto the Senate: & one of the soldiers that were for the Senate drew his sword, and said, Fellow souldiers, what should moue vs to massacre our friends, & kindred and parents, who follow Claudius? especially seeing we haue an Emperour with whom we can find no fault, vnto whom we should rather go forth with intreaties then with armes. When he had said this, he passed through the midst of the court, and all the souldiers followed him.

The Senate being thus left desolate, & the Lords abandoned of their force, began to be in great fear: and seeing it was no standing out for them, they followed the souldiers, & went vnto Cla- udius. Before the Citie walled there met some that induoured to shew themselves duifull I vnto Claudius for his fortune sake, hauing their swordes drawne, and they almost killed five before Cæsar vnderstood the outrage of the souldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ranne and told him of the matter, saying, that if hee did not presently appeale the souldiers fury, now raging against the Citizens, that all his Nobilitie would presently be extinguished, and hee should be left an Emperour of a desolate place. When Claudius heard this, hee repressed the souldiers furie, and verie honourably received the Senate into his campe, and went forth presently with them, and offered sacrifice to God, as the manner is, for the good estate of the Empire. Also hee presently made Agrippa King of all his fathers dominions, giuing him likewise that which Augustus gaue Herod, to wit, Trachonite and Auranite, and beside them another kingdome, called the kingdome of Lysania, and published this his gift by an edict vnto the K people, and commaunded the Senate to engrave that donation in brasen tables, and to place it in the Capitoll. Moreouer hee rewarded his brother Herode, who was his kinsman, with the kingdome of Chalcis, and married him to the Queene Berenice. Agrippa receiued greater re-uenues of his kingdome then he could desire, which he spent not vainely, but in building such a wall about Ierusalem, as had he finished it, the Romans could neuer haue taken it: but before he could end that worke hee died in Cæsarea, hauing reigned three yeeres with the title of a king, and other three yeeres before in the state of a Terrarch. Hee left behinde him three daughters which he had by Cypris, Berenice, Mariamme, and Drusilla, and one sonne by the same wife named Agrippa: who, because he was verie young, Claudius reduced the kingdome into a prouince, and made Cestius Festus Gouvernour thereof. But after him Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the lawes of the nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herode king of Chalcis departed, leaving behinde him two sonnes, which he had by his brothers daughter Berenice, to wit, Berenicianus and Hircanus: and by his first wife Mariamme, Aristobulus. His other brother also Aristobulus died a private person, leaving one daughter Totapa. And these were the posteritie of Aristobulus king Herods sonne, and Herode had Alexander and Aristobulus by Mariamme, whom he put to death: but Alexanders posteritie reigned in the greater Armenia.

Iewes faces, speaking words as vnseemely as was his gesture. Whereat the whole multitude be-this misdeameour: and some of them rash young men, and as it were prone to sedition, began to reuile the souldiers, and threw stones at them. Then Cumanus learning that the whole multitude of the Iewes would violently rush vpon him, called vnto him many armed souldiers, and sent them into the porch of the temple. The Iewes being in a great feare fled and left the temple, and there was such a throng that as they rushed out to flee, aboue tennethousand people were preit and troden to death: so that this festiual day was turned into wofull lamentations & mourning in euerie place. This calamitie was encreased afterward by a company of theecues: B for neere Bethoron one Stephanus seruant vnto Cæsar, carried some household stuffe, which the theecues tooke from him in the high way. But Cumanus sending for those in the villages next adioyning, to make inquirie of these theecues, commaunded them to bee bound and brought vnto him, because they had not taken the theecues: in one of which villages a certaine souldier finding the booke of the holly scripture, cut it in peeces and burnt it. Hereupon the Iewes gathered themselves together from all places, as though their religion were now violated: and drawn by the force of their superstition as with an engine, all of them at one call went to Cæsarea to Cumanus, there beseeching him that the souldier who had so blasphemed God, and their law, might not escape unpunished. But Cumanus perceived the Iewes would not be appealed without some satisfaction, wherefore he condemned the souldier to death, and sent him to execution before their faces; which done they all departed.

At last there arose a tumult betwixt the Galileans and Samaritans; for at a village called Gennai, situate in the great field of Samaria, a certaine Galilean of the number of the Iewes that came to the feast, was slaine: for which fact many Galileans ranne to fight with the Samaritans; and the nobilitie of the countrey went vnto Cumanus, requesting him before any more harme were done to go into Galilee and punish the authours of this euill. But Cumanus being busied in greater affaires, sent them away without granting their request. When this murder was known in Ierusalem, all the multitude left the solemnitie of the day, and went into Samaria without any guide, refusing to be restrained by the nobilitie. Of this their tumult and sedition D the sonne of Dinaus called Eleazar, and one Alexander were captaines; who with violence entering the borders of the countrey of Acrabarena, killed man, woman and childe, sparing no age, and burning the townes. When Cumanus heard this, hee tooke a cornet of horsemen called the Sebastians, to come and helpe them that were thus oppressed, and so tooke and killed many of them who tooke part with Eleazar. Now the nobles of Ierusalem came out to the rest of that multitude, which so wasted Samaria, clothed in sackcloth & ashes vpon their heads, beseech-ing them not to seek reuenge vpon the Samaritanes, as thereby to moue the Romanes to destroy Ierusalem, and to bee mercifull to their countrey, the temple, their wiues, and children, and not at once hazard all, and ouerthrowe their whole countrey and nation in reuenging the death of one Galilean. The Iewes hereby were pacified, and departed. At the same time many conspired together to robbe and steale (as most commonly people by long peace grow insolent) so that they robbed in euerie part of the countrey, & they that were most strong & able, offered violence to those that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beseeching Numi- dus Quadratus being gouernour of Syria, to reuenge them of those that so robbed and spoiled their countrey. There was also the nobilitie of the Iewes, & Ionathas the sonne of Ananus who was high Priest, who defended the Iewes against the Samaritanes accusations, affirming the Sa-maritanes to haue bene cause of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cause of the rest of their calamities, who refused to punish the murderers. Quadratus for that time sent away both parties, promising the that when he came into their countries, hee would dili-E gently enquire of the matter; & coming fro thence to Cæsarea, he crucified all those whom Cu- manus tooke alieue. And departing from thence to Lydda, hee heard the Samaritanes complaints, and sent for eightene men whom hee vnderstood for certaine to haue been in that broile, & beheaded them: & sent the two high priests Ionathas & Ananias, & his son Ananus, with som other of the nobility of the Iewes to Cæsar, and also the chiefe of the Samaritanes. He likewise commanded Cumanus and Celer the tribune to go to Rome, and yeelde account vnto Claudius for that which they had done in that countrey.

This done, he went from Lydda to Ierusalem: and finding there the multitude celebrating the feast of vnleavened bread, without any tumults or disorders, he returned to Antiochia. Caesar at Rome hearing the allegations of Cumanus, and the Samaritanes (Agrippa was also there earnestly defending the cause of the Iewes, as also Cumanus was assisted by many potērates) he pronounced sentence against the Samaritans, & commanded three of their chiefe nobilitie to be put to death, and banished Cumanus, and sent Celer the tribune bound vnto Ierusalem, that the Iewes might draw him about the Citie, and then cut off his head. This done, he sent Felix brother to Pallas to rule Iudæa, Samaria, and Galilæa. And hee preferred Agrippa from Chalcis vnto a greater kingdom, making him king of that prouince, whereof Philip had bene ruler, to wit Trachon, Batanæa and Gaulanitis, adding thereunto Lysanias kingdom, & the Tetrarchy whereof Varrus was gouernour: And hauing reigned thirteene yeeres, eight moneths, and thirtie daies, Claudius departed this life, leauing Nero to succeed him, whom by the perswasions of his wife Agrippina he adopted to the Empire, hauing a lawfull begotten sonne of his owne, named Britannicus by his former wife Messalina, and a daughter called Octauia, whom he married vnto Nero; he had also another daughter by Agrippina named Antonia. How Nero abused his wealth and felicitie, and how he slew his brother, mother and his wife, & afterward raged against all his kindred, and how in a mad vaine he became a player vpon a stage, because it requireth a long narration, I will speak nothing thereof.

Of the tumult in Iudæa vnder Felix.

Felix surpriseth Eleazar the captain of the theeues & many others, and sendeth them bound to Rome.
Another sort of theeues who at noone dayes went about the city to murder men.
Jonathan the high priest with many other flaine.
Ant. lib. 20. cap. 12.

Wherefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Iewes. Hee made Aristobolus sonne king of the lesser Armenia, and ioyned vnto Agrippas kingdom foure cities, and the ground belonging vnto them: two of them Abila and Iulias were in the country of Peræa, the other Tarichæa and Tiberias were in Galilee: and he made Felix gouernour ouer the rest of Iudæa. This Felix tooke Eleazar captaine of the theeues, after he had robbed and spoyled the country twentie yeeres, and many more with him, and sent them bound vnto Caesar, and he crucified a great number of them, who either were theeues and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The country was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of theeues arose in Ierusalem called Sicarii, with short swords, who at high noone in the midst of the citie killed many in euery place: and especially at the celebrating of holy feasts they mixt themselves with the multitude, hauing short swordes vnder their coates, and therewithall killed those to whom they bare any grudge; and when men fell downe dead, they amongst the rest complained of this wickednes. By this deceitfull meanes they were a long time vnspiesed & vnknewen. And first of all they killed Jonathan the high priest, & after him euery day some were flaine: and the citie was put in a feare worse then death it selfe; for each man euery moment expected death, as though it had bene amidst open warres: likewise euery one cast a diligent eye vpon those that came neere him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murdered, whilst they were looking about them to escape daunger. So cunningly did these theeues couer and conceale their actions. Moreover there arose another sort of mischieuous people, who did not so much harme with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsell more, and did no lesse trouble the quiet estate of the citie then did the theeues. These people being vagabonds and iugglers, desiring alteration vnder pretence of religion, made the people as it were madde: for they went into the wilderness, affirming that there God would shew them tokens of their libertie. Felix perceiving that their action tended to rebellion, sent an armie of horse and footmen against these people, and killed a great manie of them.

An Egyptian Prophet gathered together welny 30000. men.

Felix ouerthroweth the Egyptian. For the theeues and magicians were much mislike to many men.

But a certain Egyptian a false Prophet, caused a farre greater massacre among the Iewes then that was: for being a Magician, he came into the country, and calling himself a Prophet, he gathered vnto him almost thirtie thousand Iewes, who were by his magicke artes seduced; and leading them from the wilderness to mount Oliuet, he determined from thence to goe to Ierusalem, and to driue backe the forces of the Romans, & to vse his authoritie ouer the people. Hee had for his guard those that came to follow him. Felix foreseeing his intent, met him with his legions of armed Romans: whom the other Iewes assisting, and fighting against him, the Egyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude disperfed themselves euery one in his country. These being thus repressed, the other part (as it hapneth in a sicke body) began to rise: for some of the Magicians, and the theeues being gathered together, they brought many vnto miserie, and as it were exhorted them to libertie, threatening present death to those that obeyed the Romans; so that they forced them who were contented

A contented with their subiection to the Romans, to disobey them. These people being disperfed al ouer the country, robbed and sacked Noblemens and rich mens houses: moreover killed the, and fired the villages, so that all Iudæa was in extreame feare of them, and euery day their cruelty increased.

At this time arose another tumult at Cæsarea, by a sedition raised betweene the Iewes that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Iewes challenged the Citie to be theirs, because it was founded by Herod, who was a Iew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the city was a Iew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (said they) it had not bene lawfull for the founder to haue placed in it shrines and statuaes, if hee had meant that it should haue belonged to the Iewes. So that hereupon there arose a great controuersie amongst the Iewes and Syrians, in so much as the one fought against the other, and euery day those that were the hardiest of both parts fought together. For the elder sort of the Iewes could not restraime those of their nation from being seditious: and the Greeks scorned to giue place vnto the Iewes. The Iewes ouercame them in riches and strength of bodie, and the Græcians ouercame the Iewes by help of souldiers: for a great company of the Roman armie came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to assist the Syrians, because they were as it were of their kindred & consanguinitie. The capitaines of the souldiers endeouored to appeale the tumult, and tooke those that were most seditious on both parts, and beat them, and cast them in prison. But the punishment of those that were apprehended did not terrifie the rest: nay, they were hereby made more seditious. When Felix saw this, by a streight edict he banished those who were most seditious out of the Citie: & those that obeyed not, he sent souldiers & slew them, suffering their goods to be taken by the souldiers. The sedition being still on foot, hee sent the Nobilitie on either part to Nero to plead their right and title. Festus succeeded Felix, who diligently persecuted them that troubled the country, and destroyed many theeues.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Albinus and Florus, Presidents of Iudæa.

But Albinus, who succeeded Festus, followed not his steps: for there was no iniquitie so great wherein he was not plunged. Furthermore, hee did not onely take away by force mens goods from them vnder colour of iustice, and at his owne pleasure exact a greater tribute, but also freed and let loose any one whom either the souldiers of the Citie tooke, or his predecessors had left in prison; so that their friends would giue a peece of money: and they only who were not able to giue money, were imprisoned as most heinous offenders. At this time they in Ierusalem that desired alteration, began to take courage, & those which were rich among them see'd Albinus with money, to permit them to be seditious, & the common people that could not bee in quiet, ioyned themselves with Albinus fauourites: and euery one of them had a troupe of theeues after him. But Albinus himselfe was ouer them all as a tyrant, and prince of theeues; and he vied the helpe of his guard to robbe the meaner sort: so they whose houses were sacked and spoyled, were glad to hold their peace; and they who yet had escaped, were glad to be verie officious towards those who deferred death, for feare they should suffer the like. In general, no man could trust one another: there were then many tyrants, and from that time the seedes of captiuitie, which after befell, began to take roote.

The seditious bribe Albinus to winke at their robberies

Notwithstanding that Albinus was of such behauiour, yet Gessius Florus who succeeded him, so behaued himselfe, that in comparifon of him, Albinus might haue bene thought a good Gouernour. For Albinus did all things secretly and craftily, but Gessius committed any iniquity how great soeuer, so openly as though he gloried in his impietie; and behaued himselfe, not as a ruler of the country, but as a hangman sent to execute malefactors; omitting no manner of theft, nor any meanes whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to haue shewed pitie, there was he a tyrant; and where he ought to haue bene ashamed, there hee shewed himselfe shamelesse. No man euer could inuent more meanes to obscure truth, & deuise more waies to do harme then he: for it sufficed him not, for his owne gaine to abuse men one by one at his pleasure, but he wasted and spoyled whole cities at once, & destroyed the people in great multitude. Nay, he was not ashamed by the publicke voice of a crier, to proclaim it through the whole countie lawfull for any one that would, to rob and steale; so that they would bring him a part of their bootie. In brieft, his cruelty was such, that the countie was almost left desolate, people forsaking their own native home, & flying into strange lands. And during the time that Gessius Gallus was gouernour of Syria, no man durst go to him to make any complaint against Florus. But when at the feast of vnleavened bread Gallus came to Ierusalem, there met him a multitude of the Iewes about three hundred thousand, all beseeching him to help & succour their afflicted country, & banish Florus, who was the very plague of their nation. Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, & hearing these cries against him, he was no whit moved thereat, but laughed at it. Cestius for that time appealed the people, promising that hereafter hee would make Florus more gentle vnto them, & so returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Caesarea to stop his mouth with lies, deuising with himself how to make the Iewes rebel, & that hee thought was the safest means for to cloak his villanies: for if they continued in peace, and obedience, hee feared that some of them would accuse him before Cesar: marie if he could make them reuolt, he hoped that their great fault would shadow his impieties. Wherefore to bring about his purpose, he euery day oppressed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebell against the Romans. At this time the Gentiles of Caesarea got the victorie over the Iewes, & brought letters to testify that decree before Nero. This was the beginning of the wars of the Iewes, in the twelfth year of Nero his empire, and the seuenteenth of Agrippas raigne, in the moneth of May.

Florus had no iust cause for any of these calamities which he inflicted vpon the Iewes. The Iewes dwelling at Caesarea had a synagoge neere a peece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Caesarea. The Iewes often sought to compound with him for that peece of ground, offering him far more then it was worth: but the Landlord of the soile did not only contemne their request, but also to their great griefe in that place builded tauerne; so that he left them a verie streight and narrow passage to go to their synagoge. Some young men among the Iewes, being verie zealous, resisted the workmen, and would not suffer them to build. Florus hearing this, commanded the Iewes to let the workmen goe forward in their worke. The Iewes not knowing what to do, especially one Iohn a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promised for that money to fulfill their request: and now hauing it, he presently departed from Caesarea, and went to Sebaste without performing any thing, giuing as it were occasion of sedition, & as though he had receiued mony of the Nobilitie of the Iewes to permit them to fight a certaine time. The next day which was the Iewes Sabbath, when they were all assembled to go to the synagoge, one of Caesarea, a seditious person, tooke a great earthen vessell and set it euert at the entrie into the Synagoge, and vpon it did offer birds. This fact so moued the Iewes that they would not be pacified, because it was done in contempt of their religion, & thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Iewes that was most modest & wisest, counselled the people to complain to them that were in authoritie: but those who for heat of their youth were prone to seditio, begā cōtumeliously to reuile the aduersaries. For the most seditious of the people of Caesarea were also prepared to fight with them, and had caused that to be done before the synagoge, only to picke a quarrel, and so they fought together. Lucundus, General of the horsemen, that was left to keepe all in quiet, presently came with souldiers, and commanded that vessell to be taken away, and so indeuoured to appease the tumult: but not being able to doe it through the violence of them of Caesarea; the Iewes tooke the books of their lawes, and retired themselves to a place called Nabata, belonging to them, which was distant from Caesarea threescore furlongs. Twelve of the chiefe of them, together with Iohn the Publican, went vnto Florus, being at Sebaste, to complaine of the iniurie done vnto them, requesting him to assist them, and modestly put them in minde of the eight talents they gaue him. But he presently commanded them to be bound and imprisoned, because they had presumed to take and carrie their law from Caesarea. Hereat those of Ierusalem were greatly moued, yet they shewed it not. Florus as vpon set purpose giuing occasion of rebellion, sent for seuentene talents out of the sacred treasure, pretending that it was to bee employed in Cesars affaires. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying vpon the name of Cesar, praying that he would deliuer them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being seditious, began to curse Florus bitterly, and tooke a basket and caried it about, and begged an almes for Florus, which they did in derision, as who should say, he were as miserable as beggers that haue nothing. Florus for all this left not his cruelty, but was more earnest to rob the inhabitants of their goods. So that when he should haue gone

The outrage of Florus souldiers.

Florus souldiers kill 630 Iewes in one day.

A gone to Caesarea to haue quieted the sedition, and removed the cause of tumults, as also hee had receiued money for to doe taking an armie of horse and foot, he came to Ierusalem, that with the helpe of the Roman souldiers he might effect his pleasure, and terrifie the whole citie.

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in courteous sort to meete the army, shewing themselves readie to giue them the best entertainment they could, & to receiue Florus with all honour and reuerence. Florus vnderstanding of them, sent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fifty horsemen, commanding them to depart, & not to mock him with a pretence of honour, whom they had so hainously abused. And that if they were as good as their words, they should flout and reproach him to his face; and not onely in words, but in deedes shew, that they desired libertie. Herewithall the multitude being terrified; and also for that the horsemen that came with Capito assaulted them with violence; euery one fled before they saluted Florus, or did their accustomed dutie vnto the army: and going euery one vnto his house, they past the watchfull night in feare and sorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the kings palace. The next day hee caused a tribunall openly to be placed, and the high priest and all the chiefe of the Iewes resorted thither and stood before the tribunall. Then Florus sitting in the tribunall seat, commanded them to bring forth presently all those, that had vied any opprobrious words against him, threatening to be reuenged vpon them except they did it. The Iewes made answer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietnes, requesting that they that had offended in words might obtaine pardon. For it was no maruell in so great a multitude, if there were some rash and foolish yong men: and that it was vnpossible to discern all that offended, seeing euery one was now penitent for that which was done, and at least for feare would deny it. And that if hee were careful to conferre & maintaine the quietnes of the nation, and preserve the citie still to obey the Romans, hee then must rather pardon a few seditious for so many good mens sake; then, to reuenge himself of a few wicked persons, to hurt & molest so many that thought no harm. Hereat Florus wrath was encreased, & presently he commanded the souldiers to sacke the market place (which was in the higher part of the Citie) where things were sold, and put all they met or found vnto the sword. The souldiers, who were desirous of gaine, hauing now authoritie from their ruler, did not only sicke the place they were sent vnto, but also all houses, and murdered the inhabitants. All streets and gates were filled with them that sought to fly, and the dead bodies of them that did light into the souldiers hands: no sort of spoiling was omitted. They also apprehended many of the nobility, & brought them to Florus: and he causing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them vp. And there were slaine that day, of men, women and children (for they spared not infants) six hundred & thirty. Which did not afflict the Iewes so much, as to see the sodaine cruelty & tyranny of the Romans; Florus then doing that none before durst euer presume to doe: for hee caused knights before the tribunall seate to bee whipped, and after hanged them vp, who though they were Iewes borne, yet receiued they that dignitie from the Romans.

CHAP. XV.

Of another oppression of the Citizens of Ierusalem, by Florus his meanes.

E T the same time king Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertaine Alexander, whom Nero sent to be ruler ouer Egypt; his sister Berenice in the meane while remained in Ierusalem, who seeing the cruelty of the souldiers, was much grieved: and often sent the lieutenants of her horsemen & her own guard vnto Florus, requesting him to abstaine from the slaughter of the citizens. But hee neither regarding the multitude of them that were slaine, nor the dignity of her that entreated, but onely his priuate gaine, & what he could gather by oppression & rapine, denied her request: so that the rage of the souldiers extended it selfe also against the Queene. For they did not only before her face beate and kill all that came in their way, but they had also killed her, had she not fled into the palace, where she watcht all night, keeping a trusty guard about her, fearing that the souldiers would breake in vpon her. She came to Ierusalem to fulfill her vow to God: for it is the custome, that if any be afflicted with grievous sickness, or be in any other distresse, they must abide in prayer thirty daies before they offer sacrifice, and abstaine from wine, & shauce their haire: which custome Queen Berenice then obseruing, stood also barefoote before Florus his tribunall seat, to entreat him: whom he not only contemned, but also put her in danger of her life. This was done the sixteenth day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together in the vpper part of the Citie in the market place, and with great cries murmured that so many were slain, & especially vsed contumelious words against Florus: which the nobilitie & high priests (feearing their deaths) apprehended, beseeching them to abstaine from such words as had already caused that calamitie in the city, & not to prouoke Florus vnto greater indignation. And so the multitude was pacified for their sakes who entreated, & hoped that hereafter Florus would desist from such cruelty. Florus, when he saw the multitude quiered, was sorry: and that he might againe prouoke them, he assembled together the nobilitie and high Priests, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not seeke alteration any more, if they would goe in courteous wise and meet the souldiers which were coming from Cæsarea, where of were two legions. Hauing thus assembled the Iewes together to goe meet the souldiers, he sent and commaunded the Centurions not to salute the Iewes, who came to meete them: and if therefore the Iewes were offended, and gaue any hard speeches, they should fall vpon them with their weapons. The high Priests assembling the Iewes together in the temple, besought them to goe, and solemnly to meet and entertaine the souldiers, for feare of a greater inconuenience. Notwithstanding their counsell, those that were seditious refused to doe as they were requested: and others for griefe of them that were slaine, tooke part with the seditious.

Then all the Priests & Leuites brought forth the holy vessels & ornaments of the temple, and with Harps, songs & muscical instruments came before the multitude, beseeching them to endeuour, that the honour and pompe of the temple might still remaine, and not to incite the Romans through contumelious words to lacke the temple. There might you see the chiefe of the high Priests with albes vpon their heads, and clothes rent, so that their naked breasts were perceiued, and calling euery noble man by his name, & speaking vnto all the multitude, requested not for a small offence, to betray their whole country to them, who stil gaped after the destruction thereof. For what commoditie should the Romans reape by the Iewes salutation, and what amendment of their miseries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Contrariwise, if they would go to them in solemne sort, then they tooke from Florus al occasion of persecution, & saved their country from ruine, and themselves from further calamities. Adding that it was a great shame that such a multitude should be led away with a few seditious persons, & that it was more fit that so many should force those few seditious people to obey them, and ioine with them in opinion.

With these perswasions they did mollifie the malice of the Iewes, & also perswade many of the seditious people, some with threats, and some with reuerence of themselves to be pacified. And so they going before, al the people followed, & went out to meet the Roman soldiers. And coming neere them they saluted them: who answering nothing againe, those of the Iews that were seditious began to rayle against Florus, by whose consent this was done: & presently the soldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs; and the rest flying, the Roman horsemen pursued them, and trode vpon them with their horses. Many were slaine by the Romanes, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling vpon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the citie: for euery one hastning and struiuing to get in, hindered themselves and others. Many died most miserably in that throng, and some were stifled, and some preft to death being troden vpon; so that their neighbours coming to bury them, could not know them. The souldiers also cruelly assaulted them, killing all that they could come vnto, and forced the people to goe in by the entrance called Bezetha, who desired to recouer the temple and the castle called Antonia.

Florus taking the soldiers with him, pursued them thither, struiuing to get the castle; yet did he not preuaile: for the people made resistance, and threw down stones from the house top; & killed many of the Romanes: who being overcome with darts cast from aloft, and could not resist the people, who on euery side came against them, retired themselves vnto the rest of the army at the kings palace. Those that were seditious, fearing that Florus would againe assault them, and by the castle Antonia make an entrance into the Temple, they got vpon the galleries that reached from the porch of the temple vnto Antonia, and beat them downe, hereby to repress the couetousnes of Florus. VVho greedily gaped after the sacred treasure, and struiued to enter by Antonia into the temple to take them: but seeing the porches beaten downe, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high priests and nobilitie, he said that hee was content to depart out of the city, but he would leaue them as great a garrison as they would request. Whereunto they answered, that nothing should be altered if he would leaue one company to keep all quiet: so he left not that, which a while before did fight against the people, because that the people would not easily brooke them, for that which they had suffered at their hands. So Florus as hee requested, changing the garrison with the rest of the armie departed to Cæsarea.

of Politianus the tribune, and how Agrippa made a speech vnto the Iewes, exhorting them to obey the Romanes.

Florus yet deuised another way to stir the Iewes to rebellion: for hee reported vnto Cestius that the Iewes were reuolted, impudently belving them to haue committed that which indeed they indured at his hands. The nobles of Ierusalem & Berenice certified Cestius of all that Florus had done: he receiuing letters from both parties deliberated with his nobles what to doe. Some counailed Cestius to go into Iudea with an army, and punish the Iewes if they were reuolted; and if they were not, then to confirme them in their obedience. Yet it pleased him better to send some about him thither before, to bring him true newes of their estate, & what had hapned. So he sent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Iamnia as he returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was sent. Where also were present the Priests and chiefe of the Iewes, to welcome Agrippa. And hauing saluted him as courteously as they could, they presently bewailed the misery which had befallen their nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa disallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Iewes whom hee greatly pitied, purposing hereby to bridle their affections; that they, perswaded that they had had no iniury, might abstaine from reuenge. So that all the better sort, who for their lands and linings desired quietnes, well perceived that the kings reprehension was not of malice but for their good.

The people of Ierusalem went out to meet them three score furlongs off, and receiued Agrippa and Politianus very courteously, yet the women lamented the death of their husbands slain, and with their teares moued the whole multitude to sorrow, who besought Agrippa to haue compassion on their nation; entreating also Politianus to go into the city, & behold what Florus had done: And so they shewed him the market place desart, and the houses destroyed, and by the meanes of Agrippa perswaded Politianus to goe round about the citie as far as Siloa, onely with one man, and behold with his eies what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romanes in all things, and onely were enemies vnto Florus who had vsed them so cruelly. Politianus alledging the people, and inciting them to peace, and after returneth to Cestius.

The Iewes require the king that shew might be some embassadours sent to Rome to complaine of Florus to Nero. Politianus alledging the people, and inciting them to peace, and after returneth to Cestius.

Agrippa striueth to make the common sort flexible and attentive.

Depulsion of the Iewes which they so vehemently seeke for.

The example of the Athenians, Scythians who obey the Roman Empire. The Macedonians.

The comparison of the Romans force with the Iewes weakness. The Romans have brought the whole world under their government, & have fought another world beyond the Ocean.

fore I begin to declare vnto you who you are, and against whom ye purpose to beare armes, I will first diuide and separate such causes as you thinke inseparable. For if you seeke onely to reuenge your felues vpon those that haue iniured you, why do you then extend liberty? or if you thinke it not tolerable to obey any other, why then these complaints against your rulers are superfluous. For although they were neuer so milde, still would subiection be intolerable. Call all things to minde, and consider what a small cause of warre is giuen you. And first of all weigh with your felues the crimes and offences of your rulers: for you ought to shew your felues humble and dutifull to them that are in authoritie, and not exasperate and prouoke them to wrath by reprochfull speeches. For in reuiling them for small offences, you do incite them against you whom you forseele; and that whereas before they did onely doe you a little injury, and that secretly, now being moued through bad speeches, they openly set vpon you and destroy you. And there is nothing that so resisteth cruelty as patience; so that oft times the patience of them who haue suffered iniury, makes them that did the iniury ashamed thereof. Be it so, that they, which are sent into the prouinces and appointed by the Romans for your gouernours, are welcome to you, yet all the Romans doe not oppresse you, nor Caesar against whom you would take armes. For they command no cruell gouernours to come to you, nor can they who are in the furthest part of the West, easily know what is done in the East, nor heare thereof. And truly it is a thing against reason to take armes for so small cause, especially when they against whom you take armes, know nothing of the matter. It is an easie way quickly to haue redresse for these matters, you now complaine of. For there will not be alwaies the same gouernour; and it is credible, that they who succeed this, will be more gentle and courteous. But if you once begin to make warre, it is not easie to end it, or to staine it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after libertie, diligently aduise themselves, that they doe not bring vpon their backs a greater bondage. For flauerie is a cruell thing, and it seemeth a lawfull cause to make warre, least you bee brought into it; yet he that is already in bondage and reuolterth, is rather a peruerse slaue, then one who desireth libertie. You should therefore haue endeauoured to haue resisted the Romans; when first Pompeius entred into this land: but then our ancestors & their kings far exceeding you in riches, strength of body, and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the Roman forces; and doe you thinke who are their successors, and farre weaker then they, hauing succeeded them in subiection, that you are able to resist all the whole power of the Romans?

The Athenians, who sometime to conferre the libertie of Greece, set their owne citie on fire, and pursued that proud Alexander whom they forced to flie with one ship (which Alexander made the earth inuagable, and the sea firme land, who had such an army that the seas had not roome for one ship to flie by another, nor all Europe able to receiue his army) who also had such a victory ouer Asia, neare the little Ile of Salamina, yet now are subiect vnto the Romans, and that Kingly Citie is now ruled at the Romanes becke. The Lacedemonians also hauing gotten such a victory vpon the Thermopyles, and vnder their generall Agessilaus sacked Asia, acknowledge now the Romanes for their Lords. The Macedonians also who still imagine they see Philip and Alexander promising them the Empire of the whole world; now patiently beare this change, and obey them whom fortune hath made their masters. Many other nations, who for their power and strength haue farre more cause then you to seeke their libertie, yet patiently endure to serue the Romans. But you only thinke it a disgrace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole world. And where are the armies and armes that you trust in, or your naue to scoure the Roman seas? Where are your treasures to effect that you intend? thinke you that you are to warre against the Egyptians or Arabians? And doe you not consider the bounds of the Roman Empire? Doe you not consider your own inhabitation? Know ye not that your neighbor nations haue often by force taken your citie, and that the forces of the Romanes haue passed through the whole world vnto conquest; and as yet searching for something greater then the world? Whose dominion towards the East is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Ister, and towards the South beyond the wilderness of Lybia, and towards the West beyond Gades, hauing found an other world beyond the Ocean, and with an armie entred Britaine which is England, and Scotland, where neuer any came before. Are you richer then the Frenchmen, stronger then the Germanes, wiser then the Greekes, and are you more in number then the whole world beside? What hope can you haue that may incite you against the Romanes? But some of you will say, that bondage is a grieuous thing. But how much more then you, should the Greekes thinke so, that were thought to be the noblest nation vnder heauen, and had such large dominions, and now obey the Roman gouernours, as also the Macedonians doe, who haue greater cause then you

A you to seeke their liberty? What shall I say of the fiftie cities of Asia? do they not al obey one ruler, & the authoritic of the Consul, without any garrison? What shall I speake of the Eniochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabitants of Hellespontus, & Pontus, & about Maotis, who in the time past had no ruler of their owne nation, whom now three thousand souldiours keepe in awe, and fortie long Gallies keepe now peaceably those seas, neuer failed on before? What thinke you the Bythinians, Cappadocians, and those of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could say for their libertie, who notwithstanding now peaceably pay tribute vnto the Romans? What of the Thracians? whose countrie is fide daies iourney in breadth, and seuen in length, farre more hard and stronger then your countrie, where frost would hinder them that should assault them, yet doe they obey two thousand Romans, who are in garrison. After them, the Illyrians whose countrie reacheth vnto Dalmatia, and Ister, are kept in obedience onely by two legions, with helpe of whom they also resist the Dacians. The Dalmatians themselves, who hauing so often attempted their owne libertie being oftentimes conquered, & fil as their wealth increased rebelling, are now in peace vnder one legion of the Romanes. Nay, if any one haue cause to rebel, it is the Frenchmen, whose countrie is by nature of the place stragg, being on the East side compassed with the Alpes, on the North with the riuer of Rhene, on the South with the Pyrenean mountaines, on the West with the Ocean. Who notwithstanding, hauing amongst them three hundredth and fide nations, who haue amongst them as it were the verie fountaine of felicity and with their goods and commodities enrich the whole world: yet doe they pay tribute vnto the Romans, and account their happiness to bee builded vpon the felicitie of the Romanes, and that neither for want of courage nor Nobilitie of blood, who fourescore yeeres long fought for their libertie; admiring the Romanes & fearing them, who still gained more by fortune, then they did by warres: and now obey a thousand and two hundredth souldiours, hauing almost against euery souldiour a Citie.

Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrie, keepe themselves from being subiect to the Romans. Nor the Portugales and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the distance of sea and land betwene them and Rome. The Ocean, whose waues beating against the shoare, terrifie the inhabitants adioining, could not stay them but they past it: and carried an armie beyond the pillars of Hercules, and passed the tops of the Pyrenean mountaines, which reach vnto the cloudes, and so made all those people subiect vnto them: and for all that they were so warlike a nation, and so farre from Rome, they left onely one legion for garrison. Which of you haue not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whose vertue and mightie bodies I thinke you haue often scene. For in euery countrie the Romanes haue them for captiues, yet they whose countrie is so large, hauing hearts farre bigger then their bodies, and soules that contemne death, who are more cruell then brute beasts; yet are they now limited by the riuer Rhene, and kept in subiection by eight legions of Romanes: and those that were taken were made slaues, and the rest chose rather to saue themselves by flight then fight. And you who haue such confidence in the walles of Ierusalem, consider the walles of Britanie; whose countrie though compassed with the Ocean, and almost as great as our whole world, the Romanes sayling into it haue conquered, and foure legions keepe that Island so populous. What should I say more, when the Parthians a most warlike people, who lately raigned ouer so many nations, and abound in so much wealth, are now compelled to send pledges to Rome? Nay, you may see all the nobilitie of the East at Rome, who with peace shadow their captiuitie; and almost all the nations vnder the Sun trembling and dreading the Roman puissance: and will you only war against them? Doe you not consider what befell the Carthaginians, who boasting themselves of that great Hannibal, sprung from the noble race of the Phinicians, at last were destroyed by Scipio? Neither could the Cyrenians, who tooke their beginning from the Lacedemonians, nor all the race of the Marmaridians, which is extended as farre as the Deserts (which are very scarce of waters) nor the Syrtes, nor the Nafamonians, nor the Moores, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numidians, haue beene able to resist the power of the Romanes; who by force of armes haue conquered the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly be numbred, which from the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillars vnto the red Sea, containeth an infinite company of Ethiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who besides that they pay so much fruits and Corne vnto the Romanes, as for eight monethes in euery yeere will keep & sustain all the people of Rome, doe also pay tribute; and moreover assist them any way they can, and neuer murmure at it, as you doe; and there is onely one legion left to keepe them in obedience. But what should I need to tell you of forraine examples, to signifie vnto you the power of the Romanes, seeing you may well perceiue it by that they did in Egypt, hard by: which reaching vnto Æthiopia and rich Arabia, and bordering vpon India, hauing vnder it seuen hundreth and fifty millions of people, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria (which is easie to be counted by the tribute which is paid of euery person by the Poule) living in their country, yet disdain not to liue vnder the dominion of the Romans; notwithstanding, that they haue a great enticement to rebel, to wit, Alexandria which is both populous and very rich, in length 30. furlongs, in breadth ten, and payeth more tribute in a moneth then you doe in a whole yeere; and, besides their mony, finde al Rome with corne foure moneths in the yeere: and it is on euery side compassed about either with a waste wilderneffe, by which none can passe, or the fierce sea, which is boundles; or with great and strong riuers, or muddie and durty quagmires, and marish grounds: all which little auailed them to withstand the force of the Romans. For two legions only placed in the citie, keep al the greab H countrie Egypt, and the Nobilitie of Macedon in awe.

What lociaries will you haue from some countrie not inhabited to aide you against the Romans? For all those that at this day dwell in any place of the world, that is inhabited, obey the Romans. Except peraduenture some of you hope for helpe from beyond Euphrates, thinking that your countymen of Adiabena will help you: but they will not entangle themselves in these dangerous wars, for an vnreasonable cause; or if they would consent to so dishonest a deed, the Parthians will not suffer them. For they are carefull to maintaine their league with the Romans, and would thinke it violated, if any vnder their dominions should warre against them. It remaineth then, that you must only trust that God will helpe you; but God doth assist the Romans: for it is vnpossible that such an Empire should continue without the helpe of God. Consider that this contempt of Religion, although you were to warre against farre weaker then your selues, yet were it hard to be dispensed withall; and it may so come to passe, that that whereby you hope to make God your partaker, thereby you may make him your enemy: for if you obserue the custome of Sabaoths, and in them do nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your ancestors haue made experience by Pompeius, who euer deferred all his enterprises vntill that day, wherein his enemies were idle, & made no resistance. Now if in warre ye transgresse your countrie lawes, I know not then for what you should rebel. For truly all of you at this time are of that mind, that your country lawes shall not be changed. And I pray you how will you request help at Gods hands, if wilfully yee breake his lawes? All that begin warre, either trust in humane riches, or diuine succour: and they that warre, hauing no probability to hope for any of these, wilfully lead themselves into open captiuitie. What letteth you euery man with his owne hands to butcher his wife and children, and from consuming this goodly countrie with fire; for so you shall gaine this, not to abide the shame of a conquest. It is good O friends, it is good, whilest yet the ship is in the Hauen, to foresee and prouide for future tempests, and not then begin to feare, when you are amidst the waves and surges of the sea. They who fall into miserie not foresee, are worthe to receiue compassion: but they that runne into wilfull calamitie, deserue no pittie, but reproach. Vnlesse perhaps ye thinke that the Romans will fight with you, as you will condition, and that if they overcome you, they will not vse you hardly, nor fire and destroy this sacred Citie, and all the whole nation as they haue don others. If yee bee overcome, who so escapeth vnkilld, can haue no place of refuge: for all nations either are already subiect vnto the Romans, or feare that they shall bee shortly. So that not onely you shall bee in danger, but also all Cities wherein any Iewes remaine. For there is no nation nor people in the whole world, amongst whom some of your countrie are not, who all shall be most cruelly put to death if you rebel: and for the wicked counsell of a few men, all cities shall flow with blood of the Iewes; and no man shall be punished for killing Iewes, because of your offence. And if the Romans doe not execute all this outrage after your rebellion, then thinke how impious a thing it is, to rebell against so mild gouernours. Take compassion, if not of your children, and wiues, yet at the least of this citie, which is the mother citie of al your nation. Spare these holy walles, and sacred temple, and keepe vnto your selues the law and sacred things of the Temple: assure your selues that if the Romans againe overcome you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more gratefull vnto them, for preserving them before. I protest before God, your holy Temple, and al the Angels of heauen M and our whole countrie, that I haue kept backe no counsell, which I thinke profitable for you. Now if you consider of those things which are profitable for you, ye shall liue with me in peace: but if you follow your priuate affections, I will not be partaker of the miseries and dangers, you thrust your selues into. When he had thus spoken, he wept, his sister Berenice, standing by him, & by his teares mitigated a great part of their fury. Then they cried that they meant not to bear

A armes against the Romans and Cesar, but against Florus, for the iniurie hee had done them. To this, Agrippa answered, But your deeds shew that you fight against the Romans: for you haue not paid your tribute to Cesar, and you haue burned the porches belonging vnto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repaire with speede the porches, and pay your tribute: for this fort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money. Herewith the people were content, and ascending into the temple with Agrippa and Berenice, they began to reedifie the porches, and the nobility and captaines gathered the tribute in euery village, & quickly brought forth talents (for so much mony was behind.) And thus Agrippa appeased the beginning of these warres. After this, he began to perswade the people to obey Florus, till such time as another were sent to supply his place. Herewith the multitude was so moued, that they contumeliously reuiled the king, and threw B stones at him, and drave him out of the Citie. The king seeing that their sedition would not bee quieted, complaining of the iniurie done vnto him, sent the nobilitie & all the potentates to Florus, who was at Cæsarea, that he might chuse whom hee would amongst them to gather the tribute through the whole country. And so he departed into his owne kingdome.

Agrippa the king, is by the people driuen out of the city with stones.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the rebellion of the Iewes begun against the Romans.

C T this time, some of the chiefeest rebels, assembled together, suddenly assailed a Castle called Massada, which at vnawares they tooke, and killed all the Romans, & in their places put a guard of their owne company. In the temple also, Eleazar son of the high priest Ananias, a bold and desperate young man, captaine of the soldiers, perswaded them who offered sacrifices, not to offer any but those, that were given by the Iewes. And this was the ground & cause of the wars that ensued. For they reiectd Cæsars sacrifices, that were wont to be offered for the good of the Romans. And although the high priests & people of account requested them not to omit that custome of sacrificing for their kings and gouernours, yet they refused so to doe, trusting greatlie to their faction: all the strength of the citie that desired alteration, were of their minds, and especially Eleazar, who at that time was General, as is before said. Wherefore all the potentates, high priests, and chiefeest of the Pharisees assembled themselves; and perceiving into how great danger those rebels daily brought the citie, they determined to make triall of the courage of the seditious people: vvhether they assembled the together before the brazen gate, which was in the inner part of the temple towards the East. And first of all, they greatly complained of their rash and vnadvised rebellion, and that they sought to stirre vp so great warres against their countrey, inuicighing against the cause that moued them thereto, as being without reason: telling them that their ancestors for the most part, adorned the temple with the gifts of Gentiles; neuer refusing the offerings of strangers; and not only not to haue refused their offerings (for that were an impious fact) but also placed in the temple the gifts that they sent, which were yet to be seene. And that now onely to prouoke the Romans to warre, and denounce it against them, they began to alter religion: and beside other dangers also, to make the citie seeme guiltie of impietie; as though it were such a one wherein none might offer sacrifice but Iewes, nor any but they might adore God. If we should make such a law against any priuate person, he had iust cause to accuse vs of inhumanity. But now the Romans were despised, and Cesar himselfe accounted profane: and it was to be feared, that if the Iew disdained to accept of Cæsars offerings, Cesar would hinder them from offering any: And that the Citie of Ierusalem would presently be accounted as an enemy to the Empire, vnlesse they presently accepted Cæsars sacrifice; and before such time, as they heard these newes against whom this outrage was attempted. And hauing thus spoken, they brought forth the most learned amongst the Priests to recount from time to time how their ancestors had alwaies accepted of the sacrifices of strangers.

The Iewes refused Cæsars sacrifices for the prosperitie of the Romans.

Against those who refuse to raine sacrifices.

F But none of the rebels gaue care vnto any thing that was said, and the Leuites came not to serue at the altar, as now preparing for warre. When the nobilitie saw that they could not appeale this sedition, and that they themselves should first feele the Romans power, they deuised all means to pacifie the tumult, and sent some as Embassadors vnto Florus: the chiefe whereof was Simon the sonne of Ananias; other some were sent to Agrippa, of which the noblest was Saulus, Antipas & Costobarus, who were also akinne vnto the king, requesting them both to come with an army into the citie, and suppress the sedition which was raised, before it went further. Florus was glad glad of these tidings, and desiring nothing more then war, gaue no answer to the Embassadors. But Agrippa willing to spare both parts, as well the good as the rebels, and to preferre the Iewes for the Romans, and the temple for the Iewes, considering it not meet for him to busie himselfe in such affaires, sent 3000 horsemen to aide the people against the rebels. Which horsemen were of Auranitis, Batanæa, and Trachon, and made Darius their captaine, and Philip, sonne of Ioachim, Generall of all the army. These comming into the citie, the nobilitie with the high priests and the rest of the people that desired peace, received this succour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the citie; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the temple: so that they instantly fought with darts and slings, and shooting of arrowes, and sometime one rushing vpon another, sodainly they skirmished together. The seditious were more valiant, but the kings souldiers were more skilful in wars; who chiefly endeouored to get the temple, and expell out of it those who profaned it. And the rebels with Eleeazar endeouored beside that which they had already, to gette also into their hands the higher part of the citie. Wherefore, during the space of seauen daies, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feast came, called Xylophoria, wherein euery one carieth wood to the temple, to keepe a fire continually vpon the Altar; the rebels would not suffer their enemies to doe their deuotion.

Now many of the thieues who caried poyniards vnder their coats, went amongst the weaker multitude, and boldly followed their old practise. The kings souldiers were overcome, and forced to leaue the higher part of the citie, and the rebels presently comming in, set the palaces of Ananias, Agrippa, and Berenice on fire, and forth-with went to the place where all charters were kept, purposing there to burne all bonds and obligations of debtors, thereby to defraud the creditors; and so to ioine all the debtors with their faction, and stirre vp all the poore people against the rich. But the keepers of these publique writings flying, the seditious persons set all on fire: & so hauing destroyed as it were the strength of the citie, they addressed themselves against such as resisted their proceedings. Some of the high priests and nobles hid themselves in vaults; others flying with the kings souldiers into the higher palace of the king, soone locked vp the doores after them; amongst whom were Ananias the high priest, & Ezechias his brother, and they, who (as is before spoken) were sent Embassadors vnto Agrippa: & so the seditious were satisfied that day with the victorie, and firing of the houses aforesaid.

The next day, which was the fiftenth of August, they assaulted the Castle Antonia, and besieging it two daies, they tooke all that guarded it, and killed them; and placed in it a garrison of their owne company. This done, they went vnto the kings palace, whither Agrippas souldiers were fled: and diuiding their company into foure parts, they began to cast down the walls: none of them that were within durst come out for feare of the multitude, but went vp to the turrets of the palace, and killed all those that offered to come vp, and many of the thieues vnder the wall, with things that they cast downe. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that those which were within, could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within, thought that the seditious being wearied, would soone giue ouer. In the meane season, one Manahemus, the sonne of Iudas of Galilæa (that most craftie subtle Sophister, who reuiled the Iewes in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be subiect to any but to God) taking with him certaine nobles went vnto Massada, where king Herods armorie was, and breaking into it, hee armed the common people and other thieues; and hauing them for his guard, hee returned againe to Ierusalem as king: and when he was made prince of that sedition, he disposed of the battery of the fortresses. But they wanted engines, neither could they openly vndermine the wals of the aduersaries, who continually cast downe darts: wherefore they began a mine a great way off, till it came vnder one of the towers which was supported by posts of wood, & they set fire on the wood that supported it, and went their way: so the supporters being consumed with fire, the tower presently fell downe, and there appeared a very high wall within. For those within, percciuing their aduersaries intent, perhaps by the shaking of that tower, presently builded this wall, to keepe out the rebels betweene them and it. The seditious verily thinking that with the fall of the tower they should be victors, when they saw another wall, were amazed. And the kings souldiers were sent vnto Manahemus and others that were chiefe of the rebels, requesting them to haue licence to depart. Which Manahemus granted onely to the kings souldiers, and those of his owne countrey; who presently accepting thereof, departed, and so left the Romans in great feare. For they were not able to resist so great a multitude, and they thought it a shame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them although it were graunted. Wherefore leauing the lower place which was called Stratopedon, because it might easily be taken, they fled into the kings

A Kings towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phaselus, the third Mariamme. The rebels that were with Manahemus, brake presently into the lower part that the Romans had forsaken, and killed all that they found there, and when they had sacked it, they sette it on fire: And this was done the sixt day of September.

Of the death of Ananias the high Priest, Manahemus and the Romane souldiers.

B The next day following, Ananias the high Priest was taken in one of the water Conduits of the Kings palace, where hee hid himselfe, and was there killed with his brother Ezechias by these thieues: and the rebels besieged all the towers round about, and kept diligent watch, lest any of the Romanes should escape. But Manahemus, both for his good successe in destroying the strong holds, as also with the death of Ananias the high Priest, became proud and cruell: and thinking none so wise as himselfe, in those affaires, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Eleezars companions rose vp and communed together, that it did not become them that rebelled against the Romanes (onely to recouer their libertie) that they should be traytors thereof to their owne companions, who were of the same condition, and that they should indure a King or Lord ouer them, who although he be poore man, yet hee was of more abiection & base condition then they. If it were so, that it were expedient to haue one Ruler ouer all the rest, they had rather haue any one then Manahemus: and being thus agreed, they let vpon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pomp, apparelled like a king, and hauing about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleezar his followers leet vpon Manahemus, the people did also throw stones at him, and so stoned him, hoping that by his death the sedition would be extinguished. The guard of Manahemus at first, made some resistance; but when they perceiued the whole multitude against them, euery one shifted for himselfe, as he could, and those that were taken were put to death, and they that escaped were afterward sought for: onely a few of them fled vnto Massada, amongst whom was Eleezar the sonne of Iairus, the son of Manahemus kinsman, and afterward in Massada became a tyrant. But Manahemus fled into a place called Ophlas, where hee basely hid himselfe, and being taken, hee was drawne out from thence, and after manie tormentes put to death, and with him, all the Nobilitie that had assisted him, as also Abisalomon, who was his onely helper. And in this matter (as I haue said) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to haue some end of that sedition. But the rebels did not kill Manahemus to the end to extinguish sedition, but to the intent to rob and spoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties, besought them to let the Romanes alone, whom they did besiege, but they were so much the more earnest against them: till they being no longer able to make resistance, with the consent of Metilius their Captaine, and some other of more authoritie, sent vnto Eleezar, requesting him to giue them licence to depart with their liues, and leaue their munition to the Iewes. Who accepting their petition, sent vnto them Gorion the sonne of Nichodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Iudas the sonne of Ionathas, to confirme the promise of their liues. Which done, Metilius led away the souldiers: and whilst the Romanes had their weapons, none of the rebels durst attempt any of their treacherie against them: but so soone as euery one according to couenaut, laid downe their shields and swords, and so departed mistrusting nothing, Eleezar his guard set vpon them, and killed them, who neither made resistance, nor any intreatie for their liues, onely putting them in mind of their promise and oath. So they were all slaine save onely Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life, and promising that hee would become a Iew in religion, & be circumcised, they spared him. Yet was this a small losse to the Romanes, who onely had then but a very few slaine of their great and almost infinite armie: and this seemed the very beginning of the Iewes captiuitie.

F When they saw themselves to haue giuen sufficient cause of warres, and too great, and that the Citie was now so filled with iniquitie, that the wrath of God did hang ouer it, though there had been no feare of any harme to them by the Romanes, yet the whole Citie mourned, and was sorrowfull, and quietly minded, lamented as though they themselves should answer for the seditious, for that murder which was committed vpon the Sabbath, when it is not lawfull for the Iewes to doe any good worke.

CHAP.

Of the great massacre of the Iewes at Cæsarea, and in all Syria.

The Iewes
spoil the villages & burne the Cities of Syria.

The same houre on the selfe-same day, it happened as it were by Gods prouidence, that the inhabitants of Cæsarea did massacre the Iewes that dwelled amongst them; so that at one time aboute twenty thousand were slaine, & not one Iew left aliue in all Cæsarea. For those that escaped, Florus tooke & brought them forth bound vnto the people. After this massacre done at Cæsarea, the whole nation of the Iewes waxed mad: and diuiding themselves into companies, they wasted and destroyed in short time all the borders of Syria, and the cities thereabout, to wit, Philadelpia, and Gebonitis, Gerasa, Pella, and Scythopolis, and then they made incursion into Gadara, Hippon, and Gaulanitis, pulling downe some places, and firing other some. And from thence, they marched towards Cæsarea, a citie of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba, & Cæsarea: and neither Sebaste, neither Alcalon could resist them, but they also were consumed with fire. Likewise they destroyed Anthedon, with Gaza, and most places adioyning to these cities were sacked, to wit, the fields and villages, & a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these places. The Syrians made as great a massacre of the Iewes as this amongst them: for all the Iewes inhabiting amongst them were murdered, not onely for an old grudge, but also for the auoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in most grieuous manner, and every citie was diuided into two parts, & either parts safely consisted in this, to prevent the other in murdering them I first: the daies were spent in bloodshed, & the nights in feare, worse then death it selfe. For though they onely pretended to destroy the Iewes, yet were they drawne to suspect other nations, that followed the Iewes religion; and because they were as it were neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to destroy them: and againe, for their agreeing in religion with the Iewes, they were constrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrarie part, who before seemed modest, were now through auarice incited to meddle in this murder, for euery one tooke the goods of the that were slaine, and caried them to other places as conquerers. And he was most renowned, that had stolen most, as hauing also killed most. There might you see in euery part of the citie, the dead bodies of all ages vnburied, old men & children, and women, lying in most shamefull manner, their secret parts being vncouered. Briefely, all the countrey was filled with exceeding great calamity, & the feare of misery to come was vnspokeable.

All Syria full of miserable calamities.

And these were the conflicts betwene the Iewes and strangers. But afterward making incursion vpon the borders of Scythopolis, the Iewes there dwelling were their enemies. For they conspiring with the citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their owne commoditie and securitie before their kinred and consanguinitie, ioyned with the Gentiles against the Iewes, who for all that, were suspected for their forwardnes. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would assault the citie by night, and excuse their reuolting by their great miserie, they commanded all the Iewes, that if they would shew themselves trustie vnto the Gentiles, they with all their children should goe into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were willed, suspecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two daies after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent forth scouts to see what they were dooing: who finding some of them asleepe, and others not resisting, they surprised them in a moment and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thousand, and afterward tooke their goods. I thinke it not amisse to speake of the death of Simon, who was the sonne of Saul, a man of regard: hee was a man of great courage, and strength of bodie, both which he vied to the great hurt of his owne nation: for he daily killed many Iewes, who dwelt neere vnto Scythopolis, and hee alone often scattered diuers companies, and put whole armies to flight; who had an end woorthie for his decedes, and murdering of his countremen. For when the Scythopolites had compassed the wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Iewes in euery part thereof. Simon drawing his sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies: for he saw that it was bootlesse to striue against such a multitude. Then pittifullie crying out, I receiue (O Scythopolites) a worthy reward for that which I haue done, who to shew my fidelity towards you, haue killed so many of mine own countremen: & it is iust plague that a strange nation should be false vnto vs, who impiously forsook our own brethren. I wil therefore as a profane person, killing my selfe with my owne hands, & this death wil be a sufficient punishment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimitie, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor insult ouer me. When he had thus spoken, he beheld all his family with com-

A passion and rage mixt together: he had a wife & children, & aged parents. And first taking his father by the haire of the head, stood vpon him, & thrust him through; after him he killed his mother, who was willing to die; after them his wife & children, euery one of them as it were offering their bodies to the sword, desirous to prevent the enemies. VVhen he had slaine all his kindred, himselfe remaining aliue, he stretched forth his arme that they might see what he would doe, & thrust his sword into his own body vp to the hilt. A young man, who for his magnanimitie & strength of body was worthy to be pitied, had yet a iust and deserued end, for trusting forraine nations.

CHAP. XX.

Of another grieuous slaughter of the Iewes.

After this so great a massacre of the Iewes in Scythopolis, other cities also did rise against them where they inhabited, and two thousand and five hundred were slaine at Alcalon, and two thousand at Ptolemais, and the Tyrians killed diuers and kept many in prison: Likewise they of Gadara and Hippon slew the most valiant, and those of least courage they cast into prison. Also all other cities, who either feared or hated the Iewes, rose vp against them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia, and Apamia, spared them that dwelt with them, and neither killed nor imprisoned any of them: perhaps they stood in no feare of them, if they should haue risen, because their citie was so populous: yet I thinke they spared them onely for pittie sake, because they saw that they were quiet, and not seditious. The inhabitants also of Gerasa did no harme to the Iewes amongst them: but when they desired to depart, they conducted them safely vnto the end of their borders. In the kingdome also of Agrippa much crueltie was shewed against the Iewes: For hee being gone to Cestius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his countrey to one of his friends named Varus, kinsman vnto king Sohemus; and there came vnto him seauentie of the chiefe nobility of the countrey Batanæa, requesting a garrison to repress those that should attempt rebellion amongst them. Varus sent certaine of the kings souldiers armed, and killed them all as they were comming to him. But he did this impiety without Agrippa his consent, onely for auarice: and as it were emboldened by this fact, he ruined the whole realme, still continuing such crueltie and impiety against his nation, till such time as Agrippa vnderstood thereof, who for Sohemus sake durst not put him to death, but dispossessed him of his place. In the meane while the rebels tooke the fort called Cyprus, which is situate about Iericho, and after they had killed the garrison, they destroyed the fortress. At the same time a multitude of Iewes laid siege before the castle of Macheron, and perswaded the souldiers left in garrison to yield the Castle: who, fearing that if they denied, they should be compelled thereto, deliuered it vnto them; vpon condition, that they might quietly depart, & they of Macheron placed a strong guard within it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Iewes were slaine at Alexandria.

EHe citizens of Alexandria had alwaies a quarrell against the Iewes that liued with the, since the time that that famous Alexander vied their helpe against the Egyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabit in Alexandria, and to haue the same priuiledges that the rest of the citizens had. And this honour was also continued with them vnto the time of the successors and heires of Alexander: who also gaue them a certaine place in the citie to dwell in, that there they might liue more commodiously: the Gentiles hauing nothing to do amongst them, permitted them also to call themselves Macedonians. And afterward when Egypt was brought vnder the rule of the Romans, neither Cæsar nor any one else, did diminish the Iewes dignitie in that place, which Alexander had giuen them. So that now there was daily conflicts between them & the Greeks: and although the Iudges on both parts still punished the that were in fault, yet the sedition more and more increased, and when all cities else were filled with troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an embassage to Nero, certaine Iewes mingled themselves amongst the Greeks, & so went into the Amphitheater: who being espied by their aduersaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Iewes were enemies, and came as spies, and so laid violent hands vpon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greekes, whom they drevv to a place to burne them aliue. All the Iewes of the citie came to succour them, and first they threw stones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ranne in a rage into the Amphitheater, and threatened to burne all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander gouernour of the citie had not appeased their furie; who did not at the first vse force of armes against them, but sent their nobilitie to perswade them to cease, and not incite the Romane army against them. But the seditious Iewes refused his admonition, & mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two legions of armed Romans against them which were in the citie, and with them five thousand other souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia to this massacre of the Iewes, and Tiberius gaue them charge not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses and take their goods. The souldiers presently went into the place called Delta (fortherethe Iewes were gathered together) and did as they were commaunded, and not without bloody victorie. For the Iewes gathering theselues together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flie, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romans first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with blood, for there were slaine fiftie thousand Iewes: & all the rest had bin extinguished, had not Alexander (moued to compulsion by their intreaties) commaunded the souldiers to leaue off; who being obedient vnto him, presently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceived against the Iewes: and with much ado were withheld from tyrannizing ouer the dead bodies. And this befell the Iewes of Alexandria.

A cruell victorie, wherein fiftie thousand Iewes are slaine.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the massacre of the Iewes by Cestius Gallus.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himselfe, forasmuch as the Iewes were now hated euery where, and taking with him the twelue whole legions out of Antiochia, two thousand chosen footmen, and foure companies of horsemen out of euery one of the other legions, and with them the kings forces, that came to help him, to wit, two thousand horsemen of Antiochia, three thousand foot all boawmen, and three thousand footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and foure thousand which Sohemus brought, whercof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part boawmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many ioined themselves to them out of euery citie, who though they were not so skilfull in warre as the Romans, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himselfe was there with Cestius, being ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the army went to Zabulon (which is the strongest citie of Galilee, called also Andron, & parteth the borders of the Iewes from Ptolemais) and when he found it desolate (for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountaines) who left it full of all riches, giuing licence to the souldiers to sack it; he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof: for it was builded like Tyre and Sidon, & Berytum, & after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burned all the villages thereabouts, he returned vnto Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth staid stil behind to get booties: which when the Iewes vnderstood, and that Cestius was departed, they tooke courage, and came and set vpon them, and killed of them 2000. In the meane while Cestius departed fro Ptolemais, & went vnto Cæsarea, and sent part of his army to Ioppe, commanding the to keepe the towne if they could get it: and if the townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay til he came with the rest of the army. Some of the went by Sea, some by land, by which means they did easily take Ioppe: so that the people thereof neither had time to flie, nor to prepare themselves to fight; & setting on them, they killed all men with their families: & thus sacking the town, they set it on fire, & there were slaine 8000 and foure hundred. In like maner he sent part of his horsemen vnto Nabatena in the Toparchy neere Samaria, who spoiled the country, killed a great number of inhabitants, robbed and burned the villages, and caried away a great bootie with them.

Of Cestius his battell against Ierusalem.

OF THE IEWES. THE II. BOOKE.

A example. They that were seditious, & gaue themselves to robbing, fled into the mountain which is situate in the midst of Galilee against Sephoris, called Asamon: thele Gallus encountered with his army; who, so long as they kept the higher part of the mountain, easily resisted the Romans, and killed about 200. of them: but when they saw the Romans had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept they easily were overcome: for not being armed, they could not stand out, and if they should haue fled, they could not haue escaped the horsemen, so that onely a few hid themselves in difficult places, & about 2000 of them were slain. Gallus perceiving all Galilee in peace, and not minded to reuolt, returned with his companies vnto Cæsarea, & Cestius with his whole Army went vnto Antipatris: where vnderstanding that a great multitude of Iewes were gathered together in the Tower called Aphecy, sent some before to skirmish with them: but the Iewes would not abide battell, and the souldiers burned their tents, and the villages adioyning. Cestius went from thence to Lydda, and found the citie desolate, for all the people were gone vnto Ierusalem because of the Feast of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty persons whom he found there, he fiered the towne, and went no further: and going by Bethon he pitched his Tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs distant from Ierusalem. When the Iewes saw theselues in danger, they left the solemnity, & prepared themselves for war: and hauing a great multitude, they went to fight obseruing no order, altogether with indiscreet cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hold in great estimation: & the same fury, that made them leaue their deuotion, made them also victorious in that battell, for they assaulted the Romans with such a courage, that they brake their battell array: and killing all that resisted, they pressed into the midst thereof, & if a fresh supply both of horse and foote had not come in time, all Cestius army had been in great danger. So there were slaine five hundred and fifty Roman souldiers, and foure hundred of them were foote, and the rest were horsemen, but of the Iewes but two and twenty. The most valiant in this combat were Monobazus and Cenedæus, kinsmen to king Monobazus of Adiabana, and next to them Parades Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who fled vnto the Iewes from king Agrippa, whom he had lately serued: and so the Iewes being repulled, returned into Ierusalem; and Simon the sonne of Giora inuaded the Romans, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and slew many of the rereward, and tooke many carts, and much baggage withall, which hee brought into the citie. Cestius staid three daies in the field, and the Iewes kept the high places, espying which way he went, purposing not to be quiet if the Romans departed.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the siege of Ierusalem by Cestius, and of the massacre.

Agrippa perceiving the Romans to be in great danger, for that all the mountaines were couered with an infinite number of Iewes, he purposed to trie, if through few words he could perswade them to desist from warre, or if any refused, to receiue those that were willing. Wherefore he sent vnto them Borcæus and Phæbus, whome they well knew, assuring and promising them pardon from Cestius, and from the Romans, of all that they had already done, if they would now lay downe their armes, and ioine with them. But the rebels fearing that all the multitude in hope of safety would ioine with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and slew Phæbus before he spake any word, & Borcæus being wounded, escaped. But the people were angry herat, and with stones and clubs draue them into the towne that were the authors of this fact. Cestius perceiving them at oddes amongst themselves, thought that he had now a fit opportunitie to assault them, and so came vpon them with his whole army: and putting them to flight, he pursued them vnto Ierusalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed seven furlongs from the city, & did nothing against the citie for three daies space; perhaps hoping that they within would relent, and then sending a great many souldiers into the villages adioining to fetch corne, the fourth day, which was the thirtieth of October, hee came against the citie with his armie in battell array. The people of the Iewes were kept in awe by the rebels, who terrified by the Roman discipline, forsooke the outmost parts of the city, & fled into the innermost part of the temple. Cestius passing Berheza, burned Cænopolis and the new market place, and comming vnto the higher part of the citie, hee pitched his Tent neere the kings palace: and if at that time he had violently issued in at the walls, he had taken the city and ended the wars. But Tyrannus Priscus, General of the footemen, & many other rulers & captaines of the horsemen, being hired with money by Florus, hindred that his purpose, whereby the wars were so prolonged, and a thousand calamities befell the Iewes. In the meane time manie of the chiefest among the Iewes, & Ananus the sonne of Jonathas, called Cestius, as though they would haue opened him the gates: but he was angrie and scarce trusted them, till at last they delayed the time so long, that the rebels perceiued this treason, and cast Ananus down the wal, & with stones draue his accomplices into their houses. Which done, they retired themselves into the towers, from whence they beat back those that scaled the wals. The Romans for five daies space assaulted the wals on euery side, but all in vaine; and the sixth day, Cestius with many chosen souldiers and bowmen assaulted the temple on the North side. The Iewes valiantly made resistance out of the porches, & often repulsed the Romans approching the wals: yet at last they, with the multitude of their aduersaries darts, were forced to giue backe. Then the Romans that went before hauing their shields vpon their heads, leaned against the wall, & they in the second place held their shields against theirs in the first, and so in order vntill the last, thereby making as it were a couering as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their shot and darts could doe them no harme; so that the souldiers did safely undermine the wals, and attempted to fire the gates of the temple.

Now the seditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the Citie, as though it would presently bee taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the rebels were dismaide, and came vnto the gates to open them vnto Cestius, who had well deserved at their hands. And truly had he but a little longer continued his siege, hee had taken the Citie. But I thinke that God being angry with the wicked, would not suffer the warres to be ended at that time: for Cestius neither regarding the good will of the people, nor the desperation of the rebels, removed his armie from thence, and hauing received no losse, very vnadvisedly departed from the Citie: at whose vnlooked for flight, the rebels tooke heart, and making after him, they killed the horsemen and footemen that came last. And then Cestius went to the Tents which hee had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the countrie; whereby he more encouraged the rebels, who following him, killed many of his rereward. Afterward, either end of the armie being well strengthened, the Iewes assaulted them that were behind, and the last day not cast any darts against them, who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them; and they were not able to resist those that assaulted them on each side, being as it were heauie, and not daring to breake their order; on the contrarie, seeing the Iewes so active & apt to skip too and fro: so that the Romans endured much harme at the hands of their enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongst whom was Priscus capitaine of the sixth legion, and Longinus the tribune, & Aemilius Lucundus capitaine of a troupe of horsemen. And so with much adoe, they came vnto Gabio; where they first pitched their Tents, casting away much of their baggage, which might in any way hinder them. Cestius staid there two daies, doubtfull what to doe: the third day he perceiued his enemies to be increased, and all places about to be filled with Iewes: whereby he saw that his slow haste was to his disaduantage, and the number of his enemies would still increase if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flee speedily, hee caused the souldiers to cast away all those things that might in any way be a hinderance vnto them, & killed their Mules and Ases, & cartell, sauing onely those that bare munition, fearing that if he should not destroy them, the Iewes might make vse of them against him, and so he led the armie toward Bethoron. The Iewes in large passages did little molest his armie: but when they were to passe a streight, they killed them of the rereward, and thrust other some downe into the valley, and all the armie of the Iewes were spread vpon the eminent places, whereby the armie was to passe, expecting to welcome them with arrowes. Where the footmen amazed, and bethinking how to help themselves, the horsemen were brought into great danger: for they could not keepe their ranks for darts and arrowes, neither could they goe to hurt their enemies, the ascent vnto the top of the mountaines was so steepe: & they were compassed on each side with rockes and deep vallies, so that if any went out of the way, he fell down and was killed, in so much as there was no way to fly nor to resist. Now not knowing what to doe, they began to weepe, and crie out as men in desperation: and the Iewes answered them with an encouraging one another to play the men; being glad of their enemies aduersitie, and cruelly bent against them: and all the armie of Cestius had M there perished, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darkness gaue leasure to the Romans to flee into Bethoron. In the meane while, the Iewes kept all the places thereabouts besieged, and garded the passages. Cestius seeing it not possible to march openly, thought it best to flee, and chose almost 400. of his strongest souldiers, and seerthem in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they should crie that they did before, that the Iewes might thinke that the whole armie was there, and so he with the rest of his army marched

In the morning the Iewes perceiuing the Romans to be fled, assaulted the 400. whereby they were deceiued, & presently killed the with darts, & forthwith they followed Cestius: who hauing fled a great way in the night, made more haste the next day, so that the souldiers for feare left their rams & instruments to beat down the wals, and slings, and much other munition; which the Iewes taking, after vsed against them. And thus they followed the Romans vnto Antipatris: and seeing they could not ouertake them, they returned, bringing with them the warlike instruments, and rising those that were slaine, and taking whatsoever the Romans had left behind; and so singing songs of victory, they returned vnto Ierusalem, hauing lost verie few of their company, and slaine foure thousand, and three hundred and eightie of the footmen of the Romans, and their helpers; and nine hundred and fourescore horsemen. And this was done vpon the eight day of October, and in the twelfth yeere of the raigne of Nero.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the crueltie of those of Damascus against the Iewes, and of Iosephs affaires in Galilee.

Continently after Cestius aduerse fortune, many of the chiefest amongst the Iews daily fled and forsooke the citie, as a ship presently ready to sinke. Cassobarus and Saul two brethren, and Philip the son of Ioachim Generall of Agrippas army, fled out of the citie and yeelded themselves vnto Cestius. As for Antipas, who was also besieged with them in the kings palace, he would not flee with the rest, and so was killed by the rebels. But Cestius sent Saul and the rest of his company into Achaia vnto Nero, to let him vnderstand the cause of their flight, and to shew how Florus had caused all these wars: for so he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath against Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damascus vnderstanding the death of the Romans, deuised how to destroy the Iewes which inhabited amongst them: & they thought it was easie to be accomplished, for that the Iewes were already assembled in the common bathes, for feare of some such matter: yet they mistrusted their women, who all, except a few, were Iews in religion. Wherefore they tooke great heed to conceale their intent from them, & so assaulting the Iewes altogether in a narrow place, and hauing nothing to defend them, they put them all to the sword, who were in number ten thousand. The rebels that so pursued Cestius, returned into Ierusalem, and ceased not to ioinc all vnto them that fauored the Romans, either by force or by flatterie: and assembling themselves in the temple, they determined to chooe a greater number of captaines. Wherefore Ioseph the sonne of Gorion, and Ananus the high priest were appointed rulers of the Citie, and especially to see the wals therof repaired. Eleazar the sonne of Simon was put in no authoritie, notwithstanding that he had in his custodie all preies and spoiles taken from the Romans, and Cestius his money, and a great part of the publicke treasure, because they perceiued him through authoritie to waxe proud, and his attendants become stately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft, perswaded the people to obey him in all things. And they requested other captaines to be sent into Idumæa, who were Iesus the sonne of Sapphas, and Eleazar the sonne of the new high priest: and they commanded Niger who was borne beyond Iordan, to obey these captaines, who was therefore called Peraides, and was then Gouvernour of Idumæa. And they neglected not to doe the like by other regions: for Ioseph the sonne of Simon was sent to Iericho and Manasses beyond the riuer, and Iohn the Elfean to Tarnia, euery one to rule the gouernment of his country as a Toparchy. Lydda, Ioppe, and Amithus were annexed to Iohn the Elfean, and Iohn the sonne of Ananias was appointed Gouvernour of Gophnitis and Acrabatenia. And Ioseph the son of Matthias was made ruler ouer both Galilees, vnto which was ioined Gamala the strongest Citie in that coast.

As for other gouernors, euery one discharged his place according to his wisdom and dexterity. When Ioseph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his first care was to get the good will of the inhabitants, knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he had offended. Then considering that hee should haue most mighty & assured friends, if he made them partakers of his authoritie; and likewise get the loue of the common people, if he did esteeme of those things which they should thinke well of; Hee chose seuentie of the most ancientest wise men amongst them, and made them rulers ouer all Galilee, and elected seuen iudges ouer the lesser townes to iudge inferiour matters: for he referred all great affaires and criminall causes to his owne hearing. Moreouer, hauing ordained a forme of iustice that those seuentie should follow, he tooke counsell how to worke their outward security: And being assured G that the Romans would come into Galilee, he compassed those places with strong wals that were fit for his purpose, to wit, Iotapata, Bersabea, Selamis, Pereccho, Iapha, & Sigoph, with the mountaine Itaburium, Tarichea, & Tiberias. Moreouer, he fortified the caues neere the lake Genesar, which is in the lower Galilee, and in high Galilee Petra, which is also called Achaberon & Seph, Iamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanitis also Seleucia, and Soganes, and Gamala: he onely permitted men of Sephoris to build their own wals, because he perceived them to be rich & prone to war of themselves. Likewise Iohn the sonne of Leuias at Iosephs commaund, built the wall of Giscala himselfe alone: but in all other places that were fortified, Ioseph put to his helping hand, & told how they should be done. He leuied also an army of a hundredth thousand, who were all young men, whom he armed with olde armour, which he gathered from all parts of the country: and considering that the Roman army was inuincible, for that they were all obedient vnto their rulers and expert in warre, hee could not instruct them in marriall discipline, other occasions forcing him to the contrarie: but calling to minde that the multitude of rulers made obedience, he ordained many captaines and constituted diuers sorts of soldiers, as the Romans vsed to do; making some gouernours of ten, other some ouer a hundredth, and others ouer a thousand; and appointed likewise rulers ouer them. He taught them also how to giue the signe of warre, and how to found the trumpet both to call them to combate, and to retire: how to march in length, and cast in a ring, and alwaies to succour them that were most in danger: and to be short, hee taught them whatsoeuer might either incourage them, or make them actiue: but especially he exercised them in feates of armes, imitating in particular the order of the Romans, often telling them, that they were to fight with men, who for strength of body & courage passed all nations of the world. Also he told them that hereby he should perceiue whether they would be obedient in warre, if now they abstained from such things as were vsuall to souldiers, to wit, robbing & spoiling their countenmen, and craftie and deceitfull dealing; nor thinke the spoile of those with whom they conuersed to be their owne gaine: for those warres had alwaies best successe, where the souldiers carried good consciences; and they that were bad, should not onely haue men, but God also for their enemy. And after this maner he daily exhorted them, and now he had appointed how many were to fight. For threecore thousand footmen, and two hundredth and fifty horsemen, and beside these foure thousand, and five hundredth whom he hired, were alwaies in readinesse, and six hundredth chosen men to guard his owne person. And the hirelings onely excepted, the rest of the souldiers were prouided for by the cities: for euery citie before mentioned, sent one half of their men for souldiers; and the other halfe they kept to prouide victuals for them, that one part being employed in warre, the other might doe such busines as the citie required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Iosephs dangers and escape, and of the malice of Iohn of Giscala.

After Ioseph thus ordered the estate of Galilee, there arose a traitor borne in Giscala, the sonne of Leuias whose name was Iohn, a most subtil & deceitfull treacher, whereby L vile meanes was now become the richest man in that countrey, beeing before verie poore; whereby for a while hee was hindered from putting his villanies in practise: who could lie at his pleasure and easily giue credit vnto lies, who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he vsed euen toward his dearest friends: & a great counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gaine became a cruell murderor. Hee alwaies aimed at high matters, with an aspiring mind, & at first nourished his hope with smal villanies. For first he was a thiefe after his own manner, & liued in woods and solitarie places; at last he got him a company of audacious people like to himselfe, at first small, but afterward he greatly increased it. He had also a great care to chooe no idle persons, but such as were strong of body, valiant of mind, and skilfull in martiall affaires: of these he gathered foure hundredth, the most of them out of Tyre, and the villages thereabout: and with them he wasted all Galilee, and put many in minde of the miserable wars to come. This M man a long time before desired to be gouernour of the army, and aspired to greater matters, onely the want of money hindered him: and perceiuing that Ioseph tooke delight in his industrie, he perswaded him to suffer him to build the wals of that place where he was borne, which was now desolate; and to accomplish this, he gathered great summes of money of the richer sort. Then he deuised another shift: for hauing perswaded the Iewes that were dispersed ouer all Syria, that they

A they should vse no oile, save onely that which was made by their owne nation, he caused diuers vessels of oile to be brought vnto the confines of Galilee, and buying foure barrels for a peece of Tyrian money (which amounted vnto foure Antique groates) he told them againe vnto the Syrian Iewes, the halfe of one barrell for as much as all foure cost him. And for that Galilee abounded with oiles, and especially at that time, hee conueied it to such places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himselfe. By this meanes hee gathered an infinite masse of money, which presently he turned to his prejudice who had given him licence so to get it. And thinking that if he could depose Ioseph, that then hee might come to be ruler ouer Galilee, hee commaunded his followers to robbe and spoile more then they did before, and to trouble the country, that he might either kill the gouernour, if hee sought to redresse it, at vnawares; or if he let all alone, to accuse him of cowardice to the people for so doing. Moreouer, he had already giuen out speeches, that Ioseph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans, and deuiled many things to this effect to worke Iosephs ouerthrow. It hapned that at that time, some of the village of Dabarita, who watched in the field, let vpon Ptolomeus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his sister Berenice, and spoiled them of all cariage, wherein was much costly apparell, and many siluer cups, and six hundredth peeces of gold. And for that they could not doe this secretly, they brought all the whole bootie to Ioseph at Tarichea: who reprobuing them for offering violence vnto the kings seruants, commaunded the things to be kept at the house of Aeneas, who was one of the richest men in the towne, who should restore them to the owner when time serued: wherein thinking to doe himselfe great good, he wrought himselfe much danger. For the theues beeing C offended that they received no part therof, & seeing that Ioseph would restore to Agrippa & his sister Berenice that which they had labored to get, they went round about the villages in the night, and spread this false report in euery place, that Ioseph was a traitor to his country, and with the same rumour filled the cities thereabout. So that early in the next morning, a hundredth thousand armed men came against Ioseph. Finally, the multitude assembled themselves together in the theater at Tarichea: the greatest part cried out in their choler and fury, that the traitor might be deposed, other some that he might be burned, and Iohn himselfe incited many, and with him one Iesus the sonne of Sapphas, who at that time was gouernour of Tiberias. All the friends of Ioseph and his guard being terrified with such a multitude, fled, foure onely excepted. But Ioseph in the mean while was asleepe: and had he slept a little longer, they had set his house on fire. Whereupon he arose, and the foure that remained with him, counsilled him to flie: but he not dismayed in that he was left alone, nor for that so great a multitude came against him, went boldly towards them with his garment all torne and ashes vpon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his sword vpon his necke. Whereat they that bare him goodwill, especially the people of Tarichea, were moued to compasion: but the country people and they whom he overlaid with taxes and tributes, cursed him, and bad him bring forth the publike treasure, and confesse his treason: for because of the attire and habite hee came in, they thought hee would not haue denied any thing whereof he was accused, and that he came so to moue them to compasion, and so to obtaine pardon for his offence. This his humility stood him in good steed, for hereby those that before were enraged against him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalfe, when he promised to E confesse the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to speake, hee said: I was neuer minded to send backe that money to Agrippa, nor to keepe it vnto my priuate vse: For (God forbid) that I should euer hold him for my friend, who is your open enemy, or that I should so seeke mine own profit, that I should thereby damnifie you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) forasmuch as I perceived that your citie especially had greatest need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the walles, and for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adjoining, who still gaped after this prey and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get those spoiles for you to reedifie your walles. If ye mislike this, I will bring out the treasure, and giue it to be diuided amongst you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth how you molest him who is your benefactor.

F This speech of his well pleased the people of Tarichea, and displeased them of Tiberias; so that they breathed out their earnings against him. Thus they both left Ioseph, & fought one against another. He now hauing many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almost fortie thousand) spake more boldly vnto the multitude, and rebuked their temeritie, affirming that it was necessarie to strengthen Tarichea with that present money, and that hee would also prouide to strengthen other cities, and that they should not want money, if they would agree and conspire together against them, from whom they should take it; and not to offer violence vnto him who would endeavour to get it. So the rest of the multitude being deceived, though they were angry, yet departed; and two thousand armed men offered to set vpon him: but he being already retired into his house, they stood without, threatening him. Wherefore Ioseph used another device likewise to repress these: and getting vp into the top of the house, he beckned vnto them with his hand to keep silence; and then said that hee was ignorant what they requested at his hands: for hee could not heare one for another, because their voices were confounded through the multitude, but if they would send some into the house to talke friendly with him, he would do whatsoeuer they requested. The nobles and magistrates hearing this, presently went into the house: whom, when he had led into the innermost part of the house, hauing shut the doores, hee caused to be beaten, so long til that all their bowels appeared: the doores in the meane time being made fast, the people staid before the house, thinking that the cause of their long tarrying was, to alleadge reasons to and fro; & presently Ioseph opening the doores put them forth amongst the people all bloody as they were: wherat they were so terrified, that leauing their weapons behind them they ran away. Hereat Iohn tooke occasion to encrease his enuie, and hauing ill successe in this policy, he still attempted other plots to bring Ioseph in danger: and counterfeiting himselfe sicke, he requested Ioseph to permit him to goe to Tiberias, and use the hot bathes for to recover his health. But Ioseph not hauing yet perceived his treason, wrote letters in his behalfe to the gouernour of the towne, willing him to be Iohns oast, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good sort. And two daies after his arrival there, hee went about the businesse, which he came to effect, and entised some with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Ioseph. Silas whom Ioseph had made gouernour of the city vnderstanding this, he presently by letters gaue notice thereof vnto Ioseph: who receiuing them in the night, went to Tiberias, & was there early in the morning, and the rest of the multitude came out to meete him: but Iohn notwithstanding he iudged that he came against him, yet still he counterfeited himselfe sick in bed, and sent a man of his acquaintance to excuse his absence for not comming to meet Ioseph. Then Ioseph assembled the Tiberians together in a place to speake vnto them, concerning that which was written vnto him: and Iohn sent armed men thither with commandement to kill Ioseph. The people perceiuing them to draw their swords, cried out: and Ioseph at their cry looking about him, and perceiuing their swords euen almost at his throat, hee leapt down a little hill vpon the shore, which was six cubits high, vpon which he stood to speake vnto the people, and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midst of the lake, & presently by his guard taking their weapons, assaulted the traitors. Ioseph fearing that a great conflict would ensue, & so the whole citie for a few mens fault be destroyed, sent to his souldiers, charging them only to worke their owne safety and no more, and to kill none, nor reprocue any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceased from fight.

But they that inhabited about the citie, and heard of the treason, and by whom it was attempted, armed themselves and came against Iohn: but he before they came, fled into Giscala, where he was borne. In the meane while, all Galilee came and ioined with Ioseph, and there were many thousands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came against Iohn, and to fire that citie which had receiued him. Ioseph thanked them for their good will, saying that hee had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire or sword; and therefore requested them to be content. Hee also published an edict, wherein hee declared that all those that had rebelled vith Iohn, and did not forsake him within fise daies next following, should lose all their liuings, and their mansions should be sacked, and their houses & family set on fire. Hereupon three thousand presently forsooke Iohn, and came and cast downe their weapons before Iosephs feet, prostrating themselves before him: so that there onely remained with Iohn, but one thousand of fugitiue Syrians. By whom Iohn being assisted, again went secretly to work, hauing so ill successe by plain dealing: and so priuile sent messengers to Ierusalem, who tolde that Ioseph had gathered a great armie, and that except he were quickly preuented, hee would come and vsurpe the dominion ouer that mother citie. But the people vnderstanding before of Iohns hatred, did not regard it: yet diuers rich men and magistrates who enuied Ioseph, secretly sent money vnto Iohn to hire souldiers that were strangers, that hee might warre against Ioseph; and determined amongst them to displace him: & thinking that their decree was not sufficient to effect it, they sent moreover fise hundred and foure thousand armed men, and foure of their principal nobility amongst them, to wit, Iozar the lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Simon and Iudas the sonnes of Ionathas, all very eloquent & learned men, to withdraw the peoples minds from Ioseph; giuing them charge, that if hee of his owne accord came vnto them, that then they should permit him to speake

A speake for himselfe: but if he refused so to doe, that then they should hold him as an enemie. Iosephs friends at Ierusalem gaue him intelligence, how that an army came against him, but for what cause they knew not, for that it was kept secret. And hereupon before he could preuent it, foure Cities did revolt from him, to wit, Sepphoris, Gamala, Giscala, and Tiberias, the which hee soon after easily recovered, without any force of armes: and hauing taken the foure captaines & counsellors of his enemies, hee sent them vnto Ierusalem: against whom the people being incensed, would haue killed them, and those that brought them, had they not fled betime.

CHAP. XXVII.

Tiberias and Sepphoris were recovered by Ioseph.

NOW Iohn for feare of Ioseph, kept himselfe within the wals of Giscala: and a few daies after Tiberias revolted againe, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, and yet a few Romane souldiers shewing themselves, they revolted from Ioseph. Ioseph vnderstanding this at Tarichea, hauing sent his souldiers to fetch corne, thought it not good to goe alone against the rebels, neither did he thinke it best to delay the time any longer, fearing that whilst he delayed, king Agrippa would come & possess the towne: for the next day, because it was the Sabaoth, he could do nothing. Wherefore he thought to ouercome the rebels by policie, and so he commanded the gates of Tarichea to be kept shut, that his intent might not be reuealed vnto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the boates that were in the lake, in number two hundred and thirtie, and in euery one of them foure sailers, hee hastily sailed to Tiberias: and when hee came neere the citie, yet so farre off that the inhabitants thereof could not easily descry him, he left all the boates vpon the water emptic, & taking onely seauen of his guard with him, vnarmed, he went neer vnto the citie, that they might see him. When the rebels perceived him, and thought that the boates had been full of armed men, they cast downe their weapons, and held vp their hands to him, beseeching him to spare the citie. Ioseph, after many threatening and bitter speeches, first, for that hauing vndertaken warres against the Romans, they with ciuill wars consumed their owne forces: secondly, for that they sought his life who had wrought their safety, and that they were not ashamed to shut the gates against him, who had builded the citie wals: yet (said hee) if any would come and talke with him, and confirme a league of their fidelitie vnto him, he would not refuse them. So tenne of the chiefe amongst them came vnto him, whom hee caried away in a fisher-boat farre from the citie, and sent for fise Senators, as though he requested their promise also. And deuising new causes, hee still vnder preence of agreement, sent first for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the boats: which done, he commanded all the boatmen with all speed possible to go to Tarichea, and put them in prison, so that he caried away all the counsell, which were in number fise hundred & two thousand people, all whom he brought to Tarichea in boates. But they which remained in the citie, cried with one voice that one Clitus was cause of that revolt, and therefore besought Ioseph to punish him for all. Ioseph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his guard called Lenia, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to trust himselfe amongst all his enemies, refused to doe execution. Clitus perceiuing that Ioseph was angry, & ready to come out of his owne boat to do it himselfe, besought him to grant him one of his hands: which Ioseph did, vpon condition, that hee should cut off the other himselfe. So Clitus drawing out his sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Ioseph; and after this, hee returned to Tiberias to bring it againe vnder his subiection: and within a few daies after, hee tooke Giscala and Sepphoris, which were revolted, hauing giuen the spoiles thereof to his souldiers, but yet afterward he restored all that was taken away vnto the people, and so he did to the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sepphoris: and by this meanes got the good will of them all.

Of Vespasians comming into Iudæa, and of the two massacres of the Iewes.

After that Nero vnderſtood of his euill ſucceſſe againſt the Iewes, hee was ſci-zed with feare and aſtoniſhment; yet hee diſſembled it as much as neceſſitie would permit him. In the meane while he ſer a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, ſaying, that that which happened, was rather by the fault of his Generall, then by the valour of their ad-uerſaries: thinking that it behoued him, who was Emperour, not to ſhew himſelfe moued with a little bad newes; and the greatneſſe of his Empire ſhewed hee had a mind which yielded to no miſfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his ſpirit that he was much moued, and in great care vnto whom he ſhould commit the charge of the Eaſt, which rebelled; who both would conquer the Iewes, and chaſtiſe the inhabitants about them, that bare the ſame mind as they did. At laſt, he found Vespasian, whom hee thought onelie meet for that purpoſe; a man who from his infancie had been trained vp in warres, euen vntill he was gray-headed, who had appealed the people of the Weſt, and helped them beeing troubled by the Germans, and recovered it for the Romans: as alſo he did Britannie, which was vnknown before; and for that cauſe made his father Claudius triumph without taking any paines for it. Nero conſidered all theſe, and his prudence grounded in old age with his experience, who alſo had ſonnes in the flower of their age to be pledges for his fidelitie, and that repreſented their fathers wiſedom. God, as it ſhould ſeeme, euen then diſpoſing ſome thing of the whole cōmon-wealth, Nero ſent him to gouerne the armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with faire ſpeeches and promiſes, as at that time need required.

BThus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commaunded Titus his ſon to leade the ſiſt and tenth legions from Alexandria, and hee himſelfe croſſing ouer to Helleſpont, went after by land into Syria, where hee aſſembled all the Romane forces, and all the helpe of the kings adiōnyng that were confederates. But the Iewes after Ceſſius vnfortunate ſucceſſe became proud of their victorie, and could not containe themſelues, but like men toſſed at Fortunes plea-ſure, they ſtill gaue more occaſion of warre: and gathering all their warlike forces together, they went to Aſcalon, which is an old citie ſeauen hundred and twentie furlongs diſtant from Ieruſalem, which the Iewes alwaies hated, for which cauſe alſo they firſt aſſaulted it. The Gouernours in this expedition, were three men excellent about the reſt for ſtrength & wiſedome, to wit, Niger of Peræa, Silas the Babylonian, and Iohn the Eſſean. Now the citie of Aſcalon had very ſtrong wals, but few men to defend it; for it had onely one company of footmen, and one band of horſmen, whom Antonius gouerned. The Iewes made ſuch haſte, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perſwading himſelfe that they would aſſault him, cauſed his horſemen to iſſue forth of the citie: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his aduerſaries, he valiantly aboad the firſt aſſault of the enemies, and beat them backe that attempted to aſſault the wall. So the Iewes who were vnſkilfull, hauing to doe with them that were expert, & they beeing on foot, fighting againſt horſemen; without order; againſt thoſe that were in good order; being lightly armed, againſt their aduerſaries who were well provided, were eaſily repulled.

CFinally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good counſell; and they againſt whom they fought were obedient, and would doe nothing without the commandement of their Leader. For their firſt rankes beeing broken, they were forced by the horſemen to turn their backs; and turning themſelues to their owne company, who turned toward the wall, became as it were enemies to themſelues. So that euerie one ſeeking to auoide the horſemen, they vvere all diſperſed about the field, vvhich vvas in euery place for the aduantage of the horſemen. This greatly helped the Romans to kill ſo many Iewes: for they that fled were eaſily ouertaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compaſſing diuers of the Iewes about, ſlew them with darts: ſo that the Iewes were in as great deſperation for all their huge multitude, as if they had been alone.
The Iewes indeuouring to ouercome their miſfortunes, were aſhamed to flie, & ſo fled not haſtily, hoping that fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied in that which they did vvhith the Romans also were wounded in that fight. But the Iewes were not daunted with this misfortune, but the griefe thereof much encreased their courage: neither were they dismayed with the former losse of so many men within so short time; but rather calling to mind their great victories they had before, were drawne to vndergo yet another mishap. Shortly after, before their wounds were healed, they gathered together all their forces, and went againe to Ascalon in greater number and furie, but with the same successe and skill in warlike affaires which they had before. For Antonius having warning which way they meant to come, placed an ambush in the way; and the horsemen setting vpon them at vnwares, they killed about eight thousand of them, before they could prepare themselves to fight: and all the rest fled, and Niger with them, shewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant mind: and for that the enemies pursued them, they fled into the safest tower of a towne called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vaine to stay about the tower that was inuincible, yet loth to let the Generall of their aduersaries to escape, set fire on the wals; & so departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had been burned. But he leapt into a deepe vault in the Castle, and so escaped: and three daies after hee shewed himselfe vnto his souldiers, who sought for him weeping, that they might burie his body, for they thought him dead: whom against all expectation seeing aliue, they were very glad, as though by Gods prouidence hee escaped to be still their Leader.

Vespasian with his whole army cometh to Ptolemais. The Sephorites do curteously entertaine the Romans.

Vespasian came to Antiochia, which is the mother citie of all Syria, and brought his army with him, which for greatnesse and happy successe, doubtlesse was the third in the whole world; and finding that king Agrippa did expect his coming, he halted with all his forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came vnto him the citizens of Sephoris a citie of Galilee, who had no thought at all of rebellion: these both prouident for their owne safetie, and well knowing the forces of the Romans, before Vespasian came, submitted themselves vnto Cestius Gallus, and received from him a garrison of souldiers; and now also curteously entertaining Vespasian offered their help against their countremen. To whom Vespasian at their request gaue a guard of horse & foote, to great as hee thought was able to resist the force of their enemies, if the Iewes should attempt any thing against them. For he thought it would be a great helpe vnto him in his warre to come, to haue Sephoris the greatest citie of Galilee situate in a strong place on his side, which otherwise might be a safeguard to the whole nation.

CHAP. II.

The description of Galilee, Samaria, and Iudæa.

The description and situation of the higher Galilee.

Here are two places named Galilee, the one is called high Galilee, and the other lower Galilee; and they are both compassed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the west Ptolemais with the limits of his territorie doth part their borders, and the mount Carmell, which in time past belonged vnto Galilee, but now vnto the Tyrians. Vnto which adioyneth Gabaa, which signifieth the horsemens citie: so called for because king *Herod*s horsemen were sent thither to inhabite. On the South part it ioyneth to the Samaritanes and Scythopolitans vnto Iordan. On the East part it bordereth vpon Hippene, and Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, which are the borders of king *Agrippa*s his country. On the North it bordereth vpon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias vnto Zabulon; neere which is Ptolemais by the sea coast. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xaloth, situate in a great field vnto Bersabe, where also beginneth the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth vnto the village called Baca, bordering vpon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a village neer Iordan named Thella vnto Meroth. And beeing of such bignesse, and enuironed with so many nations, yet did they alwaies resist forraine forces: For the Galileans are from their childhood warlike, and neuer are daunted by feare or penurie: for their countrey is most fruitful, set with all manner of trees, and very fertile, notwithstanding the inhabitants take small paines in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the inhabitants, and there is no waste part.

The fertilitie of Galilee.

The description of the country beyond the Iord.

There are manie Cities, and in euerie place there are villages populous and rich: so that the least Village there, hath in it about fifteene thousand inhabitants. And although Galilee be lesse in compass than the region beyond the riuer, yet it is more populous, fertile, and richer than the same: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited, for there are many desert and barren places, and only beareth wilde fruits. Perceiue hath a good soile & large fields, beset with diuers trees, especially oliues, vines, and palme trees; and it is abundantly watered with brookes running from the mountaines, and springs

This towne Pella before mentioned, lieth on the North part, and Iordan on the West, and the countrey of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the East Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia and Gerasis. Samaria is seated between Iudæa and Galilee, beginning at a towne situate in a place called Ginara, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Iudæa. For both of them are full of mountaines and fieldes, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wild apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but haue raine enough, and haue passing sweet waters, and abundance of good grasse, and great store of mitch beasts, and which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. The confines of these countries is A B nath, a village otherwise called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of Iudæa. The South part of Iudæa, if you measure the length, is extended vnto the village of the Arabians, called Iaridan: the breadth reacheth from Iordan vnto Lopp: in the midst thereof is situate Ierusalem; and that some call that citie the nauell of that country. Iudæa also bordereth on the sea coast, which vnto Ptolemais. It is diuided into eleuen portions: the first is Ierusalem, head and chiefe of all, being about all the rest, as the head is about the body: & the rest are Toparchies. Gophna is the second, after that Acrabatena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda, also Ammaus, and Pella, and Iduma, and Engadda, & Herodium, and Iericho; besides these Samaria and Lopp command the places adioyning. Moreover, there is Gamala & Gaulanitis, & Batanea & Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to king *Agrippa*s his kingdom. This country beginneth at mount Libanus, & C the fountaines of Iordan, & reacheth in breadth vnto the lake neer Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Iulias to Arphas, and the inhabitants are partly Iewes, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How aide was sent vnto the people of Sephoris: and of the militarie discipline of the Romanes.

- Have already spoken of Iudæa as briefly as might be, and with what countries it is enuironed. Now Vespasian sent help vnto the inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thousand D horsemen, and sixe thousand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their gouernour: the horsemen diuided themselves into two companies, and lodged in a great Plaine, and the footemen were in garrison in the citie for to defend it, but the horsemen staid without. These horsemen made excursions on euery side, and greatly molested Ioseph, who was quietly bent, & also spoiled all that was without the cities, and alwaies repulled the inhabitants, if at any time they tooke courage to reuenge themselves. Notwithstanding, Ioseph assaulted the citie Sephoris, hoping to take it: which he before such time as it revolted vnto the Romanes, had compassed with so strong wals, that the Romans themselves could not haue taken it; so his hope was frustrate: for neither by force nor faire meanes would the Sephorites yeeld vnto him. Heereat the Romanes beeing angry, troubled the country more then before, who now neither night nor day ceased from destroying it, but robbed E and spoiled all they found, & all men able to beare armes they slew, and made the rest their slaues: Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and sword, and no man escaped that calamitie: onely they saued themselves, that fled into the cities that Ioseph had walled.

- Titus* came to Alexandria beeing winter, sooner then he was expected: and so received there the souldiers that hee was sent for, and hauing a prosperous iourney, hee quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his father there with two of the chiefe legions, to wit, the sixth and tenth, hee also adioyned that fifteenth legion that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen companies, five out of Cæsarea, one troupe of horsemen, and five companies of horsemen out of Syria: tenne of these companies of foot had in euerie one of them a thousand men, the rest onlie fixe hundred and thirteene; and in euery troupe of horsemen were a hundred and twentie. The kings also brought great aide: for Antiochus, Agrippa and Sohemus, brought each of them 2000 boawmen, and a thousand horsemen, and Malchus king of Arabia, brought 5000 foote, and 1000 horse, and the most of his footmen were archers; so that the whole army together with the kings aide, amounted vnto the number of thre score thousand horse and foot together; besides them that followed the campe, who were a great multitude, & not inferiour vnto the souldiers in warlike discipline: so that one may admire the Romanes, who so traine vp their seruants in time of peace, that they are verie fitte for warres. So that whosoever well beholdeth their militarie discipline, he shal perceiue that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, G but by vertue: for they do not only then begin to vse weapons when they come to fight, but they practise militarie discipline before they need, and they are not idle in time of peace, but alwaies practise themselues therein without ceasing. Their exercises are like warre it selfe, & euery souldier is euery day exercised in euery sort of weapons, euen as though they were fighting against the enemy; so that hereby they easily indure the burthen and traiaile of warres. For their disorder doth not make them forget what to do, neither doth feare dismay the, nor continuance of fight and war wearie and tire them. So that whosoever they fight against, who are not so well provided in these affaires, as they are, they alwaies overcome them: and one may well call their practises amongst themselues, conflicts without bloudshed; and their wars indeed, conflicts with bloudshed. They are not easily overcome at vnawares, for in what enemy-countrie soeuer they come, H they fight not before they haue fortified their campe about, which they do not rashly, neither do they pitch their tents in marsh or high places, after a disordered manner, for if the place be vnequall, they make it plaine. And they proportion their campe foure square: for they haue manie Smiths, and all kind of workmen needfull, which doe still follow the armie, to accomplish such business. And in the innermost part of the campe they make tabernacles, whose outside resembleth a wall, with towers equally distant one from another, and betweene them engines of warre to cast stones, and such like, that all kind of shot may be in readinesse. They also build four gates large and wide, both for their cattell easily to come in at, and also for themselues if need require, to enter in or issue out speedily.

Within the campe, there are streets diuided into certain spaces: in the midst their rulers, and amongst them all, the Generals tent like a temple, so that it seemeth a citie, and a market full of shops made in an instant. There are also seates builded for the gouernors to iudge of controuersies, if any arise between the souldiers and others. All this place and all things belonging thereto, are made in an instant, partly by reason of the multitude, partly by the industry of the that work: and if need require they compass it with a trench foure cubits deep, & as many broad. Thus the souldiers enclosed with armes, doe liue quietly in their tents, without disorder, and all things are done with good aduice and order, whether they need water, or corne, or wood: for they must all goe to dinner at the time appointed, and all sleep at once, and a trumpet giueth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded.

The reuerence & obedience of the Roman souldiers to their capitaines

How the Romanes forsake their campe.

The armour of the Roman footmen. The furniture of the Roman horlemen.

The Romanes attempt nothing vnadvisedly or rashly.

In the morning, all the souldiers come vnto their capitaines to salute the, & the capitaines to the K tribunes, and they all to the Generall, and he giueth them a watch word, and telleth them what he thinketh good, and how they shal behaue themselues towards those that are vnder them, whereby in fight they may demean themselves, and well know when to assault, and when to retire. When they goe forth of the campe a trumpet soundeth, and no man is idle, but at the first becke taketh away his tabernacle, & makes all ready for their departure. Then the trumpet soundeth againe, warning them to be ready: & hauing laden their beasts with their baggage, they expect the sound againe, as though they were to run a race, & at their departure they burn their camp, because it is easie to build the like againe, & also least afterwards it may aduantage their enemies. Vhen the trumpet hath sounded the third time, which is a signe to sette forward, then they hasten those that are slow, least they forsake their order. And a crier standeth on the right hand of their general, asking L thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often answer that they are, holding vp their right hands with lofty courage: & so they march on easily, euery man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to giue battell. The footmen haue a head peece, a breast plate, and a sword on the left side, and on the right side a dagger. The footmen that guard the generall haue Iauelin & a shield: the rest are armed euery one with bucklers & pikes. Moreover, they carry a saw, a basket, a fardle, a hatchet, also a cord, a sythe, & a chain, & victuals for 3 daies, so that the footmen are much laden as their cattell. The horlemen carie at their right side a long sword, in the left hand a dart, and a long shield hanging against the horse side, and a quiver with 3 darts with broad edges, which are as big as a speare: they haue also helmets and breast-plates like the footmen. And the generals horlemen that guard his body doe nothing differ from the rest. That company alwaies leadeh, that M the lot falleth vnto. And these are the fashions of the Romanes concerning their warlike discipline. They neuer doe any thing vnadvisedly in battaile, but manage all things according to counsell; so that they either do not erre, or if they doe, their fault is easily amended. For they thinke that bad successe after deliberation is better then good fortune without it; and they thinke that therein fortune did but flatter them, to worke them some great despite, by reason they haue not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it haue euill successe, yet it maketh them wary against

The Romanes grow more diligent by feare

The obedience of the Roman souldier is no small occasion of his victorie.

How farre the Roman gouernment extendeth.

A against another time. And none of them accounteth that good successe, which commeth by chance, & yet euery one is comforted in their misfortune, for that they take good aduice. By the militarie exercises they doe not only make the bodies of their souldiers strong, but their minds also more hardy: & their diligence is the greater by their feare. For their lawes are capital, not only for them that forsake their order, but also for them that commit the least enormity or negligence. The Romanes and their generals are more seuerer then their lawes: who only by rewarding the good, purchase fauour, least they seeme cruel in punishing the wicked. Moreover, they are so obedient vnto their rulers, that in peace they honour them, and in warre the whole army seemeth one body vnto together: they so keepe order, and are so ready to turne heere or there, and so attentiu to anie command, and so diligent to note signes made vnto them, & so quick to labour with their hands, B that they are alwaies apt to doe any thing, but slow to endure. Infomuch that they know no place, where they haue bene overcome, either by number or by courage, or counsell, or by the difficultie of the place, nor by fortune it selfe: For they thinke victory more certaine then Fortune. Therefore seeing that their deeds are ruled by aduice & counsell, and their commandments so well fulfilled by the Armie, what maruel is it if their Empire in the East reach vnto Euphrates, in the West vnto the Ocean, in the South vnto Affrick, in the North vnto Rhine and Danubius? seeing that one may iustly affirme the possession lesse then the possessors. Thus I haue spoken, not to praise the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie those that desire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good discipline, and are ignorant of the maners and customes of the Romans in their militarie affaires. But I returne to my purpose.

CHAP. IIII.

How Placidus assaulted Iotapata.

IN the meane time Vespasian liuing at Ptolemais with his son Titus, prepared his army. But Placidus was already entered into Galilee & run through it, where hee slew almost all he found who were of the weaker sort of people & cowards: And seeing that those of courage alwaies fled into the cities that Ioseph had fortified, he turned his forces against Iotapata, which was the strongest of them, thinking it might easily be taken by a suddain assault, and that he thereby should get great glorie, and that by taking it, great profit might ensue, in that D the people seeing the strongest citie surprised, they would not fly to any againe. But it fel not out as hee expected; for the people of Iotapata vnderstanding of his comming, met him neere the towne, and sodainly encountering the Romans, being a great multitude and wel disposed to fight, as those that bare armes for the generall safety of the country, and for the liues of their wiues and children, they put to the Romanes to flight, wounding many, only seuen being slaine: for the Romanes in flying kept their ranks: and being armed round about, they were not daungerouslie wounded; but the Iewes being vnarmed, rather trusted to their darts and arrowes then to handie blows. There were three Iewes slaine, and a few wounded: and so Placidus when hee saw himselfe repulsd from the towne, he fled.

How Vespasian innuaded Galilee, and how at the very sight of him the seditious fled.

Vespasian desirous to take Galilee himself, departed from Ptolemais, making such iournies as souldiers ought to keepe, which the Romanes are wont to follow. And he commanded those that came to helpe him, and the bowmen because they were lighter armed, to go before and repress the enemies incursions, and search the wood & Forrest fit for ambushes, whereby they were to passe: after them followed part of the Roman footmen and horlemen: & after them there marched ten by ten out of euery hundredth, bearing with them their armour, and the measures of their camp. After them followed men, whose office it was to mend the waies, where they were bad, and cut downe the woods that were in the way, least with bad way the armie were tired. After them he sent his baggage and the baggage of the rulers vnder him, and withall horlemen to guard it. And after them hee himselfe followed, leading an armie of choisen footmen and horlemen, accompanied with his owne gard of horlemen, and hee had out of euery legion sixscore men for his own gard. After followed they that carried the engines to batter the wals of cities, and other instruments, and with them the Prefects & Tribunes, guarded with their choisen souldiers. After them other ensignes, and the Eagle, the which the Romans

IOSEPHVS, OF THE WARRES

Ioseph forsake by his friends flies to Tiberias.

Romans hold for chiefe of all, because it is the King of all birdes, and is most valiant and strong. Wherefore they thinke it a signe of dominion & victory, ouer all them against whom they beare it. After these sacred ensignes followed the trumpets sounding in warlike maner; and after them the armie marching six in a ranke; and as the custome is, a centurion went by them to keepe order: the seruants were all with the footemen and baggage. After the last company who were hired, followed armed footemen & horsemen in great number. And thus Vespasian with his whole army came vnto the borders of Galilee; and there pitching his Tents, he staied the souldiers who were very eager to fight: as it were boasting and shewing his army to terrifie his aduersaries, and giuing them time to repent, if any one would alter his mind before the warre began, yet did hee prepare to besiege the wals and fortresses. The onely sight of him made many rebels flee, & daunted the most of them. For Iosephs souldiers who had pitched his Tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that warre grew on, & that they were presently to fight with the Romans, they did not onely fly before they fought: but also before they saw their enemies. Ioseph being left with a very few, knowing he was not able to abide the enemies: and that the Iewes were discomfited, and that if he put any trust in them, they would for the most part reuolt vnto the enemies; for that time abstained from all warre, and thought to get himselfe out of danger: and so accompanied with them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

CHAP. VI.

How Gadara was besieged and taken.

V*espasian* went vnto Gadara, and tooke it at the first assault: for all able men fit for warre were fled out of the citie: and entering the citie, he put all to death. For the Romans had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceiued against the Iewes, & partly in reuenge of that which had befallen Celsus. And they burned the citie & all townes and villages adioining: some of them being already desolate, and the inhabitants of the rest were made slaues. Ioseph fled into the city which he made choise of for his safegard, & filled it with fear. For the people of Tiberias thought he would neuer haue fled, if there had been any hope of withstanding the Romans: wherein they iudged nor amisse, for he did foresee what euent those wars would haue, and that their onely safetie consisted in changing their rebellious minds. He himselfe, though he hoped to obtaine pardon of the Romans, yet had he farre more rather haue died, then to haue liued pleasantly with them against whom he was sent, and so become a traitor vnto his countrie committed to his charge. Wherefore hee determined faithfully to write all his estate, and the estate of the country vnto the nobility at Ierusalem, and not to extoll the enemies forces too much, least they should say hee was a coward; nor yet putting the in any comfort, least perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, againe by his letters should be incited to goe forward in their rebellious course: willing them presently to write an answer, whether they thought it good to enter into league with the Romans; or if they would make warre, then they should send a sufficient armie against the Romans: and hauing written to this effect, he presently sent men away to Ierusalem to beare these letters.

Ioseph is afraid of the Romans, and writeth to Ierusalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the siege of Iotapata.

V*espasian* was very desirous to take Iotapata, for that he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and for that this was the strongest refuge they had. So hee sent before footemen and horsemen, to plaine the waies which were full of ragged stones, so that it was hard for footemen to passe, and altogether vnpossible for horsemen: who within foure daies effected that which they were commaunded, and made a large way for the armie to passe. And the fifth day which was the one and twentieth of March, Ioseph before they came entered into the citie, comming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Iewes who were dismayed. A certain run-away signified vnto Vespasian that Ioseph was come thither, willing him to haste thither, for if he could take Ioseph he might easily take all Iudæa. Hereat Vespasian was very glad & took it as good fortune, that the most prudent & port of his enemies, should (God at that time so working) put himselfe as it were in hold, & so presently he sent Placidus before with a thousand horsemen, and with him capitaine Ebutius, a man both strong, valiant and prudent, and commaunded them to compassse the citie with a siege, least Ioseph should priuily escape from thence. The day

Ioseph cometh to Iotapata from Tiberias.

Iotapata besieged.

OF THE IEWES. THE III. BOOKE.

The year of the world 4031, after Christs birth, 69.

A day after he himselfe followed with the whole army, and about noone came to Iotapata, and leading his army vnto the North side of the towne, he pitched his tents vpon a hill seuen stounds distant from the citie. Vpon purpose placing himselfe within the view of his enemies, that the very sight of his armie might terrifie them: which hee also did; for presently euery one was in such a feare, that none durst goe out of the citie. The Romans being wearied all that day, would not assault the city: wherefore they inuironed the town with two squadrons, and the third that consisted in horsemen, was placed without to intercept all passage, that none of the Iewes could passe any whither. Hereby the Iewes now in desperation tooke heart; for in warre nothing is more forcible then necessitie. The next day began the batterie, and euery Iew kept his quarter: and kept themselves in order, and resisted the Romans before their wals. But when Vespasian sent all the bowmen, and those who cast darts and other things to beate them off of the walles, and hee himselfe with footemen assaulted the walles in another place where they might easily be entered: then Ioseph fearing the citie, accompanied with all the people issued out of the towne, and assaulted the Romans fiercely, and did driue them from the walles, shewing courage and strength: and they themselves suffered as much harme as they did vnto their enemies. For as they were encouraged with desperation, so were the Romans with shame, who were armed with military knowledge and strength, and the Iewes onely with anger. And the fight continued all day euen vntill night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteene slaine: and of the Iewes there were six hundred wounded, and seuentene slaine. The next day also they met the Romans, and resisted them more stoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had resisted them, contrary to their expectation: and all the Romans fought more valiantly, ashamed as it were of themselves, in suffering the Iewes to resist them; thinking withall, that they themselves were overcome, if they did not quickly suppress their enemies. Wherefore the Romans for foue daies together ceased not to assault the towne, and the Iewes strongly rebatted them: and now neither the Iewes feared their enemies, nor the Romans were dismayed with the difficultie of taking the towne. Iotapata is almost all situated vpon a rocke, and compassed about with deep valleys, which descend straight downe like a wall: so that one can scarcely see the bottome. There is only access vnto it on the North part, where it is seated vpon a mountaine going ouerthwart; which Ioseph inclosed with a wall, so the end it might bee no passage for the enemies: all the rest of the citie is inuironed with high mountaines, so that it cannot be discerned by any before they be hard at it. And Iotapata was thus strengthened.

Nothing is more effectuall in war or more desperate then necessitie.

A fight betwene the Romans and the Iewes continued a whole day, and broken off by night.

The situation of Iotapata.

V*espasian* determined both to stricke against the nature of the place, and hardines of the Iewes; and therefore called all his captaines together, and consulted with them to begin a hot siege: at last they resolved to reare a mount in that place where the citie was easiest to be entered. Hee sent his whole army to prouide wood to doe it, who cut down the mountaines neere vnto the towne: and great store of wood and stone being brought, setting hurdles before them to beare off the darts and arrowes, hee began to raise a mount; so that they receiued little or no harme by darts cast from off the wals: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Iewes cast continually great stones and all kinde of darts vpon that which defended them; which though they pierced not thorough, yet they made a great noise and terrified the workemen.

E Which Vespasian seeing, caused all engines that did cast stones and darts, which were in number a hundred and threescore, to be placed against the wals, to beate the Iewes from thence. And so they cast stones and darts, and fire, and arrowes in great abundance: so that they did not onely beate the Iewes from off the wals, but also out of the reach of their shot; for both the Arabian archers and those that vsed slings and darts, & all the engines continually plaid vpon them. For all this the Iewes rested not, but running out in companies as theewes, they took away that which defended the workemen, and then assaulted them hauing no defence: and when they had beaten them away, destroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their owne defence and safegard. At last Vespasian perceived that these domages happened for that there was space left betwene all these works, whereby the enemies had access to doe them such harmes: wherefore hee vnited them together, and so hindered the priue excursions of the Iewes. When the mount was almost made and the towers vpon it finished, Ioseph afraid to doe nothing for the safegard of the towne, called all workemen necessarie together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they said it was vnpossible for them to worke, for the number of shot in that place. Then Ioseph made this deuise to defend them: hee fixed stakes in the ground, and fastened vnto them hides of Kine & Oxen new slaine, by which they were defended from shot, and fire; so that they labouring night and daie raised the wall twentie cubits high, creating also vpon it many towers: and by this meanes made it a strong defence. Whereat the Romans, G who before thought themselves sure of the towne, were now greatly dismayed both by this device of Iosephs, and also by the hardiness of the Iewes.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the siege of Iotapata by Vespasian, and the diligence that Ioseph used, and how the Iewes made excursions against the Romans.

THis stratageme and the carriage of the Iewes greatly moued Vespasian: for now they receiving courage in that defence, made assaults vpon the Romans of their owne accord, & H every day skirmished, running out in companies, and like theeues, taking away whatsoever they lighted vpon; and what they could not carry away, they set on fire. At last Vespasian would not permit his souldiers to fight any longer: but determined now to besiege it and take it by want of victuals, purposing either to make them come and yeeld themselves for lack of food, or if they held out, to famish them: & that it would bee more easie to take it by force, if ceasing awhile from assailing it, he afterward let vpon it, they being in anguish for the danger they were in. Wherefore he commanded all passages to be kept, that none could go out of the city. But they had great store of corne, and of all other things else, except salt and water, whereof they stood in great want, for there is neuer a fountaine in the city, and they haue little raine in sommer time, so that the inhabitants were in great distresse; for now there was hardly any water left in the citie. I Ioseph perceiving there was abundance of all things else, and that the citizens were valiant, as also the siege like to continue long, he gaue to euery one water in measure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to haue it in that manner, & now they began to faint, as though they had suffered extreame drought. The Romans perceived this, being vpon a high hill, ouer against the place which all the Iewes came together to receiue water, and they with their shotte killed many that came thither, insomuch that Vespasian hoped that within short time their water would bee spent, and they constrained to yeeld. But Ioseph to frustrate this hope, commaunded a great many garments to be laid in water and hanged vpon the wals, so that the water might run down on euery side. When the Romanes saw this, they were much grieved & affraid, for that they wasted so much water in mockery, and before had thought K that they had wanted water to drinke. And now Vespasian scorned to win the city by siege, purposed to assault it againe by force. The Iewes were very glad of this themselves: and the citie in danger, rather wishing to bee slaine then perish through hunger or thirst, Ioseph deuised also another way to get such necessaries that he wanted out of the country: for there was a valley out of the way, & therefore not regarded by the Romans: wherefore Ioseph sent men into the countie to his friends for such things as the citie wanted, by this way; commaunding them when they came neere the watchmen, to hide and couer themselves with hairie skins, that the watchmen might thinke them to be dogs, and this he used a good space, till at last the watchmen perceived it, and so let a guard there to stop the passage. When Ioseph perceived the city could not hold out long, and fearing his own life, if still he continued there, hee treated with the chiefe of the Citie L that he might fly. But the people perceiving his intent, flocked about him, and besought him to take pitie vpon them, and not forsake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming that for his sake they were all courageous and bold to fight, & if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort vnto them, telling him that it did not become him to fly from his enemies, nor to forsake his friends, neither as it were to leape out of a ship shaken with a tempest, into the which hee came when the seas were calme, for so by this meanes he would soon ouerthrow the citie; & once gone, no man afterward could or durst resist their enemies; for in him was all their hope.

Ioseph kept it to himselfe that his purpose was to worke his owne safety, for hee told them the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming that though he staid still in the citie, yet he could doe them little good, and if the citie should chance to be taken, then hee and they were like to perish; but if hee were abroad and not besieged, hee could doe them great good: for hee M would presently assemble all the people of Galilee, and come against the Romanes, and so raise their siege; whereas now in staying with them he saw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romanes against them, making them more earnest to take the towne then they would be, onely because he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that hee were fled, they would not then be so earnest in the siege. Ioseph herewith could not perswade the

A people, but they flocked faster about him, and both young and old of all sorts came and prostrated themselves at his feete, weeping, and beseeching him to take such hap as should befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they enuied his escape, but for that they hoped they should receiue no harme if he remained with them.

He then bethought himselfe that if he staid with them, he fulfilled their request; & if he denied, he feared they would force him. Wherefore being partly moued by compassion, he determined to stay; & being now, as al the city was, desperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, seeing there was no hope of safety: & that it was a goodly matter to spend their liues renownedly, & do some noble act to leaue a remembrance vnto their posterity of their valour: and so went about it. And issuing out of the city with the most valiant amongst them, when he had killed the B watchmen, at the first encounter he came euen vnto the Romans tents, & tore the skins that their tents were made of, and fired others, and their engines: and so he did the second and third day, and for certaine daies & nights afterward neuer ceased. When Vespasian perceived the Romans greatly endamaged by such excursions & very loath to fly for shame, & not able to follow them being so laden with their armor, & that the Iewes alwaies did some exploit before they retired themselves into the city; he gaue commaundement vnto his souldiers to leaue their assault, and not to fight against men who desired to die, affirming that no men were stronger then those in desperation, & that if they found none to assaile, their courage would soon bee alaid; like vnto a flame of fire, when the matter that nourisheth it, is consumed. Moreover, the Romans must seeke victory more warily, for that they fought not for necessity, but only to increase their dominions: and C after that oftentimes they beat the Iewes by the Arabian archers, and with slings and darts, and other shot which neuer ceased, and so the Iewes by this meanes were repressed. But so soone as they were without the danger of the shot, they more furiously assailed the Romans, sparing neither bodie nor minde, but continually fought by turnes, and euery one of the citie assisted them that so laboured.

CHAP. IX.

How Vespasian did beat the walles of Iotapata with a Ramme, and other warlike Engines.

Vespasian thinking himselfe as it were besieged, both for the long time which hee had continued the siege, and also for the diuers assaults and priuie excursions of the Iewes, hauing now almost raised the Rampiers as high as the wals of the city, determined to batter them with a Ramme. A Ramme is a huge beame like the mast of a A Ramme ship, whole end is armed with a strong masiue yron, made in the forme of a Rams head: whereupon it taketh his name, because he butteth with his head. It hagerh on another beam with ropes, like the beame of a paire of ballances: the beame it hangeth on lying acrosse is held vp with two props, which being drawne backe by force of many men, and then jointly with all their forces shoomed forward, it striketh the wall with the head of yron: And there is no wall nor tower so strong, but though it abide the first strokes of the engine, yet can it not hold out long. The general of the Romanes thought good to vse this meanes to take the citie by force, for that the siege was dangerous, by reason that the Iewes neuer rested; so the Romans with all kind of shot endeououred to beat the Iewes from off the walles that made any resistance: and the archers and they who vied slings, were hard by, and when they saw that none of the Iewes durst come vpon the wals, they applied the Ramme vnto them; & couered it aloft with hurdles and skins, both for to defend themselves and the engine, and at the first assault the wals were shaken, so that the citizens cried as though the towne had beene already taken. Ioseph seeing them still beat one place, and that presently the wall would fall, deuised away to resist the force of the Ramme, and so he filled lackes with chaffe, and let them downe off the wall iust against that place, where the Ram strook ordinarily, and so brake the force of the blowes, the loosenes of the chaffe making no resistance; F and so drowning or abating the violence of the stroke. By this meanes the Romans were hindered: for whither soeuer they brought the Ramme, thither did they vpon the walles also remove the lackes of chaffe, and brake the force thereof: till at last the Romans also deuised a way to cut these lackes, taking long poles and binding Siethes vnto the ends of them, and so cut these lackes of chaffe. And the Ramme shooke the wall, and the wall newly built was not strong enough to resist. Then Ioseph and his souldiers sought to helpe themselves by fire workes, and so they fired all that was made of drie wood in thier several places; and withall the engines, and fortes, and mounts of the Romans, who now had much ado to defend themselves: first, because that they were terrified with the valour of the Iewes: and secondly, because euery one had worke enough to defend himself against the fire, which seising vpon dry matter with Brimstone and Pitch wonderfully encreased; so that in one houres space it consumed all the workes that the Romanes had made with so great labour. There was a Iew the sonne of Samaus called Eleazar, who deserved eternall memory: this man was born at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar tooke vp a great stone, and cast it downe with such force vpon the Ramme, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing, leapt downe amongst the midst of his enemies, and brought it away into the citie: at last being vnarmed, and as it were a marke for his enemies to shoote at, hee receiued in his bodie siue arrowes; and as though he had not felt them, so soone as he had gotten vp the wall where all might see him, he boldly stood still, and so through griefe of his wounds hauing the head of the Ram in his armes fell downe. Next vnto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee shewed themselves valiant, named Netiras and Philip, who assaulted the tenth legion of the Romans with such violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that sought to withstand them: which Ioseph and those that were with him perceiuing, tooke fire and burnt the engines, workes, & defences of the fift and tenth legions that were fled, and those that followed destroyed all engines, and other matter that was left. In the euening the Romanes againe erected the Ramme against that part of the citie which before they had beaten, and so began afresh to shake the wall in the same place that before they had battered: and one of the Iewes shot an arrow from the wall, & wounded Vespasian in the sole of the foote, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was spent before it came to him, hauing come a great way off.

This fact greatly troubled the Romans, who seeing Vespasian bleed, presently spread these newes through the whole armie, and almost all of them came running to see their generall, and especially Titus who feared his fathers death: so that the whole army partly for the loue of their generall, and partly for the feare of Titus his sonne, were greatly troubled: but Vespasian presently freed the armie from all perturbation; and his sonne Titus from feare. For the grief of the wound being past, hee shewed himselfe to all that were sorrowfull for him, and incited them to fight against the Iewes more earnestly then before; and now euery one as it were to reuenge their generall, despised all danger, and assaulted the wals, one exhorting another. Ioseph and his associates, notwithstanding that many of them were killed with shot, darts and arrowes; yet they forooke not the wals, but with fire and sword, and stones fiercely assaulted them, that being defended with hurdles battered the walles with the Ramme, but to little purpose: for they were continually killed, being in sight of their enemies, and for that they could not see them, presently were stricken downe. For their fire did make such a light as though it had been day, so that the Romans easily perceiued whither to direct their shot: and for that their engines were not perceiued afar off, the Iewes could not defend themselves from the arrowes and stones which were shot against them, by which meanes many of them were slaine, and the tops and corners of the towers beaten downe. And there was no man so well guarded, but he was slaine by force of those stones; so that any man may know of what force that engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that stood neere Ioseph vpon the wall was stricken with a stone, and his head caried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had been cast out of a sling: and the next day a woman great with child was stricken on the belly with one of those stones, and the child caried forth of her from the place where she was stricken three furlongs; so great was the force of this engine: Therefore the violence of the engines was more terrible, and likewise the noyse of darts, arrowes and other shot. And many were slaine on euery side, and the bodies of those that were killed, stricken against the wall made a noyse: and within the citie was heard a pitifull lamentation, and weeping among the women; and without a heavy mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: so that now the multitude of dead bodies had so filled the ditch before the wall, that the Romans might easily passe ouer them into the citie, and the mountaines about did echo with the cries of the citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the eie or eare moue terror. And many stoutly fighting for Iotapata died most valiantly, many also were sore wounded: and notwithstanding the wall was continually battered, yet it was almost morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ram. And then they of Iotapata repaired the breach with their bodies and armour, before the Romans could set bridges to enter it.

How Iotapata was againe assaulted.

IN the morning Vespasian brought his army to enter the breach, hauing giuen them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Iewes that defended the breach to forsake their place, before such time as he entered, he tooke the most valiant of his horlemen and vnhorled them, being armed from the head vnto the foot, and placed them in three ranks, that they, being so armed, might besiege round that part of the wall that was battered, and to take long pikes in their hands, so that as soone as the bridges were set, they should first enter the breach. After them he placed the strongest of his footmen: the rest of his horlemen hee set round about the citie vpon the mountaine, to the end that none might escape thereout: after the footmen he commanded archers to follow with their arrowes ready in their hands, and them that used slings also, and other engines for shot. And he caused other to scale the wals, where they were not battered, to the intent that the townsmen busied in resisting them, might leaue the breach vnmaned; and the rest being wearied & oppressed with the thickeesse of the shot, should of force forsake their standing. But Ioseph perceiuing his intent, placed old men and children, and those that were already wearied, vpon those parts of the wals that were not battered: & himselfe with the stoutest in the citie went to defend the breach, and placed sixe men before them, whom hee choole out, himselfe being one of them, to sustaine the first brunt of their enemies assault: commanding them likewise to stoppe their eares, to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the armie. He willed them also to defend themselves with shields against the darts and arrowes, and giue back a little; till such time as the archers quiuers were emptied: and if so be that the Romans should offer to make bridges, that then they with their instruments should resist; & that euery one should now fight, not to defend his country, but as it were to recover it being in a maner already lost; & imagine that they now did see their aged me murdered with their children, and their wiues almost taken by their enemies, and now to reuenge themselves vpon those that hereafter would massacre their whole citie: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, women and children, seeing the citie compassed about with three ranks of horlemen, & that the Romans with their swords drawne preased against the breach, that all the mountaines about did shine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certaine Arabians to serue the archers with arrowes: they cried out as though the citie were now taken, so that a man would haue iudged them already amidst their enemies swords, and not onely in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Ioseph commaunded the women to their houses, least their cries should effeminate his souldiers minds; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threatned them if they did not: and so he marched vnto the breach, which place fell vnto his lot, & gaue no heed to them that sought to scale the wals, but onely beheld afarre off the force of the arrowes.

When all the trumpets began to sound, and the ayre to be obscured with the multitude of arrowes, Iosephs companions remembring the charge giuen them, stopped their eares; and armed their bodies against the shot of arrowes: And so soone as the bridges were set against the wal, presently they ran; and before the Romanes could enter vpon them, they got them into their hands, and resisted them that sought to come vpon them, shewing great prowesse and strength, & themselves no way inferiour vnto the Romans, though they were in extreame danger, and the Romans in none: and did not giue one foote backe, till either they did kill or were killed. But the Iewes had not any fresh men to second them that were tired, and the Romans still as they were wearied, sent fresh supply; and ioyning together their long shields, exhorting one another; they became as it were a wall or defence inuincible; and the whole armie like one body did beare backe the Iewes, and so set foote on the wals. Then Ioseph in this desperate case, deuised some way to repell this present calamitie: wherefore he commanded the Iewes to fetch scalding oyle, which they had ready, and poure it vpon the Romans yet seething, who also cast the pannes vpon them. This deuise brake the ranks of the Romans, so that with great paine and griefe, they fell from the wall, and tumbled downe: for the scalding oyle easily gorte between their flesh and armour, and scorched them like fire being easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the farnesse; and the Romanes being laden with helmets & breast-plates could not flie, so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others for griefe died; others would haue retired themselves, but could not; because their enemies followed them so hard: But neither the Romanes wanted vertue and valour valour in aduerser fortune, nor the Iewes prudence & good aduise. For the Romans notwithstanding they were in intolerable paine, being scalded with hot oyle, yet did they freshly assault them that hurt them, and euery one did thrust him forward that was before him, as it were desirous to shew their courage. Then the Iewes vied another deuile to make them retire: for they poured fenugreek boiled vpon the bridge, so that they slid downe: and neither they that would haue fled, nor they who did strue to assault the Iewes, could stand vpon their feet, it was so slipperie; and many falling downe vpon the bridge, were by their owne company troden to death; others did slide downe vpon the Rampier, and alwaies as they fell, the Iewes strooke them: and seeing that the Romans were retired from the place, so that now they were not forced to handy blowes, they had leisure to shoote arrowes and darts against them. When Vespasian saw that his men in that fight endured much misery, towards euening hee caused them to retire, many beeing slaine, and more wounded, and six men of Iotapata were slaine, and about three hundred wounded: this fight was vpon the twentieth day of Iune. But after that Vespasian had comforted his souldiers, for that which had happened, and perceiuing that they were angry, and desired to fight to reuenge themselves, so that they needed no exhortation; he raised the Rampier higher, and erected three towers fittie foote high, couering the aloft with iron, that so by reason of their weight they might stand stedfast, and not be consumed by fire: and these he placed vpon the rampiers, and in them Archers, and men that cast darts and such like: who not being perceiued of them that were vpon the wall because of the highnesse of the towers, and the couering thereof, easily wounded them who were placed thereon. So the Iewes when they could not auoid the arrowes, nor bee reuenged vpon them vvhom they could not see, nor yet fire the towers beeing couered with plates of iron, forsooke the wals, yet alwaies encountered with them vvhom sought to enter. And the people of Iotapata thus resisted, notwithstanding that many euery day were slaine, and that they did their enemies no harme without great danger to themselves.

CHAP. XI.

How Iapha was taken by Traianus and Titus.

T this time Vespasian vnderstood that Iapha a citie neer Iotapata minded to rebel, encouraged so to do, for that they vnderstood how they of Iotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: vvhether he sent thither Traianus gouernour of the tenth legion, and with him 2000 footmen, and a thousand horie: who perceiuing the towne able to resist, and the inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him (for the towne beeing for the situation strong enough, it was also compassed with a double wall) seeing this, he fought with them, and after awhile put them to flight, and the Romans following them, brake in with them at the first gate: which the citizens perceiuing, shut the second gate, not suffering their owne citizens to enter in, for feare that the enemies also should rush in with them, as they had done into the first gate. Truly God gaue that victorie vnto the Romans, whose will it was that all warlike men of the citie should haue their own gates shut vpon them, and so fall into their enemies hands, who were most greedy to destroy them. For many came to the gates, and called those that kept them by their names, pittifully intreating that they might come in: which whilst they did, they were butchered like sheepe, beeing enclosed between two wals: their own citizens hauing shut one gate vpon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus enclosed perished with their fellowes swords, & an infinite number by the rage of the Romanes, hauing no courage to resist and reuenge themselves. For the treason of their owne citizens and the terror of their enemies together, vtterly discouraged them, and so they died all in number 12 thousand, not cursing the Romanes, but the Iewes their owne countremen. Traiane, thinking that the citie was now destitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durst not resist being thus terrified, referred the taking of the citie for the Generall, & sent messengers vnto him, requesting him to send his sonne Titus to make an end of the victory. Vespasian fearing that yet there would be some resistance, sent Titus with 500 horimen, and 1000 foot: who halting thither, placed Traianus on the left side of the town, & himselfe on the right, so the Romans entered vnto the wals, & the Galileans hauing awhile resisted, presently left them. Then Titus & his followers leaping downe presently got into the citie, & began a vehement fight with them that were assembled therein, some valiantly issuing out of the narrow streets, & assaulting them, and the women casting such things as they could get vpon the Romans from the toppes of their houses, and thus they held battell fixe houres. When their fighting men were all slaine, then the old

The number of them that were slaine both in the citie and in the first conflict, amounted vnto 15000; and the number of those that were led into captiuitie, were one thousand, one hundred and thirtie: and this massacre of the Galileans happened the 25 day of Iune.

How Carcalis conquered the Samaritanes.

B He Samaritanes also were partakers of this calamitie, who assembled themselves together in mount Garizin, which they account a sacred place. But both their assembly and their courage did portend their wars: and not warned by their neighbors harmes, nor with any aduise or iudgement considering their own infirmie and the Romanes power, began to be tumultuous. Vespasian foreseeing this, thought it good to prevent them: and although all the region of Samaria had garrisons in it, yet for all the great multitude assembled, it was thought that the garrisons were able to keepe them vnder. Wherefore he sent thither Carcalis the Tribune of the fift legion with six hundred horsemen, and three thousand footmen. Carcalis thought it not the best way to goe vnto the mountaine; and fight with the whole multitude, because a great many of their enemies were vpon it: wherefore he commanded his souldiers to beleger the mountaine about at the foote thereof, and so keepe them there all the whole day. There happened at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritanes wanted water, for it was then Sommer, and the people had not provided themselves of victuals, so that many in one day, one for want of drinke died of thirst, the rest preferred death before the misery they endured, and so fled vnto the Romans; of whom Carcalis learned that those that yet remained on the mount, were euen dismayed by the misery they endured. Wherefore hee ascended the mountaine, and compassing about the enemies with his armie, he first exhorted them to yield; willing them to saue themselves, promising them all their liues, if they would cast downe their weapons: but nothing preuailing with them, he set vpon them, and killed them all, in number eleven thousand & fixe hundred: and this was done the 27 day of Iune: & these were the miseries that befel the Samaritanes.

CHAP. XIII.

How Iotapata was taken.

F He Citizens of Iotapata endured this hard siege contrary to all expectation, and in the seauen and fortieth day the Romans mounts were raised higher then their walls: on the same day, one of the citie fled vnto Vespasian, and told him in what case the citie stood, and how few citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were farre spent, whereby they were not able to resist any more, and that they might be taken by policie if they were followed: for in the last part of the night, beeing wearie, they ceased from their labour, and slept vntill the morning: wherefore hee perswaded Vespasian to assault them at that time. But Vespasian knowing how faithfull the Iewes were one vnto another, and how they contemned all punishment, gaue little credit vnto this run-away: for a litle before one of Iotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confesse, or disclose the estate of the citie, whom the fire nothing moued, & so at last he was crucified, laughing, & scorning death: yet a probable coniecture which he had, perswaded him to giue credit somewhat vnto this traitors words: and for that he knew no great harm could befall him, if he so assaulted the citie, as the traitor willed, he commanded the man to be kept, and made all his army in readinesse to assault the towne. So at the hower appointed, he made towards the wals with silence; Titus being the first, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus a tribune, and a few of the 15 legion: who killing the watchmen, entered into the citie, & after them Sextus Carenis and Placidus with their companies; so the castle was taken, and the enemies were in the midst of the towne, and it was faire day light, and yet the townes-men knew nothing, beeing now fast asleepe after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could see nothing, there was so thick a mist by chance that morning, & the rest neuer wakened till death was at their dore; and that they perceiued their calamitie and destruction. The Romans mindfull of all that had befallen them in the time of the siege, did neither ther spare nor pitie any one: but driuing the people out of the higher part of the citie into the lower part thereof, they massacred them all, where they that would could not fight for the narrownesse of the place: so being cumbered for want of roome, and sliding downe the banks for haste, their enemies still pursuing them, they were easily slaine. Many of Iosephs guard seeing this that they could not fight, gathered themselves together in a corner of the citie, and slew themselves, that the Romans might not kill them. But some of the watchmen, who first perceiued the citie to be taken, fledde into a tower, and resisted awhile (this tower was situate on the North side of the citie) and at last being enuironed with their enemies, towards euening yielded, & offered themselves to be slaine. And the Romans might haue boasted that that victory had bin without bloodshed on their part, had not Antonius a Centurion been slaine treacherously. For one of them who fled into the caues (as many did) requested Antonius to giue him his hand, in token that he might come out safe & without danger: which he doing vnadvisedly, straightway the Jew with a speare smore him in the flanke, whereof he presently died. The Romans that day slew all the people that they found, and the daies following they searched all the secret places, and drew those out of the caues and denues that had fled thither, and slew all but women and infants: so that they tooke away a thousand and two hundred captiues: and the number of them who were slaine during the siege, and at such time as the citie was taken, amounted vnto fortie thousand. And Vespasian commanded the citie to be destroyed, and the castles to be burned, and so Iotapata was taken the 13 yecre of Aero his raigne, on the first of Iuly.

CHAP. XIII.

How Ioseph was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deedes and wordes.

BVt especially about all others, the Romans made diligent search for Ioseph, both for the hatred they bare him, & also because Vespasian greatly desired to get him, for that hee being taken, the greatest part of the warres were then ended; so they sought him amongst the dead, and amongst those that were hid; but hee (fortune fauouring him) when the citie was taken, escaped from the midst of his enemies, and leapt into a deep Well, which had a large caue on the one side, the which they about could not perceiue; where he found fortie principall men who had prouision for many daies. The enemies being in euery place, he in the day time lay hid, and in the night he went forth to see if he could escape; and perceiuing that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, hee returned againe into the caue, and lay there two daies: the third day a certaine woman that had bin with them in the caue was taken, and so he was descried. Then Vespasian sent two Tribunes to him to promise him safety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Ioseph would not accept their offer, fearing that because he had bene the author of all the evils that the Romans had indured, that therefore they sought him out to punish him: till Vespasian sent vnto Ioseph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of Iosephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted vnto him how milde the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Romane captiues rather admired him for his vertue, then hated him. Moreover, that his Generall intended not to punish him (which if he pleased he might doe whether he yeelded himselfe or no) but to saue him, who was so valiant a man: adding also, that if Vespasian meant ill, hee would neuer haue employed his friend in such a message, to vse friendship (so noble a vertue) to so euill a purpose, as to worke treason: and that hee, though Vespasian had bene so minded, would neuer haue consented to haue betrayed his friend. Ioseph, after Nicanors words beganne to studie, as doubtfull what was best to doe. Whereat the souldiers being angry, beganne to cast fire into the caue: but Vespasian hindered them, being desirous to take Ioseph aliue. Nicanor ceased not to intreat him: and hee perceiuing how his enemies beganne to waxe angry, and calling to mind the dreames he had in the night, vvherein God foretold him of all the Jewes calamities, & what should betide the Romane princes (for hee could interpret dreames, and whatsoever God obscurely shewed, being instructed in the holy bookes of the Prophets, and himselfe a priest as his parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the spirit of GOD, and recording the dreames and horrible visions which hee saw in his sleepe, hee prayed secretly to GOD, after this manner: O Creator (quoth hee) seeing that it pleaseth thee to ruinate the nation of the Jewes, and that all good fortune is gone vnto the Romans, and that thou hast chosen my soule to foretell future euents, I yield vnto the Romans to saue my life, protesting that I meane not to goe to them to play the traytour vnto my countrey,

A but as thy minister; and hauing thus spoken, he yielded himselfe vnto Nicanor. But they, who fled into the caue where Ioseph was, perceiuing that Ioseph yeelded vnto the Romans, stocked al about i. m, and cried out. How are our countrey lawes violated? VVhere are those promises of GOD made vnto the Jewes? where are those gallant minds that contemne and despise death? Art thou Ioseph desirous to liue, and see thy selfe to become a vile bond slaue? How loone hast thou forgotten thy selfe? How many hast thou perswaded to embrace death for their libertie sake? Truly thou hast but a shadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou doost hope that they will saue thy life, against whom thou hast so behaved thy selfe: or if they would saue thee, to desire life at their hands. But seeing the Romans offer hath made thee forget thy selfe; yet wee, to preserve the honour and credit of our countrey, will lend thee our armes and swords, and so if thou beest willing to die, die like the Generall of the Jewes: which if thou refuse to doe; thou shalt whether thou wilt or no die like a traytour vnto thy countrey. When they had thus said, they all threatned to kill him with their swords, if he did yeeld vnto the Romans. Ioseph feared their violence, & perswaded himselfe, if hee died before hee had put them in mind of Gods commandements, that then he should die a traytour vnto God: wherefore hee beganne to make a Philosophicall discourse vnto them concerning this present estate, what was to be done.

Wherefore (O my friends, quoth he) are wee become murderers of our selues? VVherefore do we make warre between things so vnited, as are the soule and the body? Will any man say that my mind is changed? VVhy, the Romans know that it is a thing most honourable to die in wars, nor any way, but according to the law of armes, to wit by the conquerers hand. If I intreat the Romans to spare my life, then am I worthy to perish with mine owne sword & hand: but if they think good to spare their enemies, should not we thinke it good likewise to spare our owne selues? Truly it is meer folly to do that vnto our owne selues, for the which we fight against the. I confesse it is a commendable thing to die for ones libertie; but yet to die in fight, and by their hands who rooke away that libertie: but now neither do they war against vs nor kill vs. He is not onely to be iudged a coward who refuseth to die when need requirerh, but also he who will die when no need vrgerh. Moreover, what with-holdeth vs from offering our selues vnto the Romans? truly feare of death. Shall we therefore make that certaine our selues, which we feare at the Romans hands? But some will say, How if not, then wee are made captiues: consider what libertie wee now haue. You will say it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himselfe: nay truly, it is the part of a verie coward. For I thinke him to be a timorous seaman, who perceiuing a tempest comming, before it fall, sinketh the ship wherein he is. Moreover, it is against the law of Nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themselves, and thereby we should commit a hainous crime against God. There is no liuing creature that of his owne seeking would willingly die: for euery one seeketh in himselfe the strong & forcible law of Nature, whereby they desire to liue: and for this cause we iudge them for our enemies, that seeke to take it from vs; and punish them that do take it indeed. And doe you thinke it is not a great contempt of God for a man to despise his gift? For wee of him receiued our first being, and from him let vs expect our ending. The bodie is mortall, framed of corruptible matter; but our soules are immortall, and there is a little part of GOD placed in our bodies. If any one abuse that which another man putteth him in trust with, presently we thinke him a perfidious & wicked man: and shall wee think that if wee cast away out of our bodies that which God hath put vs in trust withall, and placed in the same, that he shall not know of it, whom we haue so abused? VVe hold those slaues woorthy to be punished that runne away from bad masters: and shall not wee then be held for impious, who flie from so good a master as God is? Doe ye not know that they, who according to the law of Nature depart out of this life, & render that to God which they receiued of him, when hee who gaue it requirerh it, shall leaue behind them a perpetual name to their posteritie and family? And that vnto those soules who are obedient vnto their Creator when he calleth them, he giueth a holy & sacred mansion in heauen, & from thence after a reuolution of the heauens, departing; are againe commanded to dwell in chaste bodies? And that they who haue wrought their own death, goe vnto darke hell: and that God punisherh this their offence vpon all their posteritie? Hence it is that God is displeased there-with, and it is forbidden by our most wise Lawmaker. For if any amongst vs kill themselves, it is decreed that till the sunne goe downe they shall be vnburied, yet we hold it lawfull to burie our enemies. Other nations cause their right hands to be cut off, who haue killed themselves: iudging that as the soule thereby was made a stranger to the bodie, euen so by that fact vvas the hand made a stranger vnto it. VVherefore, O companions, thinke on that which is decent, and not to add to our humane miserie impietie against God who created vs. If we desire to bee saued, let vs saue our selues, selues: for it is no disgrace to receiue our liues at their hands, who are witnesses of so many valiant deeds of ours. If wee desire to die, let vs die by their hands that haue ouercome vs. I will not goe into my enemies campe to be a traitor against my selfe. For I beare not their mind who forsake their own company to flie vnto their enemies: for they flie vnto them to saue their liues, but I goe vnto them to worke mine owne death, euen the death of my selfe. And I would to GOD that the Romans would breake promise with me; for if they kill me after they haue promised to saue my life, I shall willingly die, and with great courage, hauing their breach of promise and perurie for a comfort of the last victorie.

Ioseph is in great danger to be slaine.

Another policie of Ioseph.

Iosephs selues die by lots, & Ioseph and another are rescued.

Ioseph reforeseth to Vespasian with Nicenor.

An example of Titus grace & mercie towards Ioseph.

Ioseph hath private conference with Vespasian. Ioseph telleth Vespasian of his future honours.

Iosephs truth in all things.

Ioseph spake much to this effect to dissuade his companions from killing themselves. But they stopping their eares with desperation, where-with they had armed themselves to die, came furiously towards him with their swords drawne, vpbraiding him, that he was a coward, and euerie one was ready to strike him. Then Ioseph calling one by his name, & looking vpon another with a countenance like a gouernor, holding anothers hand, and intreating the rest (distracted in such danger) at last escaped from being killed at that instant: for still as one came neere him to strike him, he turned his face vpon him like some cruell beast; and some of them who remembered how he had been their capitaine in their extremitie, with reuerence of his personage trembled, so that their swords fell out of their hands: and many lifting vp their armes to strike him, of their owne accord let their weapons fall. Ioseph, notwithstanding his desperate estate, yet was he not void of counsell, but assisted by Gods providence, hee hazarded his life, and spake vnto them as followeth. Seeing (quoth he) that yee are all determined to die, let vs cast lots who shall kill one another, and he vnto whom the lot falleth, shall be killed by him who next ensueth, and so the lots shall be cast vpon euery one of vs, so that none of vs shall be forced to kill our selues. For it were iniustice that when some of vs be slaine, the rest should repent themselves, and so escape. They all liked well of this, and alwaies he vpon whom the lot fell, was slain by him that followed, as though they were now to die with their capitaine: for death was more acceptable, because they thought Ioseph should die with them. Now it happened by the providence of God, that Ioseph remained aliuie onely with one other, and then perswaded him who was left aliuie, to liue & not seek death, for feare the lot should fall vpon himselfe: and for that if he suruiued, he should be polluted with the murder and slaughter of his own nation. Thus Ioseph, deliuered both from the warres of the Romans, and also of his owne nation, went with Nicenor vnto Vespasian.

All the Romanes came about him to see him, and pressing about their Generall they made a great noise, some reioicing that he was taken, others crying out to punish him, others struing to come neere to behold him better, and they who were a farr off cried to kill their enemy: but those who were neere him & beheld him, remembering his prowess, were astonished to see that change. And there was no Capitaine nor Ruler, but although before they were all moued against him, yet now beholding him, they all beganne to pittie him: and especially Titus, who being of a gentle disposition, admired Iosephs valour, his constancie in aduersitie, and his age, and thereby was moued to take compassion vpon him, remembering vvhata manner of man he had bene during the warres, & what he now was being fallen into his enemies hands: calling also to mind the force and power of Fortune, and how small a stay the chaunce of warres had, and that no humane affaires had any stay or hold in them; wherefore hee drew many mens minds to pittie him, so that Titus was the chiefe author of Iosephs life: yet Vespasian caused him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to send him to Caesar. Which Ioseph hearing, requested that he might speake a word or two with him alone. Then all but his son Titus departing & two of his friends, Thus O Vespasian (quoth he) thinkest onely that thou hast Ioseph for thy captiue, but I am a messenger vnto thee of great matters from God, otherwise I knew my country lawes, and how it behoued the Generals of our nation to die, and not to be taken aliuie by their enemies. VVilt thou send mee to Nero? Wherefore? As though Nero should still liue and thou not succeed him? Thou O Vespasian art Caesar and the Emperour of Rome, and Titus also thy sonne, and keepe me in bonds with thee, for thou art not onely my Lord, but Lord of all the world, and sea, and land, and all mankind. And if I now faime these things in this state that I am, of my owne mind against God, let me be referred vnto a greater punishment. After he had thus spoken, Vespasian gaue small credit vnto his words, and onely thought that Ioseph feined these things of himselfe to saue his life: yet by little and little he beganne to giue credit vnto him, because God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire: and foretelling his reigne by many signes and tokens, hee also found Ioseph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Vespasians friends answered, that it was maruaile that hee knowing that, could not prophetic the cucnt of the warres against Iotapata, and what was like

The years of the world, 4031. after Christs birth, 69.

A to befall himselfe, that so he might haue auoided those euils. Ioseph answered, that he foretold the citizens of Iotapata, that after Ieuon and fortie daies they should be destroyed, and that the Romans should keepe him aliuie in holde. Vespasian secretly enquired of these matters, and finding by the relation of the captiues that it was true, hee began to giue more credit vnto that which Ioseph had told him concerning himselfe. So he commanded Ioseph to be kept prisoner, yet did he giue him apparell and diuers other things in most kind manner: & Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of Iuly Vespasian returned vnto Ptolemais, and from thence he came into the Sea coast vnto Caesarea, which is the greatest Citie of Iudæa, whose inhabitants are for the most part Greekes: so the inhabitants receiued the armie and the General with all friendship possible, both for that they loued the Romanes, as especially alfo for that they hated them, who were destroyed; so that many intreated Vespasian to put Ioseph to death. But Vespasian, iudging this a rash petition, would make no answer vnto it: and hee left two legions to winter at Caesarea, because he saw it was a fit place, and sent the tenth and fift vnto Scythopolis, because he would not ouercharge Caesarea with the whole armie. This place is warme in winter, and exceeding hot in summer, by reason it is situate on a Plaine by the sea coast.

CHAP. XV.

How Ioppe was taken againe.

IN the meane time a great multitude being gathered together, who either were seditionous persons, or theeuers, or such as had escaped out of the ruined cities, began to reedifie Ioppe for their refuge, which Cestius before time had destroyed: and seeing that they could not robbe nor spoile the country which was already wasted, and left desolate by warres, they purposed to become pirates, and so building ships for that purpose, they robbed the Phoenicians, Syrians and Egyptians, not suffering any to passe those seas without danger. Vespasian vnderstanding their intent, sent horsemen and footemen thither: who finding the citie not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the inhabitants perceiuing were so afraid, that they durst not make any resistance to expell the Romanes, but they all retired themselves vnto their ships, and there staid all night, a flight shor from the shore. Ioppe is naturally no road for ships (for it is situated vpon a turbulent shore) and on either side hath very high and eminent rocks, which trouble the seas, and make huge waues: in this place (if we may beleue the fable) one may see the signes of Andromedæ chained. When the north wind blowes, it striketh the waues against the rocks, and so causeth a dangerous sea, that it were far more safe to be in the midst of the seas, then at that shore when the same wind bloweth. The inhabitants of Ioppe rode there all night, & by breake of day the North wind began to blow fiercely, and draue some of the ships one against another, and others against the rocks: and many struing against winde and weather, and seeking to get into the midst of the Sea for feare of the rockie shore, and their enemies there, were drowned; and they that escaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of safetie; for the tempest did driue them from the Sea, and the Romanes from the Citie, so that the ayre was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noyse & sound of the ships beaten one against another. So some of the inhabitants of Ioppe were swallowed by the waues, others suffered shipwracke, some killed themselves rather then to be drowned: many with the waues were stricken against the rockes, so that the sea was bloody, and all the shore was couered with dead bodies: and whosoever escaped the sea and got to shore, the Roman souldiers there readie standing killed them. There were foure thousand and two hundred dead bodies cast vpon the shore. So the Romans hauing without any fight taken the citie, they destroyed it: and thus was Ioppe taken, & twice destroyed by the Romans in a short time. Vespasian builded there a castle, and placed in it some few horsemen and footemen, to the ende that none of the Iewes should come thither againe to play the Pyrates, and that the footemen might keep the Castle, and in the meane time the horsemen might goe forth, and spoile all the townes and villages, and territories belonging to Ioppe: which also they did. When the newes of the destruction of Iotapata was brought vnto Ierusalem, many gaue small credit vnto it, partly for the greatnes of that calamity, partly for that no one man could say, that he had seen the destruction of the citie: for none escaped that massacre to bring newes, but onely report thereof was declared the spread abroad; but at last it was verified to be true by those that dwelt neere vnto that place, and then they beleued it. Many things also which were false, were reported as true. It was likewise bruited, that Ioseph was slaine in the destruction of the citie, for whose death all Ierusalem sorrowed rowed, and every one mourned for their lost kinred; all bewailed the supposed death of the generall, and some of their sons, others of their brethren and kinsfolke, and others of their acquaintance. They all mourned for Ioseph thirty daies, and hired many musicians to sing funeral songs for him. At last truth discovered it selfe, and the true newes of the destruction of Iotapata with the accidents there: also how Ioseph was not slaine, but liued with the Romans, and that the Romans honoured him with more then a captiue could expect. Then the Iewes began as much to hate him now liuing, as before they mourned for him when they supposed him dead. And some said he was a coward, others that he was a traitor vnto his country, and the whole city breathed out reprochfull speeches against him. These heauy tidings encreased their rage, & this their aduersitie (which vnto wise men had beene a warning to prouide least the like befell them) made them more outrageous; so that alwaies the ende of one mischiefe was the beginning of another. H To be short, now they were more incensed against the Romans then before, as it were that they might also be reuenged of Ioseph. And this was the estate of the citizens of Ierusalem.

CHAP. XVI.

How Tiberias was yeilded.

Vespasian commeth vnto Agrippas kin, dome and recreateth himselfe there, and seateth twenty daies.

Vespasian was desirous to see the kingdome of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him to goe thither, partly to feast him and his whole army, partly to repress some troubles arising in his kingdome, in the time of his absence) and so departed from Cæsarea vpon the Sea coast, and went vnto Cæsarea Philippi, where he staid, and refreshed his souldiers twenty daies; and himselfe also feasted, giuing God thanks for his prosperous successe in the warres. This done, he had intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which cities belonged vnto Agrippa his kingdome) and fully determining vtterly to destroy the Iewes which inhabited thereabouts, hee thought it good to lead his armie against these two places, especially that hee might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by surrendering these cities vnto him. Wherefore he sent his sonne Titus to Cæsarea to bring the souldiers there vnto Scythopolis, which was the greatest of all the ten Cities, which also is neere vnto Tiberias; whither himselfe being come he expected his sonnes coming: and departing from thence with three legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the seditious people of Tiberias might behold his armie; this place was thirty furlongs from Tiberias: from thence hee sent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and sent fifty horsemen to accompany him: for hee vnderstood that the people desired peace, and against their will were forced to warre, by some of the seditious amongst them. Valerianus coming neere vnto the citie wals, lighted from his horse, commanding all his companie to doe the like, that they of Tiberias might not thinke that they came to fight, but in peaceable maner: but before he spake any one word, the boldest and strongest of the seditious persons came out armed against him, hauing one Iesus the sonne of Tobias, who had beene a Captaine of theues, for their gouernour and leader. Valerianus not presuming to fight without authoritie from his generall, although hee had beene certaine of the victorie; againe considering that it was great daunger for so few to fight against a whole multitude, and whichall terrified with the boldnesse of the Iewes, contrary to his expectation; hee fled on foote accompanied only with five other, leauing his horse and the rest behind him, whome Iesus & his followers strooke, and brought into the citie: reioicing as though they had taken them in fight and not by treason. But the Senators & chiefe of the citie, fearing what might ensue of this fact, went vnto the Romans, and together with king Agrippa came vnto Vespasian, & prostrated themselves at his feet, beseeching him not to despise them, and not to thinke that the whole citie were partakers with those few wicked persons, that so had merited his displeasure; requesting him to spare the people who alwaies had honoured the Romans, but rather that he should punish the authors of that revolt and misdemeanour: who also had withheld the whole Citie, euen vntill now, to yeeld it selfe vnto the Romans. Vespasian moued by their entreaties, pardoned the citie, though he was incited against them all for taking of Valerianus his horse; in that hee perceived Agrippa was sorrowfull, for feare that the citie should be destroyed, and so by them Vespasian promised the townes men pardon. Then Iesus & his associates thinking it not safe for them to abide there, fled vnto Tarichea. The next day, Vespasian sent before him Traianus with certaine horsemen into the Castle, to see if all the multitude desired peace: and finding the people to beare peaceable minds, he with his whole armie came vnto the citie. And the inhabitants opening the gates of their

A their citie, went to meete him with great ioy, all crying out that he was the author of their welfare and benefactor, and wishing him all prosperitie and felicitie. The gates of the citie were narrow, so that the armie could not quickly enter in: wherefore Vespasian commanded a part of the wall on the south side to be pulled downe, and so entred in: yet did he not sacke the citie, nor ruine the wals, for Agrippas sake, who promised that from thenceforth the citizens would be quiet. And so he pacified that citie greatly troubled with sedition.

CHAP. XVII.

How Tarichea was besieged.

Vespasian departed from Tiberias, and pitched his Tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himselfe, foreseeing that there hee should haue some trouble and long abode: for all rebels that desired warres came thither, trusting both to the strength of the citie, and the lake adjoining vnto it called Genesar. For this citie was situate like Tiberias, vnder the mountaines: & Ioseph had enclosed it with a wall on euery side, where it was not compassed by the lake. But the wall though it were strong, yet was it not so strong as that of Tiberias: for Ioseph builded that in the beginning of the rebellion, hauing men and mony at will; but that of Tarichea was build only by the remainder of his liberality. The Taricheans had great store of ships in the lake adjoining, to the end that if they were overcome by land, they might fly by water: & therefore they had prepared their ships for battell by water if need should be. Whilest the Romans entrenched themselves, Iesus and his followers not dismaide either with the multitude or military discipline of his enemies, issued out of the citie, and slew the workemen, and destroyed a part of the worke: and perceiuing the Romans armed and assembled together against him, hee fled againe vnto his company without any losse or harme receiued. But the Romans pursued them so fast, that they forced them to take their ships: and so being gone as far from the shoare, as that yet they might easily reach them with the shot of an arrow, they cast anchor and disposed their ships in warlike manner, and fought against the Romans vwho were on shoare. Vespasian vnderstood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neere vnto the citie: wherefore hee sent his sonne Titus against them with sixe hundred horsemen, who finding the number of his enemies to be infinite, certified his father, that hee needed more forces: and perceiuing many of those horsemen of good courage, before any more aide came, and yet that some of them were afraid of the Iewes; he stood in a high place where all might heare him and said, O yee Romans, I will first put you in minde who you are and of what nation, that so you considering what your selues are, may also consider who they are with whom we are to fight; neuer yet was there any enemy in any part of the world that could escape our hands. The Iewes themselves though already overcome, yet doe they indure and manfully beare out their miserie: if therefore they constantly indure warres, and fight valiantly being in aduersitie; what should wee doe who are in prosperitie? I reioice to see you shew good countenance, yet I feare least so huge a multitude of our enemies discourage some of you: let euery one therefore once againe consider, who himselfe is, and with whom he is to fight: and that although the Iewes be bold and valiant enough, yet they obserue no warlike order, and are vnarmed, and so are more fitly tearmed a multitude then an army. I need not speake of your knowledge & skill in wars: nay for this only cause are we trained vp in warlike discipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number should answere to the number of our enemies when we are to ioinie battell: for what fruit shall we shew of this our perpetuall warlike order and discipline, if we dare only fight with a rude multitude that are no more in number then our selues? Thinke that you being armed are to fight with vnarmed, and being horsemen are to fight with footmen, and being guided by the aduise of a captaine, with them who haue no head nor ruler: and that these things considered do supply in vs the want of more men, and the contrary in our enemies doth as it were much diminish their number. Victory doth not only consist in the multitude of men be they neuer so valiant, but also in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, so are they easily guided, and may easily come to helpe one another, not being pestered; whereas huge multitudes doe more hinder one another then doe good, and doe themselves more harme then their enemies. So the Iewes are ledd with desperation, rage and fury, which in deed in prosperous successe are of some force, but in a desperate fortune they are quickly daunted: but we are led by vertue and obedience and fortitude, which both are of force in prosperitie; and also are good in aduersitie. Moreover, we haue greater occasion to fight then the Iewes haue: for they fight onely for their country and libertie, but we fight for renoume and empire; that wee hauing already gained the empire of the whole world, it might not be thought that our enemies the Iews were aduersaries able to march vs. Consider moreover that yee need not feare any great danger, for wee haue many to helpe vs and that hard by: let vs therefore archieue the victory before any more succour come vnto vs; so shall our credit bee greater, & our victory more famous. I verily thinke that now triall is made of me, my father, and you; to discerne if he be my father, I his sonne, and you my souldiers: for hee is wont to be victorious, and shall I returne vnto him being conquered? and are you not ashamed to be dismaied, seeing that I your captaine will offer my selfe and vndergoe the greatest perils? My selfe will beare the brunt of the enemies, and first encounter with them, and let none of you depatt from me: perswade your selues that God will assise my force, and boldly presume that we can doe much more beeing in the midst of our enemies, then if wee should onely fight without and not be amongst them.

Titus hauing thus spoken, as it were by Gods prouidence, all his souldiers took heart & courage, so that now they were fory to see Traianus come with foure hundredth horsemen more before the fight was begun, as though their victory should be lesse renowned, because he came to helpe them. Vespasian also sent Antonius and Silo with two thousand archers, to take the mountaine that was iust opposite vnto the towne, and to beate them that defended the citie off from the wals, and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force possible, first rushed with his horse upon the enemies: and all followed him with a huge crie, scattering themselves in such order as they occupied as much ground as the Iewes, and so appeared more then they were. The Iewes though terrified by their discipline, yet they withstoode the first assault: but in the end dismaied, and put out of order with their lances, and killed with the horsemen, euerie one fled as fast as hee could into the Citie. And Titus killed some as they fled, others as hee met them, and those hee ouertooke, and many one for haste tumbling vpon another; and he preuented all that fled vnto the walles, and draue them backe againe into the field, till at last the multitude preuailed, and so they got into the Citie. Now at their returne into the Citie their befella great dissension: for the inhabitants considering their owne estate, and the euent of all former warres, and especially of this last fight, misliked of war and desired peace: but the strangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitude, would needs contend therein; and so one part began a mutinie against the other, as though they would presently one haue taken armes against another. Titus being not farre from the wall, heard these tumults within the citie, and cried out vnto the Romans; This is the hower (fellow soldiers) wherein God hath giuen the Iewes into our hands: why doe we deferre the time any longer? why doe we not take the victory offered? doe you not heare the cries within? they who escaped our hands are at variance amongst themselves: the citie is ours if we make haste, & making haste take courage: for nothing worth renoume can be archieued without danger: and let vs not only preuent our enemies concord which necessity will soone effect, but also our owne forces before any fresh aide come vnto vs, that beside the victory we haue, being so fewe ouer so huge a multitude, wee may also diuide the spoile of the citie amongst vs. No sooner had hee thus spoken, but presently he mounted vpon his horse, and rode into the lake, and so passed into the Citie, and all the souldiers followed him. They that defended the walles were amazed at this his boldnes, so that none made resistance against him as hee came: but Iesus with his followers leauing his quarter, which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the lake fell into their enemies hands, who came that way against them, and so were massacred euen as they were getting into their ships, other some were slaine as they did swimme to ouertake the ships that were new launcht from the shoare: and there was a great slaughter of men all ouer the citie. For the strangers that fled not, made resistance, and the townes-men did not offer to defend themselves; for they abstained from fight, hoping for pardon in that they were not against those proceedings: till at last Titus hauing slaine the wicked, rooke compassion vpon the townes-men and saued their liues, and caused the slaughter to cease. They who fled into the lake seeing the Citie euen taken, ranne away as farre as they could from their enemies. Titus sent horsemen to let his father vnderstand what hee had done. Whereof hee hauing intelligence, beeing verie glad for his sonnes valour and magnanimitie, and for the archieuing of such a victory, whereby a great part of those warres was ended, hee commaunded presently the Citie to bee guarded round about, to the intent that none might escape away aliue. And the next day hee came downe vnto the lake, and commaunded shippes to bee built to pursue those that had escaped by it: and hauing many

A many workemen and great store of matter to build them withall, his commaund was presently effected.

Of the lake of Genezar, and the fountaine of Iordan.

The lake of Genezar taketh his name from the country adioining vnto it, the breadth thereof is forty furlongs, the length a hundredth. The water of this lake is sweet and good to drinke, and is more subtile then ordinarily pure waters of marish places are, and it is very cleere neere the shore, and more temperate to drinke, then either that of the riuer or fountaine, but it is alwaies more cold then one would iudge such a lake to bee of that largenes: for the water being set in the sunne, doth not lose his coldnes, which the inhabitants haue vsed to doe in sommer eueninges to allay the naturall coldnes thereof. There are here many sorts of fishes nothing like to fishes of other places, either in shape or taste. The riuer Iordan passeth through the midst of it. It is thought that Panium is the head & fountain of Iordan, but in truth it hath his originall from Phiala, and from thence passeth vnder the ground: this place is a hundredth & twenty furlongs from Caesarea towards that way which leadeth vnto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reason of his roundnes, for it is as round as a wheele, and the water still keepeth within the brinke of Phiala, neuer encreasing or diminishing; and no man knew that this was the head of Iordan, till Philip the Tetrarch of Trachon found it to bee so: for hee casting straws into Phiala, found the afterward caried vnto Panium, which before that time was thoght to be the fountaine of Iordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his cost and charges it was much more adorned. Iordan beginneth with a deeper riuer out of this denne, and passeth along the marish places, and durty lake of Semechonitis, and from thence a hundredth & twenty furlongs vnto the city of Iulia, and in the way diuideth the lake Genezar, and passing a great way further into the wilderness, at last it endeth in the lake called Asphaltites. Vpon the lake Genezar there bordereth a country of the same name, naturally beautifull and admirable: for there is no kind of plant which groweth nor there, and the inhabitants haue replenished it with plants and trees of all sorts, and the temperature of the ayre well agreeth with so diuers trees, for there are an infinite company of Nut-trees, which of all trees especially require a cold soile: there are also abundance of palmes, which desire great heate: likewise great store of figges and oliues, which require a temperate ayre: so that one may iustly say, that through the bounty of nature, so different and opposite qualities are here in one vnited; and at one time, as it were, all difference of seasons of the yeere conioined for good purpose. And it doth not onely nourish these fruites, but also conserueth them for ten whole moneths: there grow figs & grapes, which two one may wel call the kings of fruits, all other fruits continue all the yeere long. For beside the temperature of the ayre, it is also watered by a fertile fountaine called Capernaum, many thinke it to bee an arme of Nilus, because it hath fishes like a Corbe bred in a lake neere Alexandria. The length of this country along the lake bearing the same name, is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the nature of the lake Genezar, and the country about it.

How the Taricheans were destroyed.

Vespasian hauing finished his ships, and furnished them with as many men as hee thought sufficed against them whom he was to pursue, he embarked vpon the lake, & himselfe also went against them. The Taricheans could not possibly make any escape by land, although they would, & they were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their small pyrate boates were not able to withstand their enemies great vessels; and beside that, they were not sufficiently manned, so that they feared to encounter with the Romans who pressed altogether vpon them: yet notwithstanding sometime they came about the Roman ships, & cast stones at the Romans afar off, & sometime also came neere, & skirmished with them: yet they themselves alwaies had more harm then the Romans; for their stones which they cast did only rattle against the Romans armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans arrowes: and if at any time they were so bold as to come neere the Romans, they were slaine before that they could doe them any harme, or else drowned with their boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were slaine with lauelins, and other with swords, the Romans leaping into their boats;

boats; and many were taken with their boats, the ships meeting one another. They that were in the water and did lift vp their heads to swim were preuented with arrowes, or ouertaken with Roman boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, and some other, till at last they fled and arriued vpon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romans killed many vpon the lake, and many vpon the land, and one might then haue seen all the lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped aliue. A few daies after in that countrey there was a very odious stinck, and a horrible spectacle: for the shores were all full of boats that had suffered shipwracke, and dead bodies swollon in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat did putrifie and so corrupt the ayre all about, that not onely the whole countrey and inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction, but also the Romans who were the authors thereof. And this was the end of that warre by water. And the number of them that were slaine here in the citie was fixe thousand and five hundred. The fight being ended, Vespasian sat in a tribunall seat, & separated the strangers from the inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the authors of that warre: but they tolde him that their liues might endamage him; for said they, if thou send those men away & let them liue, they cannot liue peaceably because they want abiding places; and are able to disturbe and disquiet those to whom they shall fly. Vespasian for this cause iudged them vnworthy to liue, assuredly knowing that if they were let goe, they would fight against them who pardoned their liues, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himselfe the inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled vnto them for succour: wherefore he sought to vse no violence vnto them, because hee had fled vnto them for succour: wherefore he was overcome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him, that all things against the Iewes were lawfull, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so licence being granted vnto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commaunded to take onely that way that leadeth vnto Tiberias: & they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safetie of their goods or money: but the Romans had placed themselves on euery side the way euen vnto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the citie. Presently after came Vespasian and inclosed them all in an Amphitheater, & so killed one thousand & two hundred of them, who were all old men or yong, and vnable for seruice: of the rest that were all strong yong men, he sent six thousand vnto Nero King at Isthmos neere Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number thirty thousand & foure hundred, beside others that he gaue vnto Agrippa: for he permitted him to do what he would with those sort that were of his kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those who were giuen him. The rest of them were fugitiues and seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peaciously procured these warres. They were taken the first of the Ides of September.

After that Tarichea was conquered, all those that from the time that Iotapata vnite themselves vnto them: so that the Romanes had now gotten into their hands, all Castles & townes, Giscala onely excepted, & Itaburium, a mountaine so called. With these two rebelled Gamala, a towne ouer against Tarichea, and situated vpon the lake, belonging to the kingdom of Agrippa, and also Sogane and Seleucia: and these two last were both belonging vnto Gaulanitis, and Sogane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala vnto the lower, Seleucia vnto the lake Semechonitis, which is thirtie furlongs in breadth, and threecore large, whose marishes reach euen vnto Daphne, which country is very pleasant of it selfe, and famous for that it entertaineth the streame called little Iordan, and at the foote of the golden mountaine doth deriue it into the great Iordan. Agrippa in the beginning of the rebellion, vnited Sogane and Seleucia vnto himselfe: but Gamala by reason of the situation apt to resist, did not yeeld vnto him, for it is farre stronger then Iotapata. For from an exceeding high mountaine, there descendeth a hill very difficult for any to passe, rising high in the midst, and then descendeth lower and lower both before and behind, so that it representeth the figure of a Camell, which the Hebrewes call Gamal, and so thereof it tooke the name, though the Inhabitants do not keep that exact signification. Before it, and on either side there are deepe vallies, into the which a man can hardly descend, onely it may be taken and assaulted on that side, where it ioyneth vnto the mountaine, which also the Inhabitants haue made inaccessible, by cutting out there a deep ditch. In that place the Citie was very well inhabited on the descent of the hill, and towards the South part it stood on so steepe a hill, that it seemed as though it would haue fallen euery houre, and the South hill serued the inhabitants in steed of a Castle, being vnwalled: for it was an exceeding high rock, and reached downe euen vnto the bottom of the valley in the towne, and at the wals therof there was a fountaine. Although this citie were of his owne nature inuincible, yet Ioseph compassing it with a wal, & with ditches & mines, made it more strong. Wherefore the inhabitants of this place, put farre more confidence in their wals, then they of Iotapata did; yet were they fewer in number, and not so warlike people as they; but for the situation of the Citie, they esteemed themselves more then their enemies: for the citie was full of men that fledde thither by reason of the strength of the place: so that for seauen moneths they resisted them that were sent by Agrippa to besiege them. Vespasian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his Tents before Tiberias, and so went vnto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hot waters, for there is a fountaine of hot water which cureth many diseases) and the citie was so situate, that he could not besiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keepe watch in such places as it was possible, & obtained the highest mountaine, where his souldiers pitching their tents, lastly intrenched themselves. On the East-part of the citie in the most eminent place there was a Castle, where the fifteenth and fift legions laboured against the towne, and the tenth legion filled vp the ditches and vallies. King Agrippa went vnto the wals and spake vnto them that defended them, willing them to yeeld vnto the Romans: but one of them with a sling strooke him on the right arme and hurt him, and his familiar friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romans for anger that the king was hurt, and for feare of such mischances to themselves, now became earnest to assault the towne, perswading themselves that they would vse strangers & their enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, seeing they had so euill entreated one of their owne nation, for perswading them vnto that was profitable for them.

Having quickly intrenched themselves by reason of the multitude that laboured in that business, and by reason that they were accustomed vnto such like worke, they began to place the engines against the towne wals. Chares and Ioseph were two of the most potent men in the towne: they therefore animated and armed their Citizens, and brought them vnto the wals, who trembled for feare. And although they well perceiued that the Citie could not long hold out, seeing they wanted water, and manie other things necessarie to withstand a siege; yet notwithstanding, they exhorted the townesmen to be valiant, & so brought them vnto the wals, and a while they resisted notwithstanding the shotte: but at last they were therewith so terrified, that leauing the wals, they fled into the citie. Then the Romans did batter the wals with Ramms in three severall

all places, and where the wall fell, there they issued in with trumpets and a great noise, and cries, G and fought with the townsmen, who in the first conflict so valiantly resisted them, that they permitted them not to enter any further into the towne; at last being overcome both in strength and number, they all fled into the highest part of the citie, and from thence they turned again vpon the Romans, who pursued them, and draue them downe into the vallies and killed many, and diuers in that straight passage were troden to death by their fellows. The Romanes, seeing that they neither could flie, nor resist their enemies about their heads, fledde into their houses, which adioyned vnto the Plaine, and so filled them, that being overcharged, they fell down, and lighted vpon other houses beneath them, which did beare them downe also, and they likewise others situated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way perished; for being amazed, & not knowing what to doe, they fled into their houses, notwithstanding they did see them shake and totter: H and many seeking to escape, were maimed by some part of the ruines that fell vpon their bodies, and many were choaked in the dust. The citizens of Gamala reioyced thereat, thinking that this ayde was sent from God: and not regarding their priuate comodities, they ceased not to compell the Romans into their houses; and if any were in the narrow streets, them they slew with darts from above out of the high places. Thus the ruines afforded them stones enow, and their flaine enemies swords and armour, which they tooke from them, being now halfe dead, and vsed them against themselves: manie died, who cast themselves headlong from off the houses being readie to fall, and those that sought to flie, could not easilie escape; for being ignorant of the waies, and there being such a dust that one could not see another, one of them killed another: And so with much adoe finding passage, they went out of the citie.

Vespasian, who was alwaies amongst the midst of these hurly burlies, was greatly moued to see the buildings fall vpon his souldiers: and forgetting his owne safetie, hee secretly retired himselfe with onely a few into the higher part of the Citie, where he was left in great danger, hauing very few about him (for Titus his sonne was not there, being before this time sent vnto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flie safely, nor yet had it bin for his honor if he could. Wherefore remembering all that he had done euen from his child-hood, and his own vertue, hee encouraged his men, and with them ioyned armes, and couered themselves with their shields, and so as it were moued with some diuine motion, defended themselves from all darts, arrowes, & stones, which were cast from aloft vpon them, and so remained there not terrified either by the number or might of his enemies, till at last, they wondring at his diuine vertue & courage, aswaged their furie. And now perceiuing his enemies to assault him but faintly, he retired back, till at such time as he got without the citie wals.

Many Romanes perished in that fight, and amongst the rest Ebutius a Decadarch, vwho not onely in that fight shewed himselfe valiant, but also in many warres before, & had done the Iewes much harme. Also in that fight a certaine Centurion named Gallus, accompanied with ten souldiers, hid himselfe in a house, and at supper time he heard the people of that house talke, what the Citizens of Gamala were purposed to do against the Romans (this Gallus & they with him were Syrians) and in the night time he slew them all, and after escaped safe vnto the Romans. Vespasian perceiued all his armie sorowfull for that mishance, and so much the more, for that they neuer as yet had so bad a breakfast, and especially for that they had forsaken their Generall, and left him in danger and distresse: wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing speaking concerning himselfe, least hee should seeme to find fault with some in the beginning of his speech.

Wherefore he told them, that it behooued them patiently to abide that which was common to all men, affirming that there was no victorie without bloodshed, and that fortune was mutable: and that he had already slaine many thousand Iewes, and now had paid a small bribe for his happy successe vnto aduersie fortune. And that as it did not become any but vaine-glorious people to boast in their prosperitie, so it behooued none but cowards to feare and tremble in aduersitie: For, said he, fortune is very mutable both to the good and bad, and he is a valiant man that is not moued by aduersitie: for hee hauing all his wits about him, can euen in the midst of his troubles see where any fault is, and amend it. Yet (quoth he) this hath not befallen vs through the weakness of our courage, or the valour and prowesse of the Iewes, but the difficultie of the place was the cause that they should overcome vs, and wee bee overcome. Wherefore one may well reprehend the too much rashnesse of your spirits: for vwhen you saw your enemies flie into the higher places, you should then haue held your hands, and not to haue pursued them with so manifest danger to your selues, as euery one might foresee in this pursuite; so you hauing gained the lower part of the Citie, you might in time haue dravne them to a sure and safe conflict: but

A but you being eager of the victorie, you did not respect your own safetie. It is not the manner of the Romans rashly and vnadvisedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and aduisedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you see proper to the Iewes. Wherefore, let vs call our owne vertues to mind, and rather be angry for this that hath happened (and so incite our selues to reuenge) then sorowfull. And let euery valiant souldier with his own hand comfort himselfe; so shall wee both reuenge the death of our friends, and be reuenged of them by whom they were slaine: and I my selfe (as also now I did) will expose my selfe to all dangers with you, & goe first to fight, & come last from fight. With these & such like speeches he comforted his souldiers.

The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldened with their prosperous successe, which notwithstanding did not happen through their valour: but presently perceiuing that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to escape, they were very sorowfull, and their hearts relented (for now victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to provide for their owne safetie, wherein they could; for the most valiant amongst them kept the breach: and the rest, other strong places about the walls which were yet vn battered. The Romans againe builded mounts, and attempted to assault the citie, and many of the citizens fledde by the vallies where no guard was, and by secret vaults vnderneath the ground; & they who for feare least they should be taken remained in the citie, perished for hunger: for all the victuals were reserved for them that fought. And they still continued in this calamitie.

CHAP. II:

How Placidus tooke the mountaine Itaburium.

DVring this siege, Vespasian made another expedition against them, who kept the mountaine Itaburium, situate between the great field and Scythopolis, which is thirty furlongs high, & inaccessible on the North side. In the very top of this mountaine there is a Plaine 20 furlongs ouer, enclosed with a wal, all which wall being of so huge a compasse, Ioseph had built in 40 daies: they receiued all necessarie prouision from beneath, for they had onely raine water. Vnto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Vespasian sent Placidus against them with 600 horsemen, who could no waies gette vpon the mountaine: wherefore hee exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewise diuers of the Iewes came downe vnto him, as it were to entrap him, and assault him at vnawares. Placidus for the nonce gaue them faire speeches, hoping to get them downe into the Plaine: so they, as though they would haue obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, suddainly to assault him: yet Placidus his deuisie tooke place. For when the Iewes assaulted him, hee fained himselfe to flie, and the Iewes hauing pursued him a great way from the mountaine, hee turned againe vpon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed some, and hindred the rest of the multitude from ascending the mountaine: so the rest left Itaburium, and fled vnto Ierusalem, and the inhabitants (now water failing them) yielded vnto Placidus, and deliuered the mountaine vnto him.

CHAP. III.

How Gamala was destroyed.

Now the most presumptuous amongst the Gamalians fled & hid themselves, and the weaker sort did perish through famine: yet the most courageous that were left amongst them, defended the wall till the 27 day of October. Vpon which day, three souldiers of the fifteenth legion, towards breake of the day, vndermined the highest tower in their quarter, and entred into it; those that kept it, neither perceiuing them when they came in, nor when they went out (for it was in the night time.) These souldiers being wary least any noise should be made, remoued siue of the greatest stones, and presently leapt away, and incontinently the tower fell with a hideous noise, and with the fall killed those that kept it, and many that kept watch in other quarters fled, being sore afraid: & they who sought to escape to the Romans, were killed, amongst whom one Ioseph was strooken with a dart from a part of the wall that was fallen down, and there died. They who were within the Citie, were terrified with the noise heretofore, and ranne vp and downe as though all the enemies were already entred into it. And Charles Iosephs companion being sicke, yielded vp the ghost, feare increasing his disease, and helping to shorten shorten his life. The Romanes, remembering the bad successe at the last assault, did not enter the Citie till the three and twentieth day of the foresaid moneth.

Then Titus as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romanes in his absence, accompanied with two hundred horsemen, and certaine chosen footmen, entered the Citie, no man resisting him: and hee being passed into the same, the watchmen then first perceiving it, cried to armes. Those within the citie fearing that Titus was entred, some tooke their children, some their wives, and fled into the castle with pittifull cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the sword: and they that could not get into the castle, not knowing what to doe, fell amongst the Roman watchmen: then the skies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the citie flowed with blood. Vespasian led his whole army against those that were fled into the castle, which was of a huge height, and scarcely to be come vnto, being all of stone, & full of ditches and deepe dennes, and compassed with steeple rocks: so the Iewes did driue downe the Romans that offered to come vp vnto the, partly with stones, partly with darts, which they rouled down vpon them; and they were so high, that the Romans arrowes could not reach them. But at last, as it were by Gods prouidence who would haue it so, a whirlewind arose, which caried the Romans arrowes amongst them into the castle, and the Iewes arrowes from the Romanes, and the vvind was so violent, that it was not possible for them to stand vpon those high places, and so not being able to stand, nor to see those that came against them, the Romans ascended and tooke the castle, some resisting for their defence, others yielding themselves. The Romanes now called to mind their fellowes, who perished in the first assault, & so became more cruell. Many despairing of their liues, cast their wives, their children, and themselves, headlong downe those high places, into the deep vallies vnderneath. So that the crueltie that the Romanes shewed against the people of Gamala, was not so great as that which they vsed against themselves: for there were onely four thousand that perished by the Romans sword, and the number of them who so cast themselves down, was found to be 5000: and not one escaped, but two women that were sisters, and daughters vnto Philip, who was son vnto Iochimus, a worthy man, and gouernour ouer all Agrippas army vnder him; and these two were slaine onely, because at such time as the citie was taken, they hid themselves: for they spared not infants, but many tooke them & cast them down from the castle. And thus was Gamala destroyed the 23 day of October, which began to rebell the 21 day of September.

CHAP. IIII.

How Titus tooke Giscala.

NOW all the cities and strong places of Galilee were taken, Giscala onely excepted: the inhabitants whereof desired peace, for that they were husbandmen, and their riches consisted in the fruits of the earth; but there were many thieues in the citie: to which vice also many of the citizens were addicted. These people were incited to rebel by one Iohn a witch, and a deceitful person, son vnto one Leuias; who was of strange manners and bold to presume any thing, and wonderfully achieving all he rooke in hand, and he was knowne vnto all men for one that desired war to make himselfe mighty. This man was ringleader of the seditions persons in Giscala: and for feare of them, the people who perhaps otherwise would haue sent Legates to the Romanes to request peace, were hindered and forced to stay, till the Romanes came to warre against them. Against these people Vespasian sent Titus, and with him a thousand horsemen, and the tenth legion towards Scythopolis: and hee with the rest went to Caesarea to refresh them after their great labour, at the charge of the townes adioynning; iudging it necessarie to comfort their bodies, and encourage their minds to sustaine manfully the warres that were to ensue: for he foresaw that he should haue much adoe to win Ierusalem, both for that it was wont to be the kings seat, and also because it was the chiefe and head Citie of all the nation. And his care in this point was so much the more increased, for that he perceived that many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was naturallie strong, and also compassed with almost inuincible walls: and beside this, the boldnesse and desperate courage of the inhabitants, who although that they had no walls at all, yet had been scarcely to be conquered: and therefore he thought it necessarie to comfort his souldiers before the fight, like champions who ought to enter the field and fight courageously.

Titus (comming on horseback vnto Giscala) perceived that it might easily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people should be destroyed by the Romanes (and now hee was wearie of bloodshed) hee compassionating the well disposed people which were otherwise like

- A to perish together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherefore the wals being full of people, amongst whom were many of the seditious, he told them that he maruailed what helpe they had or expected, or by whose aduise all other cities being now taken, they alone would abide the last brunt of the Roman forces, especially when as they had already scene many townes far stronger then theirs, ouerthrowne at the first assault: and contrariwise, those who had yielded themselves vnto the Romanes liued in peace, & peaceably enioyed all that was theirs. VVhich offer (said he) I now also make vnto you, and am not yet incensed against you, because that which you doe is for your libertie: but if (quoth he) you doe still perseuere in this impoissible course, my displeasure shall be kindled against you. And if so be that they refused this kind offer, they should presently perceiue the Roman sword to be sharpened for their destruction, and incontinentlie should
- B find that their wals were but a mockerie, and no waies able to resist the Roman engines: where contrariwise, if they yielded themselves, and trusted vnto the fidelitie of the Romanes, they should be the most happy people of all Galilee. None of the townsmen were admitted to make any answer, nor to come vnto the wals: for the thieues were masters of them; and a guard was placed at euerie gate, least any one should go forth to submit themselves, or any horsemen should be received into the citie. Then Iohn made answer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perswade or compell the inhabitants to accept of the; yet he requested, that that day might be granted vnto the Iewes: for it was the seauenth day, wherein it was not lawful for them to intreat of peace, nor make warre. For as the Romanes knew, the Iewes euery seauenth day ceased from all work: & which if they profaned, they who caused it to be so abused, though it were Titus himselfe, were as great offenders, as they who were forced to it. Morouer, so short time could not preiudice the Romanes, to wit, one nights space: for nothing hee could effect in that time to endamage them, except onely by flying out of the citie (which Titus might preuent, by placing a strong guard and watch in euery place thereabout) & that he thought it a great priuledge to be suffered to keepe the custome of his countrey; and that it was his part who offered peace and safetie to them that expected it, also to keep their lawes whose safetie he granted. VVith these and such like speeches Iohn sought to delude Titus, being not so religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as careful for his own safetie: for hee feared that the citie would presently be taken, & he left alone, and so he determined in that night to flee, as the onely way to saue his life. Truly God would haue it so, that Iohn should then escape to see the ouerthrow of Ierusalem, and that
- D Titus should not onely grant him the time he requested to deliberate, but also that night should pitch his tents neere Cydæssa, by the higher part of the towne, which is the strongest village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian ioile, which the Galileans alwaies hated. In the night time Iohn perceiuing no Romans to keepe watch about the towne, hauing now opportunitee, fled not onely with the armed men about him, but also with many of the chiefe of the citie, and whole families, whom he promised to conduct vnto Ierusalem. But Iohn fearing captiuitie, and carefull for his owne safetie, hauing caried them twenty furlongs out of the citie, forooke them: who being so left desolate, began grievously to lament. For euery one thought himselfe as neere his enemies, as he was far from the citie and his friends: and still euerie steppe, they thought their enemies at hand ready to take them, and euery they looked back, as though their enemies heard the noise they made as they went, and so came against them; insomuch that many rushed forward on heapes, & many were killed in the way with the prease of them that followed; so that women and infants did perish miserably: or if they spake any thing, only it was entreating their parents or their kinsfolke to stay for them.
- But Iohns exhortation tooke effect, wherein hee cried vnto them to saue themselves, and hasten vnto such a place, where they might be safe and reuenge themselves of the Romanes, for the outrages vvhich they that remained behind were like to endure: and so the multitude that fled, euery one as he was able dispersed themselves. Titus early in the morning came vnto the walls to know whether they accepted of his offer. Then the people set open the gates, and with their wives and children came to meet him, all crying that hee was their safetie, and worker of their welfare, and that hee had deliuered their citie out of captiuitie: also they certified him how Iohn was fled, and besought him to pardon them, and execute iustice vpon those malefactors that remained in the citie. And at their request, he sent certaine horsemen to pursue Iohn, but they could not take him, for before they came he had gotten into Ierusalem: yet they slew almost two thousand of them that fledde with him, and brought backe againe three thousand women and children. Titus was angry that he suffered Iohns deceit to escape unpunished: yet his anger was something appeased, for that hee perceiued Iohns purpose preuented; in that so manie of his companie were slaine, and and so many brought backe for captiues. Thus hee peaceably entred the citie, commanding the G souldiers to break down a litle peece of the wall, as it were to take possession of it, & so punished the seditious rather with threats, then torments. For hee thought that many were accused onelie for priuate hatred, and so were in danger to suffer being innocent: and hee thought it better to let the wicked liue in feare, then with them to destroy the guiltlesse. Thinking moreouer, that heereafter they wold be more quiet, either for feare of punishment, or for shame of their former offence, for the which they were pardoned: and that if any man suffered vnworthily, hee could not afterward complain. Then he placed there a garrison, both to repress the seditious, & also to confirm them that desired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toiled the Romans.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the destruction of Ierusalem.

SO soone as Iohn was entered into Ierusalem, all the people flocked about him and those that came with him, enquiring what calamitie had befallen them without the city. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to speak, by signes discovered their need: Titus yet amidst these their miseries, they boasted that it was not the Romane power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to warre against the Romans in a safer place, then that from whence they fled was; for none but vnadvised and rash-headed men would fight for such a citie as Giscala and other places that were not able to resist, seeing that it behoued them all to reserve their vigour and strength to defend the Metropolitane citie. They also signified vnto them how Giscala was taken by the Romanes, and that they departed in good sort away, though some reported that they fled. The people of Ierusalem, hearing what these men reported, and how manie were captiues vnto the Romanes, they fell into a great feare, as though that which they told did portend their ruine. But Iohn, nothing ashamed in that he had so shamefully forsaken them of Giscala who fled with him, went first to one and then to another, enciting them all to war vnder a vaine hope, alleading the weaknesse of the Romanes, and extolling their own puissance, deceiuing the simple people, & perswading them that though the Romans sought to reuenge, yet could they neuer enter the wals of Ierusalem, who had so much adoe, and endured such affliction in entering the litle burges and villages of Galilee, against whose wals they had broken all their engines. These words of his incited many young men to sedition, but all the wiser sort foresaw what was like to ensue, and euen now mourned their lost citie. And in this case were they K of Ierusalem: yet before this sedition in the citie, the country people beganne to be at discord amongst themselves. For Titus departed from Giscala vnto Cæsarea, & Vespasian went from Cæsarea to Iamnia & Azotus, & tooke them both: & leauing there garrisons, hee returned to Cæsarea, bringing with him a huge company of them who had yielded vnto him. All cities were at ciuill wars amongst themselves; so that when the Romans did not war vpon them, one part of the Iews in euery citie fought against the other, and there was a great dissension between those that desired peace, & the seditious people: and at first this discord began only in priuate houses; but in the end, euery one ioyning with them that were of their mind, they now began in companies to rebell openly. Thus euery place was troubled with ciuill discord, and euery wherewith young men, who desired wars, preuailed against wise and graue old men, who foreseeing the calamitie like to ensue, desired peace. At first, the inhabitants one by one robbed and spoiled what they could, but at last in whole troupes they ioyned together, and robbed openly, and wasted all the country about: & they in their robberies shewed such crueltie, that the harme and iniurie they did vnto their owne countrymen, was altogether equall to the miseries which beset them by means of the Romanes; and they who by these miscreants were spoiled, wished rather to haue fallen into the Romanes hands. But they who kept the citie, either because they were loth to wearie themselves, or else for that they hated the citizens or people, did nothing or very little succour them that fell into these thieues hands. At last the thieues assembled themselves together from all places, & ioyning companies, they brake into Ierusalem. This citie had no gouernor, & according to the custome of that country, receiued all that came thither that were their countrymen; and so much more willinglie M at that time, because they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to helpe them: which only was afterward the cause that the citie was destroyed; setting aside the ciuill dissension. For a great multitude of people vnapt for fight being there, consumed the victuals that wold haue sufficed for the fighting men: & beside the wars, they brought all vpon it famine & ciuill dissension. Then other thieues came out of the fields thereabout, & ioyning themselves with those that were within the citie, omitted no kind villanie; for not content to robbe and spoile, they also attempted

The best Citizens exhort the people to reuenge.

Atted to commit murders, not onely priuily, or in the night vpon meane men, but euen on the day time they publickly set vpon the chiefeest of the nobilitie. For first of all they took Antipasse, who was borne of the bloud royall, a man so eminent amongst them, that the publike treasure was committed to his charge and custodie, and put him in prison: and after him they tooke Sepha a worthy man, and sonne to Raguel and Leuia, both of them of the kings household, and after them all that seemed to beare any sway, or were in authoritie amongst the people. Great feare fell vpon the Inhabitants, and euery one provided to saue himselfe, as though the Citie were euen now surprised by the enemies. But these people were not content thus to haue imprisoned those potentates, neither did they thinke it safetie for themselves any longer to detain such men aliue: for many came dayly vnto them to visit them, and vnto their houses, who were able to reuenge their iniuries: and moreouer they feared that the people would make a head against them, being moued with their iniquitie. Wherefore they determined to kill them, and to effect their purpose they sent one Iohn a cruell murderer, who was the son of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more, all having swords went vnto the prison, and slew as many as they found there. To excuse this cruell fact of theirs, they alleaged this, to wit, that all they who were slaine in prison, had conference with the Romanes concerning the betraying of the Citie into their hands, and that for this cause they had slaine them, being traytors to their Countie: they also boasted that this fact of theirs had preserued the Citie, and that therefore they had well deserued of it. The people was brought vnto such slauerie and terror, that the chusing of the high Priest was in their hands to elect whom they pleased: so much was their insolence increased. Thus they not respecting the families, out of which it was onely lawfull to chuse the high Priest, they now elected strangers C and base persons to that sacred dignitie, and such as would be partakers of their villanies and impieties: for they who not deseruing it, attained to such dignitie, were as it were obliged vnto their will in all things, by whom they were so exalted. They also deuiled many lies, to make those that were in authoritie one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to resist their enterpises, till that being now satisfied with the bloud of the Citizens, they began to commit impietie against God himselfe, and with prophane and vnpure secte to enter into the sanctuarie. Then the people was incited against them by Ananus his meanes, who was one of the priests, and the most ancient and wisest of them all, who perhaps had saued the Citie, had he escaped the hands of these miscreants. But they vsed the Temple as a Castle and defence for themselves against the people, and made the Sanctuarie a place for them to exercise tyrannie in. And that which increased the sorrow of the citizens, was, that amidst these calamities, their religion was also contumeliously abused: for these theues to trie of what strength and courage the people were, and their owne forces, did elect by lot a high Priest contrarie to their law: which as we haue already said, requireth that the high Priest shall be chosen by succession. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient custome, alleading that in time past the high Priest was chosen by lot. But indeede this their fact was an abrogation of the most firme custome that was amongst the people, and was onely a deuise to get all gouernment into their hands by establishing magistrats at their pleasure.

EThen calling one of the holy tribes named Eniachim, they cast lots, & it so fell out that the lot fell vpon one, whereby their iniquitie was discovered. This man whose lot it was to be high Priest was named Phanes, who was the sonne of Samuel, a man not onely vnworthy of that dignitie, but who had been so rudely brought vp, that he neuer knew what the high Priest meant, this Phanes was borne in a village called Aphthasis. Him, against his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had beene in a stage-play, they graced him with another mans person, and presently gaue him instructions how hee should beaue himselfe, putting vpon him the sacred attire of the high Priest, as though that so great impietie had beene but a sport. The rest of the priests beholding a far off the holy lawes to be scorned, scarcely contained themselves from tears, and euen groaned for sorrow, that their sacred dignities were so abused. The people could no longer endure this F their tyranny, but now euery one addressed himselfe to depose these tyrants. And those that were most earnest herein, were Gorion Iosephs sonne, and Simeon the sonne of Gamaliel, who went about the Citie to euery one in priuate, and then in a publicke assembly exhorted the people to be reuenged vpon those tyrants, who tooke from them their libertie; and to address themselves to purge the holy Temple from such vile and vnclane persons. Likewise the best disposed amongst the priests, to wit, Iesus the sonne of Gamala, and Ananus the sonne of Ananus, often in publicke Sermons reprehended the people, and vpbayed them with their slouth, in that they made no more haste to destroy those Zelous people (for so those wretches termed themselves, as

The people being all assembled together, euerie man grieued to see the holy place to kept for a denne of thecues, and of their robberies and murders which they committed; yet did they not goe about to reuenge, thinking themselves too weake to deale with these Zelous, as in deed they were. Then Ananus stood vp amongst the midst of them: and hauing often turned his eyes to the Temple, and beholden it till the teares ran downe his cheekes, Oh sayd hee, how farr better were it for me to die, then to liue, to see the house of God thus filled with impietie, and the Sanctuarie wherein none should come but the high Priest, prophaned with the wicked feet of impious persons, being clothed in Priests apparell, and beare the name of the most authoritie amongst all names: and doe I yet liue, and doe I saue my life, and to bee gray-headed, abstaine from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will goe against these murderers, and as though I were in a wilderness where there were no man beside my selfe, I alone will goe and offer my soule for Gods sake. For what doth it auail mee to liue amongst a people, that hath no feeling of their owne calamitie, and which seeketh not to redresse their own present miseries? for you being robbed and spoyled beare all patiently, and being beaten you hold your peace, and there is none amongst you that dare openly mourne for them that are most cruelly murdered. Tyrannous gouernment! But why should I exclaime against the tyrants? Did not you your selues make them great, and nourish their power and authoritie by your patience? did not you by despising those who before were in authoritie being but a few, make all these, who are many in number, tyrants ouer your selues? haue not you keeping your selues quiet, they being armed, turned their swords vpon their owne heads: and as then it behooued you to resist their enterprises, when first they injured your kintred; you by suffering haue made them thecues, because at first you made no account, when they destroyed houses and whole families. And this was the cause that at last, the rulers and potentates themselves were set vpon, and none would succour them when they were drawne through the midst of the Citie, and these murderers butchered them in prison whom you thus betrayed. I will not recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I say they being neither accused nor condemned, hauing no man to heare them, they were most cruelly murdered, as wee haue seene any: for they were before our faces led to bee slaine, as the attack amongst the whole herd of beasts, all we beholding this: and yet no man opening his mouth nor lifting vp his hand. And will you also endure? will you suffer the holy Sanctuarie to bee prophaned before your eyes? and will you, hauing so emboldened these miscreants as yee see now, your selues stand in feare of them? Assure your selues, they would, if they could deuise how, commit greater impietie then this is. They keepe against you the strongest place in the whole Citie called a Temple, but now in deed it is a fortress or Castle of defence. What doe yee now thinke, such a tyranny being established ouer you; and your enemies being euen vpon you, what doe you deliberate to doe? Doe you expect the Romans to come and helpe you, to saue the Temple and sacred mysteries? Our Citie is now at that stay, and we haue so behaued our selues, that our verie enemies pittie vs. O yee wretches! will you not arise, and as the verie bruit beasts doe, will you not reuenge your selues vpon them that haue thus wounded you? Will not euerie one of you call to minde the massacre of his friends, and what calamitie he himselfe hath suffered, and so encourage your selues to be reuenged? For ought I can see, you haue all lost that sacred and sweet and naturall desire of libertie, and now we imbrace bondage, as though wee had learned to bee bounden euen from our aunccestors. But they endured many and hard warres to liue in libertie, and yeelded neither to the power of the Egyptians, nor Medes, because they would not bee at their commaund. What neede is it to recount vnto you the warres of our predecessors? To what end doe wee enterprile this warre against the Romans (bee it commodious for vs, or to our disadvantage)? If not to obtaine our libertie? And wee who cannot indure to bee subiect vnto the Lords of the whole world, abide our owne nation to tyrannize ouer vs? Some may account it aduerser fortune to be once ouercome by strangers: but to be slaues vnto the basest of our owne nation, it is a greater miserie. I will not sticke to declare vnto you that which now cometh to my mind, to wit, that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet shall wee suffer no greater miserie at their hands, then now we do vnder these base tyrants. And how can you abstaine from teares, beholding this Temple, enriched by the gift of the Romans, robbed and spoyled by them of our owne nation, this being our mother Citie? and to see those men murdered, whome the Romans (although they had conquered vs) would not haue touched? The Romans neuer durst presume to passe beyond the limites of prophane places; nor euer violat lated they our sacred lawes and customes, but alwaies reuerenced the sanctuarie, beholding it onely as farre off: yet now some borne and brought vp amongst vs who are called Jewes, tremble not to walke in the sanctuarie, hauing their hands bathed in the blood of their countmen and brethren. Who will now feare forraine wars, seeing these ciuill broyles are such? Much better were it for vs to fall into our enemies hand: yea, if you will call euerie thing by such a name as it deserueth, wee shall finde that the Romans haue not violated our lawes, but haue beene the confirmers thereof; and they within our wals are our enemies. True it is, that those that haue thus tyrannized ouer vs, deserue death, and that no punishment can be deuised great enough for their offence: and all of you were so perswaded before I spake of it, and you were incited against them by that which you haue endured at their hands: but yet you feare the multitude of them & their courage; and moreover that they are in a higher place then you: yet as all this came by your negligence and suffering, so by your delaying they will grow stronger. For their number is dayly encreased, and euerie wicked person flieth vnto his like; and they are so much the more emboldened, for that as yet no man did once offer to resist their enterprises: and be sure that if they haue time they will make vse of the higher place, and that to your damage. But (beleeue mee) if you would but once offer to go against them, their verie consciences would abate their hautie minds, and the remembrance of their misdeeds would put them to farr out of tune, that they will not make any benefit of the higher place. Perhaps God in his vengeance will turne their owne darts against them for their impietie, and consume them therewith. Let vs but onely shew our selues, and we shall dismay them; yet it is an honour for vs if need bee, to sacrifice our liues for the defence of the holy temple. My selfe will assist you with hand and aduite, and you shall see that you shall neither want counsell, nor that I will spare my owne body to defend you from their treacheries.

Ananus thus exhorted the people against the Zelous, yet he knew well that it was great difficultie to ouercome them, being lustie young men, manie in number, of great courage, & the more desperate for the remorte of conscience of the horrible crimes, & execrable deeds which they had committed, for they despaird of all hope of pardon for their misdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable, that the common wealth should be so ouerruled. After this exhortation the people cried out that they were readie to go against the thecues, and to doe as they were requested. Whilest that Ananus selected out the most able men for warre, and set them in order, the Zelous came and issued out vpon him, and hauing intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certaine spies which they had appointed vpon purpose; being enraged sallied out, and in companies, sometime all at once; other times in ambushes, sparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number then the thecues, yet were they not so well armed as they; but what they wanted in armes their courage did supply. For the Citizens were armed with furie, stronger then armor; and they which were gone out of the temple, with a more desperate boldnesse, then all the multitude how great so euer it was. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the Citie except they could driue away the Zelous; and the Zelous thought that they could not escape torments and death if selfe, except that they were victors. So at last they ioyned battell each vnder their capitaines and leaders, and first of all both parties cast stones one against another: and if any part fled, then the conquerors pursued them with drawne swords, and many were wounded and slaine on both parts. Those townsmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houses; but the Zelous that were hurt went into the temple, and polluted the sacred pauements with their blood: so that their religion was prophaned by their blood. Alwaies the thecues in making excursions got the vpper hand. Hereat the Citizens being angrie, seeing their number euerie day encreased, reprooued the cowards: so that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zelous, they made him stand & resist whether he would or no, not permitting him to passe away: And thus they bent all their forces against their enemies. At last the thecues not able to make any longer resistance, by little & little retired themselves into the temple, and Ananus with his company entred the temple by force with them, and brake the ranke of his enemies. Then they in the viter temple were in great feare and fled into the inner temple, and shut the gates with all speed. Ananus would not offer violence to the sacred gates, & beside that the enemies cast darts from aloft: for hee thought it a great offence against God, although he might haue got the victorie, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected six thousand of the chiefe of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keepe the porches, and others to succeed in their places while they tooke rest. watch there, hired other poore folke to watch in their steeds. But John, who as before we haue G tolde, fled from Giscala, wrought the ruine of all these. This man being full of deceit, and about al measure desirous of rule, long ago intended to ouerthrow the common wealth. This man from that time counterfeited himselfe to bee against the thecues, and so day and night accompanied Ananus and the rest, both in their consultations, and when they went to visit the watch; and hee disclosed all their secrets vnto the Zelous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gaue the thecues intelligence thereof before it was put in practise; yet he seemed to be verie dutiful vnto Ananus, and the rest of the nobilitie, hereby hoping to conceale his treacherie. But it fell out contrarie to his expectation; for this his too much reuerence caused him to be suspected, because they noted him to play the parasite: and for that vncalled he dayly intruded himselfe into their consultations, he was misdoubted to bewray their secrets. For Ananus perceived that the enemies knew all their secrets, and Johns deedes did carrie suspicion of treason, yet could they H not easily remoue him, his craft was such: besides this, he was boultred out by many noble men, who were employed in these affaires. Wherefore they thought it good to request of him an oath of friendship; which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true vnto the people, and neither disclose any deede or secret counsell of theirs vnto the enemies, and that he with hart and hand would truly endeavour to suppress the rebels. So Ananus did no more mistrust him, because of his oath, and admitted him afterwarde to all their counsels, nothing suspecting him. Nay they now trusted him so far, that they sent him for an Embassadour vnto the Zelous, to per- swade them to peace: for they were verie carefull lest the temple through their deedes should be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Iewes should there be slaine. But hee as though hee I had sworn vnto the Zelous and nor vnto the Citizens, entred boldly amongst them: and stand- ing in the midst of them, he recounted vnto them that hee had often for their sakes vndergone great danger, in suffering none of the townesmens secrets to be concealed from them, but declar- ed vnto them all that euer Ananus and his confederates determined against them; and that euen now he was like together with them to fall into extreame danger, except it pleased God as it were miraculously to assist them. For, said he, now Ananus without delay will send vnto Ves- pasian, and he wil send his army in all haste and take the citie: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that so vnder pretence of pietie hee might let them into the Citie, or els they might enter in by force: and that hee could not see how either they were able to endure a long siege, or to encounter with so huge an armie: adding moreover, K that it was Gods prouidence that hee should be sent vnto them to make a peace, when Ananus purposed so soone as they were vnarmed to set vpon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themselves, they should either intreat the watchmen that besieged them to bee good vnto them, or else get some succour from some place without the temple. For (said he) he that amongst you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath past, and what hee hath done; but let them perswade themselves, they that haue been iniured wil not forget and forgieue so soone, as he that iniured them is sorie for his fact. Nay many times the repentance of malefac- tors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are iniured is increased by authoritie, and licence to doe what they please. And they might bee sure that the friends and kinsfolks of them that were slaine, would alwaies lay waite to requite the iniuries; and that all the people were incensed against them for breaking the lawes: so that although some few would take pitie vpon them, yet the greater companie being most in number would preuaile. With these & such like speeches John terrified the Zelous, yet durst he not openly tell them what hee meant by forraine help, notwithstanding he meant the Idumæans. And that hee might more enflame the thecues he went vnto the chieft of them, and secretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent against them, and breathed out many threatnings against them in particular.

How the Idumæans came vnto Ierusalem, and what they did there.

Mongst the Zelous there were two principall, Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who about all the rest was thought most fit to giue counsell, and to execute that which was consul- ted vpon: and Zacharias the sonne of Amphicalus, who both descended from the line of the priests. These two vnderstanding, that beside the generall threatnings their deaths were especially vowed, and that the faction of Ananus to get him into authoritie, had sent to call the Romans (for this, John had fained) deliberated with themselves what to doe, hauing so short time

A time to prouide. For they supposed that presently the people would assault them, and they be- thought themselves that now it was too late to seek for forraine helpe: for they might endure all calamities, before they could giue notice hereof vnto any that would helpe them. Yet at last they determined to call the Idumæans to aide them, and so they wrote a brieue Epistle vnto them, let- ting them vnderstand how Ananus, hauing seduced the people, meant to betray the mother Citie of their nation vnto the Romans, and that they fighting for their libertie, were by him be- sieged in the Temple: that the time wherein they expected safetie was verie short: and that if they did not presently send succour, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the Citie to bee brought in subiection vnder the Romans: and also committed man- nie things to be spoken by word of mouth vnto the rulers of Idumæa. For which purpose were B chosen two principall men eloquent and apt to perswade, and that, which was in this case requir- ed, swift of foote: for it was certaine that the Idumæans would presently aide them, it being a clownish rude nation, and prone to sedition and alteration, much reioycing therein; and by flatterie easily entreated to warres, making as much haste to them as if they went to some fes- tiuall solemnitie: so that there onely was required two speedie messengers. Which two were readie and quicke men for such an exploite, and were both called by the name of Ananias. These presently came vnto the gouernours of Idumæa: & they reading the Epistle, and hearing that which the messengers were to say vnto them, like mad men assembled all the people toge- ther in post haste, and proclaimed war; so the people in an instant gathered themselves together, and were all armed to fight for the libertie of their mother citie: and twentie thousand being as- C bled together vnder the gouernment of foure captains, came with all speed to Ierusalem: the names of them were these, John and James, sonnes of Sofa, and Simon the sonne of Carthla, and Phineas the sonne of Clusoth. Ananus and his watchmen knewe not of the going of these two messengers, nor of the watches in the citie, but they vnderstood of the Idumæans coming, & so that the gates and placed watchmen vpon the wals: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with the, but first with peaceable words to perswade them to concord & peace. Wherefore Iesus the eldest of the priests next after Ananus stood in a tower opposite against them, & spake in this manner.

Though many and diuers tumults and troubles haue molested this citie, yet did I neuer so much admire any of them, as to come with such furie and readines to help these wicked people, against all expectation: for (said he) you are come against vs to helpe most vile persons, and that D so rashly, as it behooued not you to haue done, if your Metropolitan citie had requested your helpe against barbarous people. If I should perceiue your manners like vnto theirs that haue requested your helpe, I would then thinke you had some reason to come, for nothing causeth firmer friend- ship then agreemēt or sympathie in manners. But they if they were narrowlie fought into, haue e- uerie one deserued a thousand deaths. For they, are the basest & the verie outcast of all the coun- trie people, who hauing spent their patrimony riotously, and played the thecues in all places, and cities about them, now at last haue got into this holy citie, most religious of all cities, & haue E prophaned the holy place by their impietie: they tremble not to be drunke euen in the holy tem- ple, and there they consume in banquetting the spoyle they haue gotten from them, whom they haue massacred. And you come to helpe these men with as great an armie & prouision, as though that this your mother citie had by publike consent requested your helpe against forraine enemies. Is not this the iniurie of fortune, that your whole nation hath conspired & bent all their forces a- gainst vs to help these miscreants? Til now I knew not what moued you so quickly & so suddenly to arme your selues to assist thecues against your natie coutrimē. What haue you bin informed of the Romans coming, & of the betraying of the citie? For euen now I heard some of you mutter, that you came to deliuer your mother city. Is it not a wōder to see this deuise & inuention of these malefactōrs? But they could deuise no other way to incite other against vs (who euen naturally desire libertie & are ready for the same to spend our dearest blood in cōflict with the enemy) but to F feign vs to be destroyers of libertie: But it behooueth you to consider who are these calūniators, & a- gainst who these calūniations are deuised, & then to gather the veritie of the matter, not to forged tales, fained at mens pleasures, but frō the thing it self. What shuld moue vs now to yeeld vnto the Romans, hauing indured as yet nothing to cōstrain vs therunto? when if we had liked to liue vnder their obedience, neither needed we at first to haue rebelled; & beside that, if we had repented our selues we might haue again submittid our selues, & obtained their fauour before this time that all the countie round about vs is destroyed. Nay if now we would yeeld, it is not easie for vs: for the spoyle of Galilee, which they hauing already conquered, hath made them proud, and that we in humbling our selues vnto them, being accēse vnto vs, should incur an infamie worse then death.

it selfe. True it is, I thinke peace better then wars, yet being once provoked to wars, & the fight G being begun, I had rather die a glorious death then to live in captiuitie. Doe they enforme you that we haue secretly sent the chiefe of our citie to the Romans, or that by common consent of all the people we haue done it? If they say that we did it secretly: let them then tel what friends of ours we sent, or what seruants of ours were ministers to effect this treason. Did they take any messenger of ours, and find letters about him? How can that be hid from all our citizens, with whom we do euerie houre conuerse? And is it possible that a few, shut vp in the temple, who could not come out into the citie, should know our secrets, all the whole citie knowing nothing? or doe they now first know it when they are like to be punished for their impietie? neuer suspecting any of vs to be traytors, so long as they were in no feare. If they say that it was done by common consent of all the people, why then all men were there when the speech was made vnto the people, to exhort them thereunto, and request their good wils, and so the newes thereof would quickly haue come vnto your eares: Or what need had we to send Embassadors, if we had been now already certaineto come to composition with the Romans? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embassyage. These are but deuises and excuses of them, who feare to haue a death according to their deserts, and a shite to escape punishment.

If fate had so decreed that our citie should be betrayed vnto the enemy, assure your selues that they, who doe thus accuse vs, would haue betrayed it themselves; who haue committed already all sort of impieties, treason onely excepted. It is your parte, seeing you are come hither in armes, first (as reason and iustice requireth) to assist your mother Citie against them who tyrannize ouer vs, and violate our lawes: who treading downe our lawes make I all that iustice, which they can effect with their sword. And first of all they tooke noble men and cast them in prison, drawing them from amidst the publike assemblie; and being neuer accused nor condemned, nothing respecting their intreaties, put them to death. If it please you to come in peaceable and not hostile manner into our citie, your selues shall plainly behold euident tokens of this that I speake vnto you: to wit, houses ruinated and made desolate by their robberies, the wiues and families of them that are slaine in mourning apparell, and howling and crying in euerie part of the Citie: For there is no one amongst vs that hath not tasted the persecution of these wretched men, who are gone so far that not content to make this citie their refuge (which is the chief & a spectacle to all others for sanctitie) after they had robbed and spoyle all the country & villages, and cities here about, now lastly they haue made the sacred temple a refuge and place to K carrie all their spoyle, which they haue impiously gotten in this Citie, vnto. This temple they doe make their bulwarke to issue out, and to retire vnto; and from thence they make incursions vpon the citizens: and this is the place where they practise all their villanies against vs. And this sacred place, which all the world, euen the most barbarous & sauage people thereof do reuerence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one born amongst vs committed. And now being in desperation, they reioyce to see nation against nation, & citie against citie, & people against people, and our own countymen to turn themselves against their own bowels: when contrariwise, (as I haue already said) it had bene your parts and duties to ioyne with vs, and helpe vs to exterminate these malefactors; and be reuenged of them for this lie, in that they presumed to call you to help them whom they had iust reason to feare as reuengers of their impieties: yet if you make L account of these mens praiers, vouchsafe (laying your weapons aside) to come into our citie like friends, and be your selues iudges betweene vs and them whom you came to helpe. And consider what saueur we shew them, who permit them to plead their owne causes before you, they being guiltie of so hainous crimes, and hauing put to death persons of such account, neuer accused nor permitted to speake for themselves: yet this commoditie wee will grant them for your sake. But if you continue in your anger against vs, and refuse this offer to bee our iudges: then let vs intreat you that leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor led your aide vnto these miscreants against your mother citie. And if you suspect any of vs to be confederates with the Romans, you may keepe all passages; and then seek to defend your Metropolis, when you haue proofe of any such matter as is alledged against vs; and punish the authors M of that treason when you haue convicted them. The enemies cannot prevent you being already planted so neere the Citie. If you like of none of these, maruell not that we shut our gates against you, comming in armed and hostile manner. Iesus spake thus vnto them. But the Idumæans being angry, were not moued hereby, and so much the more for that entrance into the citie was denied them, and their generals were exceedingly wroth, thinking it slauerie to lay downe their armes, especially at the command of another.

The heare of the world, 403a. after Christ's birth, 70. Simons answer to Iesus oratio.

A Then one of the captaines named Simon the sonne of Cathla, hauing with much adoe gotten his souldiers to be silent, hee stood in a place where the priests might heare him, and said, That he now did not wonder that those who maintained libertie, were enclosed and besieged in the Temple, seeing that they of the Citie now shut their gates against his followers, the citie being common and free for all men; and that perhaps they were readie to open the Citie gates for to receiue the Romans. And he spake vnto the Idumæans from a tower, and commanded them to cast down their armes, which they took onely for the libertie of the citie, when they durst not trust their own nation to keep the same; yet would haue them iudges of the discord; & that accusing others for killing some not convicted, they themselves doe condemne all the whole nation of ignominie; and that they had now shut the Citie gates against their own Countymen, which was common for all strangers to come vnto for religion sake. Did we make hast towards you, to fight B against our owne nation, which came onely to preferue your libertie? But this is as true as that they whom you thus besiege haue wronged you, and as the accusation you forge against them. And you keeping in hold those that are the defenders of the Commonwealth, doe then shut the Citie gates against men of your owne blood: lastly, you impose vpon vs contumelious commands, and say that they do tyrannize ouer you, ouer whom indeed you do. Who can any longer endure this your mockerie, that perceiueth how vnpossible your allegations are? For who can iustly accuse those that yee keep shut vp in the Temple, because that they presumed to punish traytors, whom you grace with the title of noble & innocent, because they were your confederats? Onely in this they are blame worthe, that they did not begin with you, but left a liue such members of that conspiracie. Except also you will say that the Idumæans shut you out of your Citie, C you your selues not permitting vs to come & offer sacrifices. But though they were too merciful, yet we Idumæans will consecrate the house of God, and will fight for the common good of our Countrey, and will bee reuenged both of the enemies that are without the Citie, and the traytors within. And here will we remaine before the Citie, till either the Romans come and deliuer you, or till you change your minds and bethinke your selues what a fewell it is to haue libertie.

The Idumæans are displeased because the Citie gates were locked against them.

The reproches the Idumæans obiect against the high priests and Citizens.

CHAP. VII.

Of the massacre of the Iewes by the Idumæans.

D ALl the whole multitude agreed with a lowd crie vnto these speeches of Simon. And Iesus departed sorrowfull seeing that the Idumæans would agree to no reason, & that thereby their Citie should suffer double warres. For the Idumæans wrath was not yet asswaged, whoooke the matter in great disdain that they were not permitted to enter into the Citie, and also for that they thought the Zealous verie strong, and they themselves were ashamed that they could not come to helpe them, so that manie repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for shame retume, nothing being done by them: and so rashly E placing their Tabernacles neere vnto the Citie walles, they determined to stay there. But that night there fell a most huge tempest: for there was a great stormie wind and an exceeding great raine, mixt with fearefull thunder and horrible lightning, and the Earthquake with strange noises: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did signifie the death of mankind; and portend some great matter. The Idumæans and townes-men were both of one mind: for they thought that God was angry with them, for bearing armes against their Metropolis, and perswaded themselves that they could not escape death if they continued in their purpose. Ananus and his followers perswaded themselves that they had now overcome them without warre, and that God had fought for them against the Idumæans. But they were false Prophets, and what they iudged was to befall their enemies, that fel vpon themselves. In the mean while the Idumæans lay as close together as they could, and covered their heads with their shields, so that by this means the raine did them not so much harme. The Zealous were pensue for the Idumæans more then for themselves, and deuised which way they might succour them. Then the boldest amongst them aduised the rest by force to oppresse the watchmen, and so to goe into the Citie, and open the gates to the Idumæans that came to helpe them, for it was easie to surpriue the watchmen, by reason that many of them were vnarmed, and vnfit for warre, and the Citizens could not easily be assembled together, for euerie man because of this tempest kept his house. And suppose that there were danger, yet were it better to endure all mischiefs that might ensue, then to permit mit such an army shamefully to perish, who came at their request to helpe them. But the wiser sort G dissuaded the rest from this, seeing both a stronger watch placed to keepe them in, and the Citie wals diligently guarded because of the Idumæans: and moreover, perswading themselves that Ananus ceased not but went vp and downe, first from one watch, and then to another; yet that night hee did not so, nor for slouthfulnesse, but because that the destinies had so decreed that thereby both hee and the watchmen should perish. For about midnight the storm increasing, the watchmen fell into a sound sleepe.

Then the Zealous determined to file the barres and bolts of the gates in sunder, to effect this, they took the instruments which were consecrated to the temple, & this attempt was much fur- thered by the huge wind and thunder, which made such a noyse that they could not bee heard: so issuing out of the Temple, they went priuily to the walles, and opened that gate neere vnto H which the Idumæans lay: and suspecting that Ananus would make some resistance, they first of all drew their swords, & then together with the Idumæans came in: and if at that time they had assaulted the Citie, they had without any let or hinderance destroyed all the people therein: so great was their rage at that time. But first of all they hastned to assist their fellows, whom they left besieged, and requested the Idumæans not to leaue them in danger, for whose succour they were come, nor permit them to incurre greater damage: for having first surprised the watchmen, it would be more easie for them to assault the Citie: which if they did not, but first set vpon the Citizens, they would presently assemble together, and oppose themselves against them, and not permit them to ascend vp vnto the Temple. The Idumæans consented vnto this, and so they passed thorough the Citie into the Temple. And the Zealous remaining in the Temple, carefully I expected their coming: at whose arriual they tooke courage, and ioyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and set vpon the watch: and some being slaine who were fast a- sleepe, the rest were awaked by the cries of others, and so betooke themselves to their armes to defend themselves, being yet amazed. And at first, thinking that they were only the Zealous that gave the assault, hoped onely by their multitude to suppress them; but seeing others without the Temple also assailing them, they perceiued that the Idumæans were broken in: so the greater part of them being dismaide, laide downe their weapons and cried; and onely a few of them, young men well armed, and of good courage encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good space de- fended their idle fellows: others went and aduertised the Inhabitants what was done, yet none durst come to helpe them, because they now knewe that the Idumæans were got in, but euery K one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation, when any of the watchmen fell into danger. The Zealous also answered their cries with the like, and then the tem- pest and thunder made all more dreadful. The Idumæans spared none, because that they were naturally cruell and fierce to shed blood: and angrie that they were so beaten with the tempest, they vsed them most cruelly, by whose meanes they were shut out of the Citie, sparing neither those who requested fauour, nor them who made resistance, for they slew many euen as they were intreating them to remember that they were of their owne blood, and requesting them to spare them for reuerence of their Temple. There was no way to fly, nor any hope of escape: being driuen vp into a narrow roome, they hurt themselves more then the enemies did, by crowding and treading vpon one another, for there was no place to flie, nor their enemies ceased not to kill L them. Being in this desperate estate; not knowing how to doe, they cast themselves head-long downe into the Citie, and so died a more miserable death (in my mind) then they that died by the enemies sword. The next day there was found slaine eight thousand and five hundred, and all the viter Temple flowed with blood. Yet this massacre sufficed not the Idumæans rage, but tur- ning themselves against the Citie, they robbed and spoyled all houses, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the rest of the multitude. They made diligent search for the Priests, and many laide violent hands vpon them, and killed them: and standing vpon their dead corpses, sometime they vbrayded Ananus with the peoples fauour towards him, sometime Jesus with the words hee spake vpon the wall vnto them, and were so impious as that they cast awaie their dead bodies vnburied, notwithstanding that the Iewes in this point are so religious, that M after sunne set they take downe the dead bodies of malefactors, who by sentence haue bene ad- judged vnto the crosse, and burie them.

I thinke I doe not greatly misse the mark, if I affirme Ananus his death to haue bene the destruction of the Citie, and from that time forth the walles of Ierusalem to haue bene ouer- throwne, and the common wealth of the Iewes to haue perished in that day when they behelde their priest and Gouernour slaine, euen in the midst of the Citie. He was a man that led a lau- dable

A dable and most iust life: and being in great dignitie, honour, and reputation; yet would hee not exalt himselfe about any one, were he neuer so base. He was a man who thirsted after libertie, and bare the rule and gouernment of the common wealth. He continually preferred the pub- like commoditie before his owne priuate gaine, being alwaies desirous of peace; for he foresaw that the Romans could not be withstood; & that, if the Iewes did not quickly accord with them, their ruine was at hand: briefly I say, that had Ananus liued, they had yeilded with him vnto the Romans. For he was an eloquent Orator and could perswade admirably: wherby hee had now gained vnto his side those that hindred him, and caused the warres; whome if they had had for their captaine against the Romans, it had not bene so easie for the Romans to haue conquered them. With him was ioyned Jesus inferiour to Ananus, yet excelling all the rest. So that I B thinke Almighty God hauing decreed the totall ruine of the Citie, being now violated and fil- led with iniquitie, and meaning by fire as it were to purifie the holy temple which was now de- filed and prophaned, he first tooke away the defenders thereof, and those that loued them most deere. So they who a little before were clothed in sacred apparell, and reuerenced of all those that from the furthest parts of the world came to Ierusalem, now lay murthered and na- ked in the open streetes, left as it were a pray to be torne in peeces with dogges or wilde beastes, who earst were the authors of pietie and religion. I thinke that Vertue it selfe wept to see wic- kednesse so preuaile.

the Idumæans.

Such was the ende of Ananus and Iesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zelous massacred the people, as though they had beene a flocke of pernicious beasts, and euerie one was slaine whereloeuer hee was found: and taking the nobilitie and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was thereby moued, but euerie one desired to die rather then impiouly to conspire against their owne country: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole bodie being all as it were one fore place by whipping and stripes: and so when they could not indure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And whoso was taken on the day time was in the night carried to prison, and those that died in prison and torments, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might haue place to imprison others in their roome. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weepe openly for his friend, nor burie the dead body of his kinsman; yea those that were in prison durst not openly weepe, but secretly, looking about them, least any of their enemies should espie them. For whosoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himselfe vsed in the same manner as he had been for whom he lamented; & sometime some in the night scraped vp a little earth with their hands, and therewithall couered the dead body of their friend; and some boldere then therest, did the like in the day time. And in this generall slaughter were twelue thousand young noble men slaine by this means: and thus being hated for these massacres, they mocked and flouted the magistrates, and made no account of their iudgements. So that when they determined to put out Zacharie the sonne of Baruch to death, a noble man and one of the chiefe of the citie (for they perceiued that he was an enemy to their wickednes, & loued the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not onely to haue the spoyle of his goods, but also to bee rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seuentie of the best amongst the common people together as it were in iudgment, yet they hauing no authoritie; and before them they accused Zacharie, that hee had betrayed the common wealth vnto the Romans, and that for that intent he had sent vnto Vespasian: but neither shewed any euidence nor prooue thereof, but onely they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would haue credit giuen vnto their words. When Zacharie perceiued that vnder pretence of being called vnto iudgement, hee was deceitfully brought into prison; and hauing no hope of life, yet he spared not to speake liberally his minde: but began to scorne the rage and pretence of his enemies, and purged himselfe of the crimes whereof he was accused; and conuerting his speech against his accusers, hee laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the Citie.

In the meane while the Zelous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely containe themselves from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and iudgement might be ended. Hee also requested them, who by these misereants were appointed his iudges, to remember iustice, notwithstanding those dangerous times. The seuentie iudges all pronounced that hee was to be absolued and freed as vnguiltie; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced, the Zelous began to shoute and crie with a loud voice, & they all were angrie at the iudges, who did not vnderstand to what end that counterfeite authoritie was giuen them. Then two of the boldest amongst themselves vpon Zacharie, and killed him in the midst of the temple, & mocked him saying, Thou hast now our sentence and absolution, farre more certaine then the other was, and presently they cast him downe from the temple into the valley vnderneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their swords they did beat the iudges out of the temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being disperfed through the whole citie, they might tel the people as messengers from them, of their miserable captiuitie. The Idumæans were now sorrowfull for their comming: for they misliked these proceedings: who being assembled altogether, one of the Zelous secretly told the all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken armes, because they were enformed, how that the Metropolitane citie was by the priests betrayed vnto the Romans; but as they might perceiue there was no prooue nor signe of anie such matter: and that

A In desce the Zelous who pretended themselves conseruers of the citie, were meere enemies; and exercised tyranny ouer the Citizens euen from their beginning. And although they had assisted themselves with such wicked persons, and made themselves partakers of such and so many murders, yet thought now to cease from such wickednes, & not assist men so impious to destroye their countrie lawes and religion. For although they took it in bad part that the citie gates were shut vpon them; yet now they were sufficiently reuenged of those that were the cause thereof. Now was Ananus himselfe slaine, and almost all the people in one night: wherof manie of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themselves perceiue the crueltie of them, who requested their aide, to be more then barbarous: so that they binth not to commit their villainies openly in the sight of them who had saved their liues; and their misdeameour and impietie would be imputed vnto the Idumæans, because they neither hindered their mischieuous practices, nor forsooke their societie. And that therefore it was their parts (seeing that it was now euident that the report of treason was onely calumnation, and that no assault by the Romans was to be feared, likewise that an inuincible force was established against the citie) for to depart home, and by forsaking the societie of the impious acquite themselves of their impietie, as being by the deceiued, & so against their wills made partakers thereof. The Idumæans were hereby perswaded, & first of all they loosed them that were in prison, in number two thousand of the vulgar, & presently leaving the citie, they went vnto Simon; of whom we will speake hereafter, & so they departed home.

depart out of Ierusalem.

Their departure was against the expectation of both parts: for the people not knowing that the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, reioyced as now deliuered from their enemies: and the Zelous grew more insolent and proud, as though they neuer had needed helpe, but now were deliuered from them, in reuerence of whom they abstaied from villanies. So now they vsed no delay to effect their impietie: for they spent not much time in taking aduise, but whatsoeuer seemed best vnto them, presently without any delay they put it in practice. But chieflie they murdered those men that were strong & valiant: for they enuid the nobilitie for their vertue: And they thought it a principall point first to bee effected, not to leaue any one man of account aliue. Wherfore they slew amongst the rest Gorion a noble man of great birth and dignitie, one who loued the people, and was verie bountifull and a louer of libertie: so that there was none amongst the Iewes like him, who for desire of libertie and his other vertues was put to death. But neither could Niger Peraita escape their hands, a man who in warres against the Romans had shewed himselfe valiant: who although hee often cried out and shewed the tears of his wounds receiued in defence of his country; yet they ceased not for all this most shamefully to drag him through the citie: and being led out of the citie, despairing of life, he entreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his request slew him. Who at his death besought God that the Romans might come and reuenge it vpon them, and that plague & famine and ciuill discord might light vpon their Citie. Whose prayers God heard, sending all vpon them which he did iustly require, and first of all they were plagued with ciuill warres amongst themselves. Niger being thus slaine, they were freed from the feare that they had of him, how that hee would resist their wickednes. There was no part of the common people, who were not by some forged tale or other put to death. For some were slaine, for that long since they had borne armes against their owne citizens, and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for some occasion deuised in the time of peace: and they who did not conuerse with them were murdered, as such that contened them: and they that did freely & friendly conuerse with them were slaine, as men that sought to betraie them: and the greatest offenders, and the least offenders were all punished alike, to wit, with death: for no man escaped except he was either poore or of verie base condition.

The ciuill discord amongst the Iewes.

F

IN the meane while the Romans addressed all their courage against the Citie of Ierusalem; and seeing them at great variance amongst themselves, thought this to be for their great aduantage. Vpon this they incited Vespasian their generall, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Iewes should be at ciuill wars amongst themselves, and that therefore he should not ouerslip so good an opportunitie: for the Iewes would quickly be friends againe one with another, either by the wearines of ciuill wars, or else repenting themselves themselves of that which they had done. To whom Vespasian answered, that they were ignorant what was to be done, being rather desirous as it were in a theater to shew their forces & strength, then with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. For (said hee) if wee presently assault them, our comming will make concord amongst our enemies, and so wee shall bring vpon our selues their forces yet firme and strong: but by expecting a little while they should haue lesse adoe to conquer them, their chiefe forces being destroyed by their owne ciuill wars; And that God was more their friend then they were aware of, who without their labour and paine deliuered the Iewes into their hands, and will giue vs the victorie without indaungering of our army: And that therefore it was rather their parts to bee as it were beholders of that tragedie, then to fight against men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest euill that possible could be, to wit, domesticall sedition, and ciuill wars. And if anie thinke that the victorie is not famous being gotten without fight, let him know and consider the vncertain euents of wars: and that it is better, if it be possible, to get a victorie without bloodshed, then therewith to hazard the victorie. For they who by counsell and aduice do any worthy act, deserue no lesse praise then they, who by force of armes archiue a victorie. Moreouer, in the meane time that the enemye one destroyed another, his soldiers might take rest, and so be stronger and better able to fight when need should require. Beside that, it seemed not that there was so much haste required to get the victorie: for the Iewes neither prepared armes or engines of warre, nor leuied any forces, nor sought for aide, and so by delay no damage could insue: but that they would plague one another more by ciuill wars, then his armie would by taking them and their citie. And therefore whether they considered it best to abstaine from assaulting them (who fought with one another) for securitie sake, or else for vaine glorie thought the honour of the victorie diminished thereby: yet hee held it not meet to fight against them, who were at ciuill wars amongst themselves; for so it would be iustly said, the victorie was not to be imputed to vs but to their discord.

Many citizens, who were the Zealots, were delighted at Vespasian.

The Zealots tyrannize both ouer the liuing and the dead.

The captaines all consented, and thought this aduise of Vespasians best: And presently it appeared how profitable his counsell was. For euery day many fled vnto him to escape the hands of the Zealots: yet it was hard & dangerous to flee, because all the waies were garded with watchmen. And if anie man vpon any occasion whatsoever were taken vpon the way, hee was presently killed, as one who intended to haue fled vnto the Romans: yet he that see'd the watchmen with mony, escaped away safely; and hee that did not, was counted as a traitor: so that onely rich men could escape, & the poore were left to the slaughter. The multitude of dead bodies that lay on heapes together was innumerable, & many of them who had fled vnto the Romans, returned againe into the citie, chusing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native soyle, made death there seeme more tolerable. But they became so cruell, that they neither permitted them who were slaine within, nor them without the citie, to bee buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their countrey lawes, to abolish the law of nature, yea & by their impietie to pollute the sacred diuinity with iniustice, let the dead bodies rot about the ground: and whosoever attempted to burie any one of them that were slaine, whether hee were friend or kinsman, were presently put to death, and left vnburied as men forsaking their citie, and flying to the enemye. To be breefe, nothing so much increased their calamities as mercie: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were, prouoked to wrath, whose displeasure and crueltie was extended from the liuing vnto the dead, and from the dead vnto the liuing. And such feare fell vpon the whole citie, that those that were left aliue, deemed them happie, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in prison in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselves vnhappy then they who lay vnburied. All humane iustice was by them peruerced, and they scorned and mocked at all diuine and holy things, and proudly derided the oracles of the prophets, esteeming them as fables and iests. But hauing now condemned all lawes established by their forefathers for the punishment of vice, & increasing of vertue: at last they found that true, which by them was foretold, concerning the destruction of themselves and their countrey. For there was an olde propheticke, that when sedition reigned amongst them, and their owne hands had first violated the temple of God and holy things; that then their citie should be destroyed by warre, and their holy places should be burned with fire, according to the vse and custome of warre. And the Zealots giuing credite vnto this propheticke made themselves the ministers of this action.

CHAP. III.

How Gadara was yielded: and of the massacre there.

But John, who long agoe desired to bee in chiefe authoritie, as tyrant ouer all the rest, thought it not sufficient to be in as great reputation as his fellows; wherefore by little and little ioining vnto himselfe the most impious of all the Zelous, hee diuided himselfe from their vnion and fellowship: So that now euery one perceiued (in that he alwaies neglected what others commanded, and imperiously commanded what himselfe thought good) that hee affected principallitie; and many ioined to him for feare, some for fauour (for hee had a smooth tongue, able to perfwade them vnto what he would) many also followed him; thinking it better that all the impietie before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then vnto all men in generall. Moreouer, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to giue politike counsell, hee wanted not followers, notwithstanding that many of the contrarie faction left him, enuying that he, who before was their equall, should now be their Lord and commander. Feare also terrified them from liuing vnder the gouernment of one onely man; for they thought that if he once preuailed, he could not easily be overcome: and againe, if hee were deposed, that hee would picke quarrels against them in the end, because that they resisted him in the beginning. So euery man determined rather to suffer all miserie in war, then to submit himselfe, and perish like a slave. Thus the sedition was diuided, and John was chiefe of the faction against the Zelous, so betwene them they appointed garrisons in euery place; and if by chance they combatted together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but their chief contention was who should bear most sway amongst the people: and they did strue on both parts who should haue the greatest part of the spoile. Thus the Citie at one time was vexed with three intolerable mischiefs and euils, to wit, warre, tyrannie, and sedition: and yet warre seemed a lesse euill then the rest vnto the communitie. In brieffe, many leauing their native soyle, fled vnto straungers for succour, and found amongst the Romans safety, who with their owne nation liued in continuall danger. There was also then begun the fourth euill, which wrought the ruine of the whole nation. Not farre from the Citie there was a Castle called Massada, builded by the auncient kings of Ierusalem, very strong to lay their treasure in, and their munition for warre, and to retire themselves thereunto in time of neede, for the safety of their persons. This Castle was taken and kept by that sort of theues that were called Sicarii, who for feare durst robbe no more. These theues seeing the Roman armie now idle, and the Iewes in Ierusalem at ciuill warres and sedition amongst themselves, they tooke courage, and againe fell to their villanies. And so vpon that day which is the feast of vnleavened bread (which the Iewes doe keepe holy, in memorie of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian captiuitie) deceiuing the watchmen, they seized vpon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the townes-men could arme and vnite themselves together, they were by these persons driuen out of the town, who also killed them that could not flee, to wit, women and children, to the number of more then seuen hundred; and so sacking the houses, and taking the fruits that were now ripe, they carried all vnto Massada: and so they wasted all the villages and whole countrey round about them, many wicked persons daily flocking vnto them and ioining with them: and by their example other theues that awhile had been quiet, now robbed againe, and spoiled in euery part of Iudaea. And as in a body, if the principall member thereof bee sicke, all other parts of it are afflicted: so Ierusalem being filled with tumults and discord, those that were without the Citie found licence to robbe and spoile: and all they that had their rownes destroyed where they were wont to inhabite, went into the wilderness. Then they assembling and vniting themselves together, not so many as an armie, yet more then a companie of theues, they brake into the townes and temples; and as in warre it cometh to passe, they purposed to assault them, by whom they had suffered such iniury: but they were preuented, for the theues vnderstanding of their comming, fled with the spoile they had gotten. And there was no part of Iudaea that did not perish together with Ierusalem their mother citie. Those that fled vnto the Romans certified Vespasian hereof: for although the seditious persons did keep & obserue all passages, and kill them that offered to flee, yet many secretly stole away from them, and sought Vespasian both to helpe the oppressed citie, & to take compassion vpon the reliques of their nation: affirming that many had been butchered for wishing well to the Romans, and many being yet aliue, were yet in great danger. And Vespasian moued to compassionate their calamities came with his army neerer Ierusalem, as though he would haue besieged it: but indeed his intent was to deliuer it from the siege, hoping in the meane time to conquer that part of the countrie that was yet vntoucht, and so to leaue nothing to hinder him when hee should beginne the siege. Wherefore comming vnto Gadara, the strongest place and mother Citie of all the countrie beyond the riuer, he entered into it the fourth day of March: for the chiefe of the citie, vnknewne vnto the seditious people, had sent Embassadors to him, partly desiring peace, partly to saue their goods and liues, and promised him to yeld the towne into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: and their enemy knew not of their Ambassage, till they saw Vespasian at the citie gates. And so despairing that they were able to keep the citie, by reason they had in the towne many enemies, more in number and stronger then themselves; and moreover seeing Vespasian euen now almost at the citie: and thinking it a shame to fly and not be reuenged of their enemies; they tooke Dolus (who was both a noble man and chiefe of the citie, and also the author of that Ambassage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the Citie. Now the Romans army approching neere vnto the citie, the people of Gadara went forth and receiued Vespasian ioifully; who also confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a company of horse and footemen to defend them against the incursions of the fugitiues their enemies: for they themselves before the Romanes requested it destroyed the citie wals, that so they might shew themselves to desire peace, in that destroying their wals if after they desired to rebell they could not.

Vespasian then sent Placidus with five hundred horsemen, and three thousand footemen to pursue those, that were fled out of Gadara, and he with the rest of his armie returned to Caesarea. But the fugitiues perceiuing themselves to bee pursued by Placidus, before hee could ouertake them, got into a towne called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arme themselves, and so rashly they came against Placidus. Placidus and his army seemed a little to giue backe, to the intent to drawe them further from the wall: and then hauing compassed them about in a fit place, they wounded them afar off with darts and arrowes. Then the Iewes seeking to flie, were prevented by the horsemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Roman footemen all put to the sword, neuer shewing any signe of valour. For the Iewes assaulting the Romans being all inuironed and quite couered with their shields as with a wall, & not being able to breake into their battell, they were slain by the Romans darts: but their darts could do the Romans no harme, and so like fierce and savage beasts they wilfully ran vpon their enemies sword, and so were slaine, some hauing all their face cut with swords, some killed by the horsemen. For Placidus was carefull to intercept their passage vnto the towne, and to hinder their recourse vnto it, and brought those back againe that fled towards it, vsing his darts, and killing those that were next him; and those who fled afar off for feare, he caused to returne; till at last the strongest amongst them brake away, and got vnto the towne wals: And those that were within the citie knew not what to doe, for they would not shut the fugitiues of Gadara out of the citie, because they desired to let their owne Citizens in; and againe they perceived that if they let them in, they thereby should worke the overthrow of the citie, as it fell out indeed they did. For the gates being set open for them to come in, the Roman horsemen almost brake into the towne with them, yet the gates were shut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his souldiers assaulted the towne, and fighting a sore fight which continued euen vntill the Euening, at last he got the wals, and the towne, & slew the weaker sort: for the stronger fled: so the souldiers sacked the houses and then fired the towne. They who escaped thence incited the whole countrie to flie with them, reporting their calamities with the most and affirming that all the Roman armie was at hand: and so they put all the inhabitants there in great feare; and hauing assembled a great multitude, they fled vnto Iericho, which place they put their confidence in, for that it was strong and populous. Placidus hauing horsemen, and being encouraged with his former victory pursued them vnto Iordan, and whom so euer he ouertooke he slew, and at the riuer he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and slaying, because that the riuer being waxed deeper by abundance of raine, that had lately fallen, they could not passe ouer it.

Wherefore necessity forced them to fight because they could not fly: and placing themselves along the banks of the riuer, they there receiued the horsemen, and warded their darts; yet manie for feare fell into the riuer; so the Romanes slew there thirteene thousand, and the rest not able to resist, cast themselves into the riuer; which were an infinite number: also the Romanes took two thousand and two hundred men aliue, and a huge boorie of Sheepe, Assees, Camels, and

A and oxen. This massacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it seemed to the Iewes far greater, because that many all ouer the country flying were killed, and Iordan was so filled with dead carcasses, that none could passe ouer it: & also the lake Asphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of diuers riuers. Placidus hauing so good successe, went into the townes and villages adjoining, and tooke Abila, Iulias, Besemoth, and all the townes euen vnto the lake Asphaltites, and placed in them garrisons of them that fled vnto him: & afterward preparing ships and furnishing them with soldiers, he pursued them that were fled by water, & ouercame them: and so all the country beyond Iordan yelded vnto the Romanes, and euen vnto Machæron all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IIII.

How certaine townes were taken, and the description of Iericho.

T this time came newes of the troubles in Gallia, & how that Vindex together with the nobilitie of that country had revolted from Nero, whereof we haue made mention in another place. This newes caused Vespasian to be more earnest to end the warres of the Iewes: for euen then hee foresaw the ciuill warres that ensued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of those troubles end the warres in the East part of the world, that then Italy was not in so much danger. But winter hindring him, he in the meane time placed garrisons in all townes and villages about the whole country, and placed decurions in euery citie, and repaired many places which he had before destroyed. And first of all he with his whole army that was at Caesarea, went to Antipatris; and there hauing settled the estate of that citie, after his abode there two daies, the third day he departed, spoiling and burning all the country: as also all the country about Thamnias the Toparchy, and so went into Lydda and Iamnia. But seeing that those two places submitted themselves vnto him, leauing there such inhabitants as he thought good, he went thence vnto Ammaus, and placing himselfe in the way to their Metropolitan Citie hee there entrenched his army, & the leauing the fifth legion there, he with the rest went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout; as also the borders of Idumæa: but he reserved there certaine Castles in fit places, and fortified them. And hauing taken two townes in the midst of Idumæa, to wit, Begabri and Caphartopha, he slew there about tenne thousand men, and tooke almost a thousand; and driuing out the rest of the inhabitants, hee left a great part of his armie there, who made incursions and wasted all the high places thereabout: and hee with the rest returned to Iamnia, and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the inhabitants Mabortha, the second day of Iune hee came into Corea: and pitching his tents there, the next day hee came to Iericho, where one of his capitaines named Traian met him with the soldiers he brought from beyond Iordan, which place hee had conquered. But the multitude before the Romanes came, fled from Iericho into the high country ouer against Ierusalem, and many that staid behinde were there slain. So he found the citie desolate, being situate in a Plaine vnder a great mountaine that is barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the North side vnto the borders of Scythopolis, and on the South vnto the borders of Sodome and the lake of Asphaltites. It is all rockie and not inhabited, because it beareth no fruit. Over against this neere Iordan is situate a huge mountaine, beginning on the North side at Iulias, and reaching vnto Bacra on the South, which is the limits of Petra a citie of Arabia. In this place is that that is called the mountaine of Iron, reaching vnto the country of the Moabites.

The great field

Two lakes Asphaltite and the Tiberian lake.

A large fountain neere Iericho.

The country betwene these two mountaines is called the great field, reaching from the village Gennabara vnto the lake Asphaltites, being in length two hundred and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twenty, and in the midst it is diuided by the riuer Iordan. There are also two lakes of contrary natures, Asphaltites and Tiberias; for one of them is salt and barren, but that of Tiberias sweet and fertile. This Plaine in sommer time is burned with the heat of the sun, and the aire is infected in all places thereabouts, suue onely about those which adioine to Iordan: and this is the cause that the palme trees that grow about the riuer side doe flourish most, and are more fertile then the rest. Neere vnto Iericho there is a large great fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, & runneth with a great stream out of the ground neere vnto the old citie: which Iosue the sonne of Nun generall of the Hebrews tooke by war, the first of all that hee tooke in the land of Canaan: It is reported that in the beginning the waters of this fountain did destroy all fruits of the earth, and also made women be deliuered before their time; and to infect all places with diseases, and the plague; and afterward by Helizæus the successor of Helias was made sweet and fertile. Who, being once courteously entertained by the inhabitants of Iericho, did so reward them and all the country for that their kindnes: and going vnto the fountain he cast a pitcher full of salt into the water; and hard by lifting vp his hands to heauen, and tempering with the fountaine water certain sweet waters, he praised God to qualifie the rage thereof, to make it flow with more sweet streames: and besought God to giue a better aire vnto the fountaine, which both might cause plenty of fruits and also of children vnto the inhabitants: and that the water might haue the vertue to make women fertile, so long as they persist in pietie. After these priers, with his hands he altered the fountaine according to the knowledge he had: and from that time this fountaine which before was the cause of famine and sterilitie, was now the cause of plenty & fertilitie. And it so watereth the ground, that where a little of it commeth, it doth more good then all the other waters which lie long vpon it: and so they that water their grounds but a little with it receiue much fruits; and they that water their grounds with it much, doe not receiue them in that measure: yet it watereth a greater compasse of ground then other fountaines: and in length it runneth thorow a Plaine seuentie furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are most pleasant & goodly Orchards, and many sorts of palme trees growing by brooks sides, which are diuers in the taste of their fruits; the fattest whercof being pressed, doeyelde a iucelike hony, nothing inferiour to other hony: yet there is great store of hony in that country, and the iuice of balme, which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow also Cypres trees and myrobalans: so that one may iustly call that part of the earth diuine, where what fruit soeuer is most deere and precious is in most abundance. Also in all other fruits it surpasseth all countries in the world: for it multiplieth and increaseth all things sooner there. The cause hereof I iudge to be the pleasant waters and warme nourishing aire, which as it were inuitereth all things to spring vp, and then encreaseth them: and the moisture causeth all things to take firme roote; and also defendeth them from drought in sommer time, when that country is vexed with such intolerable heates, that all things are as it were scorched, so that nothing then will grow; yet if they be watered with water drawn before sunne rise, by the blowing of a milde and temperate winde they are refreshed, and it receiues a contrary nature: in winter time it is as it were lukewarme and temperate to them that goe into it. The aire of that place is so temperate, that when it sheweth in other parts of Iudæa, and is extreame cold, the inhabitants in this place doe onely weare a linnen garment. This country is distant from Ierusalem a hundredth and fifty furlongs, and threescore from Iordan, and all the ground betweene it and Ierusalem is desert and stonie and so likewise between it and Iordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we haue sufficiently declared the fertilitie of Iericho.

CHAP. V.

The description of the lake Asphaltites.

IT is worth the labour to describe the lake Asphaltites, which is salt & sterile; yet what soeuer is cast into it how weighty soeuer it bee, it swimmerh about the water: so that one though he would vpon purpose, cannot scarcely sinke vnto the bottome. Vespasian comming thither to see it, caused some to be raken who could not swim, & their hands to be bound behind them, and cast into the midst thereof, and all of them did swim aloft, being as it were borne vp by the power of some spirit. Moreouer it is admirable, how this lake thrice in euery day changeth colour, and shineth diuersly, according as the beames of the sunne doe sundry waies fall vpon it. And in many places it casteth vp pieces of blacke bitumen, in greatnes and shap like a bull without a head, and these floate about the water. They that get their liuing vpon this water, finding this bitumen that is thus gathered together, draw it to their boates, and it is so tough and clammy, that hauing filled their boates herewith, it is not easie for them to get them away, but their boate is as it were fastned: so it hangeth vpon the rest of that masse of bituminous matter, till it bee separated from it by the termes or vrine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to close the rifts of shippes, and also to cure many diseases. This lake is five hundredth and eightie furlongs long, being extended vnto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundredth and fiftie furlongs broad. Neere vnto this lake is the land of Sodome and Gomorrah, sometime both fertile and rich: now all burnt, being (as it is reported) for the impiety of the inhabitants

A inhabitants consumed with lightning & thunder. To be short, one may here behold as it were the signe and reliques of that fire, that by Gods appointment destroyed the place: for one may yet see as it were the fashion & tokens of five cities, and trees & fruits springing vp in the ashes: which fruit to the eye seemeth like vnto other fruits; but if you handle the they fall into ashes & smoake. And so the report of the land of Sodome is knownen to be true to them that behold it.

CHAP. VI.

How Gerasa was destroyed: of Neros death, and of Galba and Otho.

V*espasian* desirous to besiege Ierusalem on euery side, builded castles at Iericho and Adida, and left there both the soldiers that came to assist him, and also Romans with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa, giuing him many footemen, and part of his horsemenn; who at the first assault tooke the citie, and slew a thousand yong men, who thought to haue fled, & lead whole families captiue giuing the soldiers the spoile of their goods: and to firing their houses, he went to other places adjoining. They who were able fled, and the weaker sort who could not fly were slaine; and whatsoeuer came in their way they consumed it with fire. Thus all places both mountaines and Plaines being wasted and oppressed with warres, the inhabitants liuing at Ierusalem had not whither to goe, when they desired to fly from the Zealous by whome they were kept in. And they who were against the Romanes, were kept in themselves, the citie being on euery side inclosed and compassed with the armie.

After that Vespasian was returned vnto Cæsarea, and with all his armie purposing to go to Ierusalem, newes was brought him that Nero was slaine, hauing reigned thirteene yeeres and eight daies. Touching whom I will not recount how he did dishonour the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the commonwealth vnto two most wicked men, to wit Nymphidius and Tigellinus, and of least worth amongst all the Libertines: and how hee being taken by the treachery of these two men, was forsaken of all his Senators; and so fled onely with foure trustie Libertines into the suburbs and there killed himselfe: and how that long time after, they that deposed him were punished for that offence: and how the warres ended in Gallia, and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spaine: and how hee was accused by the souldiers, and by them killed in the market place, as one of base condition: and how Otho was declared Emperour, and led his souldiers against Vitellius his armie: also Vitellius his broiles and his fight before the Capitoll: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus slewe Vitellius, and so appealed the Germane troupes and ciuill warres: Of all these I haue refused to speake, because I hope that both the Greekes and Romans haue written these things at large, yet I haue briefly recapitulated all to continue my Historie.

After Vespasian heard these newes of Nero, he deferred the siege of Ierusalem, expecting what should be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to doe nothing; but lie quiet till such time as he also should write vnto him his mind, whether he would haue him proceed in those warres against the Iewes. And he sent vnto him his son Titus both to salute him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Iewes. Likewise King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause vnto Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with long ships in winter time, as the custome is, newes was brought that Galba was slaine, hauing reigned leuen moneths and seuen daies. After whom succeeded Otho, who gouerned the Empire three moneths. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, still kept on his journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would haue it) returned from Achaia vnto Syria, and so to Cæsarea vnto his father. They both were as it were in suspence what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, the Empire being so full of troubles: and so they neglected the warres against the Iewes, fearing their owne country, and therefore thinking it an vnfit time to assault strangers.

IN all this the war at Ierusalem was increased. For there was one Simon the sonne of Giara borne in Gerasa, yong in yeeres, and inferiour to Iohn, who now already had gotten the dominion ouer the citie; yet was he in strength & boldnes more excellent then Iohn. This Simon being for this cause also driuen out of the countrey of Acrabarena, where he was gouernour by the meanes of Ananus the high priest, he came to the theues that seized vpon Massada. This Simon at his first comming, was so suspected to the theues, that they only permitted him and the women that came with him to dwell in the lower part of the castle, and they themselves kept the higher part: yet afterwards his maners and behaviour were such, that they put confidence in him: for he was their capitaine alwaies when they went to spoile, and rob any part of the countrey about Massada. So hee feared not to perswade them to attempt greater matters: for being desirous of rule. after hee heard that Ananus was dead, hee departed into the high places of the countrey, and with the voice of a crier proclaimed, that all bondslaves that would follow him should haue their liberty, and all other should be richly rewarded; and so he gathered together all the wicked and desperate people in the countrey. And hauing now a large armie, he robbed and spoiled all the townes and villages thereabout; and his number daily encreasing, he also now presumed to come into the plaine countries: so that now cities stood in awe of him, and many potentates now feared him for his strength and prosperous successe. And his army did not onely consist in theues and slaues, but now many people of the countrey came vnto him, reuerencing him as their Prince and king. So they made excursions into the Toparchie of Acrabarena, and into the greater Idumæa. For hee had fortified a towne called Nain walled about, which he vted for his defence like a castle. And in the valley called Pharan he made many caues, and found many already made, and in these caues he kept his treasure, and the booties he got: also all fruits of the earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid vp in store; as also munition for diuers companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with men and munition, he would go to Ierusalem. The Zealous fearing this, and desirous to preuent him whom they every day did see encrease his number, and to grow more potent against them: they armed many of their company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountried them, and gaue them so sharpe a battaile, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselves into the towne: yet hauing men sufficient hee would not besiege the towne; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumæa, & so accompanied with twenty thousand armed men, he hasted towards the borders thereof.

The princes of Idumæa understanding this, presently assembled fise and twenty thousand armed men: and leauing at home sufficient garrisons to defend their countrey against the incursion of the Sicarii, which held the fortreffe of Massada, they accompanied with this train, went out & expected Simons comming into the borders of their countrey, where hauing met him they joined battel, and fought a whole day, yet neither party got the victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumæans home. Not long after Simon with a greater army then before, assaulted the borders of their countrey, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, hee sent one of his companions named Elezar, to them that kept the castle Herodium not farre from that place, to sollicite them to yeelde it vnto him. The garrison there presently receiued him into the castle not knowing the cause of his comming. But so soone as he began to perswade them to treason, they all pursued him with their drawne swords, and he not hauing any place to flie vnto, cast himselfe from off the castle wall into the valley vnderneath, and so presently he died. The Idumæans something fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battell, thought it best to espy what number of men he had: to effect which busines one Jacob a ruler amongst them offered himselfe, meaning indeed to betray his country to Simon. So departing frō Olurus where the Idumæans forces were assembled, he went vnto Simon, & first of all promised him to betray his country vnto him, receiuing of him an oath, that for reward of this deed hee should alwaies be next in dignitie vnto Simon himselfe, and so hee presently promised to helpe to subdue all Idumæa. For this cause he was welcom to Simon and feasted liberally, and had great promises if he performed that which hee offered: and then returned vnto the Idumæans, and fained that Simons army was far greater then indeede it was. And so at last terrifying the gouernours of his countrey, and the people, he by little and little perswaded them to receiue Simon, & without any more fight yeeld vnto

A vnto him the whole souerainty ouer them. Jacob studying to bring this his purpose to passe, prouident messengers to Simon, willing him to come with his forces, and promising him to subdue the Idumæans for him, which also he did. For when the army of Simon drew neere, hee first of all got vpon his horse, and together with his associates that were partakers of his treason, he fled vnto the enemy. Then feare fell vpon the Idumæans, and euery one without any more adoe departed home. Thus Simon against his owne expectation, entered Idumæa without bloodshed: and first of all assaulting a little village called Chebron, vpon a suddaine he tooke it, and in it an exceeding great bootie, a great quantitie of corne, and many fruites, which all he caried away. The inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not onely more ancient then all cities of that land, but also then Memphis in Egypt: for they affirme it to haue been built two thousand and three hundredth yeeres since. They also say that this was the place where Abraham the father of the Iewes dwelt, after hee forsooke Meopotamia, and that his posteritie departed from hence to Egypt. And of this there are yet monuments in the citie, richly wrought in fine Marble. Sixe furlongs from the town there is an exceeding great Turpentine tree, which they affirme to haue endured euery since the creation of the world vntill this day.

Simon hauing obtained this place, from hence he inuaded all Idumæa, and not onely robbed and spoiled all townes and cities thereof, but also hee wasted and destroyed many territories: for besides his armie, there followed him fortie thousand; so that hee could not find victuals sufficient for such a multitude. Moreouer, besides this calamitie that he brought vpon Idumæa, he excited great crueltie and outrage vpon the countrey, and so caused a greater spoile therein. And like as after locusts the trees and woods where they haue been, are left without leaues: so where soeuer Simon had been, all the country from whence he came he left desolate. And either by fire, or ouerthrowing it by ruinating places where he came, or else by treading vpon it with the feete of his armie, or by deuouring such as they found, they left nothing standing nor growing either in field or towne: & onely by passing through fertile places, he made the fields harder then barren ground; and left no signe in places which he had destroyed, that euery they had been tilled.

Hereat the Zealous were againe moued, yet durst they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambashes in the way he was to passe, they tooke Simons wife, and many of her seruants, and so came againe into the citie, reioycing as though they had taken Simon himselfe. For they perswaded themselves, that Simon would presently laying armes apart, come in humble wife and intreat them to restore vnto him his wife. But Simon was not moued with compassion for the losse of his wife, but with furie: and comming to the wals of Ierusalem like a cruell beast that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed and slew all he met. And taking them that went out of the citie to gather herbs and wood, he caused them to be whipped to death, whether they were young or old: and this crueltie seemed onely wanting in him, that he did not cate the flesh of the dead bodies. Also hee tooke many and cut off their hands, and so sent them into the citie, thereby to terrifie his enemies, and to recall the people from the Zealous: and bad them tell the citizens, that except they presently restored his wife vnto him, that he swore by God who gouerned all, that he would breake downe their wals, and vse all that hee found in the citie after that fashion, and that hee would spare no age, nor respect the innocent more then the guiltie. These his threats did not onely terrifie the people, but also the Zealous, in so much that they sent him his wife againe, & so his anger beeing somewhat asswaged, hee ceased awhile from daily slaughter.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Galba, Orho, Vitellius and Vespasian.

NOt onely in Iudæa, but also in Italy at this time were ciuill wars: for Galba was slain in the midst of the winter; after whom Orho was created Emperour, and fought against Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the Germane legions had elected: So the battell being fought neere vnto Bebrias, a towne in Gallia Cispina, the first day Orho got the victorie against Valens, & Cacina, the generals of Vitellius his armie. But the day following they ouercame Orho: & so many being slain on both parts, & newes being brought that Vitellius his army had gotten the victorie, Orho beeing at Brixels slew himselfe, when hee had ruled the Empire three moneths & two daies. Then Orhoes souldiers came vnto Vitellius his capitaines, and ioyned with them, & so Vitellius came to Rome with his armie. In the meane time Vespasian the first day of Iune departed from Cæsarea, and went vnto those parts of Iudæa, which were yet vnto conquered:

them. When he had ouercome them, Cerealis went vnto Hebron an ancient citie, and lett it on fire: this Hebron as I haue already said, was situated vpon the mountaines, not farre from Ieru-salem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the citie. And hauing subdued all places, saue onely three castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the thieues, now onely Ierusalem remained to be conquered.

CHAP. IX.

Of Simons acts against the Zelous.

When Simon had receiued againe his wife from the Zelous, hee went into Idumæa, to rob and spoile that which he had left: and chasing the inhabitants vp and down, at last he forced them to flie vnto Ierusalem, & he himselfe followed them thither; and besieging the wals, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labor. Thus Simon without the citie, was more terrible to the people then the Romans; and the Zelous within the citie crueller then them both, being encouraged and incited thereto by the counsell of the Galileans. For they had put John in authoritie: and John in reward thereof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing and spoiling rich mens houses, and of slaughtering both of men and women; and now to iniure any person was a pastime. And hauing with bloudshed obtained their prey in securitie, and without all feare after they had gotten what they liked, they now beganne to lust after women: yea, they became themselves effeminate thorow luxuriousnesse, dressing their haire and clothing themselves in womens apparell; and they annoiued themselves with sweete oynments, that their beauty might be pleasing, and alluring; their eyes wanton-like, they now did not onely imitate the attire of women, but also their impudencie, & became so shamelesse, that they now thirsted after vnnatural pleasures, as though they had kept a stewes, and so profaned the whole citie with their execrable impurities.
Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to bloudshed; and although they liued in ignominious manner, as people giuen ouer to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriours, & vnder the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kill whomsoever they met. Whosoever escaped Johns hands, Simon crueller, murdered; & whosoever escaped the ty-rannie within the citie, was slain by the tyrant without. So now there was no way to flie vnto the Romans. Furthermore, the armie of John beganne to be diuided, for all the Idumæans separated themselves from the other people, and there began a mutinie against the tyrant, partly enuying his puissance, partly hating his crueltye. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zelous, & compelled the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Graptā, father of Izata, king of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, & draue them from thence into the Temple, and so seized vpon Johns treasure: for John liued in that palace, & thither caried all his spoiles.
Then those Zelous that were disperſed in the citie, came vnto them that were in the temple, and John purposed to send the against the townesmen, & the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did fear that now being desperate, they would steale out of the Temple in the night, and so sleigh them, and fire the citie.
Wherefore, assembling themselves, they deliberated with the priests how to auoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turne their owne counsel to be their destruction, and that they should pro-uide a remedy of safety, far worse then death it selfe. For to depose John, they deuised to introduce Simon, & as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize ouer them. So this counsell was thought best, & Matthias the priest, was sent vnto Simon (who before they stood in great fear of) now to request him to come into the citie. With the also came such as had fled from Ierusalem, for feare of the Zelous, intreating him in like manner, because they desired to return to their wiues & families. So hee entered into the citie proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cried with loud voices as hee came into the Citie, that hee was their preseruer, and giuer of life and

A and libertie. Beeing now within the citie, presently hee deliberated with them about him to establish his dominion, thinking as well them that called him into the citie, as those against whom he was called, his enemies. Then John and the Zelous with him, finding no way to come out of the temple, and hauing lost all that he had in the citie (for Simon & his followers at his entrance took all that belonged vnto him) beganne now to despair of his safety. And Simon being assited by the Citizens, assaulted the temple, and the Zelous placing themselves vpon the porches, and in towers of defence, made resistance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zelous were vp-on the higher ground on the right hand, and so had the vantage against Simon. And although by reason of the place wherein they were, they preuailed against Simon; yet they builded 4 high towers, that from thence they might shoot darts and arrowes against Simons army. One of these B towers they built vpon the East side of the temple; another on the north; the third vpon a place opposite to the lower part of the towne; & the fourth tower they builded vpon the toppes of the place called Pastophoriū, where one of the priests doe vse to stand before the sun set, & at break of day, to signifie vnto the people with the sound of the trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby vnto them, sometime holy daies, and afterward that they might goe about their business. In these towers they placed all kind of engines to cast stones, & men with slings. Then Simon perceiuing many of his souldiers languish, was more remisse in his business: yet when his number increased, he came neerer: for a far off many of his men were slain with the shot of those engines.

CHAP. X.

How Vespasian was elected Emperour.

A T this time the Romans were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arrived out of Ger-manie with his armie, bringing beside them an infinite multitude with him; so that his armie was so great, that the place appointed for souldiers could not containe it: in so much that his armie occupied all the whole citie, and euery house was filled with armed men. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater then euer they saw any, and admiring their abundance of gold and siluer, not able to containe themselves, they began to robbe and kill whomsoever that fought to withstand them. And this was the estate of the affaires in Italy. Vespasian hauing wasted all about Ierusalem, returned vnto Cæsarea, and there he vnderstood of the troubles at Rome, & D how Vitellius was Emperour. Heereat, though he knew as well to obey as to be obeyed, yet was he moued to indignation, and disdained to call him Lord, who had as it were invaded and vsur-ped the Empire, being destitute of a Ruler. And much grieued hereat, he could not conceale his griefe, nor follow warres against strangers, his owne country being so endangered. But the distance betweene him and Rome did as much repress him, as anger incited him to seek revenge: for he considered that Fortune might cause many alterations before he could get to Rome, especially it being winter: and so he sought to bridle his wrath which daily increased. But his Captaines with the souldiers did now openly consult of a change, and with indignation did exclaime against the souldiers at Rome, who liued in pleasure, & neuer heard so much as the report of war, especially if they did now omit this occasion?
E and vnder hope of gaine, they disposed of the common-wealth at their owne pleasure: where they on the contrary side, hauing ouerpast so many labors and dangers, still continuing in armes till now, waxed old and gray-headed, and did suffer authoritie due vnto themselves, to be executed by others; when notwithstanding they had amongst them one who deserved the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they euer after make him? or what occasion could they find hereafter to shew themselves gratefull vnto him for the benefits by him receiued, if they did now omit this occasion?

Vespasian knew both how to gouerne, and how to obey.

The capitaines consult with the souldiers openly of a change.

And they thought that Vespasian was so much more worthy of the Empire then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperour, were in very many respects much inferiour vnto them. For (said they) wee haue endured no lesse toile then those that came out of Germanie: Vespasian neither are we lesse valiant then they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germanie. And that no body would resist Vespasian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his insatiable lust, then Vespasians chastitie and temperance; nor a cruell Tyrant, rather then a good and courteous Emperour; nor the son should by them be elected Emperour before the father. For true valor in an Emperour is a great defence of peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged experience, they had Vespasian, if to valiant youth, they had amongst them Titus: & that they might reap comodity by both their ages. And that they would not only assit him with the forces

forces of the Empire hauing there three legions, beside the help of the kings; but also all the East part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreover, they had in Italy some that would assist Vespasian, to wit his brother & his son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was now made prefect of the Citie, which was no small steppe to attaine vnto the Empire. Lastly, it might so fall out, that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the souldiers being as it were their conseruer, had neglected.

This was first talked amongst the companies of the souldiers: at last exhorting one another thereto, they came and saluted Vespasian by the name of Emperour, and requested him now to preferue the Empire, beeing in great danger to be lost. Albeit Vespasian had alwaies been carefull for the good of the common-wealth, yet he refused to be Emperour: deeming himselfe indeede to haue deserued it; yet he rather did chuse to liue a priuate life wherein was securitie, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetuall danger. The captaines were more earnest because he refused it; and the souldiers flocked about him with drawne swords, threatening his death except he would consent to liue as he deserued: yet long time struiing to auert this their determination, beeing loth to be Emperour; at last, seeing he could not auoid it, he accepted their offer.

CHAP. XI

The description of Egypt and Pharos.

Vitianus and the rest of the captaines who had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole army, cried aloud, willing Vespasian to lead them against their common enemy. But Vespasian thought it best, first to settle the estate of Alexandria, knowing that Egypt for the supply of corne was the greatest and best part of the Empire: which if hee once were sure of, hee hoped that although Vitellius were stronger then he, yet he could bring him vnder perforce, because the people would not endure that for his sake the citie should be famished: which would haue come to passe, except they had supply of corne out of Egypt.

Moreover, he desired to ioine vnto himselfe those two legions that were at Alexandria. Hee also thought that that countrey might bee a defence and refuge for him, if any aduerser fortune should betide him: For the countrey is not easie to be entred by an army, and the sea coasts haue no hauens nor harbours for to receiue ships. On the West it bordereth vpon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South, vpon the frontiers which separateth Syene from Aethiopia, and the streames of Nilus not navigable; on the East it bordereth vpon the Red sea, which extendeth itselfe euen vnto the citie Copton; on the North it is defended with Syria, and the Egyptian sea, wherein there is no haven. Thus Egypt is strong on euery side, & reacheth in length 2000 furlongs from Pelusium vnto Syene: and from Plinthine vnto Pelusium they faile three thousand and sixe hundred furlongs. And Nilus is navigable euen vnto the towne Elephantine.

Further, by reason of the downfalls of Nilus, also the haven at Alexandria is dangerous to come vnto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very straight; and beside that, the way goeth not directly on, but is made crooked by great stonie rocks, and the left side is compassed artificially, but on the right side is the Ile Pharos, hauing a tower vpon it exceeding great: so that the light in it is scene of the mariners three hundred furlongs off, that long before they come neere it they may prouide to bring their ships in with safetie.

This Ile is inclosed with most huge walls made by arte, against the which the sea beating, & so returning back again, maketh the entrance into the haven more dangerous. Yet this haven within is very safe, and thirtie furlongs long: so that whatsoeuer that countrey wanteth, it is brought them into that haven, and whatsoeuer aboundeth amongst them which other nations need, is carried from thence all ouer the whole world. So that Vespasian did not vnadvisedly seeke to establish the estate of Alexandria, and dispose thereof for his owne profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore presently hee sent letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was gouernour of Alexandria and Egypt, and told him of the souldiers resolution: and how that he seeing he could not auoid it, but that he was forced to take vpon him the Empire, that now he requested him to helpe him in what he could. Alexander receiuing Vespasians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and presently caused his army and the people also to sweare vnto Vespasian, which both of them did willingly, vnderstanding Vespasians verue by reason that he gouerned so neere them. And so he hauing now leaue, prepared all things to furnish himselfe like an Emperour, & to be receiued like a prince.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII.

How Vespasian deliuered Ioseph out of captiuitie.

It is incredible how quickly this newes was caried into all parts of the world, to wit, that Vespasian was declared Emperour in the East; and now all cities reioyced and made triumphs, and offered sacrifices for his fortunate successe. Moreover, the legions in Moesia and Panonia, who not long before were reuolted from Vitellius by reason of his crueltie, did now willingly sweare obedience to Vespasian. Vespasian returned by Berytum to Caesarea: where many Embassadors came vnto him, bringing him crownes, & applauding & reioicing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was also present Mutianus, gouernour of those parts, who brought tidings how ioyfully all the people receiued him for their Emperour, and how that they had all sworn obedience vnto him. So all things falling out prosperously on Vespasians side, and fortune for the most part enclining as he desired, he began to thinke with himselfe that it was Gods prouidence that he was made Emperour, & that a iust destinie had brought him to that estate. And so he called to mind all tokens and signes (as there had hapned many, which did foretell that he should be Emperour) and amongst the rest, hee remembered that which Ioseph had told him; who, Nero being yet aliue, presumed to call him Emperour, and so hee admired the man whom as yet hee kept in hold. And calling Mutianus and the rest of his friends together, first of all hee told them how valiant Ioseph had been, and what ado hee had to win Iotapata onely because of him; & then his prophecies, which at that time hee esteemed onely fables, fained vpon fear; yet now time & euent had proued them true. Affirming it an vndecent thing, that he who had bin the foreteller of his exaltation, and had bin a messenger vnto him from God, should still continue in bonds like a captiue, and be left in aduersitie. So calling for Ioseph, hee commaunded him to be let loose. This fact of his made the captaines vnder him hope for great reward at his hands, seeing he had been so kind to a stranger. Titus being there present, said; It is meete, O father, that as you acquire Ioseph from captiuitie, so you also take away the shame of that which he hath already endured. For if wee doe not onely vntie his chaines, but also breake them in sunder, he shall be as though he had neuer been in bondage: for this is the manner vsed for redresse, when any one being guiltlesse is committed to bonds. Vespasian hereto agreed: and so one came with an axe, and hewed his chaines in peeces. Thus was Ioseph rewarded for his prophecie, and so hereafter he was esteemed worthy to be beleueed.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Vitellius his death and manners.

When Vespasian had answered the Embassadors, and iustly disposed of all the rulers of his armie, according to euery ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and there did deliberate whither to goe first, & it seemed best to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet & firme, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherefore he sent Mutianus into Italic with many footmen and horsemen: who fearing to goe by Sea, went through Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was gouernour of Moesia, brought from thence the third legion remaining there, & came to war against Vitellius. Vitellius sent Cacinna to meet him with a great army: who departing from Rome, presently met with Antonius at Cremona, a towne of Gallia, situate vpon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the discipline and multitude of the enemies, durst not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flie, hee plotted treason, and so calling vnto him the Centurions & Tribunes vnder his gouernment, he perswaded them to goe and ioine with Antonius, debasing Vitellius his power, and extolling Vespasians: affirming the first to haue onely the bare name of the Emperour; and the last to haue also all vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that so it wold be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwise they should be compelled vnto; and seeing themselves already overcome in number, so also now willingly preuent all danger. For Vespasian was able without their assistance to subdue all the rest: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had: speaking much to this effect, he perswaded them to all that which he would haue done. And so he with his whole armie ioyned with Antonius.

The same night, the souldiers repenting themselves of that they had done, and also fearing that that Vitellius should get the vpper hand who sent them against Antonius, drew their swords, and would haue slaine Cecinna. And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrarie: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to send him to Vitellius as a traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his armie and assaulted them vwho were reuolted from him, and they awhile resisted; yet at last, forced to retire, they fledde vnto Cremona. And Primus, accompanied with horimen, preuented their courses, and so slew the most of them before the Citie; and afterward setting vpon the rest, gaue his souldiers the spoile of it, wherein many Merchants of other countries & many townesmen were slaine, and all Vitellius his army, thirty thousand and two hundred men: and Antonius lost in that battell, foure thousand and five hundred of those, whom he brought with him out of Moesia. And deliuering Cecinna from prison, he sent him to beare newes hereof to Vespasian: who comming vnto him, was praised for his fact, and greatly honoured about his expectation, in reward of his treason. Sabinus who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly reioyced, & tooke courage: and gathering together the companies of the watchmen in the night time, hee tooke the Capitoll, and in the morning many of the nobles came and ioyned with him: and Domitianus his brothers son, who was a great cause and help to obtaine the victorie. Vitellius little esteemed Primus, but he was angry against Sabinus and those that had reuolted with him: and as it were naturally thirsting after the blood of the nobilitie, hee set all the army hee brought out of Germanie with him, to assault the Capitoll, where many valiant deeds were shewed on both parts: and at last, the Germans beeing most in number got the Capitoll hill. And Domitian with many braue noble men, as it were by the prouidence of God escaped safe, the rest of the multitude were there slaine. And Sabinus was caried to Vitellius, and there by his commandement put to death: the souldiers taking away all the gifts and treasure in the Temple, sette it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his souldiers met him: and fighting in three seuerall places of the city, they were all slaine. Then Vitellius came drunke out of his palace, and beeing full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawn through the midst of the people, and after many contumelies slaine, hauing reigned eight moneths, and five daies: who if he had liued longer, I thinke verily the Empire had not bin sufficient to haue maintained his gluttonie. There were slaine about 50 thousand of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, Mutianus with his armie came and entred into Rome, and repressed the souldiers of Antonius, who still sought about in euery place for Vitellius souldiers, and many other of his fauourits, and slew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reason of their furie: and bringing out Domitian, hee declared vnto the people that he was to gouerne the citie till his father came. The people beeing deliuered from feare, proclaimed Vespasian Emperour, and made feasts & triumphs both vnder one, for his establishing in the Empire, and for ioy that Vitellius was depofed.

How Titus was sent by his father against the Iewes.

When Vespasian came to Alexandria, newes were brought vnto him what was done at Rome. And Embassadors came vnto him from all parts of the world to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this citie was the greatest in the world, yet was it scarcely able to receiue the people that came thither vnto him. Vespasian now beeing established Emperour of all the world, & the common-wealth of the Romans being contrarie to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think vpon the reliques of Iudæa. And so hee himselfe, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, & in the meane time hee hastened to dispose of all things at Alexandria. Moreover, hee sent his son Titus with certaine chosen men to destroy Ierusalem. Who departed from Alexandria vnto Nicopolis by land, which is distant from it 20 furlongs, & there he did ship his men & so sailed along the riuer Nilus by Medensia vnto Thmuin, & there landing his men, he came to the citie called Tanis. And the second place he rested in was the citie Heraclea, & the third Pelusiū: & there resting & refreshing his souldiers two daies space, the third day he passed the borders of Pelusiū, & hauing gone one daies journey through the wilderness, he pitched his tents at the temple of Iupiter Casian, & the next day at Ostracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants doe vse, they bring from other places. After that he rested at Rhinocolura, and from thence in 4 daies he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, & the fifth day he lodged at Gaza, & from thence to Afcalon, and so to Iamnia & Ioppe, from whence he went to Cæsarea, purposing to gather the rest of the souldiers there.

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of seditions in Ierusalem.

Itus being thus come out of Aegypt by the desert into Syria, hee departed from thence vnto Cæsarea: for there he purposed to set his armie in order. And whilest yet hee was with his father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empire that God had giuen him, it happened that the sedition at Ierusalem was diuided into three parts, wherof, one part fought against another, and one may say, it was a good turne that they were so equally diuided. We haue already sufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the faction of the Zealous, whose tyranny ouer the Citie was the ruine thereof: and one may well call this a sedition raised out of a sedition; which, like a cruell and savage beast in penurie & want of others, turned his crueltie against his owne bowels. So Eleazar the sonne of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple diuided the Zelous from the people, faining himselfe to bee displeased with that which John euerie day did; yet in truth, for that he enuided that a more tyrant of later time then himselfe should be his ruler, desirous to obtaine the principallitie, and make himselfe mightie, he reuolted from the rest: and with him Judas the sonne of Chelcias, and Simon the sonne of Ezyon, two of the most potent amongst the. Besides them, was also Ezechias the son of Chobarnus

Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zealous following them: and getting in G possession the inner part of the Temple, they set a guard in the entrance and in the sacred gates, trusting in their abundance of all necessities: for there was great store of sacred provision, and they thought it no impietie to vse it; yet fearing their small number, they permitted many of the companie that were killed, to remaine in the places where they were slaine. Iohn was superiour in multitude and number, but inferiour by the inequalitye of the place: and hauing his enemies about his head, he could not without danger make incurfions, & yet for anger he would not cease to persecute his enemy: notwithstanding that thereby his part had more harme then those of Eleazars side, yet he still assaulted them though to his owne cost: thus many assaults were continually made and many darts cast, and all the Temple was prophaned with murders. And Simon the sonne of Giora (whome the people being in despaire, inuited to bee their leader, in H hope that hee would haue assisted them, hauing in his hands both the higher part of the Citie, and the greater part of the lower) did now more boldly then before assault Iohn and his followers, because they were assailed by those about them: yet hee being as it were beneath Iohn and his adherents, he sustained as much losse at their hands, as Iohn himselfe did at theirs about him. So Iohn had double warres: and as Eleazar harmed him because of the higher place wherein he was, so likewise did he damage Simon for the like cause; and easily without any labour did repulse all his assaults, which hee made being on the lower ground, and terrified by engines those that cast darts at him from the top of the Temple: for he vsed all engines to cast darts and stones, and killed many not onely of his enemies, but also of them that were offering sacrifices. For although that they were carried headlong vnto all vice, yet they permitted those that would, to offer sacrifice, watching and diligently guarding them of their nation. For the strangers that came thither for deuotion were not mistrusted: yet afterwarde that they had intreated these wicked people to permit them to sacrifice, they when they had done were a pray for them, and consumed by this sedition. For darts and other shot with force of the engines came into the Temple and Altar, and slew the Priest at the Altar. And manie who came from the vttermost parts of the world vnto that holy place, were slaine euen as they offered sacrifice, and so imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greckes and barbarous people did reuerence: and strangers and the Priests being now prophaned, were forced to be amongst the dead bodies, and the place about the Altar stood full of blood of men that were slaine. O miserable Citie! what didst thou suffer at the Romans hands, to bee compared vnto this, although they enured with fire to purge thee from K iniquitie? For now thou wast no longer the house of God, neither couldest thou endure being made a Sepulchre of thine Inhabitants, and hauing by thy ciuill wars made the holy Temple a graue of dead bodies. Yet maifest thou once againe come into better estate, if first thou appeale Gods wrath that hath made thee desolate. But I must not giue place vnto sorrowe and write lamentation of my miserable Countrey, seeing I haue vndertaken to write a Historie of all things that past there. Wherefore I will recount the residue of the impietie of these seditious.

The seditious people being diuided into three companies, Eleazar and his followers, who had the keeping of the holy first fruites, and all the sacred oblations, came against Iohn, when they were drunke. And they who followed Iohn spoiling the people, assaulted Simon, and the Citie did succour Simon. Wherefore when Iohn was assaulted on both sides, hee turned some L of his souldiers against Simon, and the rest against Eleazar: and against Simon hee vsed darts cast from the porches of the Temple; and against Eleazar hee vsed engines for shot. And alwaies so often as they about his head ceased (as they often did being either wearie or drunken) hee freely assaulted Simon and his men. Also as farre as he draue them into the Citie, so farre did he fire all, and burne houses full of Corne and other necessities: and that which he left vnburned, Simon at his returne (when Iohn was gone into the Temple) set on fire: as if vpon purpose to the great advantage of the Romans, they had consumed all that was provided against the siege, so did they destroy their owne forces and strength. To bee short, all was consumed with fire about the Temple, and the Citie was made a plaine ground to fight in, and all the Corne was burnt that might haue sufficed the Citie many yeeres, and so they were taken by famine, which they M could not haue felt, had they themselves not caused it. The Citizens were in euery place a pray vnto those that were seditious on one side, and to them that besieged the Citie on the other side, and like a great bodie torne in peeces betwene these two. The olde men and women astonished with these calamities, prayed for the good successe of the Romanes, and desired some forraigne warre to deliuer them from their ciuill disagreement.

A And forthwith great feare and terror fell vpon them all: besides, it was no time as now to take counsel to change their mindes, nor hope of agreement or of flight to them that desired it. For all places were kept, and the rebels within, whomsoever they perceiued to wish peaceably to the Romans, or offer to flie vnto them, they presently killed them as their common enemies. And all these wicked persons agreed in this, to wit, to put the iust men to death, who best deserued to liue. Day and night nothing could be heard saue only the noyle of them that fought one against another; yet the lamentable cries of them that liued in a perpetuall feare was farre more miserable, who euerie day had new causes and occasions of sorrow giuen them; yet durst they not publicly lament for feare; and so not daring to shew their grieft, they secretly sorrowed, & now no man obserued any reuerence to them that were aliue amongst them, nor tooke any care to burie the dead. A The cause of both which was, that euerie man despaired of himselfe. For whosoever were not ioyned with the seditious, grew to bee carelesse of all things, as making account presently to die a thousand deaths. But the seditious gathering the dead bodies vpon heapes, continued their fighting, and trod vpon them, and as it were encouraging themselves by the dead vnder their feet, they became more cruell, still deuising one pernicious practise or other, and presently executing whatsoeuer they deuised without any commiseration, omitting no way to murder, and leauing no ranny vnattempted: so that Iohn abused the holy things of the temple to make engines of warre. For before time when the priests and people had determined to vnderprop the temple and build it twentie cubits higher, king Agrippa with great cost and charges brought them verie goodly timber sufficient for their purpose from mount Libanus. And this worke being preuented by warres, Iohn tooke them, and seeing them fit for his purpose, hee erected a tower to fight against those that assaulted him from off the temple; which he built along the wallouer against the chapterhouse, that standeth on the West side of the temple: for he could bulide it in no other place, by reason that all other places were filled with staires. And hauing thus impiously provided engines, hee hoped hereby to destroy his enemies. But God shewed his labour to be in vaine, and before he could preuaile against them, hee brought the Romans against the Citie.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his armie, and by writing appointed the rest to meete him at Ierusalem, hee departed from Caesarea, hauing three legions that lately vnder the conduct of his father Vespasian had waited all Iudaea, and the twelfth legion that sometime vnder Cestius were overcome, and put to flight by the Iewes: who though they were otherwise valiant enough; yet they desired to fight against the Iewes to reuenge themselves for that disgrace. Titus commanded the fift legion to meete him at Ierusalem, and go by Emmaus, and that the tenth legion should march by Iericho: the rest he tooke with himselfe accompanied with the kings forces that came to helpe him, hauing now more helpe then before, and many also out of Syria. Titus also brought men with him to supplie the number that was wanting, being sent by Vespasian with Murianus into Italy: For hee brought two thousand chosen men from the legions at Alexandria, and three thousand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefeft friend, and one next him in most authoritie, who before was gouernour of Egypt, and as then thought a fit man worthie to be gouernour of the armie; for that he was the first that did entertaine the Emperour being new elected, who faithfully ioyned with Vespasian, though yet he knew not what successe he should haue: and hee was present with him in all his affaires as his chiefeft counsellor, renowned both for his wisdom and experience.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Ierusalem to see their strength, and how he was in great danger.

F Titus being now to go into the countrey of the enemy, caused all those that came to help him to march in the foremost place: after whom followed they that were to mende the waies, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the rulers and gouernours of his armie, and with them the armed souldiers. Next after these came Titus himselfe accompanied with chosen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the hostemen going immediately before the engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certaine chosen men, and their companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other ensignes: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the army marching six in a ranke: then the multitude of seruants that followed euerie legion did driue their baggage before them: lastly came came the hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comly & war-like manner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, and then also was vnder the custody of the Roman garriſons. And ſtaying there one night, hee departed from thence the next day: and after a daies journey he pitched his tents in a place which in the Iewes language is called Acāthouaulona, that is, the valley of thorns, neere vnto a village named Gabath Saul, which ſignifieth the valley of Saul, which is almoſt thirtie furlongs from Ierusalem. From thence accompanied with fixe hundred choſen horſemen, hee went to Ierusalem, to view how ſtrong it was, & of what courage the Iewes were, to ſee if peradventure at fight of him they would yeeld without any further war, for feare. For Titus vnderſtood (and it was true) that the people deſired peace, but they were oppreſſed by the ſeditious, and ſo durſt not attempt any thing being not able to encounter or reſiſt the rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went ſtraight to the wals ſaw no man all the way: but turning aſide towards the tower Plephinos with his horſemen, an infinite number preſently iſſued out by the towers of women, at a gate oppoſite to Helens tooombe; and brake his ranke of horſemen into two parts, and oppoſed themſelves, hindring thoſe horſemen that were yet in the high way to come and ioine with the reſt that had croſt the way, and ſo did ſingle out Titus accompanied only with a few men. So he could go no further for the ditch of the towne wall on one ſide, & for the garden pales on the other ſide: and there was no hope for him to returne vnto his ſouldiers, the enemies being betweene him and home. And many of his ſouldiers not knowing their Generall to be in any danger, but ſuppoſing him to haue beene amongſt them ſtill, fled away. Titus ſeeing that he had onely his owne valour to truſt vnto, turned his horſe againſt his enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to doe the like, and ſo he brake violently into the miſt of them, haſtning to get vnto his company. It was euident at that time that God giueth the victorie, and hath a particular care of kings and princes and Emperours. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of darts and arrowes were ſhot at Titus, and he had no armour at all (for as we haue already ſaid, he came to eſpie & not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all paſt him; as though vpon purpoſe euerie one had ſtriven to haue miſt him. But Titus with his ſword madeway, and cut many vpon the face that oppoſed themſelves againſt him, and ſo they falling downe hee with his horſe paſt ouer them. The Iewes ſeeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to ſet vpon him; but whitherſoeuer he turned, the Iewes fled, and would not abide by it: like wiſe thoſe ſouldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either ſide him & behind him. For no man had any hope to ſaue his life, but onely by making themſelves way with Titus before they were ſo incloſed & oppreſſed. So, of two of the moſt valiant amongſt them one was ſlain, & his horſe likewiſe: the other was ſlain, & his horſe taken by the Iewes. And Titus with the reſt of his followers came ſafe into the camp. And the Iewes getting the firſt victorie, raſhly took courage, & that encouragement being of moment, made them verie confident along time after.

So ſoone as the legion that was to paſſe by Ammaus, was ioined to the reſt of the armie that night, Cæſar preſently the next morning remooued, and came to Scopus, where he might perfeſly view the Citie and the temple on the North part, where the ground adioining vnto the Citie is verie low, and is properly called Scopus, being diſtant ſeuē furlongs from the Citie: and there Titus commaunded two legions to encampe themſelves, and the ſiſt legion to retire three furlongs further off, to the intent that the ſouldiers who were wearied with trauiailing all night, might entrench themſelves without feare or danger. No ſooner had they begun their worke, but preſently the tenth legion came, who were to paſſe by Iericho, which Veſpaſian had already ſubdued, and had placed there a garriſon. This legion was commaunded to encampe ſix furlongs from Ierusalem, neere mount Oliuet, which is oppoſite to the Eaſt part of the Citie, and is incloſed with a deepe valley called Cedron. This great and huge armie ſo ſuddenly arriuing, preſently ſtaied the warres within the Citie: and theſe three ſects of ſeditious people beholding with admiration the Romans campe, became friends, and made agreement amongſt themſelves. They began alſo to queſtion one with another what furie cauſed them to ſuffer themſelves to be incloſed with three wals to their preiudice and loſſe of their liues: and ſeeing ſuch preparation of wars towards, that they ſhould be as it were beholders of that which was done

A done, keeping themſelves quiet; and not providing to reſiſt the aſſaults of their enemies: & ſome cried, we are onely valiant againſt our ſelves, and we by our ſedition maſſacring one another ſhall betray our citie into the Romans hands.

Thus they being aſſembled together, exhorted one another: and preſently arming themſelves, they iſſued out of the Citie, and aſſaulted the tenth legion, and with a huge crie ſet vpon the Romans that were entrenching themſelves in the valley. The Romans being euerie one appointed to doe ſome buſineſſe for the furtherance of that worke, and for that cauſe the moſt of them hauing laid down their weapons (for they thought the Iewes durſt not haue made any excuſions, & although they wold, that yet they were hindred being at variance amongſt themſelves) they were troubled about meaſure, and preſently leauing the worke, ſome fled; many arming themſelves to fight, were ſlaine before they were prepared to reſiſt. The multitude of the Iewes was dayly encreaſed, becauſe that at the firſt they got the vpper hand, and notwithstanding their number was ſmall, yet did they thinke themſelves many: and ſo did the Romans thinke them to bee, becauſe of their good fortune. The Romans who were alwayes wont to obſerue militarie diſcipline and order, at that time by their ſodaine aſſaulting, were ſo troubled, that they obſerued no order, and ſo fled: yet whenſoeuer they turned againe vpon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Iewes, partly becauſe that they were ſo earneſt, that they did not greatly ſeeke to defend themſelves, and alſo they did eaſily ſlay the Iewes from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill encreaſing, they were alſo more troubled, and ſo at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leaue their tents: and the whole legion had bene in greater danger had not C Titus, hauing preſent newes hereof, ſpeedily came and ſuccoured them, and vpbraiding their cowardineſſe recalled them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountering the Iewes on one ſide, he ſlew many of them, and wounded diuers, and put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the valley. The Iewes being now in the lower ground, and hauing endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned vpon them, turned againe, & hauing the valley betweene the, they fought with the Romans. And thus the fight continueth till the miſt of the day.

A little after midday Titus guarding the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others, to prevent the excuſions of the Iewes, hee commaunded the reſt to entrench themſelves in the toppe of the mountaine. The Iewes thought the Romans had fled, and their ſentinel vpon their wals making a ſigne vnto them by ſhaking his garment vp & downe, a great multitude of them ran ſo violently vpon the Romans, as though they had bene ſavage beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them; but as though they had bene ſtricken with ſome engine, ſo all of them were diuerſly ſcattered & forced to ſlie into the mountaine. But Titus in the miſt of the ſide of the mountaine remained alone, hauing but a ſewe with him; notwithstanding his friendes, who for the loue they bare to their Emperour, ſtaied with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to ſlie from the Iewes, who delperately ran vpon their owne deaths, and not to endauenger himſelfe for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he ſhould thinke vpon his owne eſtate, who was not a ſouldier, but general of them all, and Lord of the whole world, and that he ſhould not abide when all others fled ſo ſaſt, and in ſuch danger. But he made as though he heard them not, and oppoſed himſelfe againſt them that offered to aſſault him, ſtriking them vpon the faces, and killing them that made reſiſtance, and he purſued them downe the hill, and ſo forced them to retire. The Iewes amazed at his valour, did not yet ſlie into the citie, but auoided him on both ſides, and fled into the valley: then againe purſuing them that fled from them, yet Titus croſſing them as they went hindred their purſuit. In the meane time thoſe that were encamping themſelves aboue, ſeeing them beneath put to flight, were diſcomfited, and all fled, thinking that they were not able to reſiſt the Iewes, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought that he had ſtaied by it, they neuer would haue forſaken their quarters; yet being now terrified they knew not wherefore, ſo fled one way, and ſome another without any order, till ſome ſeeing the Emperour in the miſt of the F bataille, and fearing the miſchance that might beſide him, they with loud cries ſignified it vnto the whole legion. Then the Romans turning againe for ſhame, and accusing themſelves guiltie of a great offence in forſaking their Emperour amidſt ſuch danger, came with all the violence they could vie againſt the Iewes, and driuing them downe the mountaine, forced them to retire; yet the Iewes fought flying, and ſeeing the Romans to haue the vpper hand of them; becauſe they were vpon higher ground, they departed into the valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were oppoſite againſt him, and ſo commaunded the reſt to goe and finiſh their trenches. And hee with thoſe that before were with him to defend the workmen, did now alſo keepe the Iewes from ſlie-

lesting them. So if I may speake without flatterie or enuie, Cæsar himself did twice preferue the whole legion from destruction, and gaue the souldiers opportunitie to entrench themselves.

DVring the intermission of the forrain wars, they fel to their former sedition again, which caused ciuill wars amongst them. And against the feast of vnleauened bread, which is the fourteenth day of April (for vpon this day the Iewes say that they were deliuered out of the bondage of Aegypt) Eleazar and his companions opened the gates, to the intent that all that would might come in to adore and do their deuotion. But John vsed this festiual day as a means to effect his deceit; and caused many of his companie that were vnknowne, to enter in amongst the people with weapons vnder their garments, giuing the charge when they were within, to get possession of the temple: and so soone as they were within, they cast off their garments, & shewed themselves to be in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the temple: for all the people that were not of the sedition thought themselves betrayed: and the Zealous thought this treason onely practised to preiudice them: and so leauing the gate which before they kept, and leaping downe from the towers, they neuer offering to fight, fled into the vaults about the temple. And the people flocking about the altar, & others who were driuen into the temple, were killed with clubs and swords, and so troden vpon. And manie were slain vpon priuate hatred vnder pretence to be partakers with the enemies. And whosoever before time had offended any of those traitors, hee was put to death, as though he had beene one of the Zealous. But they, who had cruelly ragged against the innocent, let the wicked haue leasure to escape out of those caues; whereby they had no harme: and hauing gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging therunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before diuided into three parts, was now brought onely into two. Titus being desirous to bring his armie neerer the citie, sent a certaine number of horsemen & foot, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Iewes from Scopus, and another companie hee sent to plaine all the grounds betwixt him and Ierusalem: who cutting down al hedges and pales, & fences & wood (though they were fruit trees) filled the vallies and made it al plain ground, & hewing K down all stones that standing vp made the ground vnequall, they plained al that ground fro Scopus euen vnto Herods monumēt, which adioyned to the lake of Serpēts called sometime Bethora.

CHAP. V.

Of the deceit the Iewes vsed against the Romane souldiers.

ABout this time the Iewes deuised this stratageme against the Romans. The most courageous amongst the seditious people went out vnto the places called the womens towers, & counterfained themselves to be driven thither by them within the city that desired peace, & for that they feared the Romans, they were come thither to hide themselves one behind another: others standing vpon the wals, and counterfainting themselves to be the citizens, with loud cries desired peace, and a league of friendship; promising to fet the citie gates open, and inuited the Romans to enter, and crying thus they also cast stones against their countymen before spoken of, as though they did driue them from the gates; and they made as though they would by force breake through the people, & come to the gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to goe vnto the Romans, they turned againe like men troubled in mind, and studying what to doe. The Roman souldiers did not perceiue their subtil meaning; who seeing the seditious ready to fall into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) readie to open the gates vnto them, would in post haste haue gone vnto the citie. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kind inuiling him to enter, because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before hauing by Ioseph offered them a peace, he vnderstood that their minds were farre from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore he now commanded the souldiers to keepe their quarters and not to remouue; yet some of them, appointed to worke in the trenches, taking their weapons ranne vnto the gates, and the Iewes who seemed to be driven out of the citie first fled; at last when they came vnto the gates of the Iewes.

A gates of the towers, they inclosed the Romans round about, and assaulted them vpon their backs: and they that were vpon the wals, did cast all kinde of darts and stones vpon them: so that they slew many and wounded verie many; for it was not easie to escape from the wals, others being behind them and offering them violence. Moreover they were ashamed that their Captaines had so offended, and in feare for their offence committed, both which caused them still to persequer in it. And after a long conflict receiving many wounds, and giuing as manie, at last they put them to flight that enclosed them, and so the Iewes departed, and followed them vnto Herods monumēt, pursuing them with darts. And then the Iewes returned reioycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romanes for being so deceiued, lifted vp their shieldes and bucklers, shouting and reioycing.

B The Romane souldiers were receiued of their Captaines with threatnings, and of Cæsar with this speech: The Iewes led onely with desperation doe all things with aduise and counsell, deuising deceites; and forrune fauoureth their practises because they are ordered, and truste to one another. And now the Romanes, whom for their obedience and discipline fortune was wont to fauour, doe contrariwise offend herein, and for their rash and vnaduised fighting are ouercome: & which is worst of al, in Cæsars presence offering to fight without their Captaines. Truly the military law & discipline will be grieved hereat, & my father not a litle sorrowful to hear of this. For he who from his infancie vnto old age, hath beene trained vp in armes, yet did hee neuer offend in this sort; and what shall wee say to our law which punisheth the least offences against them committed with death, when our whole armie doth disobey their Emperours command? But

C (quoth he) they who so arrogantly haue disobeyed our command, shall presently vnderstand that amongst the Romans, victorie against the Generals command is an infamie. Titus hauing thus spoken in anger vnto the Captaines, evidently declared vnto them what and how he purposed to punish them. And they presently despaired, as though by and by they were iustly condemned to die. But all the other legions flocking about Titus, besought him to pardon their fellowe souldiers, and to remit the offence of the rashnesse of some fewe, for the obedience sake of all the rest: affirming that their future valour should be a sufficient recompence for this their offence. Cæsar was herewith pacified, partly thinking what was most profitable, partly for the intreaty of the rest: for he purposed to punish one man onely, and to rebuke the rest, & signifie vnto them his displeasure, and so he was reconciled vnto his souldiers, streightly charging them to be more

D wise hereafter: and after he deuised how to be reuenged vpon the Iewes for this deceite. When all the ground betweene the wals of Ierusalem and his armie, was in lower dayes made plain, Titus being desirous safely to conduct the baggage and the rest of the multitude in safetie, he placed the strongest of all his souldiers euerie one in his ranke leauen by leauen, and caused them to march from the North part of the Citie vnto the West, all along without the Citie wals, placing the footmen in the forefront, and in the last place the horsemen three in a ranke, and betweene them both the Archers. So the Iewes not able now to make any excursions, Titus souldiers being thus disposed of, the baggage of the three legions, and the multitude passed along without any danger. And Titus himselfe being now within two furlongs of the Citie wals, pitched his Tent against that corner of the wall that is called Psephinos, where the compass of the wall from the North bendeth into the West: the other part of the armie entrenched themselves against that part of the wall that is called Hippicos, distant in like manner two furlongs from the Citie. But the tenth legion remained still in mount Oliuet where it was before.

CHAP. VI.

The description of Ierusalem.

FHe Citie was compassed with a threefold wall on euerie side, saue onely on that part where it was inclosed with vallies vnaccessible: for on that side it had onely one wal. It was built vpon two little hills, one of them being opposite vnto another, and separated one from another with a valley, which was wonderfully replenished with houses. One of these hills whereon standeth the vpper part of the Citie, is farre higher and steeper then the other, in so much that because of the strenght of it, King Dauid in times past called it a Castle. (This Dauid was the father of king Salomon, who first builded the Temple in that place) but wee at this day call it the high market place. The other hill called Acra, is the place where the lower part of the Citie standeth. Opposite against this hill, there was also another lower then this Acra was, which was first diuided from it with a large valley, but afterwaied at such time as the Asmoneans reigned reigned they did fill vp this vallie, to the intent that they might ioyne the Citie vnto the Temple, and cut downe the top of Acra, and so made it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The valley by which wee haue said the two higher hills are separated one from another is called Tyropoon, & reacheth vnto Siloa (which is a fountaine abounding with sweete water.) Without the Citie were two hills, compassed with deepe vallies, and being enclosed with high rocks, they were on euerie side inaccessible. The most auncient of the three wals by reason of the vallie about it and the hill whereupon it stood, could not easily be taken: and beside the opportunitie of the place, it was verie strongly built, at the cost and charges of Danid, Salomon, and other kings. This wall beginning at the tower called Hippicos, reacheth vnto that called Xylus, and afterwarde being ioynd vnto the Palace, it endeth in the West porch of the Temple: on the other side towards the West it beginneth at the same tower, and passing by the place that is called H Betiso, it descendeth vnto the gate of the Esseans, and so into the South, and from thence againe it bendeth into the East, where also is Salomons pond, and reacheth vnto the place called Ophlan, where it is ioynd vnto the East porch of the Temple. The second wall beginneth at the gate that is called Genath, which is a gate of the former wall, and it onely compasseth the North part of the Citie and reacheth vnto Antonia, a Castle so called. The third wall beginneth at the tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it cometh vnto the tower Plephina, ouer against the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queene of Adiabena, and mother of king Antiochus, and passing along by the Kings caues, it turneth towards the tower neere the monument of Fullo, and in the vallie called Cedron it ioyneeth with the olde wall. Agrippa compassed that part of the Citie that hee built with this wal, it being before all open without defence. For the citie grew so populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabite some part without the wals: and this wall reacheth a great way, being ioynd vnto the hill next the citie on the North side of the Temple. There was also a fourth hill inhabited, named Bezetha, situate against Antonia, but separated from it with verie deepe ditches, which were made of purpose, least that the foundation of Antonia being ioynd vnto it, it might bee easier to come vnto, and seeme lower: for the deepenesse of the ditch maketh the tower seeme much higher then otherwise it would. This place being added vnto the Citie, is called in that Countrey language Bezetha, which signifieth the new Citie. And the Inhabitants desiring that part to bee fortified, Agrippa father to this Agrippa that finished the wall, did begin that wall afore mentioned: & fearing least Glaucius Caesar hearing how sumptuous a wall he built, should mistrust that hee purposed to revolt, he onely laid the foundation of it, and so left it vnfinished.

For the Citie could neuer haue bene taken by force, if he had finished that wall as hee began it, it being builded with stones twentie cubits long, and ten cubits broad, which could neither easily bee vndermined, nor battered with engines: and this wall was built ten cubits high, and no doubt had bene raised higher; had not his liberalitie who began this building bene hindered. Yet againe by the Iewes industrie the same wall was raised twentie cubits high, the battlements hereof were two cubits high, and the tower three cubits, and in all it was twentie and foure cubits high, as before. Vpon the wall were three towers twentie cubits broad, and twentie cubits high built foure square verie strongly, and was builded of as firme a foundation as the wall in selfe, which for the building and faire stone, was not inferiour to the temple about. Within this strong tower, which reached twentie cubits high, were roomes for men to dwell in, and cesterne to receiue raine water, and large turning staires to goe into euerie place there: and this third wall had fourescore and ten of these towers, and betweene euerie tower were two hundred cubits space. The middle wall had foureene towers, and the old wall had threescore, and the compass of the whole Citie was three and thirtie furlongs. And although the third wall was admirable, yet the tower of Plephina, which was built vpon a corner of the wall, betweene the North and the West part of the Citie, had a certain excellency of more wonder, against which part Xitus had encamped himselfe: for it was seuentie cubits high, so that from thence vpon a cleare Sunnes shine day, one might discouer Arabia, and see the vttermost parts of all the dominions of the Hebrewes vnto the sea, and it had eight corners. Iust opposite vnto this was the tower Hippicos, and neere vnto it were other two, that king Herod builded vpon the olde wall, which in bignesse, beautie, and strength, did surpass all others in the whole world.

For king Herode, beside his naturall liberalitie and desire to adorne this Citie, did also for his owne pleasure so beautifie this building, that it might excell all other, and dedicated them to three most renowned personages, whose names they also did bear, to wit, to his brother, his friend and to his wife, she being (as is afore said) put to death for iousie; the other two being slaine in warres

A warres after they had fought valiantly. The tower Hippicos called by the name of his friend had foure corners, and euerie one of them were five and twentie cubits broad, and as many in length, and thirtie cubits in height, being in no place hollow: and about the high places and stone worke there was a well to receiue raine water twentie cubits deepe: and aloft of it were houses with double roofes twentie five cubits high, and diuided into many roomes: and about them were battlements two cubits high, and turrets three cubits high: so that the whole height was accounted to be fourescore and five cubits. The second tower that by his brothers name hee called Phaclus, was in breadth and length fortie cubits, and so many cubits high, in figure of a square pillar, all which height was solide and not hollowe within: and about this a porch ten cubits high, decked with turrets and pinnacles. Over the midit of this porch he builded another tower distinguished into goodly roomes & sumptuous bathes, that it should not want anie thing necessarie for a prince: on the toppe it was beautified with turrets and pinnacles; so that all his height was almost fourescore and ten cubits: And it resembled the tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continuall light is kept to guide the seamen that faile thither, fauing that it had a greater compasse then it. And in this house now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized ouer the people. The third tower was, according to the Queenes name, called Mariamme the wife of Herod, twentie cubits high, all solide, and other twentie cubits broad, hauing more magnificent and beautifull houses and lodgings then the rest. For the king so thought it meete that the tower called by his wifes name, should be more beautifull then they, who only bare the names of other men, like as they were stronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This tower was in all 55. cubits high.

C Notwithstanding these three towers were of such height, yet by reason of their situation they seemed farre higher: for the olde wall whereupon they were built was placed vpon high ground, and the toppe of the hill whereupon they stood was about thirtie cubits high, whereby their height was much increased. The greatnesse also was admirable; for it was not ordinarie stone which men might beare, but all white marble, whereof euery stone was twentie cubits long, & ten cubits broad, and five cubits thicke: and they were so coupled one to another, that euerie stone by it selfe seemed a tower; and so cunningly conioyned by workemens hands, that euerie tower seemed one stone. And these were placed on the North side of the Citie; and adioyning to them within the Citie, was situated the kings palace, surpassing all that can bee spoken of it: which for greatnesse and excellent worke may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compassed about with a wall thirtie cubits high, and adorned with goodly towers round about, euerie one of like distance from other, beautified with dwelling houses and lodgings for a hundredth of the nobilitie. The varietie of the marble it was built withall, was admirable, all sorts being there used that were neuer so rare to bee found: and the tops of these houses for the length of the beames and the beautie thereof passed all credite; and the multitude of roomes and diuersitie of buildings, all filled and adorned with household stuffe and furniture. And in euerie room there were many vessels of gold and siluer, and many porches round about, one answerable vnto another, and pillars in euerie one. And there were manie pleasant walkes replenished with diuers trees, and manie walking places or alleys, all beset with conduites that spouted vp water on high, and cesterne full of brazen images, from which ran out water: and about the water many dovec-houses full of tame pigeons. But it is vnpossible sufficiently to declare the riches and beautie of the kings palace, and a grieve to thinke what goodly things, and how rich the theues did there set on fire: for these things were not burnt by the Romanes, but by the seditious theues (as is before said) at the beginning of this rebellion, who consumed all with fire euen from the Castle Antonia from whence the fire came, and destroyed the kings palace, and the couers and tops of the three towers. The temple was, as is before said, built vpon a hard mountain, and at the first the Plaine vpon the toppe thereof was scarcely bigge enough to containe it and the temple yard, the hill being verie steepe. But when king Salomon, who also built the temple, had compassed the East part thereof with a wall, he also placed a porch vpon the rampire, and so for many ages after it lay vnscened on other parts: wherefore the people euerie day bringing earth thither, at last made it plaine and large enough: and breaking downe the North wal, they took in all that space which the temple hath continually occupied euen vntill now: and the hill being now enclosed with a threefold wall, it was a worke passing all expectation in building. To the effecting whereof many ages were spent, and all the holy treasure offered vnto God euen from all parts of the world was employed therein, as well in the buildings of the higher as of the lower part of the temple; the foundations whereof, were laide three hundred cubits deepe, and in many places more: yet could could not all the height of the foundations be scene, being now buried in vallies that were filled vp to make them equall with the straight streets of the Citie. The stones of this building were of fortie cubits: for the abundance of treasure and liberalitie of the people did effect that which was scarcely possible: and that which all men thought could neuer haue come to passe, in time and by industrie came to perfection.

The building was answerable vnto these foundations. For all the porches were double, and euerie one was supported by pillars, each of them being five and twentie cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top wherof was all of Cedar, whose natural beaurtie for the good conioyning of this wood & polishing therof, did astonish all that behelde it, being adorned neither with painting nor carued workes. These porches were thirtie cubits broad: and the compasse of them altogether, with the fort of Antonia, was fix furlongs. All the ground wheron stood no building was cutiously wrought & paved with all sorts of stones. The way to the second temple was all enclosed with stones of lattice work, which were three cubits high, and most beautifullly wrought along: in which place also were placed certaine pillars equally distant one from another, to shew the law of purification; some being written vpon in Latine letters, other some in Greeke, forbidding all strangers to enter into the holy place: for the second temple is called the holy place. To go vnto the second from the first, one must passe vp foureteen stairs, and it was fouresquare aloft, and enclosed with a wall by it selfe; whose outside being fortie cubits high, was all couered with staires to ascend vp into it, and within it was five and twentie cubits high: for all the part of the inner side was not scene, because it was built on the descent of a hill. After the foureteen staires there was a Plaine made leuell with the wall of three hundred cubits: from thence passed on five other staires which lead vnto the gates, whereof on the North side and the South there were eight, foure on each side, and two on the East. For it was necessarie that there should be a peculiar place for women to exercise their deuotion in, which also was enclosed with a wal. And so it was necessarie there should be two doores: and against the first gate there was opposite vnto it one gate on the North side, & another on the South, both separated from the rest, wherby one entred into the place allotted for women; for it was not lawful for any to passe by any other gate vnto the women, neither could they go beyond their own doore, because of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, and also to all strange women that came for religion faze. There was no gate on the West part, but a wall that reached all along in that place: Betwene the gates were porches opposite one against another, reaching to the wall vnto the treasure house, supported with great and goodly pillars, being as plaine and fully as bigge as they below. The gates were couered with gold and silver, as also the posts and foreparts thereof were, one onely excepted that was couered with Corinthian brasse, far surpassing in beaurtie the other that were couered with silver or gold. In euerie gate there were two doores, each one thirtie cubits high, and fiftene cubits broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, euerie one had on each side seates thirtie cubites long, and large like a tower, and fortie cubits high, each one supponed with two pillars twelue cubites thicke. And all other gates were of like greatnesse; but that which was couered with Corinthian brasse, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, & opened into the East gate of the temple, doubtlesse bigger then the rest: for it was fiftie cubites high (the gates wherof were L fortie cubits) and was more richly adorned then the rest: for the couer of gold and silver was thicker then it was in the rest, which Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to couer all the nine gates. And there were fiftene staires, that went from the wall that separated the women, vnto the great gate of the temple: for these staires were shorter by five degrees, then those that went to other gates. The temple it selfe was situated in the midst of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelue staires to go vnto it. The forepart wherof was in height and breadth a hundred cubits: and behind it, was fortie cubits outright: and before, it was as it were two shoulders on each side rising vp in height twentie cubits. The first gate hereof was seauentie cubits high, and twentie five wide, and had no doore: for it signified that heauen was spread all ouer & might be scene in euerie place: and all the foreparts were gilded with gold, and at the first building did M appeare and might be scene without, and all that was within and about the gate glistered with gold. The inner part thereof was diuided into two roomes, wherof only the first roome might be scene, which was in height fourescore and ten cubits, and in length fortie, and in breadth twentie. The inner gate was (as is already said) all gilded with gold, and all the wall about it, and aboue it: it had a golden vine, whereon were hanging clusters of grapes all of gold, euerie cluster being as long as a man is high. And because the height was seeled aboue, the inner temple

A temple did seeme to bee lower then it was without, and it had golden gates five and fiftie cubits high, and sixtene cubits broad.

It had hangings also of the same length, which was a Babylonian vaile, all wrought with violet and purple silke and scarlet, admirable to behold: the permutation of which colours had a mystical meaning, bearing as it were the signification of the whole world. For the scarlet doth seeme to expresse the fire, the silke signifieth the earth, the violet sheweth the aire, & the purple declareth the sea, partly in their colours resembling them, partly also as hauing their beginning from thence: for the purple is ingendred in the sea, and the silke is produced by the earth. In this tapestry worke was curiously wrought and deciphered all the speculations of the heauens, onely the celestiall signes excepted. Being entred within, you come into a lower place of the temple, which was threescore cubits high, and as manie in length, and twentie in breadth. Again this place was diuided into two, whereof the first part contained fortie cubits, hauing in it three most admirable things, and famous throughout the world, to wit, a candlestick, a table, and the altar of incense: vpon the candlestick seuen lampes were placed, which signified the seuen planets (for so manie did there come all out of one stemme of the candlestick) vpon the table were standing twelue loaves of bread, signifying the twelue celestiall signes, and reuolution of the yeere. By the altar of incense, out of which proceeded thirteene odours, coming partly from the sea which is uninhabitable, and partly from the earth, which is inhabited, is signified that all things are in the hands of God, & subiect to yeeld him obedience. The inner part of the temple contained twenty cubits, which likewise was separated from the other part by a vaile, and nothing was within it: and this place was the ho-

Cly of holies, and no man might enter, looke into it, nor violate the same. On each side of the lower temple, there were manie lodgings and doores to passe into, euerie one of them hauing three roofes one about another: and there was a gate which led vnto both sides of the temple, and vnto these roomes: but the higher part of the temple had not the like roomes on each side, and therefore it was made so much narrower then the other, yet was it higher then it by fortie cubits, neither was it so gorgeous as the lower. For the whole height was an hundred cubits, and the ground thereof sixtie. The vtermoost part was so curious and richly wrought, that it was vnpossible for any one to imagine any workmanship that it wanted: for it was all couered with a massiue plate of pure gold, which shined far more bright then the morning sun, so that it dazzled the eyes of the beholders, as doth the sunne when it is gazed vpon. And afar off it seemed vnto strangers

D that came thither like a white mountaine: for where the temple was not gilded with gold, there was it milk white. The top hereof was all set full of rods of gold, verie sharp at the vpper end like pikes, least the birds should come and sit thereon, and so defile it: manie stones wherewithall it was built were five and fortie cubits large, five cubits in length, and fixe cubits broad. Before the temple there stood an Altar fiftene cubits high, being fortie cubits broad, and as many long, and foure square, hauing corners made like hornes. The way to this Altar was on the south side, where it by little and little mounted from below euen vnto the Altar. This Altar was builded without yron, and neuer yron did touch it. The Temple and the altar were enclosed with stone-work, beautifull to behold, which was a cubit high separating the people from the priests. Those that were troubled with a fluxe of their seede, and leapers were expelled out of the citie; and women also hauing their monthly courses, and those that were not vncleane might passe this foresaid li-

E mit. Likewise men that were not purified were not permitted to come within the inner temple, and those that were, might not come amongst the priests: those also that descended from the line of the priests, and for blindness did not administer their function, were notwithstanding admitted into the place appointed for the rest of the priests that were sound, and had a share as they had; yet did they goe attyred as laymen, for onely hee that did sacrifice might weare priestlie attire.

The priests that came vnto the altar and temple had no infirmie, and they were cloathed in a fine linnen garment, and abstained from wine, and liued in abstinence for reuerence of religion, least they should sinne whilst they offered sacrifices. The high priest also ascended with the priests into the temple; yet not alwaies, but only every seventh day, and in the Calends of euery month, or on a festiual celebrated according to the custome of their country, or wherein all the people were present. And then hee sacrificed being girded with a vaile, which couered his thighe euen vnto his priuities, vnder which hee ware a linnen garment hanging downe vnto his feete, and aboue it a round violet garment all fringed at the skirtes, and hanged full of golden belles, and pomgranates of gold, first one & then another: the bells signified thunder, and the pomgranates lightning. Vpon his breast he wore a vesture of five colours, to wit gold, purple, scarlet, silke and violet; violet, which also (as we haue said) the vailles of the temple were wrought withal. He had likewise a rochet of the same, wherein was more gold, and in shape it was like the garment he wore on his bodie downe to the thighes: it was also buttoned with two golden buttons, made in the form of Aspes, wherein was enclosed the greatest & most precious Sardonyx stones that could be found, bearing the names of the twelue tribes of Israel engrauen in them. On the other side did hang 12 precious stones, three and three in a ranke, diuided into foure rowes. In the first was the Rubie, the Topaze, and the Emerald: in the second the Carbuncle, the Iasper, and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyst, and the Diamond: in the last the Onyx, the Beryl, and Chrysolite; in euery one of which one name of the twelue tribes was written. Vpon his head he wore a miter of silke, which was crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another crowne of gold, wherein was engrauen sacred letters, to wit the foure vowels. He did not alwaies vse this garment, but an other most commonly not so gorgeous: this hee vsed when he entered into the sanctuary, which he did onely once euery yeere alone, none else going with him, vpon which day all the nation was wont to fast. But wee will hereafter speake more at large of the citie and temple, the lawes and customes, the ordinances and obseruations; for these things cannot be briefly declared. The castle Antonia was situate in a corner of the two porches of the first temple, which looked vnto the West, and the North: and it was builded vpon a rocke of stone fiftie cubits high, which on euery side was inaccessible: this first was builded by king Herode, to shewe the greatnes and magnificence of his minde. For first of all the rocke at the foote thereof, was all couered with thin, and slender stones like slates, which did both adorne it, and would also easily slide downe, if any one walked vpon them. Before the battlements of the fort there was a wall three cubits high, within the which the castle Antonia was built fortie cubits high, being within all furnished and contriued like the Palace of a king, hauing all kind of houses of office, and other necessary roomes. For there were porches, bathes, and large hals, for to place tents in: so that for all conuenient roomes and places, it seemed to be a citie, and for the magnificence thereof a kings palace. In outward fashion it was built like a tower, and inuironed about with foure other towers, at euery corner one, whereof they that were on the South and East side were threescore and ten cubits high, the other two were onely fiftie, so out of these two highest one might haue a perfect view of all the whole temple. Where it ioyned vnto the porches of the temple, there was on either side a paire of staires, for the souldiers to come downe out of it into the temple. For alwayes the Roman souldiers lodged there, and guarded the temple in armour vpon festiual daies, least the people should attempt any rebellion or sedition. For the temple was as a castle to keepe the towne in awe, and the castle Antonia to ouerthrow the temple: there also were placed the souldiers: likewise in Herodes palace, which serued for a castle ouer the higher part of the citie. The hill B-zetha was diuided from the citie as is before mentioned: which being the highest of all, was ioyned vnto part of the new citie, which did obscure the view of the temple on the North side. And thus I haue here spoken sufficiently of the citie and the wall in this place, because wee meane hereafter to describe them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Iewes refused to yeelde, and how they assaulted the Romanes.

Fiftie thousand folloues Simon.

THe most warlike of all the people ioyned with Simon, being in number ten thousand, beside the Idumæans: and those ten thousand had fiftie captaines of their owne fellows, yet all subiect vnto Simon. The Idumæans that tooke his part were five thousand, and had ten captaines, the chiefe of whom were Jacob the sonne of Sofas, and Simon the sonne of Cathla. And John, who kept the temple, had fixe thousand armed men, ouer whom were twentie captaines: and then there came vnto him two thousand of the Zealous, and foure hundred, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon the sonne of Iairus. So these warring one against another, the people was their bootie, and the multitude that were not seditious as they were, was their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the Citie, and the greater wall euen vnto Cedron, and all that part of the olde wall which is betwene Siloa and the palace of Mohabazus, M who was king of Adiabena, that lieth beyond Euphrates: hee also kept all the hill Acra (which is the lower part of the citie) vnto Helens palace, who was Mohabazus his mother. But John kept all the temple and the space about it, Ophla, and the valley Cedron: and that which was betwene these two places which Simon and John kept, was all consumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans tents were pitched neere vnto the vails of the citie, yet did not this sedition cease, but hauing recovered some securitie a while at the Romans first Simons campe against John.

OF THE IEWES. THE VI. BOOKE.

A comming presently they returned vnto their former wont. And diuiding themselves againe, euery man fought for his owne part, doing all that the Romanes could wish to be done. For the Romanes did them no more harme then they did themselves: for after them the Citie suffered no new calamitie, but indured farre more miserie before it was taken and destroyed by the Romanes, then it did at that time. For the Romanes in destroying it did rather end their misery, then bring them into it. For the seditious did take the citie, and the Romanes did overcome and take the seditious, which was furre stronger then the wallles: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their owne nation, and equitie and iustice vnto the Romanes, as euery one shall cleerely see by that which ensued.

B The citie being in the estate before said, Titus with chosen horsemen went vp and down withing the wall, to espy where he might most easily assault the wals. And being in doubt a long time what to doe, for that where the vallie was, footemen could not possibly get vp to it: and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered downe with engines: At last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of John the high priest: for onely in this place the first wall was lower then in other places, and it was not compassed here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, because that those parts of the new citie were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: wherby Titus was perswaded that the higher citie, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor came vnto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an arrow, because hee desired to come neere Ioseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the

C Iewes which were vpon the wall to yeelde (for Nicanor was very eloquent.) Cesar perceiving their minds, and that they could not abstaine from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moued, and began earnestly to besiege them: and so hee permitted his souldiers to waste all the suburbs, and to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, & other matter together, and made therewith a mount. And diuiding his army into three parts, hee disposed of euery one what he should doe, & in the midst of all vpon the mounts he placed archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithall he hindered the incursions of his enemies, least they should annoy the worke, & also did beate those off from the wall, who made any resistance from thence. And presently all trees being cut downe, the suburbs appeared naked. Whilst the Romanes hauing gathered the wood together, were busied in their worke, the Iewes were not idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murders & robberies, did hope to haue an end of their miserie, the seditious people being busied against their enemies: & they now hoped that if the Romanes did overcome, they might be reuenged vpon them. John still kept where hee was, fearing Simon; yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romanes. But Simon being next vnto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Seleis Gouvernour of the Romanes, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Iewes small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to vse them: onely some who were taught by certain that fled from the Romanes, could vse them a little. Yet did they assault the Roman souldiers that were building the mounts, with arrows and stones; and they made incursions vpon them by companies, and fought with them. But the Romanes worke

The darts did the Iewes little good because they were not expert in vsing them.

D men were defended by hurdles that were of purpose set before them: & euery legion had strange and admirable engines against the excursions of their enemies, and especially the engines that the tenth legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones; which did not onely repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood vpon the wall: for euery stone was a talent weight, and were shot more then a furlong, and flew not onely those that they did first strike, but also many that were stricken with the rebound. But the Iewes alwaies espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so auoided them: and they were not onely deliered by the noyle they made in flying, but they might easily be perceived: and by this meanes the watchmen in the towers gaue warning alwaies when these engines were shot off, and when the stones came, crying in their countrie language, The stone commeth: so the Iewes vpon the wallles knowing what they meant, auoided the stones and so received no harme. Then the Romanes deuised to blacke the stones with inke, and so they could not be seene as they flew, but at one stroke slew many. But the Iewes were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romanes peaceably to build the mount, but night and day they hindered them with stratagemes and valour. Now when the Romanes had finished their worke, the Carpenters measured the space betwene the mounts and the wallles with a plummet fastned vnto a line, which they cast from one place vnto another: for they could not measure it otherwile, because of the darts cast from the wallles; and finding that they had Rammes long enough, they set them vp, and Titus commaunded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the batterie might not bee hindred. The noyse that these rams did make, was heard round about the citie; and the citizens cried mainly out, & the seditious persons were also sore afraid. And seeing themselves all in like danger, they now determined to ioine all together in resisting the Romans: and the seditious cried one vnto another, saying, that they rather assisted the enemies, then resisted them: & therefore exhorted one another, at least for that time to become friends, if not for euer, onely to resist the Romanes. And Simon sent a crier vnto the temple, licensing all such as would to come vnto the wals: which also John did permit, notwithstanding he mistrusted Simon: so they forgetting their old quarrel, ioined all together, and resisted the Romans, and guarding the walles round they cast much fire vpon the engines of the Romans, and against those that did rule them; & threw darts against them without intermission: and the boldest amongst them in great companies leapt downe, and destroyed that wherewith the engines were couered, and assaulted those that stood to defend them; and so did the Romans much harme, by reason of their desperate boldnes more then by their skill.

Titus was still at hand to succour them that stood in need: and placing horsemen & Archers about the engines, he repulsed the Iewes who came to cast fire, and repressed them that cast darts, and shot arrows from the towers, and so gaue the rams time & opportunity to beat the wals. Yet for all this the wall was not shaken with rams, saue onely that the ram of the fifth legion did shake the corner of a tower; but yet the wall stood firme, and was not harmed by the shaking of the tower: for it was far higher then the wall, and so could not draw downe any part of the wall as it fell. So soone as they had awhile ceased from excursions, they perceiued that all the Romanes were busied in one labour or other, and so dispersed all ouer the camp, thinking that the Iewes for feare durst come no more. The Iewes all secretly issued out of the gate by the tower Hippicos, & cast fire vpon the works, and courageously made incursion vpon the Romans euen vnto the rampire of their campe. The Romanes seeing what danger might ensue, presently assembled themselves, both they that were neere, and those that were far off. The discipline of the Romanes ouercame the furie of the Iewes: and putting those to flight that first met them, they assaulted those that opposed themselves against them afterward. So there began a grieuous battell about the engines, the Iewes struing to fire them; and the Romanes fighting to hinder them: and a doubtfull cry was raised on both parts, & many in the forefront were slaine on both sides. But the Iewes audacitie got them the vpper hand; & their fire did something touch the engines: and all had been consumed quite with fire, had not the chosen soldiers that came from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themselves did fight stoutly: for they were accounted to haue bene the most valiant of all in this battell; till such time as the Emperour with certaine selected horsemen came and set violently vpon the enemies: and he himselfe slew twelue men that did resist him; for whose deaths the rest fearing fled, and were forced to retyre themselves into the Citie, and so saued the engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Iewes was in this fight taken aliue, and Titus commaunded that he should be crucified before the wall, that perhaps therewith being herewithall terrified might yeelde. After Cæsar was retired, John the Captaine of the Idumæans talking vpon the wall with one of his friends, being stricken in the brest with an arrow by an Arabian soldier presently died: which caused great lamentation among the Iewes, and sorrow amongst the seditious, for he was valiant of his hands and very wise and of good aduise.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the tower: and how the two walles were taken.

THe night following, there was a great tumult amongst the Romanes. For Titus the Emperour had commaunded to be builded three towers, fiftie cubits high a peece, each one vpon a seuerall mount, that from thence hee might the more easily beate the enemies from off the wals: but one of these towers in the midst of the night fell downe without any assault. And making a great noyse with the fall, feare fell vpon the whole army; who suspecting that it came to passe by some stratageme wrought by the Iewes, euery one ranne and armed himselfe, and so there was a great tumult in the armie: and for that no man could tel what the matter was a long time, they stood as it were all amazed, euery one asking his fellow what had happened. And seeing no enemies come, they beganne to feare some treason amongst themselves; and so were in a great feare they knew not wherefore, till such time as Titus vnderstanding

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Christs Nativitie, 72.

A the matter, caused the truth thereof to be presently proclaimed throughout the campe; and so the tumult (although with much adoe) was appealed.

The Iewes valiantly bearing and enduring all other dangers, were foretroubled by reason of these towers which Titus had erected; for they were slaine and wounded from thence with small engine shot, darts and arrowes; neither could they build themselves any so high, nor was there any hope to destroy them: for neither could they bee throwne downe for their weight, nor fired because they were couered with yron: and so they flying out of the reach of the shot, did not seek to hinder the ram from battering their wals; which neuer ceasing, at last preuailed somewhat. So the great ramme, which the Iewes called Nicon, because it ouercame all, at last battered the wal; and the Iewes being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for sloth, or else because they perswaded themselves that the wall was superfluous, they hauing two more beside it, they all forooke their quarters, and retired themselves vnto the second wall; and the Romanes entred the first, that the ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romanes that had passed and entred the first wall, went and opened the gates & let in the whole army. Hauing thus gotten the wall the seventh day of May, they destroyed the greatest part thereof; and also the North side of the citie which before Cestius had wasted.

Titus remooued his campe from thence, and went vnto the place called the Assyrians campe, and seised vpon all betwene that and Cedron; and being without the shotte of an arrow from the second wall, hee began againe to assault it. Then the Iewes diuiding the wall betwixt them to defend each others part, they resisted most valiantly. And John and his partakers defended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders toombe: and Simon defended all from Johns toombe vnto the gate by the tower Hippicos. And many times issuing out at the gates they fought hand to hand with the enemy, being alwaies repulsed by the discipline of the Romanes, only for want of knowledge in warlike affaires; and still in all fights vpon the wal they got the best: for the Romanes were assisted by fortune and knowledge, and the Iewes with desperate boldnes which came of feare; for they are of stout courage in aduersitie. Moreover, the Iewes were moued to fight in hope that way to saue their owne liues: and the Romanes to get a speedy conquest. Neither partie was wearie, neither did they euer cease from assaulting one another: all the day long the Iewes in whole companies made excursions against the Romanes, and they omitted no kinde of fight, beginning at sunne rise, and continuing all night long, farre more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Iewes feared least that the Romanes should get the wall; & the Romanes likewise misdreaded that the Iewes should invade their camp. Thus still all night long being armed, early in the morning they were prepared againe to fight. The Iewes did one strue with another who should vndergo the most danger, and so deserue his captaines fauour. Simons followers did greatly reuerence & feare him, in so much as if hee should haue commaunded any of them to haue killed himselfe, hee would presently haue done it. The Romanes were encouraged to fight by their wont and custome in getting the victorie, and that they were not wont to bee ouercome: againe their frequent and daily warres and continuall exercises, and large dominions gaue them like courage, and especially Titus their Generall still present in all their affaires greatly stirred them forward: for euery one thought it a hainous crime to be a coward in the presence of such a captaine as Cæsar was. Cæsar himselfe beholding and looking on, who also was a witness of their deedes that behaved themselves valiantly, would reward euery man for his valour: beside that, it was aduantage to be easily knowne vnto the prince for a valiant man: so that many of them shewed that their alacritie was farre greater then their strength. At this time Longinus one of the horsemen coming out of the Roman armie, pread into the midst of the Iewes forces, and casting them downe that stood in his way, by this violence he slew two of the strongest of the enemies amongst them, striking one of them ouer the face, and slaying the other with his owne dart he rooke from him: who for this deed was greatly honoured, hauing broken thorow a strong army of the Iewes, that were placed before the wals, and cast darts at him on either side. Many of the Romanes by this his example were enticed to doe the like. The Iewes now regarded not what they suffered, but onely deuised which way to harme their enemy; nothing esteeming death, so that they might kill some one of the Romanes. But Titus had as much care to preferue his soldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming these rash assaults to proceed of desperation: and that onely was to be accounted for vertue, when one did warlike not in danger himselfe to atchieue any worthy action, and willed them rather to shew themselves men where there was no danger.

When Titus commanded the ramme to be set vp against the tower on the North part of the citie, wherein a craftie and politike Iewe accompanied with ten men had hid himselfe, all the rest being fled: this Iew was named Castor. These men hauing seen still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid and the tower beginning to shake, they start vp: and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly craue fauour at Cæsars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as he thought, and perswading himself that the Iewes did now repent them of their enterprise, he caused the ram to cease from battering, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speake his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come & make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be all the rest would do so likewise; & that hee would presently confirme a league of peace betweene him and the citie. Five of Castors fellowes seemed to bee willing, and to request the like; but the other five counterfai't to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would neuer bee slaues vnto the Romanes, seeing they might die in libertie. Whilest Castor and his fellowes were debating the matter, the batterie ceased. In the meane time Castor priuily sent worde vnto Simon, willing him whilest the batterie ceased to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessitie: for hee awhile would deceiue the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the meane time hee seemed to exhort his companions that denied to embrace the kind offer of Titus: & they as it were angry hereat, drew their swords and strooke vpon their corslets; and they so stricken seemed to fall down, as though they had bin slaine. Titus and his soldiers were amazed at this their obstinacie; for being on the lower ground they could not well perceiue what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, and also pitied their calamity. At this time one strooke Castor in the buttock with a dart, & Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it vnto the Emperour; & complained of it, as being iniured. Titus presently with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would haue sent Ioseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Ioseph denied to goe, affirming that Castor only dissembled, & so hindered his friends that would haue gone. At last one Aeneas, who had fled vnto the Romanes, K offered himselfe to go. Castor inuited him, as though hee would giue him some thing in token of his true meaning. Then Aeneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would haue cast him downe something of worth: and when he came vnderneath the tower, Castor tooke a great stone and threw it downe vpon him; yet hurt him not because he was aware of it, & auoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Cæsar considering this deceit, began to thinke that pitie and mercie in warres was hurtfull, & that cruelty was not so easily deceived; and so being very angry at this deceit, he caused the wall to be beaten with the ramme more then before. Castor and his fellowes perceiuing the tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed through the flame, and conuied themselves into a mine of the tower; so that again the Romanes admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselves. Titus assaulting the wall on this part, took it five daies after that he had taken the first; and causing the Iews to fly from thence, he accompanied with a thousand chosen men about him, entered in where the woollmen, & coppersmiths, & marchant-tailors dwelt, which place was the new citie, hauing only narrow & straight waies to go vnto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the lawes of armes destroyed that which he had gotten, he had obtained the victory without any losse on his side. Yet now hoping the Iewes would yeeld, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gaue the more ample and easie passage to retire: for he did not thinke that they whose good he sought, would haue bene traitors vnto him.

How the Romanes did twice take the second wall.

When Titus was entred the citie, hee suffered none of them that were taken to be slaine, nor the houses to be burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the preiudice of the people: & also promised the people to restore vnto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the citie for them; and the temple for the

A the citie. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Iewes thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and iudged that Titus, for that he despaired to winne the rest of the citie, did now cowardlike propound these conditions. They likewise threatned all the people, that whosoever should speake one worde concerning peace and yeelding vnto the Romanes, should presently die: and some of them did resist the Romanes from out of their houses, and others in the narrow waies: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battell; wherewith the watchmen being troubled, fled from the wall, and forsaking the towers, they reired themselves into their campe. The Roman soldiers within the city cried out, because they were enclosed with enemies, the gates being shut, and assaulted without by those who apprehended their companions to be in great danger. The number of the Iewes encreasing, and preuailling, for that they knew the waies and turnings of the streets, many of the Romanes were slaine, and violently borne downe, when they offered to resist in that necessitie: for a multitude together could not flie, by reason of the narrowness of the streets, that went vnto the wall: and all that entered into the city had been slaine; had not Titus succoured them. For placing at the beginning of euery streete archers, and himselfe being where most need was, he so did driue away the Iewes with darts and arrowes: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proued a stout warriour; who so long continued beating the Iewes with arrowes, till all the souldiers were escaped away.

C Thus the Romanes hauing got the second wall were beaten from it againe: And the citizens fit for war were hereat encouraged, & were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romanes durst no more offer to come into the citie, and that they could not be overcome if they did arme themselves to fight. For God, because of their iniquitie had darkened their vnderstanding, so that they neuer considered that the Romane forces were far greater then they that were overcome, nor the famine that presently ensued: for as yet they liued vpon the destruction of the people, and dranke the blood of the citie: but the good did euen now suffer famine, and many of them had already perished for want of foode: yet the seditious did reioice at the death of the citizens, as though thereby they were eased of a great burthen, onely desiring their liues that bare rebellious minds, and would ioine with them against the Romanes, reioicing at the death of the rest, as freed from a heavy clogge; and this was the affection they bare vnto their Citizens. And so they armed themselves, and resisted the Romanes, who now againe did attempt to enter the breach: and they threw down stones and part of the wall vpon them as they came vp, and so draue them backe againe, and valiantly resisted them for three daies. But the fourth day they were not able to withstand Titus his assault, but were forced to retire, as before: and hee hauing gotten the wall, destroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a garrison in the towers and fortresses of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raised to batter the third wall: and a long Oration of Iosephs to perswade the people to yeelde: and of the famine in the Citie.

When Titus now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue that siege but a short time: & that it was conuenient to giue the seditious some time to bethinke themselves, to see if that either by the taking of the second wall, or terrified with famine, they would repent. For now there was no more preies for the left in the citie, & he lay before the walls thereof, euen as he desired. And the time being come, that euery souldier should receiue victuals and prouision for himselfe, Titus caused them to be led euery one in order into a place, where the Iewes in the citie might perfectly behold them, and caused his captaines to distribute money to euery one: and the souldiers (as their custome is) all armed, and drawing their swords out of their sheathes, marched along, the horsemen leading their horses gallantly adorned, and a great part of the suburbs glistered with gold and silver. This spectacle was gratefull to their own souldiers, and terrible to the Iewes: for all the old walles, and the North part of the citie, and many houses were filled with the multitude of them, who came to view this sight: & there was no part of the citie that was not filled with people to see and behold it. And feare came vpon the very boldest amongst all the Iewes, seeing both the Romanes armour & their order: and perhaps that shew would haue caused the seditious people to haue relented, had they not despaired to haue found mercy and pardon at the Romanes hands for their offences committed; and so they thought it better better to be presently slaine in warres, then to be put to death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. Destiny also hindered this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the citie with the seditious, and for foure daies space they distributing necessities vnto the souldiers: and on the fift day Titus perceiuing that for ought he could do, the Iewes were still obstinate, he diuided his armie into two parts, and about Iohns tomb he began to raise mounts, and against Antonia, hoping that waies to take the higher part of the citie, and by Antonia to seise the temple; which except he could effect, he could effect, he could not safely take the citie: and against either of these places he raised two mounts, euery legion making one. The Iewes and Simons followers did hinder the work that was begunne before Iohns tomb, and Iohn likewise with a great number of the Zealous hindered them that made the mounts ouer against Antonia: who not onely did fight with the aduantage of the higher ground; but also had now learned the vie of engines: for continuall vie by little and little made them skilfull, and they had three hundred engines called Balistaes, and fortie engines to cast stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romanes, and hindered them from their worke.

Titus foreknowing that fortune would fauour him, & that the city was like to perish, he halted to take it, neuer ceasing to perswade the Iewes to yeeld: & with his deeds he joined counsell. For he knew that many times words preuaile more then violence of armes, & exhorted them to saue themselves, & yeeld the citie vnto him: & told them of Ioseph, how that he should make a speech vnto them in their owne language, for he hoped that they would heare their owne countriman. Then Ioseph going about the Citie without the daunger of shot, cried vnto them to spare themselves, the citie, the temple, the people, and not become more hard hearted against him, I strangers were. For the Romanes did reuerence the holy places, notwithstanding they had no societic or portion in them; and how euen till this day they had abstained from violating them: and they who were nourished with them, and might onely saue them, did wilfully cause their destruction: and bad them consider that their strongest walles were battered down; and only now the weaker remaining vn battered, hee willed them to consider, how they were not able to withstand the Romanes forces. And that it was no newes to the Iewes, nor straunge, to be subiect vnto the Romanes. For although it be a good & commendable thing to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for hee that was once subiect, and would rebell, hauing a long time liued vnder the obedience of the Romanes, seemed rather to be desirous of a shameful death then a loue of libertie. Moreouer, that they should disdaine to be subiect vnto base people, and not vnto them whom the whole world obeyed. For (said he) what place haue not the Romanes that may be inhabited? Nay themselves might perceiue how fortune did still fauour them: And that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Also that euen by the law of nature, as well by the example of beastes as of men, wee are taught to giue place vnto them that are stronger then ourselves, and be contented that they should get the victory that are valiantest in armes. And this (quoth he) was the cause that your ancestors who were far more strong and politike then you, and had better meanes to resist; yet did they submit themselves vnto the Romanes: which if God had not bene pleased withall, hee would neuer haue permitted them to haue done. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the citie was as it were already raken? And that the citizens supposing their walles were whole, yet were they all destroyed. For the Romanes well knew what famine was amongst them, and how it did euery day waste the people, and would also in short time destroy the warriours amongst them. For suppose that the Romanes would cease, and not besiege the citie, nor offer with drawne swords to assault it: yet is there a ciuill warre within the Citie, which the Iewes cannot overcome or auert, it euery daie increasing: except they would also fight against hunger, and they alone overcome aduerse fortune. Further he added, that it was best, before intolerable calamities befell them, to change their opinion, and whilst they haue time to be counselled by good aduise. And that the Romanes would not punish them for that which was already past, except they persisted obstinate euen vnto the end. For they are (quoth he) kinde, courteous, and gentle to their subiects, and doe prefer their commoditie before reuenge. And they thought it aduantage to haue the citie, & the countie try inhabited; therefore the Emperours would make a league of peace with them: but if he tooke the citie by force, he would not spare one, especially seeing that they were willed by him to saue themselves, and yet in their greatest necessity refused to obey him. Likewise hee told them that the third wall would also be taken very shortly, as well they might perceiue by the two walles: and suppose that the citie was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cause it to be yeelded into the Romanes hands in despite of them.

As

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Christ's birth, 72. The Emperor striueth to be at peace with the Romanes. Ioseph rippeth vp the ancient Histories, and some forraine.

- A As Ioseph did thus aduise them, many standing vpon the wals did raile against him, many vbraided him, & others shot at him. Ioseph seeing he could no more auert them from their imminent calamities, recounted vnto them al their own Histories making for his purpose. O wretches (quoth he) and vngrateful to them that help you: you fight against the Romanes, and bear armes against them, as though this way you had conquered some others that came, as they now doe, against you. When doth God the maker of all things denie his help vnto vs if we be oppressed? Will ye not remember your selues? For what cause did you enterprise these warres, & how great a friend and alsiester of yours doe you daily offend? Do ye not remember the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place; & how in times past it was by the enemies destroyed? But I quake and tremble to recount the works of God to such vnworthy hearers: yet hearken, that you may know that you do not only resist the Romanes, but also God himselfe. Nechias at that time king of Egypt, who also was called Pharaoh, came, and with an infinite army tooke away Queene Sara, the mother of our nation. And what did our first father Abraham in this case? Did he with weapons and armes reuenge this iniurie? hauing vnder his command three hundred and 18 captaines, & vnder them an infinite multitude? Or did he rather desist from warre, perceiuing God not to accompany him? Wherefore lifting vp pure and vndeiled hands towards this holy place, which now you haue defiled and prophaned, he chose God an inuincible helper to aide him. And vvas not the Queen the second night after sent home againe vnto him vntouched? And the Egyptian adoring this holy place, which ye haue polluted with murders of your own nation, & trembling at the visions he saw in the night time, fled, rewarding the Hebrewes with gold and siluer, whom he perceiued to be so beloued of God. Shal I recount vnto you the going of our ancestors into Egypt? who hauing for foure hundred yeeres been slaues vnto the Egyptian tyrants and kings, & able to haue reuenged themselves by force of armes, yet did they rather expect & stay Gods leade of serpents, and infected with all diseases, and the earth became so barren, that Nilus waxed dry, and the tenne plagues followed one another without ceasing; whereby our ancestors were safely deliuered without any bloodshed: for God conducted them, as willing to referue them for his Priests.
- When the Assyrians had taken away from vs the holy Arke, did not Palestina and Dagon repent that fast? did not all the nation of them that tooke it, weepe and lament therefore? For their priue parts being putrified, their bowels and the meat they did eate ran out there, and so with vnclean hands they were forced to bring it back againe, with cymbals and trumpets: therby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our ancestors, because that they laying their armes aside, wholly resigned themselves to his pleasure. Was Senacherib king of Assyria, comming with all his power out of Asia, and incamping himselfe before this citie, ouercome by humane force? Did not our ancestors leauing armes, flie to prayers, and by an Angell God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day the Assyrians rising, found a hundred four score and siue thousand of his men dead, and so fledde with the rest from the Hebrewes being vnarmed, & not pursuing him? You knowe also, that in the captiuitie of Babylon, where the people liued the space of 70 yeeres, they got not their libertie till such time as God put in Cyrus hart, to suffer them to goe into their owne countrey. Who still assisting them, they againe as the Priests in old time were wont, did serue and reuerence their helper. In briebe, our ancestors did neuer atchieue any great matter by force of armes, neither did they leaue any thing vndone, wherein they expected Gods helpe, but still remaining quiet at home, they ouercame their enemies through his prouidence: and when they did fight after their own wils, they alwaies failed of their expectation. For when Zedechias our king, contrary to the admonition of the prophet Jeremie, did go forth, and fight with the king of Babylon then besieging the city, both hee and all his were taken, & this city destroyed. Yet consider how far your captaines are inferior vnto that king, and your selues vnto the people of those times. For Jeremie crying vp & downe the citie, and saying that God was offended at their iniquitie, and that except they did yeeld the same, it should be taken by force; yet did not the king nor any of the people lay hands vpon him. And you (that I may omit your iniquitie done within the citie, which though I wold, I could not sufficiently diminish) do attempt to kil me, & vnto me speaking speeches against me, who once gaue you wholsom counsell for your good only; for that I put you in mind of your sins, you not enduring to hear of that which you daily commit. This same berided also when Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes besieged the Citie, GOD being highly displeased at our ancestors, who going out in armes against him, were all slaine, the towne spoiled, and this holy place for three yeeres and sixe moneths made desolate.

dured a siege, being not so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege then you, yet did they yeeld themselves. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobolus, who inuading the kingdom, brought our nation againe into subiection; God so laying this bondage vpon them, for that he was moued at the iniquitie of our nation? And Herod the sonne of Antipater, brought Sosius and the Romane armie, and besieged the citie round six moneths space: and at last, for the greatnesse of their iniquitie was taken and punished for their offences, & the citie sacked by the enemies. So you evidently see that our nation did neuer preuaile by force of armes. And assure your selues that the Citie will be taken by this siege. It is meet therefore that you who keep this holy place, wholly commit your selues to Gods wil and pleasure, & then feare not the forces of the enemies, when by reason of your pietie, you are assured of Gods helpe and succour. But what one parcell of Gods law haue you obserued? Nay, what mischiefe haue you left vndone, that he detesteth not? How farre greater is your impietie then theirs, that did luddainly perish for their sinnes? For you making small account of secret sinnes, to wit, stealing, deceit, and adulteries, do violently take away mens goods by open force, and murder whom yee please; and haue deuised new waies to sinne. Moreover, you haue made the holy Temple a place of all these your impieties, and the seate that the Romans did adore, is by our owne nation polluted: much derogating from the honour of our religion by your impious facts. Last of all, you hope of his help whom you haue so hainously offended. Truly you are very iust people and obedient, and with pure hands you aske help of God. Did our king thus pray vnto God, when he obtained that in one night so many of the Assyrians should be destroyed? Or doe the Romans commit such impietie as the Assyrians did, that you may hope of the like reuenge against them? for he hauing receiued a peece of money to saue the citie, did, not regarding his oath, seek to destroy the same. The Romans doe onely request the tribute that our auncestors were wont to pay vnto them: which if they haue, they will neuer destroy the citie, nor touch our holy things. They will also permit you to enioy freely your families and possessions, and suffer our lawes to remaine in-uiolate. It is altogether madnesse for you to hope that God will so punish iust men, as hee did sinners and impious persons, who knoweth to punish at his pleasure. To be short, hee destroyed the Assyrians the first night, that they encamped before the citie. And if hee purposed also to deliuer you, and punish the Romans, hee would then haue done it, when Pompey and Sosius came against the citie, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus came to assault it. But neither Pompey nor Sosius suffered any harme, yet both of them tooke the citie. Vespasian so gained by warring against vs, that he hath hereby got the whole Empire. And the fountaines which before gaue you no water, yeeld it to Titus in great abundance. You know that before his com-ming, the fountains without the citie and Siloa were so dried vp, that water was sold by measure: yet now they flow so plentifully, that they do not only serue all the army, & their cattell also, but besides that, do water all the gardens about. What this wonder foretelleth, you haue already experience, vvhhen the king of Babylon came with his army and destroyed the citie: who tooke it & fired it and the temple, notwithstanding that (as I am perswaded) the Iewes of that time were nothing so wicked as you are. Wherefore I thinke that God hath forsaken this holy place, and is now gone to them that do besiege you. Wil not a good man flie a wicked house, and hate the impious that dwell therein? And do you then thinke that God will abide your impietie, who beholder shall secrets, & knoweth all things that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seeke to hide? Nay, what do you that your enemies doe not know? All your iniquities are disclosed to all men: & you euery day strue one with another who shall bee most impious. And you doe as greatly labour to shew your selues vicious, as others do to shew themselves vertuous. Yet for all this, there is time to amend, and Gods wrath will be appeased, if ye acknowledge your sins, & be penitent for your offences. Cease from armes, be ashamed of your country now ruined through your owne meanes. Turne your eyes and behold the beautie of the place, whose ruine you seek.
How braue a Citie, how gorgeous a Temple, how rich with the gifts of all nations? Who would fire these? Who would desire the ruine of these? Or what is there in the world that better deserueth to be serued then these? O hard harted people, and more blockish then stones. If you doe not pittie these, yet let your families moue you; euery one of you look vpon your children, wiues,

A wiues and parents, who shal all presently be consumed, either with sword or famine. I know that together with you shall perish my family, and wife and house, which sometime were of no small account: And perhaps some of you doe think me therefore to speake this vnto you; but kil them, and take my blood for recompence of your welfare and liues: I my selfe am also prepared to die, if after my death you would remember your selues.

Ioseph crying thus vnto them with teares trickling downe his cheeks, the seditious were nothing moued, but told him that it was not safety for them to yeeld. But the people were perswa-ded to flie: and some selling their possessions, & that they had for small prices, they did swallow downe the gold, for feare the thieues should take it from them. And so when they had escaped vnto the Romans, they emptying their bellies found it againe, and so had money to buy them necessaries.

B Titus also permitted many to go away which soeuer they pleased: which thing caused diuers to flie, seeing that thereby they were deliuered out of their calamitie, which in the citie they abode, and were not forced to serue the Romans. But John & Simon were as diligent to stop the waies, lest the Citizens should escape, as they did hinder the Romans from entring into the Citie: so that whosoever did but giue any suspition of flight, hee was presently by them put to death. The richer sort, whether they staid or fled, were slaine for their wealth & possessions. The famine of the citie, and the desperation of the thieues both increased alike, euery day more and more; so that now there was no more corne found. Wherefore the seditious persons brake into the houses, and searched euery corner for to find corne; and if after their search they found any, then they did beat the owners for denying it at the first; and if they found none, they tortured the C householders, as hauing more cunningly hidden it. And whosoever was yet strong of body, and well liking, him they presently kild; for hereby they deemed him to haue store of food, or else he should not haue been in so good plight of body as he was. And they that were pined with famine, were by their barbarous seditious people slaine, who esteemed it no offence to kill the, who wold shortly after die though they were left aliue. Many both rich & poore secretly exchanged all that they had for one bushell of corne, & presently shutting themselves in the secrett roome of their house, some of them did eate the corne as it was, vnground: others made bread thereof as neces-sitie and teare required. No man in the whole citie fate down to eare his meat on a table, but greedily taking it not boiled from the fire, they euen rawe as it was did eate it.

Most miserable was this manner of liuing, and a spectacle which none without teares was D ble to behold; for the strongest still got the most, & the weakest bewailed their misery: for now famine was the greatest calamitie they endured. And nothing doth arme men more then shame: for during this famine, no reuerence was had towards any man: for wiues rooke the meate euen out of their husbands mouthes, and children from their parents, and mothers euen from their infants, which was the most lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compasion, neither did they spare their deereest infants, but suffered them to perish euen in their armes, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eate thus in such secrecy, but presently some came to take away from them that whercon they fed. For if in any place they saw any doore shut, presently heereupon they coniectured that they in the house were eating meat, and forth-with breaking downe the doores, they came in; and taking them by the throat, they tooke the meat alit-tle chewed, and ready to be swallowed downe. The old men were driuen away, and not permit-E ted to keep and defend their food from being taken from them: the women were drawne vp & downe by the haire of the head, for that they hid between their hands some part of their meate, and would not forgoe it. No pitie was now remaining, neither to old age nor infancie, but they rooke young babes eating, their mouth full of meate, & not permitting it to be taken out of their mouthes, and threw them against the ground. Now if any one had prevented these thieues, and eaten their meat before they could come at them, then they were more cruell; and the other to much more tyrannously handled, as hauing committed some greater offence against them. They also deuised most barbarous and cruell torments to extort food from others: for they thrust sticks or such like into the cawtie of mens yards, and sharpe thornie rods into their fundaments: and it F is abhominable to heare what the people endured to make them confesse one loafe of bread, or one handfull of corne which they had hidden.

These miscreants did not yet for all this feele either hunger or thirst: for then these their impi-eties had become more tolerable; but they did it onlie to exercise their crueltie, preparing six daies food for themselves aforehand. Wherefore meeting such as had escaped the Roman watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they againe came into the Citie, and thought they had now escaped the danger of their enemies; they there tooke from them the

The honorable & rich are drawn before the tyrants.

The dissension between Iohn and Simon was for rule, their concord was in wickednesse.

heards they had gotten with hazard of their liues, denying to giue them any small part of that for which they had vndergone such danger: & they required them for Gods sake to do it; yea they thought it a benefit, if beeing thus robbed and spoiled, they did not also perish by the swords of these miscreants. These calamities the baser sort of people endured at the hands of the common souldiers: but the nobles & chiefe men of the citie were led vnto the tyrants, & accused before the of betraying the citie vnto the Romans; & so by some forged treason or other put to death. And many times their suborned accusers would testifie against them, that they purposed to flie vnto the Romans. And those that Simon robbed, he sent vnto Iohn; and those that Iohn spoiled, he sent vnto Simon: and so they did as it were one drink vnto another the blood of the people, & diuide their dead carcases between them; insomuch that they disagreed onely for their desire of rule & domination: but both conspired to doe mischief & commit iniquitie. For hee that did not giue to the other part of that which by crueltie hee had extorted from the miserable citizens, was accounted impious: and he that receiued not part, did now grieue as sustaining losse, in not hauing a share in crueltie and impietie.

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefly, I thinke that neuer any citie endured the like, nor neuer any people since the memory of men were so cruell and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impietie vnto strangers might seeme the lesse, they spake euill of the nation of the Hebrewes, and cursed them, & openly confessed themselves to be slaues, people of diuers countries, vnited together in wickednesse, bastards and abortiues of their nation. They ouerthrew the citie, and forced the Romans (though against their wils) to accept of this sorrowfull and heauie victory; and almost drew the fire into the Temple, as though it staied from it too long. Neither did they weepe or lament when they saw the higher part of the citie on fire; but many amongst the Romans did with sorrow behold that sight: which we will speake of hereafter, where we will describe the euent of that businesse.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Iewes that were crucified, and the Rampiers burnt.

THe mounts and rampiers that Titus built did greatly aduantage him: and although his souldiers endured some losse by the Iewes who were vpon the wal, yet hee sent part of his horsemen, and commanded them to lay wait for the Iewes that came out of the citie into the vallies to fetch food: and amongst them were also some fighting men. For now that which they could rob & take from the citizens was not sufficient for all of them: yet the greater part of them were poore people, who durst not flie vnto the Romans for feare that some harme should thereupon betide their dearest friends, not induring to leaue them behind to be murdered by the thieues. Famine did now embolden them to goe forth of the citie; and now it only remained for them to go forth priuily, & be taken by the enemies. And being taken, necessity forced them to fight for fear of torments; for they now thought it too late to request mercie: after the fight they were beaten and tortured all waies possible, and then crucified before the citie walls. Titus deemed this calamitie most miserable: for every day 500 Iewes and sometime more were taken; and yet did hee not thinke it expedient to dismisse so great a multitude, nor to keepe them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principall point for which hee did not hinder this, was, that by this spectacle he might terrifie the Iewes & make them feare to suffer the like, except they did quickly render themselves & the citie vnto him. Wherefore the souldiers for a hatred which they conceived against our nation, crucified all they tooke one after one fashion, & another after another in derision. And the multitude of the captiues was now so great, that there remained no more space to set crosses in, nor any more crosses to crucifie bodies vpon. But the seditious Iewes within the citie were so far froe relenting by this massacre, that rather their hearts were heereby more hardned; so that heere with they terrified the rest of the multitude: for they caried the kindred of them that had fled vnto the Romans to the wals, & bad the behold how those were vnto that fled vnto the Romanes: the same sight they also shewed vnto them that desired peace; affirming that they whom the Romans had so vnto, were those that fled vnto them for succour, & not captiues by them taken. This terrified many who desired to flie vnto the Romans, from effecting their desire; till such time as the truth hereof was known. Yet some presently went boldly vnto the Romans, as they were intending to suffer death & torment at their hands, accounting that death coming vnto them by their enemies hands, was far more tolerable than the famine they endured.

The Romans inuironed with fire, lose the mounts they had built.

A Heereupon Titus cut off many of the captiues hands, and so sent them into the citie vnto Simon and Iohn, that their calamitie might testifie them to be captiues, and not such as had fledde and yielded vnto the Romans; willing to admonish them at least now to yield, and not compell him to destroy the citie: telling that in so doing, euen now at the last they should saue their owne liues, countrey, and temple, which had not the like in all the world: and hee continually went about the rampiers hastening the workmen in their busines, as though hee presently meant to effect that in deeds which in words he had spoken. The Iewes that stood vpon the wals, cursed both him and his father, reuiling them, and affirming that they contemned death; and that they did chuse rather to die then to become bond slaues: and that whilst life lasted, they would as much as lay in them harme the Romans, neither hauing care of themselves nor of their countrey; which B Caesar sent them word were both presently to perish. Moreouer, hee said, that the whole world was a temple dedicated to God, farre more excellent then that of theirs, which notwithstanding should be consecrated by him that dwelt in it; whose help they also enjoying, would deride all his threatnings, which could not come to passe, God beeing the end of all. And thus opprobriously they exclaimed against the Romans.

At this time arriued also Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him many armed men; and beside them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were all of like age, and little older then young men in their youth, all trained vp in armes, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof also they tooke their name: yet for the most part not able to answere the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the king of Comagene was the most fortunate & happy of all kings, that were subiect vnto the Romane Empire; till such time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged yeres shewed that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: he yet flourishing, his sonne (said he) maruailed that the Romans did delay so long to assault the citie, and enter the battered walles (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding strength, to the which he trusted too much, so that he did many things rashly. Titus heereat smiled and answered, that that was a labour not onely for the Romans, but for all in common. After he had said thus, presently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedonians, assaulted the wall, and himselfe with his strength and dexteritie auoided the darts of the Iewes, and cast his darts at them: but all his young men (onely a few excepted) were there slain: for ashamed of their boasting speeches, they continued longer in fight then it was expedient for them: at last, many beeing wounded retired themselves, now perceiuing that the Macedonians to win a victorie had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the 12 day of May beganne to build their rampiers: & labouring full seauenteen whole daies, with much adoe they ended them the nine and twentieth day of the said moneth. For they builded foure most huge rampiers, one of them ouer against Antonia, which was builded by the fift legion opposite to the midst of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twelfth legion, 20 cubits distant from the other. But the tenth legion, which was of more account then the two former, erected a mount opposite to the pond called Amygdalon on the North side: and the fifteenth legion made the fourth, thirtie cubits distant from the other, ouer against the monument of the high priest Iohn.

The mounts beeing thus finished, Iohn vndermined that which was ouer against Antonia, & E vnderdropped it with posts of wood, and filling the mine with wood, bitumen and pitch, hee fired it: so the posts that held it vp beeing burnt, the mine fell, and the mount also with a hideous noise fell into it: and first of all there arose a great smoake and dust, for the mines did couer the flame; at last the fire hauing consumed the matter that couered it, the flame cleerly appeared. The Romans at this suddaine and vnexpected exploit were amazed, being grieued at it: so that thereby those who before made account of the victorie, as though it had been theirs already, began to despair. Two daies after Simon and his associates did sette vpon the other rampiers: for thereon were planted rams, wherwith the Romanes began to beat the wals. Amongst the rest, a certaine man named Tepthaus of Garfusa citie of Galilee, and Megastarus, one of Queene Mariammes seruants, and with them one of Adiabena the sonne of Nabateus, who for his fortune was named F Agirus, which signifieth lame: these three taking fire brands ran vnto the engines, and there was none found in all the Roman armie more valiant then these men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidst the throng of their enemies so boldly, as though they had gone amongst their friends, and neuer made any stay, but breaking through the midst of their enemies, they fired their engines: and notwithstanding that on euery side they were assaulted with darts and arrowes; yet did they not giue backe, nor seek to auoide the danger, till such time as the fire had taken hold of the engines. The flame mounting on high, the Romanes now came running out of their campe to succour their fellowes: and the Iewes vpon the wall with darts and arrowes hindered them, fighting with them that sought to quench the flame, nothing sparing their own bodies. The Romans beganne to draw away the Rammes, their shelters being fired. And the Iewes amidst the flames sought to keep them there: yet for all this the Romans saved their Rammes. From thence the fire caught hold of the rampiers, and those that would haue prevented it were burned: & the fire so increased, that it could not be extinguished; so the Romans now enuironed with a flame, and despairing to rescue their works, retired themselves into their campe, and left them on fire. But the Iewes were so much the more earnest, their number still increasing by new supply coming out of the citie: and so encouraged by this their victory, they rashly adventured vnto the Romans campe, & assaulted the guard there. Which guard, was a company placed round about before the campe in armour, and there was a law made, that whosoever of them forsooke his place, he should lose his life: so that they esteeming rather to die a glorious death, then ignominiously to suffer a penall punishment, resisted very valiantly: so that many that had fled, retired themselves back againe to fight, both for shame that they had forsaken their place, and for fear of punishment therefore: and placing engines vpon the rampier of their campe, they hindred the Iewes from issuing out of the citie any more: for they came out vnarmed, hauing nothing to defend their bodies withall. For the Iewes fought with whomsoever they met, and rashly running amongst their enemies pikes, they strooke them with their fists. For the Iewes preuailed more by their hardnesse, then by their deeds: and the Romans fledde more for the Iewes boldnesse, then for any harme they sustained by them.

Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had been to view a place to build an other rampier, I and he greatly blamed the souldiers, who hauing gotten their enemies wals, did now suffer themselves to be in danger in their own wals; and now forced to abide that, which earst the Iewes did suffer, he now as it were broken out of prison: & so he with certaine chosen men assaulted the enemies on one side; and they though stricken vpon the faces, yet did they not giue backe, but stoutly resisted him: and so ioyning the battaile, the dust was so thicke, that none could see one another, nor any heare what was said for the cries and noise, so that now no man could discern his friends from his foes. The Iewes persisted still in the battaile, not for that they trusted to their force, or thereby preuailed, but because they were desperate. The Romanes on the other part tooke courage, and fought stoutly for shame, and for that Caesar himselfe was in danger amongst them. So that I thinke that had not the Iewes retired themselves into the citie, the furie of the Romans had then consumed the whole multitude. The Romanes were now sorrowfull for the losse of their rampiers, who in one houre had lost that, which with such labour and so long time they had been making: and many of their engines being now displaced, they despaired to take the citie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the wall which the Romane armie built about Ierusalem in three daies space.

Titus now deliberated with his captaines what was to be done; & they that were most forward amongst them, thought it best with all the whole army to assault the wals: for that as yet the Iewes had onely fought with one part of the army, but they were not able to withstand the force of the whole army, but would be all consumed with darts and arrowes. The wisest sort again perswaded Titus to build rampiers: but others counselled the contrarie, to hold themselves quiet there, & onely to keep all places about, that no foode should be conuied into the citie, and so famish the citie, and neuer fight with the enemy. For that the Iewes being now desperate, & desiring to be slaine, would not be overcome by force; or if not, to slay others which was worst of all. But Titus thought it a shame to lie there idle with so huge an armie, and do nothing; yet he deemed it superfluous to fight with them, who would willingly fight to be slaine: and he could not make any mounts because hee wanted matter, & it was most difficult of all to guard every place about the citie, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleagred round on euery side, by reason of the difficult places, & huge compasse thereof, fearing also the dangers that so might ensue, the Iewes issuing out of the citie. For the Iewes seeing their open waies all guarded by the Romans, they would deuise some secret waies, both vrged thereto by necessity, & also because they knew all places there about very wel. And if so be that the Iewes should secretly effect any thing to preiudice the, that then their siege was like to continue

A so much the longer: so that hee feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glorie of his victorie. For though all these waies might be taken, yet hee preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would vse celeritie and safetie, that then it was needfull for him to compasse the whole citie round about with a wall: for so all waies and passages might bee hindered: and so the Iewes seeing now no hope of safety, should either be compelled to yeeld the citie, or else bee consumed with famine, otherwise he could not be in safety and at quiet; and that so he might erect mounts, hauing that wall to defend them. And if any one thinke that worke difficult, and not to bee achieved, let him consider that it did not become the Romanes to make a bafe or slender peece of worke: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God onely. Hauing with these speeches encouraged his captaines, he caused them to lead the souldiers, & dispose them all in these businesses. The souldiers had as it were some diuine force and courage fallen vpon them: for the captaine parting the circuit amongst them, not onely they, but the souldiers also did striue who should first effect their part. And euery souldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and the Centurion the Colonell, the Colonell to please the Captaine, and the Captaine to please Caesar, who euery day went round about, and beheld the worke: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians campe, where hee was encamped, hee drew a wall all about, euen vnto the new citie, and from thence by Cedron and mount Oliuet, and so turned toward the South, and inclosed the mountaine to the rocke called Peristereonos, and the hill next adioining thereunto which hangerth ouer Siloa: and from thence bending his worke into the West, hee brought it downe all along the valley of the fontaine: from thence ascending to the monument of Ananus the high Priest where Pompey pitched his Tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the citie: and comming along vnto the village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the monument of Herode towards the East, and so ioined the wall vnto his campe where hee began. This wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this wall hee builded also thirteene forts, euery one ten furlongs in compasse. And all this whole worke was finished in three daies space, which desired moneths to haue beene builded in: so that the celeritie in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The citie being thus encom- passed with a wall, and guards placed in euery fort, Titus himselfe did still goe round about the first watch, to see all things in good order: the second watch hee allotted vnto Alexander; & the third vnto the captaines of the legions, and the watchmen appointed euerie one in his turne to D sleepe in: and so all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the famine in Ierusalem: and of the building of the second rampire by the Romanes.

He restraint of libertie to passe in and out of the citie tooke from the Iewes all hope of safetie; and the famine now increasing, consumed whole households and families, and the houses were full of dead women and infants; and the streetes filled with the dead bodies of old men: And the yong men swollen like dead mens shadowes, walked in the

And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were aliue could not bury them, neither cared they for burying them, being now vncertaine what should befall themselves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell downe themselves dead vpon them as they were burying them. And many being yet aliue, went vnto their graues and there died. Yet for all this calamitie was there no weeping nor lamentation, for famine ouercame all affections. And they who were yet liuing, without teares beheld those, who being dead, were now at rest before them. There was no noyse heard within the Citie, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all; the thecues at night came and tooke away that which couered the dead bodies nakednesse, and went laughing away, and in their bodies they proued their swords, and vpon pleasure only thrust many thorough yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to end him a sword to kill himselfe, that so he might escape the famine, they denied him. And euery one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes vpon the temple, and beheld it now with griefe, leauing the seditious behind them. The seditious now not able to endure the stinke of the dead bodies that lay corrupted about the ground. first commanded that all such should bee buried at the charges of the citie: at last finding not place wherein to bury them all, they threw them ouer the wals into the ditch. When Titus going about the wals, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens bodies, hee lamented; and lifting vp his hands to heauen, hee called God to witnes, that it was not his doing. G Such was the estate of the city. Now the Romanes, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in ioy and mirth: for they neither suffered famine nor sorrow, hauing abundance of corne, and all other necessities out of Syria, and the prouinces adioining: and many standing before the walles, and shewing their abundance of victualls vnto the Iewes, did so much more increase their famine. Yet were not the seditious people moued at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the nation, and minding at least to saue them that were left aliue, hastned to take the citie, and so he began anew to build mounts: although hee scarcely found matter to doe it withall. For all the wood neere vnto the citie was consumed in the first workes, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood ninety furlongs off, and onely against Antonia, were erected in foure places foure mounts greater then the former. Cesar H went about and hastned the workemen, and now shewed the theeues that they were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this they would not repent: and now as it were depriued of their wits and bodies, they vsed both as though borrowed, and not their owne. For neither did any affection moue their minds, nor any griefe their bodies: for they reut and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weake and languishing people.

Of the massacre of the Iewes both within and without the citie.

Simons cruelty against Matthias and his sonnes.

T last, Simon hauing tormented Matthias put him to death, notwithstanding that by his meanes he had obtained the citie. This Matthias was sonne vnto Bathura Priest, whom the people for his fidelitie towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the outrage of the Zelous towards the people, Iohn beeing now ioined with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to helpe them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no euill. And when hee was come into the citie, hee held him for his enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his onely aduice hee was receiued into the citie, as though Matthias had onely done that of simplicitie. Wherefore calling him before the people, hee accused him that hee did fauour the Romanes, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to cleare himselfe; and put to death likewise his three sonnes with him, K for the fourth was before this time fled vnto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that hee might bee put to death before his sonnes: but Simon in regard that by his meanes hee had gotten the Citie, caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed vpon the murdered bodies of his sons, in a place where the Romanes might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananus his executioner who was the sonne of Banadus. This man was the most cruell of all Simons followers: who euen when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now help him, to whom hee sought to flie, and not permitted their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest the sonne of Masbalus a nobleman, and chiefe secretary to the councill, a valiant strong man & borne at Emaus, and with him fiftene of the chiefe men in the citie were put to death. They tooke also Iosephs father and kept him in prison, and with the publike voice of a crier proclaimed, that L no man should talke with him nor visit him, pretending feare of treason: and who soeuer bewailed his estate, were put to death without any triall. It happened, a certain man called Iudas the son of Iudas, who was one of Simons captaines seeing this (who also kept a tower that Simon committed vnto his charge, perhaps moued with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet rather fearing his own life) assembled together ten of his most trusty companions, & said; "How long shall we endure these calamities? Or what hope haue wee of life in beeing trusty to a most impious man? Behold how famine doth take our citie. The Romanes are almost within our walls, and Simon is cruel & faithlesse, euen towards them that haue wel deserved at his hands: with him we are in feare of punishment; if we fly vnto the Romanes, we shall assuredly be receiued into fauour. Wherefore let vs deliuer the wall vnto them, and saue our selues & our citie. Neither can Simon hereby sustaine any great losse, in being punished a little sooner, then otherwise hee should be, being now desperate of his own health and safety. The ten men, to whome in this manner hee brake his mind, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers vnder his rule into diuers places, that they might not perceiue his intent, and hee at the third hower of the day standing vpon the tower called the Romanes. But some of the Romanes proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely believed them, and the rest made no speed to come. In the meane time Ioseph wounded in the head with a stone and the rumor is spread thorow the citie.

A time while Titus with certaine armed men came vnto the wall, Simon had notice of their intent; and so speedily got the tower, and slew them that were within in the sight of the Romanes, and cast down their bodies ouer the wall. And Ioseph going about the wall, and coming thither (for he neuer ceased from requesting the Iewes to remember their estate) hee was strooke vpon the head with a stone, and so amazed with the blow fell downe: who beeing fallen downe, presently the Iewes made excursion out of the citie, and had carried him away into the citie, had not Titus sent men to defend him: and whilest they fought, Ioseph was carried away, scarcely knowing what was done. The seditious with loud cries reioiced, as hauing slaine him whose death they chiefly desired; and so they reported within the citie. Hereupon the people were most sorrowfull, verily beleueing him to be slaine, by whom they had confidence to fly vnto the Romanes.

B When Iosephs mother who was in prison heard this, she said vnto those of Iotapata that were her keepers, that she verily beleueed it, for that he was neuer taken aliue by the Romanes: yet secretly vnto her maidens she wept, and said, that this benefit shee receiued by hauing borne a son, that he could not bury him by whom she hoped to haue bene buried her selfe. But this false report did not long grieue her, nor comfort the theeues: for Ioseph was quickly healed of his wound, and recouered; and shewing himselfe he cried vnto them, that ere long they should finde that he would be reuenged on them for his wound; yet he ceased not to exhort the people to obey the Romanes, and yeld: but the seditious seeing him aliue were astonished, and the people conceiued good hope. Many (present necessity vrging them) leapt off the wals and fled vnto the Romanes, diuers with stones going forth vnder pretence to fight with the Romanes, yeelded themselves, C who had harder fortune there then within the citie; and were now more harmed by plenty of victualls which they found amongst the Romanes, then with their famine they suffered in the citie: for many became by famine all swollen, as though they had the dropsie, & presently filling their emptie bodies they burst; and so all died, saue onely those who being warie did by little and little accustome their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus escaped fel into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Iewes that were fled vnto the Romanes was found amongst the Syrians, gathering gold out of his owne dung which he had swallowed, as is before said, for that the seditious did search all, and take that they could finde from them: & there was verie great store of gold in the citie, and that now was sold for twelue Atticks which before was worth twenty five. This deuice being discovered in one, presently a report was spread all ouer the whole campe, that the Iewes that fled from the citie came full of gold. And now the Arabians and Syrians did rippe the bellies of their poore suppliants, to see if they could find any gold or siluer within them. And I am perswaded that there was no greater calamitie befell the Iewes then this was: for in one night the bellies of two thousand Iewes were ript. Titus hearing of this cruelty, had caused the authors hereof to haue been compassed round with horsemen, and slaine with darts; & had the multitude of the offenders bin knowne, many more of the should haue bin punished, then of the Iewes that were so murdered. Wherefore he called together the leaders of the soldiers that came to helpe him, and the Roman captaines (for some of the Romanes also did commit this fault) and said vnto them in anger, that if any of his souldiers did commit any such acts for vncertaine gaine, and were not ashamed that their armour should be made of gold and siluer: or if the Arabians in these warres against strangers did what they pleased, and presently cause the infamie of their vile facts to redound vnto the Romanes; they committing such murders and exercising their hatred against the Iewes (for now euery one that bare armes vnder him were diffamed with this vile report) hee declared vnto them, that such beeing hereafter found in that fact, should bee put to death. Also he commanded his owne legions to make enquire, who were suspected among them for this matter, and bring him worde thereof. But auarice is not terrified by feare of punishment, and cruell people haue naturally a desire of lucre and gaine, and no one calamitie may be compared to the desire of wealth; yet sometime it is bridled and restrained for feare. But now God who had giuen ouer the people to perdition, suffered all things to be turned to their destruction: for that which Cesar did so streightly forbid, was still secretly committed against the poore Iewes that fled for mercie vnto the Romanes. So that now who soeuer fled out of the Citie, the souldiers first looking about them, least any of the Romanes should see them, rippe their bellies, and so got an vngodly and impious bootie; yet in verie few did they find that they sought for; & the most of them that were slaine had no gold nor siluer found within them. And this mischance caused many that fled vnto the Romanes to returne againe into the Citie.

When John could rob no more, nor get any spoile from the Citizens, whom hee had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to sacriledge, and took many gifts that were bestowed vpon the temple, and carried away sacred vessels for diuine seruice, as cups, plates, tables, and the cruets of golde that Augustus & his wife sent. So that now a Iew robbed and spoiled the temple of all gifts wherewith the Romane Emperours and other nations had honoured it: affirming vnto his associates, that without feare they might vse the holy things of the temple, seeing they fought for God and the temple, and therefore it was lawfull for them to be fed by the riches of the temple. Moreouer, that it was lawfull for them to spend the holy wine & oile which the priests reserued for diuine sacrifice: which hee distributed in the temple amongst the multitude, and they without feare were annointed therewith, and dranke thereof. I will not cease to speake that which grieue compelleth me. I verily thinke that had the Romanes forborne to haue come against these seditious, that either the earth would haue swallowed the city vp, or some deluge haue drowned it, or els the thunder and lightning which consumed Sodome would haue light vpon it: for the people of the citie were farre more impious then the Sodomites. In brieue, by their desperation and obstinacie the whole nation was extinguished. What neede I recount euery particular misery? Mannæus the sonne of Lazarus flying to Titus out of the gate that was committed vnto his custodie, and yelding himselfe vnto him, recounted vnto Titus that from the time that the Romans army was placed neere the citie, from the fourteenth day of Aprill, vntill the first of Iuly, were carried out of that gate he kept, a hundreth, fiftene thousand and fourescore dead bodies; yet was not he the keeper of the gate, but beeing appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the citie, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buried by their parents, and this was their buriall, to cast them out of the citie, and there let them lie. And certaine noble men flying vnto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in all the citie 600000. poore folkes which were cast out of the gates, and the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered their bodies together in the greatest houses adioining, and there shut them vp. And that a bushell of corne was solde for a talent, which is six hundreth crownes: and that after the Citie was compassed with a wall that now they could not goe out to gather any more hearbes, many were driuen to that necessitie, that they raked linkes and priues to finde olde dung of Oxen to eate; and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meate. The Romanes hearing this, were moued to compassion; yet the seditious within the Citie who beheld this miserable sight were nothing moued, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamitie: for their hearts were so blinded by the prouidence of God, that they could not see what hanged ouer their heads, and ouer the citie.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the walles: and how the mounts were burned: and how Sabinus assaulted the wall.

THIS misery of Ierusalem every day encreased, the seditious being by reason of their misery more & more incited against the people: for now the famine was not only amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the city, from which came a pestilent & infectious smel, so that it hindred the soldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread vpon dead bodies, as though they were to march along a field couer'd with dead carcasses. Having now embred their hands in the blond of their countymen, they prepared to resist & fight with their their enemies, and (as it seemeth to me) hereby vpbraiding God in that he so deferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safety, but as despairing of all. The Romanes though much troubled to get wood to build withall; yet did they in one and twenty daies finish their mounts, hauing cut downe all the woodes neerer the citie by ninety furlongs. It was miserable to behold that country and place, before all beset with trees and fertile plants, now to lie plaine like a delart, all cut downe: neither was there any stranger that before time had scene Iudaea, and the beautifull suburbs of Ierusalem, who now beholding it could abstaine from teares, or not lament the wofull change so farre different from the former. For now this warre extinguished vtterly all signes of beauty: neither could one coming sodainly now know the place which he well knew before.

The Iewes and Romanes are equally afraid.

The Romans most of all fear the desperate-nesse of the Iewes.

The Iewes with firebrands set vpon the engines: but losing their hope returne backe againe. The valour & violence of the Iewes decreaseth.

The Romans undermine the wall.

When the mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Iewes greatly feared: the Iewes for that except they were destroyed, their citie would bee presently taken: the Romans, for that if these were ouerthrowne, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds with many griefes and molestations. But the Romans were more grieued at the calamitie of the citie then the citizens within: for the Iewes notwithstanding these miseries, did neuertheless stoutly defend their wals: but the courages of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Iewes policie made their mounts vnprofitable, that the strength of the wals resisted their engines, that the Iewes boldnes ouercame their strength in fight; & especially seeing that the Iewes hauing endured such calamitie, famine, and misery, were still more courageous then before: so that they deemed their strength not to bee overcome; and that their minds were inuincible, who were hardened and encouraged by misery. For who were I able to abide their forces in prosperity, who by aduersitie were incited to vertue? Wherefore the Romans made a stronger watch about their mounts. But Iohns followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were battered, preuented it in what they could, before the Rams were set vp: and taking firebrands in their hands they assaulted the mount; but deceiued with a vaine hope they retired theselues. For first of all they seemed to disagree amongst themselves; so that they came from their wals one after another, & some space betweene every one; so that they came softly and fearefully; and briefly, not after the maner of the Iewes: for they wanted courage, rashnes, and flocking together at once, which is proper vnto all that nation, and so came more soberly, and with lesse courage then they were wont. They did also finde the Romans more courageous then of late, who so defended their mounts with their bodies and weapons, that it was not possible to come & fire them; and euery one was fully determined not to shrinke out of his place till he were slaine. For besides that if so be that worke were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more; they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should bee overcome by subtiltie, or their weapons by rashnes and temerity, or their skill by a multitude; or the Romanes by the Iewes. Also they had engines to cast dartes at them as they came downe their wals. And when any one of the Iewes that was slaine fell downe, hee hindered them that followed, and the danger of him that went before terrified them that came after. They also that rashly aduentured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified with the discipline, and multitude of their enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retired, one accusing another of cowardlines, and archieued nothing.

The first day of Iuly the citie was assaulted, and the Iewes being now retired, the Romanes set vp their Rammes, notwithstanding that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and whatsoever their enemies in that extremitie could finde. For though the Iewes had great confidence in their wals, as that they could not be battered; yet did they not permit the Romanes to place their Rammes against them. And the Romanes being perswaded that the Iewes so laboured, because they knew their wals to be weake, and least Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, did strue to place the against the wals. But the wal wold not yeeld vnto the Ram: yet did the Romanes safely & without danger (notwithstanding that many darts were cast at them from off the wals) persist to beat the wal with their Rams: who being below & seeing the stones broken with the force of their engines, they shielded themselves with their bucklers: and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall; some digged vnder the foundation thereof: and when foure stones with much labour were broken and shaken, the night hindred both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Rammes (in the place which Iohn had undermined to destroy the mounts, the mine setting) fell downe. So, that fell out otherwise then either part expected: For the Iewes who indeed had cause to be sorrowfull for the mine of the wall, and for that they did not preuent that mischance, were iofull and courageous,

No man durst ascend the wall that Iohn built.

Titus exhortation to the most valiant and strongest.

The patient minds of the Iewes, & their constancie in misfortunes.

The wrath of God against the Iewes, & their furtherance.

Titus speaketh of the lite to come after a poeticall manner.

The reward of that valiant men.

A courageous, as though Antonia did yet remaine firme & strong: And the Romanes reioycing for this vnexpected fall, were againe dismayed, seeing the other wall that Iohn had built within, yet they iudged it easier to be taken then the former; but no man durst ascend it, for that he who first assaulted it, was certain to die. Titus thinking that by hope and perswasion his souldiers might be encouraged, and knowing many times promites and exhortations made men forget danger, & sometime to contemne death it selfe, he called together the most valiant of all his souldiers, and spake thus vnto them as followeth; Fellow souldiers, it is manifest cowardlinesse to exhort men to enterprife a thing without danger, both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exhorteth: for exhortations are onely to be vled in doubtfull affaires, wherein it is praise worthy for euery man to aduenture himselfe. So that I confesse it is hard for you to ascend the wall: yet wil I shew you that it is a glorious death to die in such a fight, and especially it becommeth them that are desirous to win honour; and that they that first aduenture valiantly to doe it, shall not go away unrewarded. And first let this moue you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient mind of the Iewes, and their constancie in aduersitie. For it is a shame for the Romane souldiers, who in time of peace practice themselves in warlike feates, & are accustomed in warre to get the victory, now to be overcome by the Iewes; and that in the end of the victory, we hauing also God to helpe vs: for all our harmes proceed from the Iewes desperation; and their destruction and calamitie by Gods fauour and your valour is euery day increased. For what else is betokened by their ledition amongst themselves, their famine, the fall of their wals without our engines to batter them, and the siege it selfe, then the wrath of God towards them, and his fauour towards vs? Wherefore it is vnseemly for you either to giue place to your inferiours, or to betray Gods fauour and furtherance. Is it not a shame that the Iewes, who, were they conquered, sustained no great reproach, as beeing accustomed to serue and obey others, should so valiantly contemne death, least they should hereafter suffer or endure the like; and many times boldly to aduenture and make excursions euen amongst the midst of vs, not for hope they haue to overcome vs, but onely to shew their valour: and wee, who haue conquered almost the earth and sea, to whom it is an infamie not to be victorious, to lie idle, neuer making valiant assault vpon our enemies, but beeing thus armed, to expect till fortune and famine deliuer them into our hands? Especially seeing that by vndergoing a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we haue taken the Citie. For suppose that we were then to fight against them, that are within the citie (which I do not think) D we hauing gotten the higher part of the citie, beeing about our enemies head, are then assured of a perfect victorie ouer them. I omit now their commendations who haue been slaine in wars, and their immortalitie whom Martiall furie hath deprived of this life: and those that doe not so thinke, I pray that they may die of some euill death in peace, whose soules are condemned to be entered with their bodies. For what valiant man knoweth not that the soule of him that dieth in war, is presently receiued into the most pure airie element, & fro thence caried & placed amongst the starres of heauen, and the good and valiant ghosts doe alwaies sit his posteritie? And that all that in peace doe die of some disease and sicknesse, their soules are kept in the bowels of the earth in darknesse: notwithstanding that they be most iust and pure, and presently they are forgotten, and their life and memory together with them extinguished. Seeing therefore that we are E all certaine to die, & that to die by the sword is a more easie death then to die by any disease, why should we deprive our selues of this opportunitee, seeing that at last wee must necessarilie forgoe our liues as due debt vnto the destinies? And this I haue spoken as though it were vnpossible to escape with life, you doing your endeavors; yet they that beare the minds of men can find means to saue themselves, euen in the greatest dangers. For first of all, that part of the wal that is fallen may easily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be thrown downe: and many of you together enterprising this worke, may one exhort and helpe another, and your audacite and courage will quickly daunt the enemies hearts, and perhaps may get vs the victorie if we get this one place without bloodshed. For they will not resist vs if wee offer to ascend the wall: and let vs but effect any one exploit either secretly or openly, and the Iewes will neuer more endure vs, though wee F be but a few in number. And I wold be ashamed if I did not so reward him, that doth first begin, as to make all that are in our armie to eniue his happinesse: and from henceforth I decree, that whatsoever escapeth, shall be Gouvernour ouer them that are now his equals; and who so is slaine in this quarrell, I will doe him great honour.

Titus hauing thus spoken, the rest of the multitude feared the greatnesse of the danger: but one of them that warred in the companies named Sabimus, a Syrian borne, a man of excellent strength and courage; yet of so small stature; that if one had scene him, they would haue deemed him him vnfit to haue been a souldier: for he was of very small stature and of black colour, but he had a mind far bigger then his body, & strength scarcely able to be contained in so little roome. This Sabinus rising vp, said; I offer my selfe vnto thee, O Caesar, first of all to ascend the wall, and that with a willing mind, requesting that my fortune may asist my strength and mind: yet if fortune shall hinder my enterprise, know that I die not against my expectation, but that I will gladly giue my life for thee. When he had so said, he tooke his shield in his left hand, and holding it about his head, with his drawne sword in his right hand, about the sixth houre of the day hee went vnto the wall: and cleauen men followed him, who only enuied his vertue. But Sabinus with a diuine feruour of spirit went before them all; notwithstanding that on euery side the Iewes vpon the wall cast an infinite number of darts at him, & rowled downe vpon him huge stones, which did strike downe some of the cleauen that followed him. But Sabinus meeting the darts and pestering arrowes, yet did not remitt his force, till such time as he had gotten vnto the top of the wall, & put the enemies to flight: who terrified with his strength and courage, & indeed thinking that more had come vp after him, fled. Wherein, who may not iustly blame Fortune, & accuse her; as enuying at vertuous acts? For this man failed not of his purpose, yet was he stricken with a stone, & throwne downe flat vpon his face most violently with a great noise: so that now the Iewes seeing him alone, and lying vpon the ground, returned againe, and shot at him on euery side: and hee kneeling vpon his knees, and couering himselfe with his shield, did first of all reuenge himselfe vpon his enemies, and wounded many that came neere him, till that with wounding them hee was so wearie, that he could strike no longer; and so at last was slaine with arrowes: a man who for his valor deserued better fortune, & died as valiantly as his enterprise was courageous. Those that were left of his company, hauing almost gotten to the toppe of the wall, were slaine with stones, and the rest being wounded were caried into the camp. And this was done the third day of Iuly.

CHAP. II.

How the Romans assaulted Antonia, and how they were driuen backe from thence by the Iewes.

The Romans inuade Antonia.

Two daies after, twentie of the watchmen which guarded the mounts, two horsemen, and one trumpeter gathered themselves together: and about the ninth houre of the night, they came by the ruines into Antonia without any resistance: and finding the first watchmen asleepe, they slew them, and got the wall, and commaunded the trumpet to sound; by which found the rest of the watch-men were awaked, and fled for feare, before they saw what company of the Romanes were gotten vpon the wall: and the sound of the trumpet perswaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come vp the wall. Caesar hearing the sound of the trumpet, presently armed his souldiers; and accompanied with his chiefe Captaines, and a company of chosen men, he ascended the wall. The Iewes fledde into the inner Temple, and the Romanes also brake in amongst them by the mine that Iohn had made to destroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of Iohn and Simon, did courageously driue them back: for they thought it the vnder ruine of all, that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a sore fight, euen in the very entrance, the Romans struing to get the inner Temple, and the Iewes endeavouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now arrowes, darts, and speares, nothing auailed either part, but they both fought it out at handie blowes with swords: & in that conflict no man could discern on which side any one fought; for the souldiers on both parts were mingled together, & for the straightness of the place, could not keep their roomes: for there was such a noise that no man could heare one another, and many were slaine on both parts: & the dead bodies of those that were slaine and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trode vpon them; and whosoeuer had the worst, presently cried out pittifully, and the victors shouted for ioy: neither was there any place to flie or follow; the fight was such, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that stood in the forefront of the battell, were either of necessity to kill or be killed: for there was no void space left between the two armies. At last the Iewes courage ouercame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten back (hauing fought from the ninth houre of the night vnto the seauenth houre of the day.) The Iewes were encouraged to fight for feare they should be ouercome. And that parcell of the Romane army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it sufficient at that time to haue gotten the Castle of Antonia.

Of the exceeding valour of Iulian the Romane souldier.

Here was one Iulian a Centurion, borne in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my selfe well knew) was most valiant of all, both in strength of body, and skill, and courageous mind. This Iulian, seeing now the Romans to haue the worst (standing by Titus in Antonia) he presently leape downe, & all alone pursued the Iewes who had the victory, into the inner temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force and courage, not to haue been a man. But he amongst the midst of them, slew whosoeuer he light on, one of them for haste casting downe another. So that this his deed seemed admirable vnto Caesar, and terrible to his enemies. Yet did that destinie befall him, which no man can escape; for hauing his shooes full of sharpe nailes, as other souldiers haue, running vpon the pavement, hee slipped & fel down, his armor in the fall making a great noise: wherat his enemies, who before fled, now turned again vpon him. Then the Romanes in Antonia fearing his life, cried out: but the Iewes many at once strooke him with swords and speares. And he defended many blowes with his shield, and many times attempting to rise, they strooke him down againe: yet as hee lay hee wounded many; neither was he quickly slaine, because that all parts of his body, which being wounded might cause present death, were armed, and shrunke in his neck a long time till the rest of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his strength failed. Caesar was very sorrowful to see a man of so great force and fortitude slaine in the sight of such a multitude: & that the place wherein he was, hindered him from helping Iulian; and others that might haue helped him, durst not for feare. At last, when Iulian had a long time striven with death, and wounded many of them that slew him, he was with much adoe killed, leauing behind him a renowned memory, not onely amongst the Romans and Caesar, but also amongst his enemies. Then the Iewes tooke his dead body, and did beate back the Romans, and shut them in Antonia. In this battaile one Alemaus and Gyphtheus two of Iohns company fought valiantly, and of Simons company Malachias and Judas the sonne of Merton, and Iames the sonne of Sosa, capitaine of the Idumæans; & two brethren of the Zelous, the sonnes of Tairus, Simon and Judas.

CHAP. IIII.

Iosephs speech, perswading the Iewes to yeld their Citie: and how many of them fled vnto the Romans.

After that Titus had commanded his souldiers to pull down the foundations of Antonia, & make an easie entrance for the whole army: He called Ioseph vnto him (for he understood, that day being the seauenteenth of Iuly, that the Iewes were wont to celebrate a certaine feast to God, which they called Entelechismus, and that it was not solemnized for want of men; so that the people greatly mourned therefore) and againe commaunded him to tell Iohn that, whereof before he had sent him word, to wit, that if hee desired to fight, hee should haue libertie to come, with what multitude he pleased; so that the citie and the temple might not both perish with him, willing him now to desist from prophaning the holy place, and from sinning against God: sending him also word, that if he so pleased, hee would grant him leaue to celebrate the festiuitie which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleased. Ioseph to the intent that not onely Iohn might heare this offer of Titus, but also the rest of the people, he stood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted vnto the Iewes Caesars pleasure, earnestly requesting them to spare their country, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, & to offer the accustomed sacrifices vnto God. When he had thus said, the people were very sorrowfull, and euery one held his peace, not knowing what to say. But the tyrant Iohn hauing vsed many railing speeches against Ioseph, at last he answered, that he need not feare the destruction of the temple & citie, seeing that it belonged to God.

Then Ioseph with a loud voice cried out, True it is, you haue kept it pure, and vnprophaned for God, and the holy things you haue kept inuiolate, neither hast thou committed any iniquitie against him, from whom thou expectest helpe, but hast offered Iolemn sacrifice vnto him. If any man should take fro thee thy daily food, no doubt thou wouldest account him thy enemy: canst thou then hope that God whom thou hast depriued of daily sacrifice, wil asist thee in these wars?

Titus speaketh to Iohn & his companions.

Doest thou impute these offences to the Romans? why they euen now doe defend our religion, and commaund sacrifice to bee offered, which thou hast forbidden. Who doth not bewaile this vnexpected change, and lament our Citie? strangers and enemies correct thy impietie, and thou a Iew born & brought vp in our lawe, art more cruell then they. But consider Iohn, it is no shame to repent thy wickednes in extremitie: and at the last cast, if thou bee desirous to saue thy countrey, thou hast a good example of Iechonias, sometime king of the Iewes; who when the Babylonians warred against him, of his own accord, went out of the citie before it was taken, and willingly endured captiuitie with all his family and kinred onely, least hee should betray these holy places vnto his enemies, and behold the temple fired. And for this act of his, hee is of sacred memorie amongst the Iewes, and hath thereby gained immortall credit amongst all his posteritie. This is a good example, O Iohn, although danger be at hand: and I wil promise thee also pardon from the Romans, onely remember that I thy countreiman admonish thee, and promise this vnto the Iewes, behold who is the author & counsellor hereof. God forbid that euer I should solue a captiue, that I should not lue according to the lawes of our countrey. Yet againe art thou incensed against me, and exclaimest vpon me, and cursest me. But true it is, I deferue worse then this, who seeke to perswade contrary vnto the determination of Gods prouidence, and strue to saue them whom his sentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient prophets, & their prophecies, now hanging ouer this wretched city? For then it is foretold by them to be destroyed, when we murder our owne nation: and now not onely the citie, but also the temple is full of your dead bodies. Certainly it is God, God it is that together with the Romans, bringeth in fire to purge this citie filled with iniquitie.

Ioseph thus crying with teares and lamentations, hee could speake no more for sobbing: And the Romans compassionating his sorrow and affliction were astonished. But Iohn and his confederates were so much the more incited against the Romans, and sought to take Ioseph; yet his speech did moue many of the nobles; and diuers fearing the seditious watchmen, remained still where they were, making full account both of their owne destruction, and the subuersion of the Citie. Yet some there were, who, finding opportunitie, fled vnto the Romans: amongst whom were two priests, Ioseph and Iesus, and three sons of Imael the priest, who was beheaded at Cyren, and foure sonnes of Matthias the priest, and one of the other Matthias, who escaped vnto the Romans before his father was put to death by Simon Gora, with his three sons, as is before said: and many other nobles reuoluted with the priests, whom the Emperour receiued very courteously, & sent them into Gophna; knowing that it was a griefe for them to conuerse amongst people of diuers manners from them, and willed them to remaine there, and promised euery one of them great possessions, after the warres were ended. So they ioifully departed vnto the place appointed. But the seditious, for that they were not seene, reported vnto the people, that they who had fled vnto the Romanes were slaine, meaning hereby to terrifie the rest from flying to them: and this their deuicewhile preuailed, as their former did; and they that saue would, durst not now flie for feare. But afterward when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the wals with Ioseph, and shew themselves vnto the people; then many of the Iewes fled vnto the Romans. And after they had gathered themselves together, standing all before the Romans, they besought the seditious with teares, first to receiue the Romanes into the Citie, and saue their countrey: or if it pleased them not, at least to depart out of the Temple, and deliuer it vp vnto them. For the Romans durst not, except necessity vrged them thereto, fire the holy temple. But their malice against the Romans encreasing, and rayling against them that had fled vnto them, they planted all their engines to cast stones, darts and arrowes vpon the holy porches. So that all the void space about the temple was filled with dead bodies like a Sepulchre, and the temple it selfe resembled a castle, & they now with their weapons hauing their hands imbrued with the blood of their countreimen, presumed to enter into the Sanctuary where none ought to come, and they became so iniurious against their owne lawes, that looke what indignation the Iewes ought to haue conceived against the Romans if they had so prophaned the holy places, the same they caused the Romans to haue against them, for doing the like. For there was no one amongst the Roman souldiers, that did not with reuerence behold the temple, and adore it, and that did not hartily wish that the theewes would repent themselves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pitying the seditious once againe spake vnto Iohn and his adherents, saying: O ye impious people, haue not you inuironed the temple about with a cloister? haue not you your selues in Greeke and our language engraued in tables, forbidden all men to enter into those limits? did not we licence you to kil any man that should passe them, notwithstanding that he

A he were a Roman? Why then ye wicked wretches doe you tread vpon dead mens bodies within your temple? Or wherefore haue you polluted the Temple with the blood of strangers; and of your countreimen? I call my country gods to witnesse, & him who sometime dwelt in this place, if euer there were any (for now I am perswaded there is none) I call also my army to witnesse, & protest vnto the Iewes that are with me, and vnto your selues, that I will not compell you to violate these sacred things: but that if your armie will depart from this place, that then no Roman shall come into these holy places, nor commit any thing in contumely of them, but I will preferre the temple for you against your wills.

CHAP. V.

How the battaile was renewed, the Rampters being againe builded, and of the excursions of the Iewes.

Ioseph hauing deliuered these words of Titus vnto the Iewes, the seditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will but of feare, began to be more proud hereat. Then Titus seeing that they neither pitied themselves nor the temple, determined again to fight, though very loth so to doe; yet could hee not bring all his armie against them, the roome was so little. Wherefore out of euery hundred he made choise of thirtie of the strongest amongst them, and ouer euery thousand he appointed a Colonell, and made Cerealis their capitaine or Generall, commanding him at the ninth houre of the night, to assault the watchmen of the enemy. Altho he himselfe would haue gone downe with them armed; but his friends and the capitaines about him, foreseeing the great danger that he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming that he might doe more good sitting in Antonia, and encouraging the souldiers that fought, then if he himselfe should goe and indanger himselfe: for euery man being in the view of the Emperour, would fight more courageously. Titus herewith was perswaded, telling the souldiers that the onely cause he went not with them was this, that he staied behind to view and iudge euery ones valour and vertue, and to the intent that none behauing himselfe valiantly should goe away unrewarded, nor any coward escape unpunished, but that he himselfe would be a beholder of euery mans vertue, and a witnesse thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or punish.

Then he went vnto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence hee beheld what was done. But they whom Titus sent, did not find the watchmen asleepe, as they hoped, but with a cry assaulted the Romans that came against them: and at this noise they awaked their fellowes, who came in whole companies to assist them, and made excursions vpon their enemies. So the Romanes sustained the violence of their first companies: but the second that came fell vpon their owne fellowes, & vsed them like their enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noise there, neither could one see another by reason it was night: and moreover, some were blinded with furie, some with anger, some with feare: wherefore euery one strooke him that met him without any respect. And the Romanes receiued small damage thereby, because that they were defended with their shields, and remembred one anothers watch-word. But the Iewes fel on euery side, shewing themselves rash as well in excursions, as in their retiring; so that many times one of them rooke the other to be his enemy, euery one falling vpon him that retired, as though hee had been a Roman, assaulting them in the darke. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellowes then by their enemies, till day breaking euery one knew his companion; & each one keeping his rank, did then betake themselves to their darts & arrowes. Neither part gaue back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romans together & apart, did in the view of the Emperour shew their courage, euery man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaued himselfe valiantly. The Iewes fought stoutly, both for that they feared their owne imminent danger, if they were overcome, and the destruction of the temple: and Iohn standing by, encouraged them to fight, some with blowes, other sortie with threatnings. They fought most commonly with handle blowes; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either farre to flie, or any space to follow them that fledde. The Romanes in Antonia cried vnto their fellowes that fought the battaile, Now for hope of victorie: presently encouraging them to stand to it, when they began to giue backe; so it was as it had beene a theater of warre: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done; so at last in the fift houre of the day the fight ceased, hauing continued from the ninth houre of the night, neither partie forsaking the place where first they beganne battaile, neither any part hauing the victorie. Many Romanes there fought courageously, and amongst the Iewes these that follow: Iudas the sonne of Mertyn, Simon the sonne of Iosias, and Iacob and Simon Idumeans; this the son of Eathla; but Iames was the son of Desa: and all these were of Simons Simons company, and of Iohns followers Cyprianus and Alexas; & of the Zealous, Simon the son of Jairus. But the 7 day, the rest of the Romans pulling down the foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the army. And the legions comming vnto the wall, presently began to raise mounes, one against the corner of the inner temple, which was situate north & east: & another against the gallery on the north side between the two porches: & the other two, one against the porch of the west side of the outward temple; the other against the north porch. So with much toile and labour they finished this worke, fetching wood to build it withall a hundredth furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by trechery, not being wary by reason of their victory: & the Iewes despairing of themselves every houre more & more were encouraged. For many of the horsemen going either to get wood or hay, whilst they were about it, they tooke the bridles frō off their horse, & permitted them to feed till they had ended their busines; & presently the Iewes issuing out in troupes vpon them, rooke them away.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horses were stolen rather by their negligence, then their enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the seure punishment of one, to make others look better to their horses. And so he cōdemned to death one of the souldiers that had lost his horse: by whose punishment the rest of the souldiers being terrified, kept their horses better. For after that, when they went about any busines, they neuer left their horses in the pastures, but kept alwaies with them. Thus the Romanes assaulted the temple, and builded there mounes. The day following, certain of the seditious, who now could get no more booties in the citie, and now also beganne to taste of hunger, assaulted the Romanes that were placed towards mount Oliuet about the eleventh houre of the day: for they hoped to take them vnawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romanes vnderstanding their intent, came out of their places & resisted them who attempted violently to breake in vpon the ouer the wall: so that there was a hot fight, and many worthy deeds were done on either partie, the Romanes hauing both strength & knowledge in warlike affaires; the Iewes led with a desperate furie: and shame forced the Romanes to fight, and need compelled the Iewes: for the Romanes accounted it a shame not to ouercome the Iewes, who were as it were fallen into their hands; & the Iewes thought it the onely way to saue their owne liues, to breake downe the wall by force. And one of the horsemen called Pedanius, the Iewes being put to flight & driuen into the vally, pursued them with his horse as fast as hee could gallop, and ouertooke a young man one of his enemies, being of a heauie bodie, armed all ouer; & taking him about the ankle, hee caried him violently away: thereby shewing the strength of his arme and of the rest of his bodie; and his skilfull chiuallrie, and so brought the captiue vnto Cesar as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the captiue for hauing attempted to assault the wall, he now hastid to assault the temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch their mounes. In the meane time the Iewes beeing ill handled in the former wars, and war still increasing to the overthrow of the temple, they did, as the custome is in a purtified body, preuent the plague from going any further by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the porch that reached from the North vnto the East, ioyned vnto Antonia; which they firing, separated it twentie cubits from it, hauing now with their owne hands begunne to cast fire into the holy place. Two daies after, which was the 24 day of the aforesaid moneth, the Romanes set the porch on fire, and the fire hauing gone foureteene cubits, the Iewes pulled downe the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed workes, they pulled downe all adioyning vnto Antonia; vhen it was casie for them, and that they ought to haue hindered the fire. The porch beeing on fire, they permitted so much to be burned as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the Temple neuer ceased, many excursions were made one against each other.

About this time a certaine Iew of lowe stature, and to seeto a contemptible person, euerie way an abiect, both by reason of his base parentage and otherwise, named Jonathan, going to the monument of Iohn the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romanes to come and fight a single combat with him. The Romanes that beheld him diddaind him: yet some amongst them (as commonlie it is seene) were afraide of him: others vsifely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to die: for they that were desperate, neither fought aduisedly, nor had the feare of God before their eyes: and so that it was not a signe of valour, but of ouermuch hardinesse, to fight with such a one; whom though they ouercame, yet they could win no credit, but with infamie hazard themselves to be vanquished. So a long time none of the Romanes came against him, and he vpbraided them of cowardlinesse. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsemen named Pudens, diddaining his insolencie, and perhaps also for that

The yeare of the world, 4034. after Christs birth 72. Pudens fighting with Jonathan is slaine by him. Priscus the Centurion killeth Jonathan with an arrow.

A that he was of little stature, came against him; and fighting with him, fortune frowned vpon him, so that he was laught to scorne by his fellow: for he falling downe, Jonathan slew him; & setting his foote vpon the dead body, with his left hand hee flourished his shield, and with his right his bloudy sword, and striking his weapons one against another, he insulted ouer the Roman army, and ouer the dead body, vpbraiding the Romans, so long till Priscus a Centurion, as he was thus vaunting, shot him through with an arrow, & so he fell down dead vpon the body of his enemy: at which deed, both the Romanes and the Iewes raised a confused cry or noyle. So Jonathan here shewed how quickly reuenge pursued the felicitie of warlike victorie, falling out contrarie to all reason.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romanes through the deceit of the Iewes were consumed with fire, and of one Artorius.

THe seditious that kept the Temple, did now every day openly in fight resist the Romanes that kept the mounes, and the seuen and twentieth day they deuised this stratagem; They filled the void part of the East porch of the temple with drie wood and brimstone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to resist. Wherefore many of the Romanes rashly pursued the Iewes that fled, & with ladders got into the galleries. But the wiser sort considering that the Iewes had no iust occasion to fly, kept their place. The porch being now full of Romanes that were got vp into it, the Iewes gaue fire to the wood and brimstone, and vpon a sodaine all the porch was compassed with the flame: so that the Romanes who were out of danger were hereat amazed, and those that were amidst the flames became desperate; & inuironed with the flames some sought to runne backe into the towne, other some vnto the enemies; others killed themselves, so preuenting the fury of the fire; and presently the flame ouertooke those that sought to flie. Cesar, though offended at the souldiers for hauing ascended into the porch vnbidden, yet seeing them die so woefully in the flames, hee compassionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poore souldiers dying amongst the flames were hereat comforted, in that they perceiued him to be sorrowfull for them, for whom they had lost their liues.

D For they beheld him crying to their fellowes to helpe to extinguish the fire, and hee himselfe laboured what he could to do it; so that euery one esteemed his sorrow and lamentation for them as much as a sumptuous funerall: but some escaped the fire and gotte into the largest part of the porch; yet inuironed round about with Iewes, hauing long resisted, though with many wounds, yet in the end they were all slaine.

A last a yong man named Longus, was an honour to all this misery, and notwithstanding that euery one that there perished desired particularly to be remembred, yet he shewed himselfe the most valiant of them all. The Iewes were desirous to kill this man for that he was strong, & willed him to come downe vnto them, swearing vnto him to spare him. But his brother Cornelius, who stood on the other side, intreated him not to discredite his owne honour and the Romanes, whom he obeyed: and he lifting vp his sword on high, that either part might see, slew himselfe. Yet one Artorius from amidst the fire escaped by this deuise: hee called vnto him one Lucius his fellow soldier and chamber fellow; I will (quoth he) make thee heire of all my inheritance if thou wilt catch me in thy armes. Lucius willingly endeauiouring to doe it, Artorius cast himselfe down vpon him, and so escaped with his life, but Lucius vpon whom he fell was brused against the pavement, and so died. This calamitie awhile did greatly grieue the Romanes, yet it made them more warie afterward, and acquainted them with the Iewes subtilties, whereof before beeing ignorant, they sustained great damage; so the porch was burnt vnto the tower which Iohn built, during his wars against Simon: and the Iewes, after the Romanes that were ascended into it were consumed, pulled downe the rest. The next day the Romanes fired the North porch, euen vnto the foresaid East porch, which contained the corners of the wall builded ouer the valley Cedron, so that it was terrible to behold the valley from thence, by reason of the depth.

Such were the affaires about the temple, but an infinite multitude perished within the ci-tie through famine, so that they could not be numbered: for in euerie place where anie shew or signe of fooode was, presently arose a battell and the dearest friends of all floufought one with another, to take the fooode from other poore soules, neither did they beleue them that were now a dying for famine, but the theues searched them, whom they saw yeelding vp the ghost, thinking that they dying for famine, had hid about them some fooode: but they were deceiued of their hope, beeing like mad dogges, greedie of meate, and fell against the doores like drunken men, searching the selfe same houses twice or thrise together in desperation, and for very penury they ate whatsoeuer they light vpon, gathering such things to eat, as the most filthy liuing creatures in the world would haue loathed. In brieft, they did eat their girdles and shooes, and the skins that couered their shields, so that a little of olde hay was solde, for foure Attiques. But what need is it to shew the sharpnes of this famine by things that want life? I will recount an act neuer heard of, neither amongst the Greekes, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to bee reheard, and incredible, so that I would willingly omit this calamitie, least posteritie should thinke I lie, had not I many witnesses hereof, and perhaps should incur reprehension, not fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead.

CHAP. VIII.

Of a woman that for famine killed her sonne, and dressed him for meate.

Certaine woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Iordan, the daughter of Elezar of the towne of Vitezokia, which signifieth the house of Myhope, descended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the rest vnto Ierusalem, was there with them besieged, her other goods the tyrants had taken from her, which shee had brought from beyond the riuer into the Citie: and whatsoeuer being hid, escaped their hands, the theues daily came into her house and tooke it away: whereat the woman greatly moued, curst them, and with hard speeches animated them the more against her, yet no man either for anger, or compalsion would kil her, but suffered her to liue to get them meate: but now could she get no more, and famine inuaded her, with rage and anger more then danger. Wherefore by rage and necessitie shee was compelled to doe that which nature abhorred, and taking her sonne vnto whom she then gaue sucke, O miserable child (quoth she) in warre, famine, and sedition, for which of these shall I keep thee? If thou continue amongst the Romans, thou shalt be made a slaue, yet famine will preuent bondage; or else sedition worse then them both. Be therefore meate for me, a terror vnto the seditious, a tragi-call storie to be spoken of by posteritie, & that which is only yet vnheard of amongst the calamities of the Iewes. Hauing thus spoken shee slew her sonne, and did seeth the one halfe of him, and ate it, the rest shee reserued couered. Presently came the seditious, smelling the sent of that exce-crable meate, threatening presently to kill her, except shee forthwith brought some of that vnto them which she had prepared. Then she answered that shee had reserued a good portion thereof for them, and presently vncouered that part of her sonne which shee had left vneaten, at which sight they trembled, & a horror fell vpon them. But the woman said, This is truly my sonne, and my doing, eat you of it, for I my selfe haue eaten thereof. Be not more effeminate then a woman, not more mercifull then a mother. If religion make you refuse this my sacrifice, I haue already eaten of it and will eat the rest. Then the seditious departed herat onely trembling, and scarcely permitting this meate to the mother. Presently the report of this hainous crime was bruted all about the citie, & euery man hauing before his cies this execrable fact, trembled as though himselfe had done it. And now all that were vexed with this famine, hastned their own deatnes, and hee was accounted happy that died before he felt this famine. This vnnatural fact was soon after recounted vnto the Romans, and some of them would not beleue it, others pitied them within the citie, and many herat encreased their hatred towards that nation.

tie, hauing with their owne hands begunne to set on fire the temple, which hee had preferred for them, and that therefore such like meate was fit for them, and that hee would bury this abhominable crime of eating their own children in the ruines of their countrey, and that he would not in any part of the world suffer the sunne to shine vpon such a citie, wherein mothers did eate their owne children, and that such fooode did more beleeue fathers then mothers, who for all their miseries would not yet cease from armes. Hauing thus spoken he considered the desperation of the enemies, and that they would not recall themselues, who had already endured all such calamities, which might if it had been possible haue altdred their opinions rather then haue endured them.

CHAP. IX.

How the wall was taken, and the temple burnt.

The eight day of August, two of the Romane legions hauing finished their mounts, they began to place their rammes against the East galleries without the temple, hauing fixe daies together without intermission already beaten the wall with their strongest rams, and nothing preuailed, the stones beeing so strong, that the rams could not mooue them: others of the Romans laboured to dig vp the foundations of the porch, that was on the North side; & after much toile, they onely could pull away the outward stones, and the inner stones did still support the porch. At last the Romanes seeing themselues not preuaile by their iaulines and other instruments, they set ladders to ascend into the galleries. The Iewes did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting vp, but when they were within the galleries, then they came and fought with them, and cast some of them downe headlong, forcing them to retire; others they slew that stood in it; and others that were vpon the ladders going downe before they could defend themselues with their shields, were with swords stricken downe, and they also thrust downe some ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great massacre of the Romanes, some fighting for their enignes, which the Iewes had taken from them, esteeming the losse thereof a great shame vnto them. At last the Iewes got their ancients, & slew them, that came vp to rescue them, and the rest terrified with their deaths that were slaine went downe againe, and no one of the Romans died, who before he was slaine did not some valiant act; and those seditious people that in the former battels did shew themselues valiant, did now also fight valiantly, & beside them Eleazar sonne vnto the tyrant the brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiving that he spared the temple of the Iewes to his losse, and to the death of his souldiers, he commanded fire to be put vnto the temple gates: presently Ananus of Emmaus the most cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the son of Magadatus, fled vnto Titus, who for their cruelties committed, determined to put them to death: yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forsaken the Iewes when they had gotten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of goodwill, but for necessitie, & that they did not deserue to liue forsaking their countrey now set on fire for their offences: yet his promise bridled his wrath, and hee dismissed them, but they were not so much esteemed as the rest. The Roman souldiers did now put fire vnto the temple doores: and the siluer plate wherewith they were couered being molten, the flame quickly fiered the wood, and encreasing rooke hold presently on the next porch. The Iewes seeing themselues inuironed with flames, were now altogether discouraged, and their strength failed them, and beeing amazed no man fought to extinguish the flame, and so they stood still beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was set on fire, more then desiring to saue the rest: and so that day and all the next night the fire en-creased, for the porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The next day Titus caused part of his army to quench the fire: and calling vnto him his captaines, and six that were the chiefest amongst them, to wit, Tiberias Alexander Generall of the whole army, Sexsus Cerealis commander of the sixth legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, with whom was also Aeternius Fronto commander of the two legions that came from Alexandria, & Marcus Antonius Iulianus Gouernour of Iudæa, and with them the colonels and captaines, hee deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the temple. Some counfelled to vse the custome of warres, for that the Iewes would neuer liue peaceably their temple standing; all their nation wheresoeuer liuing assembling themselves thither at certaine times. Others perswaded Titus that if so be the Iewes yeelded their temple, and fought not for it, then to saue it: but if they fought for it, to burne it: for now it seemed a castle and not a temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it should not be imputed to the Romanes or to their general, but to the Iewes who constrained them to do it; & he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed that although the Iewes fought for their temple being men without conscience, yet it should not be destroyed: for he would not so be reuenged of their iniquities: neither would he euer fire so goodly a building, for so it would redound vnto the losse of the Romanes; as also it would be a credit vnto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, & Cerealis, perceiuing Cæsars minde were of his opinion, and so he dismissed the conuocation, and commaunded the souldiers and captaines to rest, that they might be more able to fight when neede required: and presently hee appointed certaine chosen men to make the waies euen, and easie for the armie to passe by the ruines, commaunding them to quench the fire; and that day the Iewes being fearefull and wearie did make no resistance. The daie following taking heart and assembled together, they assaulted the watchmen that kept without the Temple, the second houre of the day. The Romanes valiantly resisted their first assault, so defending themselves with their shields as though they had a wall before them; yet sure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number then their enemies, and not so desperate as they were. Then Cæsar before his men retired (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certaine chosen horsemen came to succour them: whose force the Iewes not sustaining, but the first of them being slaine, the rest fled: and the Romanes departing, they returned, and fought against them; and when the Romans returned againe, presently they fled, till about the fift houre of the day the Iewes were forced to betake themselves into the temple, and there they were shut vp. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purposing the next day to assault them with all his armie, and winne the temple. But the sentence of God had already determined, that it should be consumed with fire: and now the fatall day was come after many yeeres, which was the tenth of August: vpon which day also the king of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now first set a fire by our owne conntimen, who were indeede the cause thereof. For the seditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then againe they assaulted the Romanes, and so fought with the guard that were without the temple, labouring to extinguish the flame; who putting the Iewes to flight, came vnto the temple.

CHAP. X.

How the temple was burnt, against the will of Titus.

WHen a certaine souldier, who expected no commaund, nor feared to doe so execrable a fact, being moued with some diuine fury, & lifted vp by his fellow, tooke in his hand a flaming firebrand, and cast it into the golden gate which entred into the routes on the North part of the temple, and the flame presently arose: which caused a great crie amongst the Iewes, expressing their calamitie, and euery one hastened to extinguish the fire; now neither accounting of their liues nor forces, hauing lost that for which they fought. News hereof was presently brought vnto Titus by one who came from the fight, who then was resting in his tabernacle, and he presently arose and ran vnto the temple to hinder the fire, and all the captaines after him; whereat the souldiers being terrified followed, and there arose a great cry and tumult in that army being vnordered. Cæsar both with voice and hand made a signe vnto the souldiers, that were fighting to quench the fire. But they did not heare him; there was so great a noise, neither did they perceiue the signe hee had made vnto them with his hand, because that some were distracted with fight, others with anger: & the souldiers issued in, nor restrained either by commaunds or threatnings, but euery one went whither furie carried him; and thronging together at the entrance, many pressed one another to death; and many being amongst the fierie ruines of the galleries perished as miserably as those that were overcome. When they came vnto the temple euery one counterfeited himselfe not to heare Cæsars commaund, and so exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The seditious now had no hope to withstand them, but either fled or were slaine; and many vnarmed & vnable people wherefoeuer they were found, were slaine: so that about the altar was an innumerable company of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the temple staires: & their bodies that there

A were slaine roused down, Cæsar seeing he could not restrain the fury of the madbraine souldiers, and that the fire encreased, entred into the temple with his nobles, & beheld all the holy things there, and whatsoeuer else was there, farre surpassing all report which straungers had giuen of it, and equall to that report which the Iewes made of it. And the flame not hauing yet pierced into the inner part of the temple, nor yet consumed the houses and rooms about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preferred: wherefore himselfe came & intreated the souldiers to extinguish the fire: commaunding Liberalis the Centurion of his guard to beate those with a truncheon that would not be obedient, and drue them away. But their furie and the rage of warre, and the hatred they bare against the Iewes, ouercame in them all Cæsars commaunds, and feare of them that forbade them. Many were incited so to doe hoping of some bootie, thinking that all the temple within was full of money, because they saw the gates of golde. Moreover a certaine souldier, when Cæsar sought to quench the flame, fired the poastes about the doores: and presently the flame appearing within, Cæsar and the Captaines departed, and to euery one stood looking vpon it, and no man sought to extinguish it. Thus the temple was burnt against Titus his will. And although euery man will iudge it a lamentable case, in such a building surpassing all that euer was seene or heard of, both in greatness, workmanship, costliness and plenty of all things; in this yet we may comfort ourselves, in that the destinies had so determined. For neither liuing creatures, nor places, nor buildings can auoide their destinie. One may also admire the exact and iust reuolution of time: for it was now destroyed in the same moneth, and on the same day that the Babylonians first destroyed it: and from that time that Salomon began the first temple vnto the destruction of the second temple, which hapned the second yeere of Vespasians raigne, were a thousand, a hundreth and thirtie yeeres, seuen moneths, and fifteene daies: and from the building of the latter temple which Aggeus built in the second yeere of the raigne of King Cyrus, vnto the destruction thereof now in Vespasians raigne, were sixe hundreth thirtie nine yeeres and siue and forrie daies.

Of the Priests: the treasure house: and the porch.

WHen the temple was thus consumed with fire, whatsoeuer the souldiers found therein they caried away, and put all to the sword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they shew any pitie to olde age, or infants: but olde, young, priests, and common people all were slaine without respect, and all sorts of people tasted the calamitie of warre, whether they resisted, or intreated mercie. And now the flame encreased, which grieved euen them that were yeelding vp the ghost: and by reason of the height of the hill, and the building together, one would haue thought the whole Citie had bene on fire. Then a most lamentable crie was raised betweene the Roman legions, and the seditious now enuironed with fire and sword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the Citie, and had fled vnto the Romanes, lamenting their calamitie; and they of the Citie answered the teares and cries of them in the hill, and many whole eies death by famine had already closed, tooke strength awhile to bewaile the Temple, which they now opening their eies beheld on fire. The country beyond Iordan, and the mountaines about did eccho with their lamentations: and yet the calamitie surpassed that tumult. For one would haue iudged the hill whereon the temple was situate, to haue bene burnt vp by the rootes, it was so full of fire: Yet the multitude of bloud there shed surpassed the fire. Many that were slaine were covered with them that slew them, and all the ground was overspread with dead bodies, so that the souldiers ranne vpon the dead bodies to pursue them that fled. At last the theemes hauing driuen the Romanes without the temple, they ranne into the citie; and the rest of the people that were left, fled into the outward porch. And many of the priests first vied spits, & then their teares made of lead, in stead of darts against the Romans; at last nothing at all preuailing, and the fire falling vpon them, they went vnto a wall eight cubits broad, and there staid. Yet two of the nobles, when they might either haue fled vnto the Romans, and there haue bene saued, or else haue endured like fortune with the rest, they notwithstanding cast themselves into the fire, and so were burnt with the temple: one of them was named Meierus the sonne of Belga, the other Ioseph the sonne of Dalens.

IOSEPHVS, OF THE WARRES

Size thousand in the porch consumed by fire.

False prophets suborned by the seditious.

The Romans thought it in vaine to spare the buildings about the temple, seeing the Temple was alreadie consumed, and so set fire on them all, the porches, galleries and gates; two onely excepted, one on the East side, and the other on the South side, both which afterward they raised vnto the ground: they burnt also certain chests called Gazophylacia, or money boxes, wherein was great store of coine, and rich garments, and other precious things, and indeed all the Jewes treasure, for the richest of the Citie had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the porch that was left standing, many men, women and children to the number of six thousand. And before Caesar and the capitaines did determine any thing what should be done with them, the furious souldiers fired the porch wherein they were, and so they all perished in the flames; saue a few, that leaping downe to auoide the fire, were slaine in the fall, so that no one escaped of all that multitude. A certaine false prophet was cause of all their deaths, who the same day preached in the Citie, and commanded them to goe into the temple, and behold signes of their deliuerance: for many false Prophets were then suborned by the tyrants, to periwade them to expect Gods helpe, thereby to hinder them from flying vnto the Romanes, and to cause the souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their citie. Men easily beleue and are credulous in aduersitie, so that if any deceitfull person promise deliuerance out of calamitie, he that suffereth miserie is full of hope thereof.

Of the straunge signes and tokens that appeared before the destruction of Ierusalem.

The blindness of the people. The first prodigie. A comet like vnto a sword. The second prodigie was that a bright light shined about the altar and temple by night. The third prodigie was a cow that brought forth a lambe in the midst of the temple. The fourth the brazen gate of the temple opened it selfe.

The fif, armed chariots and men seene in the ayre. The sixt a voice in the inward temple. The seauenth prodigie Iesus a countrymans crye and death.

THese miserable people were thus easily perswaded by impostors who did belie God, yet would they not beleue, nor giue any care or regard vnto certain tokens, & signes of the ruine of their city: but as it were blinded, neither hauing eyes nor soules, they counterfai-Themselfes not to see what God foreshewed them. One while there was a comet in forme of a fire sword, which for a yeere together did hang ouer the city: another time before the first reuolt and warre, the people beeing gathered together to the feast of vnleavened bread (which was the eight day of Aprill) the ninth houre of the night, there was so much light about the altar and temple, as though it had been bright day, which remained halfe an hower: this the ignorant people interpreted as a good signe, but they that were skilfull in holy scripture, did presently iudge, what would ensue before it came to passe. The same festiuitie a cow led to be sacrificed at the altar brought forth a lambe in the midst of the temple: and the inner gate of the Temple on the east side being of massiue brasle, which at night time had alwaies at least twenty men to shut it, and was bound with locks of yron, and was barred with bars, the ends whereof went into mortise holes in the stones on either side the dore (the foresaid stones being on each side, one whole stone) was seene at the first houre of the night to open of his owne accord: which being presently related vnto the Magistrate by the keepers of the Temple, he himselfe came thither and could scarcely shut it, & this also to the ignorant seemed a good signe, affirming that God opened vnto them the gate of his blessings: but the wiser sort iudged that the defence of the temple would decay of his owne accord, and that the opening of the gate foretold, that it should be giuen to the enemies, affirming one vnto another that this signe signified desolation. A little while after the feast daies, on the one and twentieth day of May there was seene a vision beyond all beleefe, and perhaps that which I am to recount might seeme a fable, if some were not now alieue that beheld it, and that calamitie worthy to be so foretold ensued: for before the sunne set, were seene in the ayre yron chariots all ouer the country, and an armie in battell aray passing along in the clouds, and beginning the citie. And vpon the feast day called Pentecost, at night the Priests going into the inner temple to offer their wonted sacrifice, at first they felt the place to moue & tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which said, Let vs depart hence. And that which was most wonderfull of all, one Iesus the son of Ananus a country man of the common people, foure yeeres before the wars began, when the Citie flourished in peace and riches, comming to the celebration of the feast to Ierusalem, which we call the feast of Tabernacles, sodainly began to crie out thus; A voice from the East: A voice from the West: A voice from the foure winds: A voice against Ierusalem and the Temple: A voice against men and women newly married: A voice against all this people: and thus crying night and daie, hee went about all the streets of the city.

Some

OF THE IEWES. THE VII. BOOKE.

A Some of the nobilitie disdaining misfortune, tooke him & scourged him with many stripes: but he neither secretly speaking for himselfe, nor vnto those that did beate him, persevered crying as before. The Magistrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man spake this through some diuine motion, led him vnto the Generall of the Romans, where beeing beaten till his boones appeared, he neuer intreated nor wept, but as well as hee could, framing a weeping voice, hee cried Woe, woe vnto Ierusalem. Albinus (beeing then Iudge) asked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he said so, but he made him no answer. Yet he ceased not to bewaile the miserie of Ierusalem, vntill Albinus thinking him to be out of his wits, suffered him to depart. This man euen vntill the time of warre neuer went to any Citizen, nor was seene speake to any one: but still as it were studying of some speech, hee cried Woe, woe vnto Ierusalem. Neither did he euer curse any one, though euery day one or other did beate him, nor thanke any one that offered him meat. All that he spake vnto any man was this haueie prophecie. He went crying as is aforesaid, chiefly vpon holy daies, so doing continually for the space of seauen yeeres and five moneths, his voice neuer waxing hoarse nor wearie, till in the time of the siege, beholding that which hee foretold them, he ceased, and then once againe vpon the walls going about the citie, with a loud voice he cried; Woe, woe vnto the Citie, Temple and people: and lastly he said, Woe also vnto my selfe. Which words were no sooner vttered, but a stone shot from out an engine smote him, and so he yielded vp the ghost, lamenting them all.

Ietus for seauen yeeres space & five moneths cried about the citie. A stone shot from an engine killeth Ietus.

If any one doe diligently consider all these, he shall find that God hath a care of mankind, and doth euery way fore-shew betime, what is most expedient for them, and they through their own madnesse, to haue voluntarily perished in their wickednesse. For the Jewes when the Castle Antonia was taken, made the Temple foure square: notwithstanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the Citie & Temple should be taken, when the Temple was made foure square. But that which chiefly incited them to war, was the doubtfull prophecie like a life found in the holy Scriptures: That at the same time, one in their dominions should be Monarch of the whole world; and many wifemen were deceived in this interpretation, making account that he should be one of their owne nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Vespasians Empire. But men cannot present destinie, though they foresee it. Thus the Jewes interpreted some of the signes as they pleased, and at others they laughed, till by the ruine of their country, & their owne wofull overthrow, their iniquitie appeared.

The Iewes in the morning began to their owne goods, but in the evening they sawe the cause of their own calamity.

CHAP. XIII.

How Titus was made Emperour: and of the death of the Priests.

AFTER the seditious were fled into the Citie, all the Temple and places thereabout beeing set on fire, the Romanes placed their Ensignes in the Temple ouer against the East gate: and there celebrating sacrifice, with great cries declared Titus Emperour, and the Romanes got such preyes and booties, that they sold gold in Syria for halfe the valew. And amongst those Priests that kept on the wall, a child being thirstie, desired peace of the Roman watchmen, saying, that he was thirstie. So they pitying both his yeeres and his need, gaue him their hands that he should haue no harme, and then he came downe and drunke, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, hee ranne vp againe to his fellowes, and none of the watchmen were able to ouertake him and they vbraided him with falsehood. But he answered, that he had done nothing, but that which hee and they intended: for they did not giue him their hands to secure him to remaine with them, but onely to come downe and take water, which hee had done. The Romane watchmen greatly admired the subtiltie of him that was but a child. The fifth day, the Priests beeing almost famished came downe, and the watchmen caried them to Titus, who they besought to grant them their liues: But hee answered them, that the time of pardon was past, seeing that was destroyed, for the which he might haue pardoned them, and that it was meet that the priests should perish with the Temple: and so he commanded them to be put to death. Then the tyrants with their followers being on euery side beset with wars, and having no way to flie, they beeing thus beleaguerd round, requested to parley with Titus, who for his naturall meeknesse, his friends also perswading him thereto, thought at least to saue the Citie (iudging indeed that now the seditious had altered their minds) and so he stood in the west part of the inner Temple: for there was a gate built about a gallerie, and a bridge that ioyned the Temple

The yeere of the world, 4034. after Christs birth, 72. Titus oration to the Iewes by an interpreter.

The Romans humaneitie incited the Iewes against them.

Temple and Citie together, which was then between Titus and the Tyrants. Many souldiers on both parts flocked about their rulers; the Iewes about Simon and John, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, desirous what he would say vnto them: and Titus by an Edict commaunding the souldiers to be quiet, and to shoote no arrowes, spake vnto them first by an Interpreter, thereby shewing that he had the vpper hand, and said, O yee men of Ierusalem, are yee not now grieved with the calamities of your country? Neither calling to mind our power, nor your own infirmities, but with a rash furie haue destroyed your people, citie and temple: your selues also haueing iustly deserved to perish, who since Pompey first conquered you, haue neuer ceased to be sedicious, and at last haue openly borne armes against the Romans. Did you trust vnto your multitude? You haue seene that a small parcell of the Romans army hath sufficiently resisted you. Did you expect forraigne aide? What nation is not vnder our dominion? and who would rather make choice of the Iewes then of the Romans? Did you trust in your strength of body? Why, you know that the Germans serue vs. Or in the strength of your wals? what wal, or what greater hinderance then the Ocean, wherwith the Britaines inuironed, haue yeelded vnto the Romane forces? Or to your courage, & politike counsell of your capitaines? You haue already heard that the Carthaginians haue bene by vs surpris'd. It was therefore the Romanes humaneitie that incited you against them selues, who first of all permitted you to possesse your country, and gaue you Kings of your owne nation: and after all this, we kept your lawes inuiolate, and suffered you to liue as your selues desired, not onely in your owne countrey, but also amongst other nations; & which is the greatest of all our benefites bestowed vpon you, wee permitted you to gather tribute and gifts, to the maintenance of your Temple and sacrifices to GOD; of all which wee neither forbade any to be brought vnto you, neither hindered any that would offer vnto your Temple, but suffered you our enemies, to be made more rich then our selues, so that you haue used our own money against vs. Wherefore, haueing receiued so many benefites at our hands, you haue now disgorged your selues vpon vs, and like spightfull Serpents, spet your poyson vpon them that made much of you. Let vs omit that by Alexander his negligence you became forgetfull of your dutie, and like some member in the bodie broken or shrunk, you being still tumultuous, at last were taken in a greater offence, and were encouraged with immoderate desires to hope for vnlawfull liberty. My father came into your country, not to punish you for your misdemeanors toward Cestius, but by good counsell and warning to reprehensive and quier you. And whereas if hee had come to destroy your nation, hee ought first to haue cut downe the very roote, and to haue come vnto this citie and destroyed it, with the inhabitants: hee rather chose first to waste Galilea, and the places adioyning, that in the meane time you might repent you, and consider of your estate. But this his mercie towards you was held for cowardlinesse and infirmities in him, and by our long suffering, you were emboldned against vs: and when Alexander was dead, you did as treacherous subiects are wont to doe, taking occasion by our ciuill dissension, to reuolt from vs: and whilst my father & I were gone into Egypt, you prepared your selues to war against vs; neither were you ashamed to trouble them that were designed Princes, whom notwithstanding you had found most gentle captaines vnto you. At last, when the Empire fell vnto vs, and all things beeing now quieted, all nations with gifts & presents came to congratulate vs: Behold againe, the Iewes shewed themselves our enemies, and you sent an Embassadour beyond Euphrates, onely to nourish your rebellion, walling and fortifying your towns anew; and contending like sedicious and tyrants one with another, for abroache ciuill warres: all which none but impious people would haue committed. Wherefore beeing commaunded by my father, who was now vrged thereunto, I came against this Citie with a heauie charge; yet did I reioyce when I heard that the people desired peace. Before I warred against you, I exhorted you to peace: after war was begun, I desired awhile from vsing seueritie: I spared all them that of their own accord fled vnto mee, and kept my promise vnto them, pittying those that were captiues. I with strokes restrained them that hastened the war against you against my will; and euen forced so to do, I set the Romans against your wals, and alwaies restrained my souldiers so much desirous of your blood. How often did I ouercome you, so often did I exhort you to peace, as though I had bene vanquished. Againe; when I approached vnto the Temple, I willingly omitting the law of armes, requested you to spare your temple and holy things, offering you leaue to depart, and promising you safetie, or else I gaue you leaue to fight another time in another place, if so you thought good. All these my offers you refused, & with your owne hands fired your temple. And now you wicked wretches vrge me to a parly. What thing can you now preferre so excellent, as that which is already perished? What pardon can you Titus granteth the Iewes liue, on condition they should lay aside their weapons and submit themselves.

The souldiers set the citie on fire.

Cesar constant in his resolution.

A you expect, seeing your temple is destroyed? nay, euen now you stand armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission in the last cast. O wretches with what hope? Is not your people dead, is not your temple destroyed, and your citie now in my hands, yea your liues also? But doe you thinke death the renoune of fortitude? I will not strue with your obstinacie: yet if you will cast downe your weapons, and yeeld your bodies, I will spare your liues: And like as in a priuate house I will shew my selfe vnto you a gentle master; and after I haue punished that which otherwise is incurable, I will reserue the rest for my selfe.

To this they answered, that they could not receiue pardon at his hands, haueing vowed the contrary: wherefore they requested licence to depart with their wiues & children by the campe, which he had enuironed with a wall, and so to goe into the wilderness, and leaue the Citie vnto the Romans. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner captiues, should impose vpon him conditions, as though they were victors; and commaunded a crier to tell them, that henceforth they should not flie vnto him; nor hope that hee would pardon them: for hee would spare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight & saue themselves as they could, for he would now in all things vse the law of armes: and so he permitted the souldiers to sack the Citie, and set it on fire. And that day they did nothing: but the next day following, they fired the councill-house, the palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came vnto Queene Helens palace, which was situate in the midst of Acra: also the houses and streetes of the Citie full of dead bodies were set on fire. The same day, the sonnes and brethren of king Alexander, and with them many nobles of the people, assembled together, besought Cesar to pardon them: and he though incited against them all; yet not changing his manner, receiued them to mercie, and put them all in prison, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for hostages, that were the kings sonnes and kinsmen.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the prey of the sedicious, and how the inner part of the Citie was fired.

D He sedicious went vnto the kings palace, where many had left all their wealth, because it was a strong place; and driuing the Romans from thence, they slew all the people there assembled, amounting to the number of eight thousand and foure hundred, & carried away all the money, and they tooke there two Romane souldiers aliue, one a horseman, and another a footman; and they slew the footman, and drew him all along the citie, as it were in the body of that one, reuenging themselves vpon all the Romans. But the horseman affirmed that hee had something to say vnto them, which would greatly profit them, and saue their liues: who was caried vnto Simon; and not haueing there any thing to say, Simon deliuered him to one of his captaines called Ardala to be slaine, and hee brought him where the Romans might behold him with his hands bound behind him, and a veile before his eyes, meaning there to behead him: but he whilst the Iew drew out his sword, fledde vnto the Romans. And Titus would not put him to death, because hee had escaped from the enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Romane souldier, who suffered himselfe to be taken aliue, he tooke from him his armes, and discharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wise man was worle then death. The next day the Romans putting the sedicious to flight that were in the lower citie, they fired all vnto Siloua, reioycing that the towne was destroyed: yet they got no booties, because the sedicious had already robbed and spoiled all, and caried it into the higher citie. For they nothing repented them of their wickednesse, but were as arrogant, as though they had bene in prosperitie: so that they with ioy beheld the citie on fire, affirming that they desired death; for that the people beeing slaine, the temple destroyed, and the citie on fire, they should leaue nothing vnto their enemies. Yet Ioseph in that extremitie laboured to saue the reliques of the citie, much inuighing against their crueltie, & earnestly exhorting them to saue themselves: yet hee nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labour: for neither would they yeeld vnto the Romans for their oaths sake, neither were they able to fight with the Romans, beeing now as it were besieged round by them; yet their accustomed murders did encourage them to stand out.

Thus dispersed all ouer the Citie, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for those that sought to flie vnto the Romans, and many of them were taken, and all of them were slaine; for famine had so weakened them, that they could not flie, & they cast their dead bodies vnto dogs. And any death death were eaſie in reſpect of famine. So that many fled vnto the Romans, hauing no promiſe, no G nor hope to be pardoned by them, and vpon purpoſe fell into the hands of the ſeditious, who neuer ceaſed from murder: and now there was no place in the whole citie void, but was filled with dead bodies, who either periſhed by famine or ſedition. But the tyrants and factious thieues put their laſt refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatſoeuer hapned to ſaue themſelues, hoping that there they could not be found, and ſo after the citie was deſtroied, to eſcape, which was one-ly their vaine fantaſie. For they could neither be hid from God nor the Romans: yet at that time they truſted in thoſe caues, from whence they fired the citie more then the Romans, and cruelly murdered them that hauing eſcaped the flames, came and fled into ſecret places, & ſpoiled them: alſo if they in any place found any meate, though all bloudie, yet they tooke it, and did eate it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the ſpoile they gotte. And I verily perſwade H my ſelfe, that had they not been prevented by the deſtruction of the citie, their crueltie vould haue been ſuch, that they would haue eaten the bodies of dead men.

CHAP. XV.

How the higher part of the Citie was aſſaulted: and how many Iewes fled vnto Titus.

Cæſar, perceiuing that the higher part of the Citie would not be won without mounts, I being ſituate in a ſoile, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentith day of Auguſt he let all his ſouldiers on worke, and the carrying of wood for that purpoſe was very painefull: all trees within a hundredth furlongs off the citie were already cut downe, and vſed in the former worke as is before ſaid. So the ſoure legions raiſed a mount on the weſt ſide of the Citie, and all the reſt made a mount againſt the porch, bridge and tower, which Simon during his warres with Iſſa had built. About this time, the capitaines of the Idumæans aſ-ſembling together, deliberated to yeeld themſelues, and ſent ſiue of their company vnto Titus, beſeeching him to confirme a peace vnto them: and he hoping that the tyrant would yeeld after them, who were the greateſt part of his army, with much adoe granted them life, & ſo ſent them vnto their fellowes: but Simon had notice of their departure, and preſently ſlew thoſe ſiue that were ſent vnto Titus, & taking the captiues (the nobleſt of whom was Iames the ſonne of Joſa) K he put them in priſon, and alſo kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now hauing no gouernours, knew not what to doe, yet the guard could not hinder them from flying: for although manie of them were killed, yet diuerſe fled and eſcaped, and all were receiued by the Romans. Titus curte-ſie beeing ſuch, as that he remembred not his former ediſt to the contrarie, and now the ſouldi-ers hoping for gaine, and hauing already gotten ſufficient, abſtained from murders: for leauing onely the common people, they ſold the reſt with their wiues and children for a ſmall price, many beeing expoſed to ſale, and few comming to buy them: ſo that hee hauing made an edict that none ſhould flie vnto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet he now receiued them alſo, appointing ſome to enquire who had deſerued puniſhment, & to inſiſt it on them. And an infinite number was ſold, & more then fortie thouſands of the people were ſaued, L whom the Emperour diſmiſſed and permitted to goe whither they pleaſed. The ſame time a certaine Prieſt the ſonne of Thebathus, named Ieſus, was promiſed pardon vpon condition that hee ſhould deliuer certaine holy things giuen vnto the Temple, and ſo he came and brought out of a wall two candleſticks, like vnto them that were in the temple, tables, goblets, cups, all made of ſolide and maſſiue gold: alſo, the veile and the ornaments of the prieſts, and the precious ſtones about them, and many veſſels made for ſacrifice. Moreover, the keeper of the holy treaſure, called Phineas, brought forth the garments, and all things that did belong vnto the prieſts, & much purple and ſcarlet, which were laid vp in ſtore to make tapeſtry or hangings, amongſt which alſo was ſome Cinamon, Caſſia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded ſweet odors to be offered to God. He alſo deliuered him much wealth of other mens, and much ſacred treaſure: for the which notwithstanding that he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, M as they were that fled vnto Cæſar.

CHAP. XVI.

How the reſt of the Citie was taken.

HHe ſeuenth day of September, the mounts beeing finiſhed, which was the eighteenth day after they were begun, ſome of the Romans placed their rammes & engines to batter them; and ſome of the ſeditious who now deſpaired to keep the citie, left the wals, and fled into Acra, others hid themſelues in certaine vaults, and many hindered the Romans and reſiſted them for placing their rammes againſt the wals, who were overcome by them, beeing both more in number then they were, and alſo ſtronger and more valiant. The Iewes being now all diſcouraged and ſorrowfull, ſo ſoone as any part of the wall was broken downe, or ſhaken with the force of the rammes, ſtraight waies fled, and now the tyrants were ſurpriſed with a greater feare then needed. For euen before ſuch time as the enemies had entred the vvall, they ſtood in doubt whether they might flie or no, and they who a little before were proud and arrogant malefactors, did now tremble and quake, ſo that it was pittifull to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. And they endeouored to aſſaile the wall that Titus had built, to compaſſe the whole citie withall, but ſeeing themſelues forſaken of all thole that were wont to be truſtie vnto them, every one fledde whither neceſſitie did driue him. Preſently newes were brought them that all the weſt wall of the citie was beaten downe, others affirmed that the Romans had entred, and that they had ſcene the enemies in the towers, feare dazeling their eyes: & proſtrate vpon the ground, they bewailed their miſfortune; and as though they had been lame, they ſtood ſtill and ſought not to flie. From whence one may chiefly perceiue Gods iuſtice towards the impious, & the Romans fortune: for the tyrants deſtroyed themſelues of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their towers, wherein they could neuer haue bene taken but by famine: and the Romans hauing ſo much laboured at the lower wals, did now by ſudden take theſe, which their engines could neuer haue ſhaken, for there were three inexpugnable towers that could not be battered with the engines, whereof before we haue made mention. So the tyrants hauing forſaken theſe, or rather beeing by Gods will driuen from hence, preſently they fled vnto the valley Siloa, after the feare was paſt they againe tooke hart, and went vnto the wall that was in that place: yet not vſing ſuch courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the watchmen that guarded it; their ſtrength now failing & wearied with labor, feare, famine and calamitie. And ſome were driuen one way, and ſome another, and ſo were forced to hide themſelues in vaults and ſinks. The Romans hauing obtained the wall, placed their colours in the towers, and clapping their hands, and ſinging for ioy, they cried victorie, finding the end of the warre nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not beleeue that was the end, becauſe they gotte the wall without any bloudſhed, but admired, ſeeing no man did offer to reſiſt them. And now iſſuing into euery ſtreet, they ſlew whomſoeuer they found without any reſpect; and fired houſes, and all the people that had fled into them, and deſtroyed many whereas they entred for to get a prey, and they found whole families dead, and houſes full of dead bodies, conſumed by famine. Thus terrified with that heauie ſight, they departed out, not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pittied not them that were left aliue, but ſlew whomſoeuer they met, wherby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies by them ſlaine, that none could paſſe that way for them: all the whole citie flowed with bloud, ſo that many things ſet on fire, were quenched with the bloud of them that were ſlaine. At euening they ceaſed from killing, but all the night long the fire increaſed: and ſo in the morning, which was the eight day of September, all was now on fire, the citie in the time of the ſiege hauing endured more miſery and calamitie then euer it receiued ioy and happineſſe, from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithstanding that they were ſo great that all cities might iuſtly enuy it, & it no wiſe deſerued ſo to be oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſaue onely for that it foſtered & bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought the ouerthrow thereof.

Titus entring into the Citie, amongſt the reſt admired the ſtrong holds thereof, and the rockie towers which the Tyrants like madde men deſtroyed themſelues of: and ſeeing the height, firm-neſſe, bigneſſe, and the ioyning of the ſtones together, and their breadth & height, he ſaid: Surely God hath aſſiſted vs in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Iewes from theſe fortrefſes.
For what could mens hands and engines preuaile againſt them? And hauing ſpoken much to this effect, comming with his friends, hee set them at libertie who the tyrants had left bound in the Castles; and when he destroyed the rest of the citie & wals, he left those towers standing as a monument of his good fortune and victorie, by the which he had gained them, though vnexpugnable. The souldiers now being wearie with killing the miserable Jewes, & yet a great multitude remaining alieue, Cesar commaunded, that onely the armed Jewes and they that resisted should be slaine, and the rest left alieue. But the souldiers also killed old folkes and weake persons, and taking all able men and lustie, they caried them into the temple, & shut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cesar left one Fronto a libertine and his friend to keepe them, giuing him also charge to make inquirie, who had deserued punishment; who slew all the theiues and seditious, one of them bewraying another, and reserved certaine chosen young men of large stature and beautifull withall for the triumph, and all the rest that were aboute seauenteene yeeres old, he sent bound into Egypt, to be imployed in certaine works there, as digging, deluing, & manuring the fields, and to be viced in other publique busines. Titus also sent many of them vnto diuers provinces to be slaine in the Theaters with beasts, or words: and they that were vnder seauenteene yeeres of age were sold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, ten thousand died for hunger; partly for that their Keepers hating them, would not giue them any meat; partly for that some refused meat when it was offered them. For there was now scarcitie of corne by reason of the great multitude of the people.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the number of the captiues, and them that were slaine.

The number of the captiues, & such as died during the siege of the citie.

The number of all the captiues that were taken during the whole time of warre, was fourescore and seauenteene thousand: the number of all that died and were slaine during the siege, was eleuen hundredth thousand, the most of them beeing Jewes by nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For beeing assembled together from all parts to the feast of vneleuened bread, presently & on a suddaine they were enuironed with war, & first of all a plague fell amongst them by reason of the straightnesse of the place, & immediatly after, famine, worse then it. And that the Citie was capable of so many men it is eident, for that Cestius before numbred them; who desirous to signifie the flourishing estate and strength of Ierusalem vnto Nero, who contemned our nation, requested the high priests, that if possibly they could, they should number all the people in their citie: and that vpon the feast of Easter, when they killed offerings from the ninth houre of the day vntill the eleauenth: and to eate a lambe not fewer then ten persons were assembled, for it is not lawfull for any to feast alone, yea many times 20 are in a company: they numbred two hundredth fifty & six thousand, & 500 oblations or lambes to be killed, so that if we reckon to euery lambe ten men, the number amounteth vnto 27 hundredth thousand men, all purified whole and sound: For it was not lawfull for any that were lepers, or had a fluxe of seed, nor women that had the monthly tearmes, to eate of that sacrifice, nor for any stranger, except he came thither for religion sake. And this multitude was assembled together from other places, and was there by the prouidence of God shut vp as it were in a prison. And the citie being filled with men of war was besieged, that the number of them that were slaine, passed all that euer perished, either by any plague sent from God, or by the meanes of men; who were partly openly slaine, partly taken by the Romans: who searching the vaults, and opening the sepulchers, spared none they met withall. There also were found more then two thousand, whereof some slew themselves with their owne hands, other some killed by others, the rest perished with famine. The stinck of dead bodies was so great, that many minding to goe and search the foresaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre sake treading on the dead carcasses, searched the dead bodies, if they could find any thing: for much riches were hidden in the vaults, & couetousnesse omitted no way to gaine. Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the tyrants had bound, who euen in their extremitie ceased not to tyrannize: yet God plagued them both according to their deserts: for Iohn being now almost famished with his brethren in a vault, besought the Romans to saue his life. And Simon hauing long stricken with necessitie, as we shall hereafter make mention of, at last yeelded himselfe, who was kept for the triumph, and Iohn was condemned to perpetuall prison. Then they destroyed the walles, and fired the outward parts of the Citie.

A brieue historie of the Citie of Ierusalem.

THus was Ierusalem taken the second yeere of Vespasians raigne, on the eight day of September, and hauing bene alreadie fise times before surpised, it was finally againe destroyed. First, Aiochams king of Aegypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Susius tooke the Citie and yet destroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon destroyed it, when hee had inioyed the same, a thousand three hundredth and threescore yeeres, eight months and sixe daies after it was first built: but hee that first built it was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his owne language called the iust king. For he indeed was so, & therefore was the first Priest that sacrificed vnto God, and dedicating a Temple, called the Citie Solyma: but Dauid the king of the Jewes hauing driuen out the Cananeans, gaue it vnto his people to bee inhabited, and after foure hundredth threescore foure yeeres and three moneths, it was destroyed by the Babylonians: and from king Dauid who was the first Iew that reigned there, vntill the time that Titus destroyed it, were a thousand one hundredth seuentie and nine yeeres, and from the time that it was first erected vntill it was by him destroyed, were two thousand one hundredth and seuentie seuen yeeres: yet neither the antiquitie nor riches, nor the fame thereof now spread all ouer the world, nor the glorie of religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being destroyed. Such was the end of the besieging of Ierusalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the soldiers to get, & that now there was nothing, against which the soldiers could shew their outrage (for they would haue spared nothing that they could haue spoyle) Cesar commaunded them to destroy the Citie and Temple, onely yet leauing standing certaine towers, that were more beautifull and stronger then the rest, to wit, Phasaclus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the wall that was on the West side, meaning there to keepe a garrison, and that they should be monuments of the Romans vertue, who had surprised a Citie so well fortified as it appeared by them. All the rest of the Citie they so planned, that they who had not seene it before, would not beleue that it had been euer inhabited. This was the end of their madnesse, who were alwaies giuen vnto sedition in Ierusalem, a most worthie Citie & famous amongst all nations.

Ierusalem being fise times spoiled was at that time once more taken.

How the souldiers were rewarded.

C*esar* determined to leaue the tenth legion for a garrison in Ierusalem, with some troupes of horsemen and other companies of footmen: and all wars being now ended, hee purposed to thanke the whole armie for their valiant acts, and reward the most courageous for their deserts. And placing a great tribunall in the middle before the campe, standing in it with the chiefe peeres about him, for whence the whole armie might heare him, hee gaue them heartie thanks for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during those wa-res, praying the for their loyaltie during all the foresaid time, and that in many skirmiges they had shewed themselves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their countrie: likewise they had now giuen al nations to vnderstand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor strong holds, nor greatnesse of Cities, nor rashnesse, nor barbarous crueltie of their aduersaries could euer resist the forces of the Romanes, nor escape their hands; notwithstanding, that in manie things fortune fauoured them, adding that it was a credite for them to haue ended those wars that had continued a long time, which was all that they hoped for at their comming; and which was most glorie of all vnto them, that those Capitaines whom they had elected to be the Romane Emperours, were well liked and imbraced of al men, all standing to their appointment; and acknowledging themselves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover that hee admired them and loued them all, for that euerie one shewed himselfe valiant and courageous, affirming that he would now recompence those with honours, and due desert, who had behaued themselves most valiantly, & most hazarded themselves, & effected worthie deeds, & whosoever was more forward then the rest should haue a reward according to that desert. And that he would be more diligent in honouring the that had bin his companions in that that he requested them to permit him to informe Cæsar of all that was past. For Vespasian had already sent Cæcilius Pontus to be gouernor of Syria, but he was not as yet arriued there. Then Collega making diligent enquirie of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Iewes accused by Antiochus was guiltie: for certaine impious people had done all this mischief, being indebted, thinking that if they had burnt the market place, and the publike writings, that then their debts could not be required at their hands. Yet the Iewes liued in great feare, and expected the euent of those forged accusations.

CHAP. XXII.

How Vespasian at his returne was received by the Romans.

The year of the world, 4035, after Christs birth, 73.
The Citie of Rome entertained Vespasian with all willingesse and pompe.

After that Titus had receiued letters from his father, that hee was arriued in Italie, and all Cities wherein he as yet came, welcommed him verie ioyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pompe and triumph, he was now eased of the care hee had before, and verie ioyfull for his fathers wellfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reuerence Vespasian, though absent, as though hee had beene present with them, desiring to see his expected arriual, whose comming they so hartly wished for. For the Senate remembering what calamities had befallen the Citie in the change of Princes, desired to receiue their Emperour dignified with the honour of olde age, and martiall renowne, whose presence only would bee to his subiects profite and safetie. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with ciuill wars, long expected his arriual, assuring themselves thereby to haue an end of their calamity, and to recouer againe their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the souldiers, who knowing his skill in martiall affaires by that which himselfe had already done, and finding their other captaines, vnder whom they warred, ignorant and vnskillfull, they wished for his comming, thereby to be deliuered from the disgrace, wherein they liued, desiring to receiue him by whome they might both be honoured, and preferred from danger. The nobilitie seeing him so beloued of all men, could no longer waite his comming, but went and met him, hee being farre from the Citie, and accompanied him, and no man staied his comming, but in whole multitudes they went to meete him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meete him then staied at home.

The Romans issue out to meete with Vespasian.

Vespasian celebrated gratularie sacrifice for his late arriual.

When newes was brought that hee approched neere vnto the Citie, and how friendly and curteously he had entertained all men, the people with their wiues and children staied in the way hee came, to salute and see him: and whereloeuver he came, with ioyfull applauses and acclamations they cried, calling him their conseruer and benefactor, and he who onely was worthy to see the Romane Emperour, and the whole Citie was as it had been a temple all hung with garlands, and full of sweete odors and perfumes: and the multitude of people being such that hee could scarcely get into the palace, he offered sacrifices vnto his household gods for his safe returne, and all the people were feasted by their tribes, kindred and neighbours, sacrificing vnto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his sonne after him, and that the Empire might neuer depart from his linage. The Citie of Rome hauing thus receiued Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happinesse and felicitie.

CHAP. XXIII.

The exploits of Domitian against the Germans and Frenchmen.

The causes of the enuie of the Germans and French against the Romans.

Before such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the City of Ierusalem, a great part of Germanie was reuolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordered vpon them renouncing their allegiance they were in great hope to free themselves from the yoke and gouernment of the Romans. The first motives that caused the Germans to reuolt, and to warre against the Romans, was their temeritie and rash natures prone to fight, hauing but a verie little hope of successe, then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subiection but only the Romans, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunitie they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with ciuill wars, by reason of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the world vnder their dominions was

A now in suspence, they thought that by reason of their troubles and ciuill wars fit opportunitie was offered them, and they were hereunto perswaded by one Cassius and Civilis two of the most potent amongst them, who long before desired alteration, and now finding opportunitie, shewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made triall what the common people thought of this point, and the greatest part of them manifestly condescended hereunto, and perhaps the rest were not vnwilling. At this time as it were by Gods providence, Vespasian sent letters vnto Petilius Cerealis (who before time had beene gouernour of Germanie) and declared him Consull, commanding him to go into Britaine and take the rule of the countrey. Hee forthwith obeyed Vespasians command: and hearing that the Germans had reuolted, hee came against them, they hauing now leued an armie, and gaue them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forced them to their due obedience vnto the Romans. Notwithstanding if he had not come thither, not long after they had assuredly beene punished for their offence. For so soone as newes of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæsar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his yeeres would haue done, being verie young) vnderooke that expedition to go and conquer them: but hauing his fathers courage, and being more skillfull then his age required, hee presently went against them, who terrified with the report of his comming, yeilded vnto him, thereby gaining this, that without bloodshed they were brought vnder subiection as before. Now all things in Gallia being well disposed of, so that it was not easie for them although they would, to rebell any more, Domitian returned againe to Rome, being a credite vnto his age and countrey.

C At the same time also the Scythians rebelled, and the Sarmates assembled in great multitudes, and passed ouer the riuer Istrum, and with great violence and crueltie comming vnto Alexandria, slew manie of the Romane garrisons, whom they found in strong holds: and Fonteius Agrippas Lieutenant, who had been Consull, meeting them, bade them battell, and fought verie valiantly: which done, they went all ouer the countreies adioyning, wasting, robbing, and spoiling them. When Vespasian heard thereof, and how Mæsia was all wasted, hee sent Rubrius Gallus to be reuenged vpon them: who hauing slaine manie of them in fight, hee forced the rest to retire into their owne countrey. The generall of the armie hauing thus ended that warre, prouided to preuent them, if hereafter they did attempt the like, for he built farre more stronger forts then were before, so that the enemy could no way passe out of their owne countrey: by which meanes the wars in Mæsia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Riuer Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of Vespasian and Titus.

Thus the Emperour hauing some while remained at Berytus (as is before said) and being returned from thence, hee shewed many spectacles in all the cities of Syria, wherein hee came, reseruing for that purpose the Iewes, that were captiues, to let all men vnderstand of their overthrow: in his journey, he beheld a riuer worth the recital, which runneth in the midst betweene Arcas and Raphaneas, two Cities of the kingdome of Agrippa, which hath a miraculous nature, for when it floweth, it is verie full of water, and runneth with a swift stream; yet hauing flowed fixe daies, it is on the seuenth day so drie, that you may see the bottome, and so continueth his course, which for this cause the Iewes call Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Iewes Sabbath, which is the seuenth day. When the Antiochians vnderstood that Titus was comming to their citie, they could not containe themselves within their wals for ioy, but all went out to meete him, and not onely men, but also women and children, expecting his comming thirtie foulds off: & when he approched neer vnto them, they holding vp their hands to him saluted him, with great ioy, and hauing receiued many courtesies from him, they returned with him, and amongst other acclamations, they often besought him to banish the Iewes out of their citie. But Titus returned no answer, making as though he heard not what they requested. Yet the Iewes doubtfull what he would doe, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great feare. For Titus did not tarry at Antiochia, but passed fro thence to Zeugema towards Euphrates, where Vologesus the king of Parthians messenger came vnto him, bringing him a golden crowne for his conquest of the Iewes: which he receiuing, feasted the kings Embassadors, and so returned to Antiochia, where the senat & people besought him to com into the theater, where G all the people were assembled expecting him, & he accorded so to do, & again they besought him to expel the Iewes out of their city, but he answered that their country whereunto he might haue banished the, was now destroyed, & there was no place that would receiue the: so the Antiochians seeing that they could not obtaine their former petition, they requested an other thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the brazen tables, wherein were engrauen the Iewes priuiledges: but Titus would not grant that, but leauing the Iewes in the same estate he found them, he departed from thence into Aegypt: and as in the way he passed by Ierusalem, comparing the desolation of that place with the beautie and goodly buildings that were before it was destroyed, he lamented & pitied the ouerthrow thereof, not insolently reioicing as an other would haue done, for hauing destroyed so faire and strong a citie, but cursing the seditious who forced him to destroy it, not H purposing to make his vertue knowne by the calamitie of wretches. For as yet great part of the treasure of the Citie was found in the ruines, and some the Romans found of themselues; but the most they got, the captiues told them of, which was gold and silver and other precious things buried by the owners in the earth, being vncertaine what would betide them.

Titus going forward in his iourney speedily past the wildernesse, and came to Alexandria, and determining now to saile vnto Italy, he sent the two legions that accompanied him vnto the places, from whence they came, the first into Mæsia, the fiftenth into Panonia, commanding John and Simon captiues of the prisoners and others to the number of seuen hundred all of goodly stature, and beautiful, to be carried presently into Italy, meaning to vse them in his triump. When he was now arrived at Rome as he desired, the people were so affected towards him, as if hee had bene their father, & came to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his sonne Titus, meeting him in his owne person with great ioy: all the citizens likewise receiued him with exceeding ioy, seeing that now the father and his two sonnes were met: Within a few dayes after, they purposed to make a triumph in common, but the Senate had decreed them a priuate and peculiar triumph, for their valiant deedes, and in the day prefixed for the same, no man in all the citie remained at home, but euerie one got a place to stand in that they might see the Emperours, leauing onely roome betwene them for their passage. All the soldiers before it was day-light, euerie one with his captaine in companies, came and expected the Emperour, not at the palace gate, but nere the temple of Isis: for the Emperours that night lodged there, and at day brake Vespasian and Titus came forth both crowned with lawrel, & in purple garments made after their country K fashion, and they went vnto Ostians walks, where the Senate, captiues and knights expected their comming. Before the porch was made a tribunall, and in it placed seats of Iuorie, which they ascending sate downe in, and presently all the souldiers with loud voice declared their valour and fortitude. The Emperours were vnarmed and cloathed in silke, and crowned with lawrell.
Vespasian hauing receiued their praises, they offering still to speake now in his commendations, he beckned with his hand, and made a signe vnto them to be silent: which being done, he arose vp, and couering the greatest part of his head with his garment, he performed his solemn vowes, and Titus also did the like. That done, Vespasian spake vnto them all in generall in fewe words, and so dismissed the souldiers to goe to dinner, which according to the custome the Emperour was to prouide for them: himselfe departed from them to the triumphal gate so called, for that all L triumphs passed that way, and they did eate meat and put on triumphal apparell, hauing offered sacrifices vnto the Gods that were placed by the gate, and so went in triumph all along the place, where people strided to see them, to the ende that all people might haue a better view of them. But the spectacles there exhibited, both for number, varietie, and costlinesse, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could deuise, both workeman-ship, riches, and varieties, and nouelties of nature. For almost all things that euer were in any place amongst men that liued in felicitie, either rich or beautiful, and pleasant to beholde; all of them were that day shewed and scene in that triumph, giuing a testimonie of the large dominions of the Romans. For there was such store of works of gold, silver and yuorie, that one would not haue deemed them, to haue bene made onely for the pompe of that day: but to haue been so plentiful, as if they had flowed all about the citie: some carried fine tapestrie made of all sorts of purple, other some carried others, diligently wrought with pictures and Babylonian worke, and there were so many gemmes and precious stones, some set in crownes of golde, some in other workes, that it appeared, that without reason we iudged them to be rare and scarce. Moreouer the pictures of their Gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatnesse and work-

A workmanship, and all of pretious matter. And diuers sorts of liuing creatures were there to bee scene, all adorned with some attire, agreeing and alluding vnto their nature. There was also an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments ouer wrought with golde, which carried all these things, and they who were separated from the rest to bee scene, were attired in such garments, that as many as beheld them admired. The captiues went not without their gorgeous at-tires, but the varietie and beautie of the garments hid all the deformitie of their bodies, which happened through their bad vsage. The Pageants that were born in that triumph, were of an admirable bignesse, so that the people that behelde them wondered how it was possible that men should carrie them, for many were builded with three or foure lofts one aboue another, surpassing all that can be imagined of them for worke and cost, for many of them were hanged about B with Tapestrie of gold; and all things annexed vnto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought gold or Iuorie. Therein was curiously represented the manner of war, and all stratagemes, and manners of fighting, that could bee deuised; some in one part of the Pageant, some in another. There might one haue behelde a most fertile and fortunate land destroyed, and all the armie of enemies to be slaine, and some flying, others taken prisoners, and strong and huge wals battered downe with Rammes, and Castles and strong holds destroyed, and the wals of populous Cities to be ruined, and the armie entering the wals, all places filled with massacred men, and how those that were not able to fight, yeelding themselves, asked mercie, the temples set on fire, and after all else was wasted, the houses thrown downe vpon the owners heads, and a riuer representing sorrowe, not flowing as it was wont into tilled places, and to serue the vse of man nor for cattell to drinke, but into a Countrey which was in euerie part burning, and enuironed with flames, C all which the Iewes in their warres endured. These things were so artificially represented vnto their viewes, that had not scene them, as though they were now a doing: Before euerie Pageant went the Captaine of the Citie, representing the maner how it was taken. After all these followed many ships, and in euerie place were carried the spoiles taken in warre: amongst all which, those that were taken in the Temple of Ierusalem, were most excellent, for there was a golden table weighing many talents, and likewise a golden Candlesticke, the vse whereof was now not such as we were wont to put it vnto, for in the middelt of the stem thereof was fixed a bale, and out of it proceeded many small branches, framed like a three forked spear, euerie one being at the top made like a Lampe, which were seauen in number, shewing the honour of the seauenth day, which D was the last of all the spoiles. Then followed many carrying the image of Victorie, all made of gold and Iuorie. Afterwardes, came Vespasian, and after him Titus, and with him Domitian, gallantly adorned and mounted vpon an excellent horse, and so they went all to the Temple of Iupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pompe, where they made some abode.
For it was an auncient custome of their Countrey, to repose themselves there till some came and brought newes vnto them, of the death of him, who was Generall of their enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was also carried in the triumph, and hauing a rope fastned about his necke, was drawne all along the market place, where they that drew him did kill him. For it is the custome of the Romanes, thereto put malefactors to death that are condemned. After E word was brought that he was dead, all the people made ioyfull exclamations, and so they began to sacrifice, which done according to the custom, they returned into the palace, and they feasted some, other some had prepared banquets for themselves at their owne houses. For this day was sacred amongst the Romanes, in ioy of the victorie ouer their enemies, and an ende of ciuill calamitie, and the beginning of good fortune, and hope, which they had in their newe princes.
When the triumphs were ended, and all the Romane Empire quieted, Vespasian built a Temple and dedicated it vnto Peace, which he did in so short a space as it was admirable: and hauing bestowed great cost vpon it, hee also beautified it with diuers pictures, and carued workes. And hee placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to see, from the vttermost F parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden vessels, and other necessaries that the Iewes vled in their Temple, doing them great reuerence. But their law and the Tapestrie or purple veiles of the Sanctuarie hee commanded to be kept in the palace.

How Herodium and Macherus were taken by Bassus.

Cæsar sent Lucius Bassus into Iudæa to bee Lieutenant there, who receiuing an armie of Cerealis Vettilianus, hee tooke the Castle and garrison of Herodium, being yeelded vnto him. After this, gathering together all his armie, who were dispersed in diuers places of the Countrey, he with the tenth legion purposed to warre against Macherus, for he thought it necessarie to destroy that castle, least that for the strength it might moue many to rebell: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certaine hope of their safetie, and those that sought to assault it, were in great daunger, for it was built vpon a rocke that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so deuised, that it is hard to come vnto it, who hath enuironed it round about with vallies, so deepe, that the bottome thereof cannot bee descried, neither could one passe ouer them, nor fill them vp: for that which is on the West part is threecore foulds large, and endeth at the lake Asphaltites, & on this side Macherus hath a verie high prospect, and it is enuironed on the North & South with vallies of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to winne the Castle: but that vally which is on the East side, is at least a hundred cubits deepe, and it endeth vpon a mountaine neere vnto Macherus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place did there build a Castle, which afterward Gabinus in the warre against Aristobulus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, iudged this place worthie to be fortified, as a principall defence against the neighboring Arabians. For it was aptly situate vpon a mountaine, where one might behold their borders: wherefore making a large wall, hee builded a Citie there in the place that men doe enter vnto the Castle, he also compassed the verie top thereof with another wall, and in the corners he placed towers that were threecore cubites high, and in the verie middelt of all hee built a palace, for largenesse and beautie admirable, and made many Cisterns to receiue water in conuenient places, which serued the people abundantly, as it were struing with nature, that the places which he had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid vp there in store, arrowes and engines, and made all prouision wherewith the Inhabitants might bee able to hold out a great siege.

Rue of admirable greatnes.

How Baaras is to be gathered.

Another fashion how to dig the roote.

Hot bathes.

In the Kings palace, there grew the herb called Rue, which was verie admirable for the greatnesse, for there was no figge tree taller or broader then it, and it was reported that it had continued euer since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Iewes, Inhabitants of the place cut it downe. In the vally that lieth on the North side of the Citie, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a roote of the same name, the colour wherof resemblen the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sunne beames, and is not easie to bee pulled vp, till that one cast vpō it the vrine of a woman or her flowers: which done, who soeuer toucheth it is sure to die, except he carrie the roote hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner. They digge all round about it, so that they leaue a verie little of the roote covered with earth, & then they tie a dogge vnto it, which struing to follow his master, who maketh as though he would goe away, he easily pulleth vp the roote, and the dogge presently dieth as it were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, neede to stand in any feare therof. This herb notwithstanding al this danger, is diligently sought out for the vertue it hath. For it driueth away diuels (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies: if it be but applied vnto them, whereas otherwise if they had no helpe, these diuels possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also doe spring certaine hot waters, verie different in taste one from another, for some are bitter, some sweete, there are also sources of colde waters, one neere vnto another in a Plaine: but which is most admirable, there is a caue hard by, not verie deepe, enuironed with an eminent rocke aboue, frō the which there commeth as it were two dugges or paps, hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth verie colde water, out of the other verie hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serue to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all paines of the sinnewes. In the same place also are mines of Sulphure and Alumē.

Bassus hauing viewed this place on euerie side, resolved to besiege it, and endeouored to fill vp the valley that was on the East side, and so make a way vnto it: which he began to doe, hastening

Astening to raise a verie high mount, and so make it easie to be taken. Those that were inhabitants, constrained Iewes that were strangers, to go into the lower citie, iudging them an vprofitable multitude, and so caused them to endure the first brunt of the enemies, and they themselves kept the Castle both for that it was strong, and also to preserve themselves, hoping that by yeelding the place vnto the Romans, they might obtaine pardon of them; yet first they purposed to make triall if they could auoide the siege: and therefore verie courageously, euerie day they made excursions, and fought with them they found, and many were slaine on both parts. Fortune and opportunitie sometime caused one to bee victors, sometime another: for the Iewes got the best when they could assault the Romans at vnawares, and the Romans ouercame, when they were aware of the Iewes comming and armed themselves. But the siege was not ended by these skirmishes: yet a chauce befell, that forced the Iewes to yeelde their Castle. Amongst them that were besieged was one Eleazar a young man, and verie hardy and bold in any enterprise, who oftentimes made excursions and sought to hinder the Romans worke, who alwayes in euerie fight did greatly endamage the Romanes, and by his valour and aduenturous courage, hee gaue them that were his fellowes opportunitie to assault the Romans, and to flee againe and retire in safetie, himselfe being alwaies the last that so retired. It happened one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, hee as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durst undertake to combate with him, staid without the gate speaking to them that were vpon the wall, & giuing great attention vnto this. Then one Rufus an Aegyptian one of the Roman army, espying this opportunity ranne vpon him so suddenly, that he at vnawares tooke him all armed as he was, and they vpon the wals stood amazed, whilest Rufus led him vnto the Romans campe. Then the Generall of the Romans caused him to bee led into a place, where they in the Citie might see him, & there to haue all his cloathes taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly discourage the Iewes, and al the citie was resolved into teares for the calamitie of that one man. Bassus seeing this, hee deuised this counsell against them; for hee sought to moue them so to compassion, that for to saue him they should yeeld their castle, which fell out as he desired. For he presently commanded a crosse to be erected, as though he would presently haue crucified Eleazar: which sight greatly moued them in the Castle to sorrow: so that now with lowd cries they lamented, saying that this calamitie was insupportable. Then Eleazar besought them not to despise him, who was now to die a most miserable death: and moreover to prouide for their owne safetie in yeelding the castle vnto the Romans vertue and fortunate successe.

Then they moued with his words, and many also within the Citie intreating for him (for hee came of a great parentage and had many kinsfolks) though contrarie to their natures, compassion tooke place in them: and so sending some of their companie speedily, they desired to parley, affirming that they would yeeld their castle vpon condition that they might safely depart away, and Eleazar might be likewise restored vnto them. Which offer of theirs the Romans accepted, and the Iewes in the lower part of the citie hauing intelligence of this couenant, resolved themselves to flee away in the night: but so soone as they had opened their gates, those that had agreed with Bassus gaue him intelligence thereof, either enuying that their countremen should escape, or els fearing that Bassus would punish them for their flight: yet for all this the most valiant of them that fled, escaped, who were gone before the rest, and the rest were slaine to the number of a thousand and seauen hundred men, for the women and children were made bondslaves. And Bassus thinking it meete to keepe his promise vnto them of the castle, permitted them safely to depart, and restored Eleazar vnto them.

FHis done, hee prepared to carrie his army into the pasture called Iardes, for hee had notice that manie Iewes were there assembled together, who had escaped from Ierusalem and Machæra during the siege. So comming vnto the place and finding it to be as it was reported vnto him: he first of all enuironed it with horsemen, that if any one of the Iewes sought to escape, the horsemen might withstand them, and hee commanded the footmen to cut downe the wood, into the which they fled to hide themselves. And so through necessitie they they were constrained to fight, hoping by a courageous fight to finde opportunitie to flie: wherefore they all together with a crie violently assaulted them by whom they were inuironed, and they did valiantly withstand them, and by their valour, and the Iewes desperation the fight endured a long time: yet the euent of the war was not like vnto the rest of the fight, for onely twelue Romans were slaine and verie fewe wounded, and all the Iewes were slaine in that fight, being in number three thousand, and their captaine Iudas the sonne of Iairus (of whom we haue already made mention, who during the siege of Ierusalem was commander of a company there) hid himselfe in a certaine caue, and secretly escaped from thence. At that time Caesar writ vnto Liberius Maximus his Gouernour, and vnto Bassus, to sell Iudæa: for hee did not build in all the countrey any Citie but appropriated it vnto himselfe, leauing there onely eight hundred souldiers, and giuing them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirtie foulds distant from Ierusalem, and he imposed a tribute vpon all Iewes wheresoeuer they liued, commanding euerie one of them euerie yeere to bring two drachmes into the Capitole, according as in former times they were wont to pay vnto the Temple of Ierusalem: and this was the estate of the Iewes at that time.

IN the fourth yeere of Vespasians raigne, it happened that Antiochus king of the Coma-genes with all his family fell into great miserie vpon this occasion. Cesennius Petus go-uernour of Syria (either for enuie, or for that indeed it was so, for it is not well knowne) sent letters vnto Caesar declaring vnto him that Antiochus was determined to reuolte from the Romans, together with his sonne Epiphanes, and had made a league with the king of the Parthians, and that therefore it was necessarie to preuent them in time, least that if they first began to reuolt openly, they might trouble all the Romane Empire with warres. Caesar did not neglect these news, for that the neerenesse of both the kings countries one to another, seemed to require that they should be quickly preuented: for Samosata the greatest Citie of Comagena is situate vpon Euphrates, which might both easily receiue the Parthians, and be a strong hold for them, and also there they might easily passe over the river. Wherefore Vespasian beleeuing it permitted him to doe what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entred into Comagene, with the sixth legion, and certaine other companies of footmen and troupes of horsemen, accompanied with Aristobulus king of Chalcidias, and Sohemus king of Emesa, who came to assist him. So they entred the countrey without any fight, for none of the inhabitants offered to resist. Antiochus daunted with these v unexpected newes, did not so much as thinke of any warre against the Romans, wherefore hee determined to leaue the whole kingdome in that estate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to cleare himselfe vnto the Romans, from that which they suspected of him: and going almost a hundred and thirtie foulds from the Citie into a field, there hee placed a tabernacle. And Petus sent men vnto Samosata to take it, and left them to keepe the Citie, and hee with the rest of the souldiers purposed to go against Antiochus. But for all this the king though by necessity vrged thereunto, yet would he not fight against the Romans, but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoeuer; but his sonnes being lustie strong young men, and skilfull in martiall affaires, could not easily abstaine from fight in that their distresse. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two sonnes had recourse vnto their forces, and in a great fight that dured a whole day they shewed their valour, and departed receiuing no losse. But Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his countrey, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cilicia, and thereby discouraged his souldiers, who despairing to keepe the kingdome for him, reuolted vnto the Romans. But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seeke to saue themselves, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten horsemen, hee passed the river Euphrates: and thus being out of daunger they came to Volagesus, of whom they were receiued, not as fugitiues, but with great honor, and according to their degree, as though they yet possessed their auncient dignitie. And Petus comming to Tarsus of Cilicia, he sent a Centurion to carrie Antiochus bound vnto Rome. But Vespasian permitted not a king

A robe so brought vnto him, thinking it meete to consider the olde friendshippe betweene them, leauie his journey towards Rome, allowing great store of mony, sufficient to maintaine a kingly dignitie.

Epiphanes, and they with him hearing this, were eased of the great care they tooke for their father, whom they greatly feared to be fallen into some danger, and now they also conceiued some hope to be reconciled vnto Caesar. Whereof Volagesus writing vnto Caesar (for they were not vp with yron gates, obtained leaue to passe, and so came into Media, the Medes nothing fearing any such matter, and sacked and spoiled all their populous and wealthie borders, being full of carrells, none daring to resist them: for Pacorus king of that country, for fear fled into the strongest hold he had, and left all his goods behind him, and with much adoe redeemed his wife, and concubines whom they had taken, for one hundred talents. Having therefore licence to rob and spoyle, for that no man resisted them, they came into Armenia, & waited all the countrey thereabout: and Tyridates was then king of that country, who with an army comming to fight against them, was almost by them taken aliue in the battaile; for one cast a halter about him, and began to draw him amongst the enemies: & so had done, but that he with his sword did quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reason he fought against them, waited all the coun-treys, and carying with them a huge multitude of men and cattell out of both countries, they returned into their owne.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Massada a most strong Castle was taken.

D*IESSUS* dying in Iudæa, Flavius Sylva succeeded in his place, and now perceiuing that althe countrey else was conquered save one only castle, he with all the forces he could make went against it. This castle is called Massada. The captaine of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who first inuaded it, was a verie strong and valiant man, borne of the tribe of Iuda, who per-twaded a great many Iewes as is before said, not to intole themselves when Cyrenus was Cenfor and sent to tax Iudæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conspired against them that obeyed the Romans, and in all things vsed them like enemies, taking and driuing away their goods, and firing their houses, affirming that they did not any thing differ from straungers, who betrayed the liber-tie of their countrey rather than they would fight for it, and that they had rather haue them warre on the Romans side. But that was onely an excuse to hide their auarice and inuiolous dealing, as the proole made manifest, for they themselves reuolted and bare armes against the Romans, and their enterprises against the Romans were worse then the rest, and when their first forged pretence was known and confuted, they did rage more then before against those that vpbraided them with it. For that time amongst the Iewes abounded with all manner of iniquitie, so that none was left vndone: yea though one inuadored to inuent some new villanies, yet could hee deuise none that was not then practised: all laboured with this maladie, both in particular and in common, and euerie one did strive with other, to surpass his fellow in impietie against God, and in iustice towards his neighbour. The mightie vexed the weaker sort, and the meaner sort destroyed the potentates, and tooke their riches away from them; they gaped after rule and dominion, these after mischiefe.

The Sicarians were the first that were so cruell and inuiolous against their neighbours: for not prouoked thereunto, neither by deede nor word, they slew and inuiolous all men without cause, but John shewed them to be verie moderate. For hee did not onely say all that counselled that which was good and profitable, as his greatest enemies, and especially dealing thus with the citizens, but also many waies inuiolous his countrey, like one who had impiously also contemned God himselfe.

selfe. For hee did eate forbidden meates, and violated his countries temperance, so that it was no wonder to see him obserue no iustice nor fidelitie towards men, who had now infringed the laws of God. Again what villanie did Simon Giora leaue vndone, or what iniurie did he abstain from to offer vnto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kindred and friendship then preuaile any man, saue onely this, that it made them be more cruelly vsed, and euerie day to be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise? For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glorie to exercise cruelty vpon their most familiar friends. The Idumæans were followers of this furie, who killed the high priests, and left not any one of note in the Citie, whereby God might be honoured, and induced all iniustice possible, wherein the Zealous excelled. For they committed all mischiefe, leauing nothing vnattempted that had euer before that time beene practised: yet theyooke their name from them that imitated good and goodlines, but in truth it was to mocke and flout them that did well, so saueage and cruel was their nature, or else accounting the greatest impietie to be goodnes. But their end was as they deserved, and God punished their desert with his iust vengeance. For euen vnto the latter end of their liues, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with diuers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserved: but what punishment could bee deuised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens crueltie, wherefore I will returne to that where I left.

The Roman captaine came against Eleazar, and them that kept Massada with him, who were Sicarians, and he brought an armie with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in euerie fit place garrisons, and enuironed the Castle with a wall, least anie of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keepe a continual guard. Moreover he placed his campe in a fit place for the siege, euen there where the rocke that the castle was built vpon, ioyned vnto the other mountain, which was an vnfit place to get necessaries in. For not onely victuals were fetcht farre off by great labour of the Iewes who were commaunded to doe it, but also water for the whole armie somwhere else, for there was no fountaine neere that place. This done Silua attempted the siege, wherein it was requisite for him to vse both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the castle, which is thus situate. It is enuironed round with a huge stone verie high on euerie side, and the valley vnderneath is so deepe, that one cannot see the bottome, all rockie, and inaccessible to all liuing creatures, saue onely that in two places there is a difficult passage vnto it, one of them is from the lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the easiest of the two is the West side: the first is called a Snake, taking his name of the straitnesse and crooked turnings, for the rocke that is eminent seemeth as it were broken in sunder, and by little and little often returneth againe vnto it selfe, and it is by little & little extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no halte but must step with one foot first vpon them, and the other vpon another, & must stand vpon one foot whilest he remoueth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be slaine in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side between the rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man aliue. When thou hast gone thirtie stoundes by this way, then thou comest to the top of the hill, which is not steepe at the top, but hath a Plaine aboue it, and Ionathas the high priest was the first that built a Castle in this place, and called it Massada: and Herod after him bestowed great labour and cost in building that place, for hee enuironed it all with a wall, seven stounds circuit all of white stone, twelue cubits high, and eight cubits broad, and placed vpon it seven and twentie towers, that were fiftie cubits high, by the which men passed into the houses that were round about the wall within, for the king appointed the top of the hill for tillage because it was a more fertile and fatter soyle then any ground else, so that if at anie time they within the castle wanted prouision from other places, yet they might not be famished, hauing this to finde them. He also builded in this place a palace for himselfe, the way to which was on the West side within the castle wall, whose prospect was toward the North, and enuironed the same with a most strong wall, and in the corners thereof he built foure most firme towers three score cubits high, verie sumptuous within, hauing diuers roomes and galleries and bathes, supported in euerie place with pillars, euerie one of which was one onely stone, the wals thereof were of solide stone of diuers colours: and to euerie house, and in the top of the hill, and round about the palace, hee hewed certaine cisterns out of the rocke for to beare water, so that by this meanes water was as plentifull, as though they had fountaines within the castle. There was a way vnto the castle vnder the ground and from the kings palace, which they that were without could not perceiue, the way about ground was inaccessible, for as we haue already said, the way on the East side no man could passe, and as for that on the West side, it was stopped vp with a tower built in the street thereof, distant a thousand cubits from the Castle, by which it was impoissible to passe, and it was not easie to get it by force, and the more leafully they went, the neerer they were to danger. And thus was this fortress strengthened both by art and nature.

The prouision within the Castle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and also for the long time it had continued, for there was corne sufficient for many yeeres, and Wine and Oyle and diuers other prouision and heapes of dates. All which Eleazar found readie thereto, hauing deceitfully obtained the Castle with his Sicarians, which prouision was all as sound and as fresh, as though it had newly beene laid vp in store: notwithstanding, that from the time it remained there, vnto the time that the Romanes tooke it, were a hundred yeeres, and the Romanes found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may iustly thinke that the cause hereof is the ayre about the Castle, which, by reason of the height of the place is most pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was also found all maner of Armour in great quantitie, which Herode made, and would haue armed ten thousand men, also vnwrought yron, brasle, and lead, so that one may iudge that prouision to haue beene referred for some great cause. It is reported that Herode prepared that Castle for his refuge, when hee doubted two great dangers, first that the people of the Iewes would depose him, and make them Kings whole auncestors had before reigned.

The other which was more dangerous then the first, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queene of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often request Antonius that Herode might be slaine, and that shee might haue the kingdome of the Iewes giuen vnto her. And it was a great maruaile that Antonius doring so vpon her, did not fulfill her request. Herode for these occasions hauing builded Massada, left it furnished as the last bulwarke for the Romanes to make warre against the Iewes. For the Generall of the Romanes, hauing now compassed all the place without it with a wall, (as is before said) to the end that none might escape, hee did very wisely, and to began to assault the Castle, finding one onely place that would beare a mount. For behind the tower that on the West side stopped vp the passage into the Castle and palace, there was a great rocke verie large and long, yet not so high as Massada by three hundred cubits. The rocke was called Leuce, which signifieth white. When Silua had gotten this rocke, and ascended it, hee commanded his souldiers to build a mount thereupon; and they chearefully labouring, raised a sodaine mount two hundred cubits high: by reason of the height it seemed not firme nor sufficient enough to beare the engines, but vpon it was built a Tribunall with great stones fiftie cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the engines were such as first Vespasian, and after him Titus deuised to batter walles with, and so they made a tower three score cubits high all plated about with yron.

Now the Romans with many shot did driue the Iewes off from the Castle wals, not suffering them to lift vp their heads. And Silua hauing builded a mightie Ramme, caused the wall to be continually beaten therewith, but it could scarcely enter vpon it: and the Sicarians quickly preuented that, building another wall within, which could not bee broken with the Ramme being yet soft, and so would breake the force thereof, for they did sawe timber in peeces, and as it were made two rayles, and then filled the space betweene the two rayles with earth, and with other planks they kept the earth from falling downe, so that they made a worke like the wall of a house, and for that it yeilded vnto the blowes of the Ramme (being soft earth) the Ramme could not preuaile against it, but rather made it more stronger then before by ramming the mortar together.

Silua perceiuing this, iudged that hee might sooner destroy the wall with fire then with his engine: and so hee commanded the souldiers to cast vpon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, because it was for the most part built with wood, and easily also pierced through it, by reason it was not cleane wrought together, and there vvas a great flame.

At the verie beginning of the fire, the North wind did greatly annoy the Romans, for the fire blowing furiously from aboue against them that were Romanes, it did driue it extremely vpon them, so that they were in great despair, fearing their engines would be burnt, and presently the winde chaunging and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned G the fire againe vpon the wall, and now all of it euen vnto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romanes hauing Gods assistance, returned againe vnto their Campe ioifully, purposing the next morning betimes to assaile their enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, least any of the enemies should escape. But Elezar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his companie so to doe. And seeing now the wall was fierd, and not knowing any way else to helpe himselfe, considering likewise what the Romanes would doe vnto their wiues and children if they should take them, hee deliberated of all their deaths, which hee in that extremitie iudged to bee the best way they could take. And so he assembled the most valiant of all his companie, and exhorted euerie one of them thereunto after this manner.

*Elezars Oration to his

*Elezar con-

Valiant companions, wee long agoe resolued our selues neither to serue the Romans, nor any other saue onely God, for he alone is the true and iust Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that exhorteth you to shew your resolute minds: let vs not therefore dishonour our selues, and besides our slauerie, suffer also intolerable torments if we be taken aliue by the Romans. For we were the first that revolted from them, and the last that war against them. And I verily thinke that God hath giuen vs this benefit, that we may die wel and in our own liberty, which he denied to others who were overcome contrarie to their expectation. We are certaine to bee conquered as soone as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our dearest friends, is a glorious resolution vnto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debarre vs, who doe labour to take vs aliue, and carrie vs away captiues, & we are not able to vanquish them in fight. For cruelly at the first (when we who coueted libertie, suffered all miserie at the hands of our owne countrie men, and worse at the hands of our enemies) we should haue considered that God who was some time favorable vnto the nation of the Iewes, had now condemned them vnto perdition: for had he yet bene favourable vnto vs, or had hee bene but lightly offended at vs, hee would not haue permitted so many men to haue perished, and haue deliuered his holy Citie into the hands of the enemies to be consumed with fire. And we onely amongst all our nation, hoped to liue in libertie, as though we had no waies offended the diuine maiestie, nor been guiltie of any offence who indeed taught others iniquitie. So you see how we are checked for longing after vaine hope, being brought in to greater extremitie then we expected. Neither hath our Castle by nature inexpugnable, any thing profited vs to our preservation, but wee hauing store of victuals and armour, and al other necessities, haue lost all hope of safetie, God himselfe openly taking it from vs. For the fire that once was carried against our enemies, did not of it selfe returne against vs and vnto the wall wee built. But it was the punishment of our offences, who furiously raged against our owne nation. For the which I request you, let vs not bee punished by the Romans; whose forces are inuincible, but by our selues let vs satisfie the ire of God, and so it will be more tolerable for vs; euen by that meanes our wiues shall die vndeiled, and our children shall not taste of seruile captiuitie. After whose deaths, we will one helpe another to die with credite, conseruing our libertie, which is the best sepulture of all: yet let vs first fire our Castle, and burne our treasure: for it will bee no small griefe vnto the Romanes, if they neither get our bodies aliue, nor can finde any one iot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let vs onely leaue our victuals as sufficient testimony, that famine did not at any time cause vs to be conquered, but that we as at the first wee resolued, preferred also death before bondage.

Elezar hauing thus spoken, they that were present did not all accord vnto him, for some joyfully hastened to execute his aduice, thinking it so glorious a death. But they who moued with compassion towards their wiues and families, were something effeminate, or else abhorred to kill themselves, one looking vpon another with teares, did shew his minde to disagree from that which Elezar perswaded. Which when Elezar perceiued, and that his counsel through feare was defeated, fearing also that they who courageously had accorded thereunto, should bee withdrawn by the teares of others, he did not so end his exhortations; but standing vp, and with a vehement spirit hee began to speake vnto them of the immortalitie of the soule, and fixing his eyes M vpon them that wept, he vied a vehement exclamation, saying.

tion touching the im-mortalitie of the soule.*

How much am I deceiued, who thought that valiant men fighting for their libertie, would rather chooseth to die then to liue, but yee doe shew your selues nothing to excell any ordinarie men, who feare to die, notwithstanding that thereby you may escape great miserie, and calamity,

A calamitie, when in this point you ought not to haue expected any admonition thereunto, nor to haue made any delay to doe it. The ancient customes which haue endured euer since men had reason, the diuine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually been confirmed by the deeds of our predecessours, doe instruct vs, that it is miserie to liue, and not to die. For death freeth our soules from prison vnto their most pure and proper place, where neuer after they shall be touched with any calamitie. Which whilst they are bound in a mortall body, and do participate of his miseries, may probably bee affirmed to bee dead. For it is an vnseemely coniunction for that which is diuine, to bee coupled and connexed vnto that which is mortall. True it is, that our soules can doe much being ioined to our bodies, for they vse the bodies as their instruments secretly producing in them motion, and many other actions paising the nature of mortall things. B But when the soule is loosed from that heauy burthen which doth weigh it downe euen vnto the earth, which hangerth vpon it, and hath receiued his proper habitation, then it enioyeth free and perfect felicitie, and remaineth inuincible to our mortall cies as God himselfe is, neither is it visible in our bodies. For it commeth secretly into them, and so departeth from them againe, that no man can perceiue it, hauing onely a nature incorrupt, and causing a change in our bodies. For whatsoeuer the soule toucheth, that presently liueth and flourisheth; and what it forsaketh, that incontinently withereth and dieth: so much doth it participate of immortalitie. The sleepe maie bee an euident argument vnto you of this which I speake, where the soule not distracted taketh a most pleasant and sweete repose; and communicating with God, it is with him present in euerie place by reason of affinitie, and foretelleth many future euent. Wherefore C should we then feare death, who loue the rest that we take in sleepe? were not he a mad man that for a shorfe life would hinder himselfe of eternall life? It were necessarie that wee who are instructed in the law of our nation, should giue example to other to despise and contemne death. But if wee seeke confirmation hereof from strangers, let vs see the example amongst the wiser sort of the Indians: for they beifig iust men doe tolerate his life as a necessary office of nature for a certaine time, though against their wils; yet do they hasten to vnloose the soule bound in this mortall body, though not urged thereunto by any calamitie or necessitie, but onely for desire of immortalitye, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one seeke to hinder them, but all men esteeming them most fortunate, send by them commendations and other messages vnto their friends departed: so firme is their beliefe that the soules of them that are dead D haue communion and conuersation together: And so they hauing all instruction what to say to the soules departed, doe with great applause leape into the fire, that thereby their soules may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more ioifully with them when they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when hee is to go a great iourney, and they bewaile themselves, not those who are dead and haue attained mortalitye. Shal not wee then be ashamed not to beleue so firmly as the Indians do? despising through our own sloath our countrey lawes which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, supposing that by our law we had bin instructed contrariwise, to wit, that to liue in this life is blisse, and to die is calamitie: yet notwithstanding this present necessity, this present time had bene a sufficient motive to cause vs to embrace death rather then life, seeing that by Gods appointment, and of necessity wee must now E die. In times past it appeareth God so provided, that he shortened their daies of our own nation that would not vse their life as they ought to haue done. I dare not ascribe it vnto the Romans, nor report of our selues that their warres consumed vs all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cause hereof there was which made them conquerours. Which of the Romans slew the Iewes that inhabited at Cæsarea? whom the inhabitants thereof vpon the Sabaoth day, they beeing assembled in one place together with their wiues and children, did massacre, notwithstanding that they had no intent to reuolt from them, nor neuer lifted vp their hands in their owne defence, nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted them of our nation their enemies that reuolted from them. But some may obiekt, the Iewes at Cæsarea, and the inhabitants thereof were alwaies at variance, and that now they reuenged their olde quarrell F hauing gotten opportunitie. What then shall wee say of the Scythopolitans? who bare armes with the Græcians against vs, and denied to assist their owne kinned against the Romans. What profit did they receiue by this their goodwill and fidelitie? for they were altogether with their whole families cruellie slaine, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for hauing withstood vs to haue done the like vnto them; it were too long to recount all things seuerally to this effect. For as ye know there is no Citie in all Syria that hath not massacred the Iewes there inhabiting, biting, being more our enemies then the Romans were, where they of Damascus although they could not deuise any probable cause for it, yet did they massacre all the Iewes living amongst them, who amounted to the number of eightene thousand beside their wiues and families. And as we haue heard it reported, the number of the Iewes slaine by the Egyptians, were about threescor thousand: It may be that finding no aduersitie in a strange country, they were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their owne countrey fought against the Romans, wanted nothing that might haue caused a perfect hope of a full victorie ouer the Romans, they had weapons, armour, walles, and strong holds inexpugnable, their valorous courage in fighting for libertie shunned no daunger, and encouraged men to reuolt: which all, hauing awhile seru'd their turnes, at last was a cause of their greater misery. For all were taken and subdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make their enemies victory more famous, and not to doe them seruice. And we may iustly deeme them happy who were slaine in the warre, for they died in libertie. Yet who doth not pite the multitude of them that fell into the Romans hands; or who would not hasten to die, rather then endure the like misery that they suffered? Some of them being tortured, and some with fire and stripes perished; and others halfe eaten of wilde beasts, were reserved alieue for their second foode: and they are most miserable of all that are yet alieue, who often wish for death and cannot finde it. Where is now that gorgeous Citie? where is it that was once the mother Citie of all the nation of the Iewes? so strengthened with such strong walles, so fortified with towers and castles to defend the walles, scarcely able to containe the prouision made for war, hauing in it so huge a multitude of men to fight for it; what is it now become, wherein God himselfe was thought to dwell? It is now razed downe euen vnto the very foundations; and no other memory or reliques thereof is left standing; their campe is destroyed, onely a few olde men and vnhappy suriue, who sate amongst the ashes of the temple and a few women whome their enemies reserved to satisfy their filthy lust. And will any amongst vs considering all these things, desire to behold the light of the sunne, although hee could liue without molestation? Who is such an enemy to his native soile? who is so effeminate or desirous of his life, that doth not grieve to haue liued till this time? Would God wee had all bene in our graues before wee had seene that sacred citie fired by a hostile hand, before we beheld the holie temple destroyed by impietie: & seeing that the hope we had to be reuenged vpon our enemies is now vanished away, and that we are left alone in miserie & necessitie, let vs hasten to die wel, and take compassion vpon our selues, our wiues, & children, and that whilst we haue time, to compassionate our selues. For both we are borne to die, and all that are begotten by vs, and the strongest men liuing cannot auoid it: but iniurie, and bondage, and to see our wiues and children abused before our faces is no necessitie, proceeding from mans nature, but they onely are forced to endure it, who when they might haue died without it, did refuse for feare. Wee first of all trusting to our strength, rebelled against the Romans; now lastly they exhorting vs to obedience, we denied: which of them then will not be enraged against vs, if they can take vs alieue? Most miserable shall those young men be, whose strength will endure many torments, and those olde men will moue compassion whose aged yeeres cannot suffer tortures; one shall see his wife carried away from him, and another his sonne, hauing his hands bound behind him, crye out vnto his father for helpe: who now whilst they are free from the thraldome of their enemies, may gloriously assist vs with their swords. Let vs with our wiues and children die freemen, let vs altogether depart out of this life. This our religion commandeth, this our wiues and children perswadeth; God himselfe hath driuen vs vnto this necessitie for this purpose. The Romans would haue it otherwise, who feare least any of vs should perish, and not fall into their hands alieue. Let vs therefore hasten, that in steed of their expected hope, whereby they verily perswaded themselves to take vs alieue, we may contrarie to their expectation daunt them with a sodaine admiration of our glorious deaths.

Whilst Eleazar was yet speaking, and desirous still to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: euery one now in a fury bent to follow his aduice, made haste to effect it, and as though they had bene vrged by some spirit thereunto, euery one laboured to prevent one another in the execution thereof, iudging him to shew most valour and fortitude, that first dispatched himselfe. They were also desirous to kill their wiues and their children with themselves. And which is most strange, their mindes were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody worke; but with the same resolution that they had, when they heard Eleazars speech, euery one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reason to take no place, and

A and perswading themselves that thus they had well provided for their children, they all at once embraced their wiues and children for their last farewell, and tooke their leaues of them kissing them with teares, and then at once slew them, as though it had bene done by the hands of other men, and not their owne, comforting themselves being forced so to doe, in that hereby they should escape the tyranny and cruelty of their enemies. Finally, no man was so cowardly, who durst not presume to this action; so euery one of them killed his dearest friends. O miserable people whom necessitie forced to slay their wiues and children, accounting the action thereof to bee the very least of all their miseries. Wherefore now not enduring the griefe that ensued vpon this fact, & thinking that in liuing any while after them, they should iniure them whom they had slaine, they with all speed possible gathered all their riches together and set them on fire: which

B done, they elected ten by lot, who should slay the rest, euery one prostrating himselfe vpon his wife and children, & embracing them in his armes, and was so slaine willingly by them that executed that wretched office: who hauing without feare dispatched them, they cast lots whose fortune it was to kill all the rest, and he vpon whom the lot did fall, should kill the other nine, and lastly himselfe vpon them all, euery one so encouraging one another, that there was no difference between them that were to be killed, and them that were to kill, & so the rest offered themselves to death: which done, one who was the last of all, being yet alieue, went amongst the dead bodies & searched to see if none liued that needed his hand in so great a multitude of slaine people, and finding all of them dispatched, he went and fired the palace: which done, hee with all his force thrust his sword into his owne body vp to the hiles, and so fell downe by his dearest friends.

C In this manner they died, thinking they had left no one alieue to haue fallen into the Romanes hands, but one certaine olde woman, and another that was Eleazars cousin, who in learning and wisdom surpassed all other women, and five children, who all hid themselves in a caue wherein water was reserved to drinke, whilst the rest were busied in this massacre, who were in number 900 and 60 beside women and children. This calamitie hapned the fifteenth day of Aprill. In the morning the Romanes expecting that the Iewes would fight with them, made bridges from their mounts vnto the wals, and so assaulted the walles: and seeing none of their enemies appeare, but all the walles wasted & on fire, and deepe silence in euery place, they could not coniecture what was done, and at last they made a crie at once, as though they had been beating the walles with a Ramme, thereby to see if they could make any enemies come out. The women in the vaults heard this crie, and coming forth, they declared vnto the Romanes all that had hapned, one of them relating vnto them the euent of all the whole matter: yet for all this the Romanes did not easily beleue her words, by reason of the greatnes of that fact, but they endeauored to quench the fire, and passing through it, they presently came into the palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies, yet they did not insult ouer them as their enemies, but admired that so many should be so obstinately minded to despise death.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the death of the Sicarians that were fled vnto Alexandria and Thebes.

HE Castle being thus taken, the generall of the Romanes leauing a garrison there, went vnto Cæsarea, for there was no one enemy left in all that country, but now all Iudæa was destroyed through continuance of long wars, and many of that nation though far distant from it, tasted of those troubles: for it so fell out that afterward many Iewes perished in Egypt at Alexandria: for those Sicarians who had escaped thither, were not content to be safe and free from daunger, but there also they attempted alteration, and to defend their liberty against the Romanes, esteeming themselves nothing inferiour vnto them, and that onely God was their Lord. And some of the noble race of the Iewes, seeking to withstand that their enterprise, were by these Sicarians slaine: which was no sooner done, but they exhorted the people to reuolt. The chiefe and elders of the Iewes seeing this, and that they could not repress them without daunger, they assembled all the Iewes together, and declared vnto them the temeritie of these Sicarians, shewing them to be the authors of all the misery that had befallen the Iewes, and that now notwithstanding they were escaped, yet they were not certaine of their liues; for that if they were knowne, the Romanes would presently put them to death, and draw them also into the like miserie, who were not partakers of their wickednes. Wherefore they admonished G the multitude to beware lest they drew themselves into the same danger, wherein they were, and to make satisfaction vnto the Romans for themselves by deliuering such people vnto them. The Iewes were perswaded by these speeches: and foreseeing the danger that might ensue, they furiously assaulted the Sicarians, & tooke of them six hundred: & shortly after those who there escaping, fled into Egypt and Thebes, were taken and brought backe againe; whose hard hearted obstinacie was so great, that none can without admiration, heare of. For notwithstanding that all torments & tortures that could be deuised were inflicted vpon them, only to force them to confesse that Cæsar was their Lord, yet no one of them would say so, nor make any shew thereof, but all persevered in their former opinion, as though the bodie tormented had beene dead, and not aliue. Moreouer their children were most to be admired, for not one of them could bee H constrained to call Cæsar Lord. So much did their boldnes overcome the torments inflicted vpon their bodies.

CHAP. XXX.

How the temple of Onias at Alexandria was shut vp.

That time Lupus was gouernour of Alexandria, who with all speed by letters gaue Cæsar notice of these troubles. And Cæsar, seeing that it was necessarie to beware of the Iewes, who were naturally enclined to ledition and vnquietnes, fearing also that they would once againe gather themselves together, and cause some to ioinc with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the temple, which Onias erected in Egypt, which was builded and named vpon this occasion. Onias the sonne of Simon one of the high priests, being driuen out of Ierusalem, Antiochus king of Syria then warring against the Iewes, he came vnto Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Ptolomeus who was then also enemie vnto Antiochus, affirming that he would annex vnto his countrey the people of the Iewes, if hee would agree to that which hee required. The king according to all that could be granted, hee requested him to permit him to build a Temple in some place of his countrey, and that hee might worship God therein according to the custome of their countrey: for so the Iewes would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their temple at Ierusalem, and be friendly vnto him, and many of them did K flie vnto him for religion sake. Ptolomeus agreed so to doe, and gaue him a peece of ground for that purpose, a hundred and fourescore stounds from Memphis, in that place which was called the way to Heliopolis: where Onias building a castle, made also a temple vnlike to that of Ierusalem; but he erected a tower like that of Ierusalem, with stones, that was threecore cubits long, and he built an altar after the fashion of that of his countrey, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (saue onely a candlesticke) which had in steede thereof a lampe to giue light, which he caused to be hung before the Altar in a golden chaine, and he inuironed all the temple with a wall made of bricke, and the gates he made of stone, and the king granted vnto it great reuenues of money and ground, to the intent that the priests might haue abundance of all things vvch they required.

Onias temple

But Onias did not this with a good conscience, but for that hee was at variance with the Iewes of Ierusalem, for that they forced him to flie: and hee perswaded himselfe that by the building of this temple, he might withdraw all men from Ierusalem thither; and of this, there was a prophetic nine hundred threecore and ten yeeres before, and Esaias foretold that a certaine Iewe should build a temple in Egypt. And thus that temple was built, and Lupus hauing receiued the Emperours letters went vnto the temple, & taking away certaine gifts from it, he shut it vp: And after him Paulinus who succeeded in his steed, left not one gift there (for he threatened the priests if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any that came thither for to sacrifice to come neere it; but shutting vp the gate thereof, hee left no signe of diuine seruice there, and from the time it was built till the time it was shut vp, were three hundred thirty and three yeeres.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Massacre of the Iewes at Cyrene.

He boldnesse of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease infected also the townes about Cyrene. For one Iohn, a weauer, and a wicked man hauing escaped, perswaded manie simple people to follow him, and led them into the wilderness, promising to shew them signes and visions, and thus he deceived the simplest sort of the Iewes: but the noblest of them of Cyrene vnderstanding his deceit, gaue Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Gouernour of Lybia; who sending horsemen & footmen, did easily surprisethem being vnarmed, and the most part of them were slaine, yet some were taken aliue, and brought to Catullus. But their leader Ionathas at that time escaped: yet being diligently laid and sought for, ouer all those Countreies, he was at last taken, and being brought vnto Catullus, he sought to delay his owne punishment, in offering an occasion of iniquitie vnto Catullus. For hee accused the richest amongst the Iewes, to haue beene his aduersers to doe this matter. Catullus was glad of those allegations, and exaggerated his accusations very much with tragicall tearmes, so that he seemed to haue made an end of the warres against the Iewes, and which was worst of all to be content to credite whatsoeuer was maliciously spoken: hee himselfe instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Iew, whom he had long hated, and his wife Berenice, he put them first of all to death, and after them all that were well monied, who amounted to the number of three thousand, and this he thought he did without controule, because he confiscated their possessions vnto Cæsar. And least that any Iew liuing in any other place should complaine of his iniustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off, and perswaded Ionathas and certaine others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trustie and faithfull Iewes at Rome and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falselie accused, was named Ioseph, who writ this Historie. But this deuise of Catullus had not such successe as he hoped: for hee came to Rome, and brought Ionathas & the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquirie would be made of the falsse accusations inuented by himselfe.

A part of Ionathas companions were taken & slaine, the rest kept captiue aliue & brought to Catullus.

Three thousand Iewes slaine by Catullus.

Ioseph by Catullus perswaded is accused by Ionathas.

Ionathas being first beaten, is burnt aliue.

The conclusion of the seauen bookes of the warres of the Iewes.

D But Vespasian suspecting the matter, made diligent inquirie to know the truth: & finding these crimes iniuriously imposed vpon those men, at Titus intreatie, hee acquitted them, and punished Ionathas according to his desert; who being first whipped, was afterward burned aliue. And Catullus at that time, by reason of the mildnesse of the Emperour, had nothing said vnto him, but not long after he fell into a grieuous disease, and was cruelly tormented, not onely in body, but also in mind. For he was greatly terrified, and still imagined to see the ghosts of them whom he had so vniustly slaine, ready to kil him; so that he cried out, and not able to containe himselfe, leapt out of his bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this disease daily increasing on, his guts and bowels rotting and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leaving behind him an euident argument, that the diuine iustice doth punish impious malefactors.

E And this is the end of the Historie, which we promised to be set downe with all fidelitie, for them that are desirous to know the euent of the warres, between the Iewes and the Romanes. And as for our stile, we leaue it to the iudgement of the Reader: but touching the veritie of the Historie, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I doe affirme that to be the onely scope, which I aimed at in this whole worke.

Suppose (O thou worthiest amongst worthy men, Epaphroditus) that I haue sufficiently testified vnto them, who shall reade those bookes which I haue written, as touching the autentique historie of the Iewes, that our nation is most auncient, and that they haue had their originall from themselves, and haue from the first beginning inhabited that Countrey, whereof they are now possessed at this present. To which effect I haue gathered out of our sacred writings, and published in the Greeke tongue, a Historie containing the occurrences of fise thousand yeeres. And for that I see there are diuers, who (beeing too much addicted and seduced, by the scandalous blasphemies and reports, which some of those who are lewdly affected towards vs, haue misconceited and misbelieved that which I haue written of our antiquitie, & labour to approue our nation to be moderne, because none of the most auncient and most renowned Historiographers among the Grecians, haue thought our ancestors worthy to be enrowled in their writings: I haue for these causes held it a part of my dutie to write some short treatise hereupon; both to reprove the euill intent and affected lying of those our calumners, as also to correct their ignorance, by teaching those who are desirous to know the truth, what the originall of our nation is. For prooffe wherof, I will produce no other testimonie then those, who from antiquitie haue bene iudged worthy of credit among the Greekes, laying open before their eyes, that they who haue slanderously and falsely written against vs, are conuicted by their owne mouthes: I will also enforce my selfe to expresse the causes, wherein very few Grecians haue made mention of vs in their Histories; and moreover, I will make it known to those that are ignorant (either in effect or in pretence) who they haue bene that omitted not our Historie. First of all therefore, I doe not a little maruaile at those (who in respect of antiquitie) suppose that the truth ought onely to be gathered from the Greekes: and that they iustly may claime the honour and knowledge of faithfull writing, whereas they neither vouchsafe either vs, or any others, the credit or truth in that wee set downe, although I am able to proue, that all things haue fallen out quite contrarie. For vvhich cause it behoueth vs not to looke vnto mens various opinions, but to examin that which is right, and gather the same by the effects. For all that whatsoever is set downe by the Greekes is new, & of late memorie, and hath bene brought to execution, in a manner but yesterday: I meane the foundations of Cities, the inuentions of Arts, and the descriptions of Lawes, & the latest practise amongst them, hath been, and is, the diligent trauaile in Historie.

But among the Egyptians, Chaldeis and Phœnicians (for I presume not to compare my countreimen with them) as they themselves confesse, the memorie of their writings is most auncient and infallible. For all these nations dwell in such countries as are not subiect to the corruption of aire; and haue carefully provided, that none of those things that haue been done by them should

A should sleepe in obscuritie, but should bee kept in memorie in the publike writings of the learnedest men: whereas innumerable corruptions haue crept in among the Greekes, by which the memorie of things forepassed, is defaced. But they alwaies who haue established new estates, haue each of them supposed in their owne behalfe, that whoeuer was of theirs, he was the first of the world. Yet notwithstanding they haue had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and haue attained the same with very great difficultie. For they that speake of the most auncient vie of the same, doe boast & glorifie themselves, that they haue receiued the knowledge thereof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithstanding, there is not any one of them that can shew any record of that time, either in their temple, or in their publike registers: whereas after there arose a great doubt and question, whether those letters were in vie during their time, who since

B haue for the space of many yeeres continued the siege before Troy. And in sooth, their opinion who affirme that they were ignorant of the vie of those letters, which are at this present allowed & accustomed amongst vs, is not to be refused. For it is most manifest that there is not any writing extant among the Greekes that is more auncient then Homers poesie, which as it is most manifest, hath been in allowance and continuance since the time of the siege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that hee left no part of that his poesie in writing, which was composed of diuers songs, and onely sung by roat, by which meanes it came to passe, that there are so many contradictions in the same. And as touching those who haue vnderaken to write histories among the, I meane Cadmus the Milesian, & Acusilaus the Argiue; and after him if there were any others, they were not aliue, but very little time before the passage of the Persians into Greece. Furthermore, they who among the Greekes were the first that introduced Philology; and the knowledge of celestiall and diuine things, that is to say, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, these all of them confesse with one accord, that being instructed by the Egyptians and Chaldeis, they haue published some few writings, which are supposed to bee the most auncient that are among the Greekes, and it is hardly belieued also that they were written by them. What reason therefore haue the Greekes to be so proud, as if there were none but themselves onely, who knew the affaires of antiquitie, and could exactly expresse their truth and veritie? Or who cannot easily coniecture by their owne Writers themselves, that their writings were onely vpon hearefay & supposition, and that their stile was onely tied to their vaine coniectures. Hence commeth it to passe, that in their bookes they cauill and reprove one another, & make no conscience to maintaine and write contradictions in one and the same things.

D But it may be laid, that I taske my selfe to a fruitlesse labour, if I should goe about to informe those who are better experienced then my selfe; in how many points Hellanicus differeth from Acusilaus as touching the Genealogie: in how many places Acusilaus hath corrected Herodotus; or how Ephorus hath approued that Hellanicus was a liar in the greater part of that which hee reciteth. Ephorus hath been reproved by Timaeus; and in generall, all them haue taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timaeus vouchsafed to accord with Antiochus, or Philistus, or Callias, in the Histories of Sicily. Neither haue they who haue written the histories of Athens, or those who haue entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon vp those who in particular haue entreated of Cities, or of succinct and short matters: whereas in the description of the Persian warre, and those exploits that were performed therein, those of greatest authoritie are most

discord among the Iewes.

E at oddes. Thucydides is accused by some for a liar in diuers places, notwithstanding that hee seemeth to haue described the historie of his time most exactly. But the causes of this discord are diuers, and it may be that they who shall narrowly pry into them, shall find more. For mine owne part those two which I shall heere set downe in my opinion are of greatest weight. The first, and in my iudgement the chiefe, is, that amongst the Greekes, from the beginning wee haue not bene industrious to keepe publike registers of such matters as happened in any time or place, which hath made them erre, and giuen those a priuiledge to lie, who afterwards would looke to write any thing of such matters as were acted long since. Neither are the other Greekes onely to be touched with this negligence for not making account of such registers, but amongst the Athenians also (who are reputed to be glorious for the antiquitie of their countrey, and who are exercised in sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is said, that the most auncient and publike writings which they haue, are those capitall lawes which were set down by their lawmaker Draco, who liued but a little time before Pisistratus tyrannie. What need wee speake of the Arcades, who vaunt themselves of their antiquities? For they haue learned the vie of letters with verie great difficultie, and sometime after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing published true historie.

lished before that time which might instruct those that would learne or reprehend those that published vntruths, from thence it is, that so many differences haue happened among Historiographers. A second cause is, for that they who addicted themselves to compile histories, did not busie themselves about the inquisition of the truth (notwithstanding that each of them did ordinarilie promise no lesse) but they laboured to expresse how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole studie thereon, as the onely meane whereby they hoped to obtaine reputation about the rest. Some of them therefore addicted their stiles to fables, other some by flattering praises thought to corie fauour with kings and Cities. The rest enforced their studies to accusations by obiecting the worke of the writer thereof, vnder trust to get the more credite thereby. In effect they haue followed that course in composing their historie, that was euery way different from the true nature thereof. (For the assured signe of a perfect and true history is, whereas all men accord both in worde and writing in setting downe the same thing:) and they who haue written diuersly, made men beleue that they were the truest amongst all the rest. We ought therefore to grant the superioritie to the Grecians in all that which concerneth eloquence, and the ornament of language, but not in that which appertaineth to antiquitie or truth of Historie, and especially when the question is, what each man writ as touching his owne nation.

Seeing therefore that both the Egyptians and Babylonians long time since vsed all diligence in writing, inasmuch as their priests were hereunto enioined, who did most curiously entreat of all such points: the same also did the Chaldeis amongst the Babylonians, and the Phœnicians also (inhabiting amongst the Greekes) vsed lawes (both concerning priuate and publike affaires) which because all men confesse it, I will omit to speake of. I let passe also to recount what care our nation had of this point (no doubt greater then those nations about mentioned had) charging our high priests and prophets, to execute this office, which custome hath been obserued euen vntill this our age: yea (and if I may presume so far) will bee obserued in all succeeding ages, as by the scope of my speech ensuing, I will endeour to make manifest. For our nation did not onely depute this office to the most iust men amongst them in the beginning, and vnto such as were alwaies ready to appeale the heauy displeasure, and wrath of God kindled against them; but they also provided to preferue the line and descent of priests from all impuritie, and from being intermingled with others. For no man amongst vs can be a priest, who is not borne of a woman descended from the priests line; neither in this case is any respect made either of riches or honours: but the partie who claimeth the dignitie of priesthood, must by many witnesses proue his Genealogie, and that hee is descended from priests. This custome is not onely of force in Iewrie, our owne cuntry, but wheresoeuer else any of our nation inhabite, as in Egypt, and Babylon, and in any other place, where continuallie the priests in their marriages haue this respect not to marrie with any woman that is not of their own line, & they send vnto Ierusalem the name and pedigree of the woman whom they haue married, and al testimony hereof which they can deduce from her ancestors. Now if warres molest our nation (as often they haue) in the time of Antiochus surnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the great, Quintilius Varo, and especiallie in this our age, then those priests who suruiue make new Genealogies, and pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foresaid women, that are not deuoured by the fury of war. For they come vnto these women, not fearing the company of strangers amongst whom they liue: yea this is an euident token of the priests integrity, that euery priest during the reuolution of two thousand yeeres are registred together with the names of their fathers, and if any one doe erre or falsifie any of the things before said, he is then interdicted from the altar, and from exercising any priestly function. So that in the writings of such men all things must of necessitie be true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any dissonance and disagreement is found in their writings. For such things as past in auncient times quite beyond the memorie of men, were only written by our Prophets, who had the knowledge therof by inspiration from God himselfe: but other things of latter time are onely recorded by those, who liued in the age wherein the things they writ of were done. The bookes amongst vs containing the histories of all ages, are neither infinit nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in two and twentie bookes, to which bookes it is impierie to deny credite.

Fiue of these bookes were written by Moses, comprehending Genealogies, and the beginning of mankind, and such notable events as hapned euen from the beginning of the world vntill his death, which is little lesse then three thousand yeeres. After the death of Moses vntill the time wherein

A wherein Artaxerxes liued, who was king of the Persians, & sonne to Xerxes, the Prophets of our nation euery one writ the historie of his time wherein he liued, so that of these mens writings we haue thirteene bookes: the four other bookes which make vp the number already mentioned, are knowne to containe holy Hymnes dedicated vnto GOD, and whollome precepts for mans life and conuersation. All things which from Artaxerxes vntill our time haue hapned, are also set downe in writing: yet the bookes wherein they are registred, do not deserue so much credite, as the former of auncient times, for that there was no certaine iucelusion of Prophets in this age. Moreover, it is euident, that to the former works we giue as great credite, as to the things we our selues write, & notwithstanding they haue been so long written, yet in all that time no man durst presume either to alter or to blot out any thing therein contained. For all Iewes euen from their cradle do beleue these bookes to be sacred, holy, and diuine, and therefore doe giue all credite possible vnto them, and so would willingly suffer death, rather then to doe the contrarie. Many captiues also of our nation haue already been cruelly tormented, and diuers waies put to death in open theaters, only for that they would not commit any thing, either in word or deed against their lawes, nor violate the writings of their forefathers. Now who amongst the Greekes did euer sustaine the like? nay they are so far frō doing it, that none can be found amongst them who would suffer any losse in his goods, or fortunes, thereby to preferue all the writings of their nation from perdition: & the reason heereof is, that euery one esteemeth the veritie of their Histories to depend vpon the vwill of the VVriter. And this they doe also of their most auncient Historiographers and not without cause: for they euery day see men of their owne times, writing Histories of matters past long before in former ages, wherein neither themselves were present, neither yet vouchsafe they to credit the writings of such as were then eye-witnesses thereof, yea some amongst them haue divulged Histories of such things as of late befell our nation, when themselves neuer haue been in the place where such matters past as they did write of were, nor haue liued in any neighbour place, where they might haue probable report how matters past, but onely making a few centones or broken newes, they most impudently arrogate vnto their patcht stuffe, the name of a Historie.

I my selfe haue composed a most true Historie of those warres, and of euery particular thing there done, as well I might, hauing been present in all those affaires. For I was capitaine of the Galileans amongst our nation, so long as any resistance could be made against the Romans: and then it so fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and being prisoner vnto Titus and Vespasian, they caused me to be an eye-witness of all things that past. First in bonds and fetters, & afterwa. d freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the siege of Ierusalem. So that nothing could then passe whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman armie, I committed to writing all things with all possible diligence. My selfe also did only manage all matters disclosed vnto the Romans by such as yeelded themselves, for that I only did perfectly vnderstand them. Lastly, being at Rome, and hauing now leisure, all businesse being past, I vied the help of some (for the puritie of the Greeke tongue) and so I published a history of all that had hapned in the foresaid wars: which Historie of mine is so true, that I feare not to call Vespasian & Titus Emperours in those warres to witness for them. I first gaue a copie of that booke to them, afterwards to many noble Romans, who also were present in those warres, I told also many of them to our owne nation, to such as vnderstood the Greeke language, amongst whom were Iulius, Archilaus, Herod the honest, and the most worthy king Agrippa, who all doe testifie that my historie containeth nothing but truth: Who would not haue bene silent, if in any thing eyther for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithstanding all this, some ill disposed persons endeour to discredit my historie, as though they were disputing pro and contra amongst children in schooles, being sometime on a suddaine to forge a feined accusation, and otherwise to feine a slanderous and iuddaine detraction, neuer considering that he who promiseth other men a true relation of matters past, must either bee priuie vnto them by his owne knowledge, as hauing bene present in the affaires, or else haue that which hee speaketh from other mens mowthes by report of them vho knowe them: both which I haue done. For I gathered my other bookes of Antiquitie out of holy Scripture, being my selfe a Priest, and skillfull in our law, and the historie of our wars I haue written my selfe being an agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witness of the rest; so that nothing was said or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any man excuse them from impudencie and malice, vho labour against me to proue my relation false? They perhaps alledge that they haue read the com-mentarie mentarie containing the Emperours acts, yet for all this they were not present in any action, repugnant to that, which my historie recounteth.

Thus haue I (as I thought it necessary) made a digression to shew how they are able to performe their word, who discrediting my historie, promise to set downe truth in writing. I haue also sufficiently (as I think) demonstrated, that the registring of things is more ancient amongst other nations, then amongst the Greekes. I will now first of all dispute against those, who with all might and maine labour to prouoe our nation of no antiquitie, for that (as they say) no Greeke Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth prooffe and testimonie of the antiquitie hereof out of other Writers, & so I will shew that their tongues are no slander, who seeke to discredit our nation. First therefore our nation, neither inhabiteth a country bordering vpon the sea, neither are we delighted in merchandise, nor for this cause wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our cities are situate farre from the sea in a most fertile soile, which we till with all industry, and our whole induours are how to get foode for our children, & to keepe our country lawes, and how to leaue vnto our posteritie the knowledge of pietie, which vvorke we thinke all our age ought to be employed in. Beside all this before mentioned, we haue a forme of liuing, different from all other nations: all which concurring together, we had no need to traffike with the Greekes, as the Egyptians and the Phoenicians doe, who giue themselves to bargaining and merchandise onely for the couetousnesse of money. Neither were our ancestors delighted in thefts and robberies, nor did our fathers make war vpon any nation for desire of larger possessions, notwithstanding our country was furnished with many thousands of strong warlike men. Wherefore the Phoenicians sayling vnto the Greekes to traffick with them, they were thus made knowne vnto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other nations, who sayling vpon the seas, brought merchandise into Greece. The Medes also and Persians were known vnto them, after such time as they openly raigned ouer Asia, and the Persians warred euen vnto the other opposite continent.

Moreover, the Greekes knew the Thracians, because they were their neighbours, & the Scythians by sayling to Pontus, and finally all that were disposed to write, knew all the nations bordering either vpon the Easterne and Westerne seas, but such as dwelt furre from the sea and seacoast, were long time vnknowne, as also appeareth in Europe: for neither Thucydides nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome, notwithstanding that so long since it was so mightie, and made so great warres; yet at last, with much adoe the Greekes heard of it. Yea their most curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were so ignorant of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a people onely denominated of one cite, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabit a vast country, and a great part of the westerne world. Likewise the said Greeke Writers relate the manner of the foresaid people to be such, as neither are, nor were ever vied amongst them. And the onely cause why they were ignorant of the truth, was the distance of the place, and these Writers would seeme to tell something which others of former time had not spoken of. No maruel therefore though our nation was vnknowne, and none of them in their writings made any mention of vs, being both so farre from the sea, and liuing after a different manner.

Put case therefore that I denied the Greekes to be of any antiquitie, and to prouoe my assertion I should conclude their nation to be moderne, for that our histories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reason, and vse the testimonie of their neighbour nations to prouoe their antiquity? I therefore will do the like, & vse the testimony of the Egyptians & Phoenicians, whose records the Greekes cannot denie. For all Egyptians in generall are our enemies, and amongst the Phoenicians they especially of Tyre; Which I cannot iustly say of the Chaldeis, who haue been Princes ouer our nation, and because of their affinitie and alliance with our countrymen, haue in their Chronicles made mention of the Iewes. Yet when I haue prouoed what I now asserre, and refelled the slanderous reports against vs, I will then also shew who amongst the Greekes speake of vs, that so the Greekes may also be deprived of this shift, and refuge, to excuse their malicious lies falsely forged against our nation. And first of all I will beginne with the writings of the Egyptians, who as they well know, doe nothing at all fauour vs. Wherefore Manethon and Egyptian borne, skilfull in the Greeke tongue, as by his works appeares (for he writ in Greeke) compiling a historie of the customes and religion of his forefathers, collected (as himselfe reporteth) out of the Egyptians holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much helpe the Egyptians. This Manethon, in his second booke of the Manethon an Egyptian writer.

A Egyptian customes saith thus (I will set downe his owne words, because I vse them for a witness.) Wee had a king (quoth he) named Timaus, in whose raigne God being angry with vs, contrary to all expectation, an obscure people taking courage, came from the East, and pitching their Tents in our countrie conquered it by force, no man resisting them, and committing our princes to bonds, did finally burne our Cities, and destroy the temples of our Gods, and behaued themselves most cruelly against all the Inhabitants, killing many of them, and making slaues of the rest with their wiues and children: finally, they chose a King amongst themselves, who should be then of our Countrie, his name was Saltis, who comming to Memphis, made both the higher and lower Prouince tributaries, leauing garrisons in strong holds, and fortifying those places in the East: Likewise foreseeing that the Assyrians were more mighty then hee, and would inuade his countrie, he found out in this Prouince a citie called Saitre fit for his purpose, being situate on the East side of the riuer Bubastis, which by an ancient diuine was called Auaris, hee builded vp this Citie and compassed it with most huge wals, and placed in it two hundred thousand armed men to keepe it. This Saltis came in haruest time, to the intent that hee might both paie his souldiers, and be a terrour vnto other people, and after hee had raigned nineteene yeeres hee died.

After him succeeded another King called Beon, who raigned foure and fortie yeeres, next to him Aphinas, who raigned thirtie six yeeres and leuen moneths, then Aphosis, who raigned threescore and one yeeres, and then Sandas who raigned fiftie yeeres and one moneth, after them all raigned Asis, nine and fortie yeeres and two moneths, and these sixe were the first Kings amongst them, euer destroying and warring vpon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguishe their race. This nation was called Hiclos, which significth kings shepheards, for Hic in the sacred tongue, significth a King, and Sos a shepheard or shepheards, according to the common speech, and Hicfos is a compound word. Some say these people were Arabians, but in other coppies I finde that Hicfos, is not interpreted kings shepheards, but shepheards that were captiues: for Hic and Hae also when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue signific a captiue, and this latter exposition seemeth to me to be the truest, for it is more agreeable with the historie. Wherefore Manethon reporteth these foresaid kings and shepheards to haue ruled Egypt five hundredth and eleven yeeres: and after these the king of Thebes, and the king of the residue of Egypt, vnting their forces together, inuaded the said shepheards, and held on great and long warres against them, and that the said shepheards were overcome by the king Alisfragumthosis, also that then they lost all Egypt which he had in their power, and that they were shut vp in a place called Auaris containing ten thousand acres of ground, which as Manethon reporteth these shepheards enuironed round about with a huge wall, to the end that all their whole prouision might be fortified, and all their praies which they got, defended. Moreover, that Themos sonne of the said Alisfragumthosis endeauoured by force to subdue them, and for this cause besieged them with foure hundredth and 80000 armed men: and at last despairing to take them by siege, hee couenanted with them that they should safely depart out of Egypt whether they would; and that they vpon these conditions together with all their families and goods and cattle departed out of Egypt into the wilderness, and so into Syria, being in number two hundredth and fortie thousand, & that E fearing the puissance of the Assyrians who at that time raigned in Asia, they builded a city in the countrie now called Iudaea, which they made so large as that it might receiue them all, and this citie they called Ierusalem. Further the said Manethon in an other booke of the Egyptians affaires saith, that in the holy writings hee findeth the foresaid shepheards called captiues, wherein hee saith most true. For our aunccestors were wont to feede cattle, and so leading a pastorall life, were called shepheards, neither are they vniuistly called captiues for our forefather Ioseph told the king of Egypt that he was a captiue, & long time after he called his brethren into Egypt by the kings command; but we will hereafter examine this point more straightly: I wil now cite the testimonie of the Egyptians concerning this point, and also relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befell, who sayeth as followeth.

F After that the nation of shepheards were departed out of Egypt vnto Ierusalem, king Themos who draue them out of the land, raigned twenty five yeeres and foure moneths, and then dyed: and his sonne Chebron succeeded him, who raigned thirteene yeeres, and after him Amenophis twentie yeeres and seuen moneths; next, his sister Amesses one and twenty yeeres and nine moneths, then raigned Mephios twelue yeeres and nine moneths, & Mephramuthosis twentie five yeeres and ten moneths, Thimos nine yeeres and eight moneths, Amenophis thirtie yeeres and ten moneths, Orus thirrie fixe yeeres and fixe monethes, after him his daughter Achemcheres, G twelve yeeres and one moneth, and the brother of Rathosis nine yeeres, Achencheres twelue yeeres and fixe moneths, another Achencheres twelue yeeres and three monethes, Armais foure yeeres and one moneth, Armejis one yeere and foure moneths, Armejesmamus threescore and fixe yeeres and two moneths, Amenaphis nineteene yeeres and fixe moneths. Moreover that Sethosis hauing made readie a huge armie both of foote and horſe, and also a Nauie at Sea, left the gouernment of Egypt vnto his brother Armais, and permitted vnto him all other kingly authoritie, onelic forbidding him to weare a Diademe, and to oppresse the Queene, mother to his children, commanding him also to abstaine from the rest of the kings concubines. And Sethosis himselfe went to Cyprus and Phoenicia, against the Assyrians and Medes, & subdued them all, partly by the sword, partly by feare of his power and greatnes: and being proud of all this his fortunate successe, hee bent himselfe against the Easterne countrie, and destroyed with fire and sword the cities of that place, with whole Prouinces: and spending much time in these wars, his brother Armais whom hee left in Egypt, did without feare commit all that hee forbad him to doe, for hee oppressed the Queene violently, and daillie lay with the rest of the kings concubins, and being thereto counselled by his friends, he put a crowne vpon his head and rebelled against his brother. Also that hee who was then chiefe of the Egyptians holy customes, sent letters vnto Sethosis containing all that had happened, and how Armais had rebelled against him; who returning to Pelusa, came and enioied againe his own kingdome which by his name was called Egypt: for Menethon writeth that this Sethosis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danaus.

Thus farre Manethon, out of whome it is euident by computation of the foresaid times, that our nation was deliuered out of Egypt, three hundred ninety and three yeeres before Danaus, and inhabited this countrie of Iudæa so long, before Danaus came vnto Argos: notwithstanding the Inhabitants of Argos boast their Citie is most ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for vs out of the Egyptian letters: first that wee came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their countrie againe, & that so long agoe, as it was almost a thousand yeeres before the Trojan warres. Touching those things which Manethon professeth himselfe, not to haue gathered out of the writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certaine tales and reports, I will hereafter shew, how they are alleadged without any reason for them. For I wil once againe leaue these, and go to the testimonie of the Phoenicians, which they writ concerning our K nation. The Tyrians therefore haue Chronicles of very great antiquitie, which they haue kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath bene done amongst them, and indeed they are worthe of memorie. Amongst these Records it is written, that king Salomon built a Temple at Ierusalem, a hundred fortie three yeeres and eight moneths, before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they haue registred the building of our Temple, for Hiramus King of the Tyrians, was our king Salomons friend, obliged vnto him for his fathers sake, who for this cause allo of his owne liberalitie, gaue Salomon a hundred and twenty talents of golde towards the building of the Temple, and cut downe the most goodly wood called Libanus, which hee bestowed vpon him, to make the rooſe of the Temple withal: for which bounty, Salomon gaue him againe many liberal gifts, and among the rest a countrie of Galilee named Zabulon: but Salomons wisdom was the chiefe cause of this kings friendship towards him. For they sent problemes one to the other to be answered, and Salomon in his answeres appeared most wittie, as also hee did in many things else; & euen vntill this day, many of their Epistles sent one vnto another, are kept amongst the Tyrians. And that I doe not feare the authoritie amongst the Tyrians, I wil proue by the testimonie of Dius, a man who by common consent hath faithfully written the Phoenician historie, wherein he writeth as followeth.

After the death of Abibalus, Hiramus his sonne reigned in his steade, who encreased the number of his Easterne Cities, and enlarged Ierusalem, hee also iointed the Temple of Iupiter Olympius, situate in an Iland, vnto it, filling vp the water with earth, and adorned it with golden gifts. After this ascending into Libanus, he cut downe the wood to build temples, and that the king of Ierusalem named Salomon, sent vnto him certaine riddles to be expounded, and he againe the like vnto him, couenāting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one an others riddles, should pay vnto the other a summe of mony, & that Hiramus cōfessing he could not expound Salomons riddles, did pay vnto him much mony: Lastly that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the said riddles, & writ more vnto Salomon, which if Salomon could not interpret he should

A should pay vnto Hiramus a summe of money, and this testimonie Dius beareth vs concerning the foresaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Ephesian, who hath registred the acts of all kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true historie out of the writings of euery country. This man writing of the Tyrian kings, and comming to Hiramus he saith thus of him. Abibalus dying, there succeeded in the kingdome his sonne Hiramus, who liued 34. yeeres: and this king with a rampire conioined Eurichorus, and created there a pillar of gold in Iupiters temple, and went into the woods, and cut downe the Cedars of Libanus to make coverings for the temples; of which, pulling downe the olde; hee erected new and dedicated the temple of Hercules and Astartus, but that to Hercules in the moneth of Peritius, and then the other to Astartus, when hee with an armie went against the Tyrians, who did not pay him B tribute, whom when he had subdued, he returned againe.

At this time also liued Abdemonus a seruant vnto the king, who was wont to expound the parables, which king Salomon of Ierusalem sent vnto king Hiramus: now how long it was from this kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his son Belestartus succeeded him, who liued forty and three yeeres, & reigned leuen: after him his sonne Abdastartus, who liued twenty yeeres, and reigned nine; but this king was treacherously slaine by the foure sonnes of his nurse, the eldest of whom reigned twelue yeeres. Next whom, Astartus the sonne of Belestartus, who liued fortie and foure yeeres, and reigned twelue: after him ruled his brother Astartimus, who liued fiftie and foure yeeres, and saie in the kingdome nine, then hee was slaine of his brother Phelletes, who reigned eight monethes, and liued fiftie yeeres, and was slaine by a priest of Astarta named Itobalus, who liued threescore and eight, & reigned thirrie two yeeres, him succeeded his sonne Badezorus, who liued fortie fixe yeeres, and reigned six yeeres, to him succeeded his sonne Mettinus, who liued thirrie two yeeres, and reigned nine. After him Pigmalion who liued fiftie fixe yeeres, and reigned fortie; in the seuenth yeere of whose raigne, his sister Dido builded a Citie in Africa, and named it Carthage: so that from the time of king Hiramus vnto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred and fiftie fixe yeeres, and two monethes: and for as much as the temple of Ierusalem was built in the twelfth yeere of Hiramus his raigne, the computation of the time since that yeere vntill the building of Carthage is 143 yeeres, and 8 monethes. What neede wee alleadge more, seeing this testimonie of the Phoenicians? The truth is now sufficiently made manifest: for our D ancestors must needs haue come into this countrie we inhabite, before such time as they built a temple in it, as I haue also made manifest in my bookes of Antiquitie, collected out of our holie Scripture.

I will now speake of that which the Chaldeis writ of vs in their histories; which do much agree in all other matters with those of our nation. And first let Berosus be my witness, who was a Chaldean borne, yet a man famous & knowne vnto all that loue learning, for hee in the Grecian tongue did write Astronomie, and the Chaldeis Philoſophie. Berosus imitating the most auncient Histories writeth of the deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguished, and hee in all things imitateth Moses. Hee also speaketh of the Arke wherein our forefather was preferred, and affirmeth that it was carried vnto the tops of the mountaines in Armenia: after this he professeth the Genealogie of all that reigned from Noe, vntill Nabulassar king of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. Hee likewise setteth down how long euery one reigned, and in prosecuting the deeds of this king he recounteth how he sent his sonne Nabuchodonosor into Egypt, and to our country with great power, who finding them rebels, subdued them and burnt the Temple at Ierusalem, and so departed, carrying with him all our nation into Babylon: whereupon our citie was desolate seuentie yeeres vntill the raigne of Cyrus king of the Persians. Moreover, he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phoenicia, and Arabia, exacting more of his subjects then euer any king of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Berosus must needs be to this effect: Nabulassar his father hearing that his substitute in Egypt, Coelosyria and Phoenicia had rebelled, he himselfe not being able to take such paines, committed these affaires vnto his sonne Nabuchodonosor, and gaue vnto him a part of his army, for that he was in the flower of his age, and sent him against him: and Nabuchodonosor fighting with the said Champion, ouerthrew him, and subdued the countrie which of olde belonged vnto them, and at the same time his father Nabulassar fel sick in Babylon, and died, hauing reigned twenty nine yeeres. But Nabuchodonosor long after vnderstanding his fathers death, hee disposed of Egypt and other prouinces as he thought good, and taking the captiues of Iudæa, Phoenicia, and the Syrians that liued in Egypt, hee committed them to certaine of his friends, to bee brought with other cariage and his army to Babylon, and so hee himselfe accompanied with a verie fewe took his journey to Babylon through the desert: and finding that the Chaldeis ruled all, and that their nobilitie reserved the kingdome for him, he was made king, and commanded houses to be built for the captiues that were comming, in the most conuenient places of Bebylon, and he of the spoile beautified the temple of Belus and other places most richly, and built a new citie without the wall of the olde: and prouiding least hereafter the enemies might turne the riuer and so haue access vnto the Citie, hee inuironed the inner Citie with three seuerall walles, and the outmost Citie likewise. The wals whereof were made of brick, but the walles of the inner citie were of bricke and bytumen: this done, he builded most sumptuous gates which might haue become temples: and moreouer neere vnto his fathers palace he builded another farre greater, and more costly then it was, the pompe whereof it were hard and perhaps tedious to expresse. Yet this we will rehearse worth the noting, that this so ambitious and aboute all credit gorgeous palace was builded in fiftene daies: in it hee erected rockes of stonelike mountaines, beset with all sorts of trees: hee also made a famous garden, all supported with pillars, for that his wife being brought vpp in the country of the Medes, desired to haue a prospect into the fieldes and mountaines.

The testimony of the Phoenicians touching the Iewes Antiquitie.

This hee relateth of the forementioned king, and many things more in his booke of the affaires of the Chaldeis, wherein hereprooueth the Greeke writers, who falsly affirme that Semiramis the Assyrian Queene built Babylon, and that they falsly report those wonderful works about Babylon, to haue been by her made and finished. Wee must needs thinke that the Chaldean history is true, seeing it agreeth with that of the Phoenicians, which Berosus writ of the king of Babylon, who subuerred both Phoenicia & all Syria: with them also accordeth Philostratus in his historie in the siege of Tyria, and Magasthenes also in his fourth booke of the affaires of India, where he laboureth to proue, that the said king excelled Hercules in strength and valour, affirming that he subdued the greatest part of Affrique, and Spaine, and that the temple of Ierusalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again reedified by Cyrus; & we may proue it out of Berosus, who in his third booke saith as followeth. Nabuchodonozor hauing begun the third wall, fell sick and died, when he had reigned fortie three yeeres, and his sonne Eummaradochus succeeded him, who for his iniquitie and lustfull liuing, was treacherously slaine by his sisters husband named Nirigissoroor, after he had reigned two yeeres. He being dead, the traitor Nirigissoroor usurped the kingdome, and reigned foure yeeres, whose sonne then a childe was made king, called by name Laborofardochus, and he reigned nine moneths; who for that he seemed to be of very corrupt maners, was slaine by his owne friends: after whose death they who slew him consulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian, king. At this time the walles of bricke and Bytumen about the riuer of Babylon were built. In the eight yeere of this kings raigne, Cyrus comming with an army out of Persia, conquered all Asia, and came with his forces against Babylon: but the king of Babylon hauing notice of his comming, leuied an army meeting him in the way, and ioined battell with him; but being overcome in the fight, he accompanied with a verie few of his men, was forced to flie into Borsippa. Cyrus now besieged Babylon, and purposed to destroy the outward wals thereof: but by reason that it was too strong and too hard to win, he returned to Borsippa to besiege Nabonidus the king of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the euent of war, yeelded himselfe vnto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him and gaue him a territorie in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: so Nabonidus led the rest of his life in that prouince. This historie agreeth with ours, for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonozor in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne did destroy our Temple, and that it so remained threescore and ten yeeres: Also that in the second yeere of king Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laide againe, and that it was finished and reedified in the second yeere of king Darius his raigne. This done, I will also relate the histories of the Phoenicians, that we may abound with prooue of that we say, for they make a computation of the yeeres after this manner: In the raigne of king Ithobalus, Nabuchodonozor besieged Tyre thirteen yeeres, after whom Baal reigned ten yeeres, next him iudges were appointed, to wit, them that follow: Ecnibalus the sonne of Balachus iudged two moneths, Chelbis the soone of Abdau ten moneths, Abbarus the high priest thre moneths, Myttonus and Gerasus sons of Abdilos iudged six yeeres, after whom Balatorus reigned one yeere, and after his death the Tyrians called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him king, and he reigned foure yeeres, and he then dying, they sent also to Babylon for his brother ther Iromus, who reigned twenty yeeres, in whose raigne Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire, so that this whole time is fiftie foure yeeres and three moneths: for Nabuchodonozor began to besiege Tyre in the seuenth yeere of his raigne, and in the fourteenth yeere of king Iromus his raigne Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia.

The Chaldeis and Tyrians agree with the Iewes historie.

Wherefore both the Chaldeis and Tyrian Historiographers agree with vs concerning our Temple. So that the antiquitie of our nation aboue mentioned is now made manifest, & without all controuersie. And that which is already alleaged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not vpon purpose contradictious. It is therefore requisite (to satisfie them who giue no credit to the writings of other nations, and contend that the Grecian histories onely are to be beleued) to bring many testimonies from the Greeks themselves, who haue as opportunitie

B served, made mention of our nation and knowne it. Pythionis a Samian borne both of great antiquitie, and excelling all other Philoophers in holines towards the Gods, is not onely conuincied to haue knowne the customes of our nation, but he did also as it plainly appeareth imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but diuers haue recorded many notable things of him, and especially Hermippus a man most diligent in searching of histories. This Hermippus recounteth in his first booke of Pythagoras, that the said Philoopher (hauing one of his familiar friends named Calliphen dead, who was a Crotonian borne) reported this mans soule to be perpetually with him, and that the said soule commanded him not to passe the place where his aile fell, and that hee should abstaine from vncleane water, and that hee should with all diligence eschue blasphemie: and then it followeth, this hee did also and said, imitating the opinions of the Iewes and Grecians, and applying them to himselfe. For it is certainly reported: that this man gathered much of his philoophie out of the Iewes lawes. Our nation in times past was well knowne to diuers cities, so that many of them doe now obserue our customes, and others esteeme them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus doth witnesse in his booke entituled de legibus: for he saith that the Tyrian lawes forbid to sweare by any strange sacrament, and amongst these straunge and forraine sacraments, hee reckoneth the oath called Corban, which is vied onely amongst the Iewes, and in our language signifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnassa knew our nation also, and in a maner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, he saith thus in his second booke. The Colchians, Egyptians, and Aethiopians onely amongst all other nations did vse circumcision in the beginning: for the Phoenicians & Syrians liuing in Palestina do confesse themselves to haue learned this custom from the Egyptians, and the Syrians liuing neere vnto Thermoodontes, and the riuer Parnenius and their neighbours the Macronians are reported lately to haue learned it of the Colchians, & these are they onely, that vse circumcision, and they doe like vnto the Egyptians, but I am not able to saie, whether the Egyptians or Aethiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to vse circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabite Palestina, the Iewes onely vse it, which hee knowing writeth so of them. Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our nation, and affirmeth that our countymen warred vnder Xerxes against the Greeks, and numbring them of the countries that followed him, hee lastly spake thus of our nation.

The Colchians, Egyptians, and Aethiopians onely amongst all other nations did vse circumcision in the beginning: for the Phoenicians & Syrians liuing in Palestina do confesse themselves to haue learned this custom from the Egyptians, and the Syrians liuing neere vnto Thermoodontes, and the riuer Parnenius and their neighbours the Macronians are reported lately to haue learned it of the Colchians, & these are they onely, that vse circumcision, and they doe like vnto the Egyptians, but I am not able to saie, whether the Egyptians or Aethiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to vse circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabite Palestina, the Iewes onely vse it, which hee knowing writeth so of them. Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our nation, and affirmeth that our countymen warred vnder Xerxes against the Greeks, and numbring them of the countries that followed him, hee lastly spake thus of our nation.

E *A people straunge followed this royall throng.
Their language was th' unknowne Phanician tongue: In the billes of Solymus their dwelling was, Neere to a lake for greatnes which did passe:
Their heads were shau'd, and for the heads attire, They were an horf-skin dried at the fire.*

It is euident as I thinke that he speaketh of the Iewes: for the mountaines of Solymus are in our country, & that lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greaest and valsest of all lakes that are in Syria, and thus Cherilus maketh mention of vs. And that the Iewes were not knowne only of the Greeks, but also admired of them, it is easy to proue not out of the obscurest writers, Asphaltites the lake.

F but by the testimonie of their wisest Philoophers: For Clearchus discipule vnto Aristotle, and the best amongst all the Peripaterickes in his first booke de somno, saith that his master Aristotle spake thus of a certaine Iewe, and reporting Aristotles words hee saith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things else which he alleageth, but I will set downe that onely that may cause the man to be admired. Hyperichides answered that they all were verie desirous to heare it: then quoth Clearchus according to Aristotles precepts in his Rhetoricke I will first recount of what

natio the man was, least I seem to oppose my self to him, that set down the foresaid precept. Do so quoth Hyperchides if so you please. Then he said, this man before mentioned was by nation a Jew (born in Coelosyria) one of the sect of the Indian Philosophers, & they are called (as I heare reported) amongst the Indians Calani, and amongst the Syrians, Jewes, taking their name from the place where they inhabite, called Iury; the name of their citie is hard to pronounce, for they call it Ierusalem. This man entertained many strangers, & he came from out of the higher countrey downe vnto the sea coast, and he was very eloquent and of great courage. We at that time liued in Asia, when this diuine man came vnto the place where we were, and began to conferre with vs, and with other Philosophers, making triall of their knowledge: and for that manie learned men were assembled about him, he at last for this cause more willingly imparted some of his knowledge vnto them. Thus saith Aristotle in Clarchus: recounting moreover at large the admirable abstinence of the foresaid Jew from meate, and his chastitie: all which they that are desirous to know may read in Clarchus; for I am loath to write any thing superfluous: So now it is euident how Clarchus by the way of a digression speaking of an other matter maketh mention of vs. But Hecateus Abderita a Philosopher, and one brought vp with king Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomeus of Lagus, did not only briefly make mention of vs, but also writ a whole booke of our nation the Jewes, out of which I will briefly note some few points that occurre, but first I will shew of what antiquity he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomeus nerevnto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which hapned the eleuenth yeere after Alexanders death in the hundreth and seuenteenth Olympiade, as Castor writeth, who speaking of this Olympiade saith: that in this time Ptolomeus Lagus ouercame Demetrius the son of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliocetes, and all men confesse that Alexander died in the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiade: so that it is euident that at that time wherein Alexander liued, our nation flourished. And Hecateus saith that after that battell fought at Gaza, Ptolomeus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemencie of Ptolomeus, followed him into Egypt, and conuerfed with him: amongst the which one was called Ezechias the Jewes high priest, a man about threecore and six yeeres old, and of chiefe notice and dignitie of all his nation, and most prudent & eloquent, one also who in all affaires had more experience than any man else. He likewise reporteth that the number of the Jewes priests who receiue their tenths, and rule all in general, is a thousand and fise hundred or there about; and againe making mention of the same Ezechias, he saith, this man being in this reputation and honour, and conuerfing with vs, by the helpe of some about him, declared all things wherein we and his nation differ, and shewed vnto vs the place of his dwelling, and the maner of his conuerfation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecateus sheweth what maner of people we are, and how religious in our lawes, and how that we rather will sustaine all torments & death it selfe then violate them in any thing, and that wee account it a worthy thing so to doe: adding moreover that beeing much hated of our neighbors, & hauing suffered all contumelies both at the hands of the Persian kings & their officers, yet that we could not be forced to change our opinions, but that we are continually exercised to giue a reason thereof. He also recordeth an example of our constant minds: for Alexander (quoth hee) beeing at Babylon, and purposing to reedifie the Temple of Bell, he commanded all his souldiers to carie timber to the building hereof, and the Jewes onely disobeyed his commaund, for the which they endured many stripes and torments, till such time as the king freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their owne countrey, destroyed all the temples and altars that they found there, and some of them were by the officers therefore punished, other escaped free; adding that wee may iustly be admired for these things, and that our nation is exceeding populous, likewise that many of vs were caried captiues into Babylon, and there rescued the Persians. Moreover, that many more were dispersed into Egypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria: Hee also recordeth the greatnes of our countrey, and the fertilitie thereof; they inhabite (quoth he) a country that hath almost thirtie hundred thousand acres of most fertile ground; for Iury is of this largenes, and that in time past we inhabited a large & very great citie, which was very populous; he speaketh also of the building of our temple in this maner. The Jewes haue many other townes and villages in euery prouince, but they haue one most strong citie, the compasse of whose walls is fiftie foulds; and in it inhabite a hundred and fiftie thousand men, and this citie they called Ierusalem, in the midst of it is a building of stone with foure porches a hundreth cubits about, it hath also double gates wherein is a foure squared Altar

Therein is no Image nor gift, no trees nor wood growing there, nor any thing of this sort. Therein inhabite Priests both night and day, celebrating certaine purifications, & they drink no wine in the Temple.

The Priests dwell in the Temple and drink no wine

Moreover, he shewed how our nation warréd vnder Alexanders successors, and he reporteth that which he heard of a certaine Jew in the armie, and I will set down the Authors own words. As I went (saith he) to the redde Sea, a certaine Jew, one of the horsemen that conducted vs, named Mosollamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all archers else, both Greeks and other nations; This Jew (euery one halting on forward of his iourney, and beeing willed by a Southfayer to stand) asked for what cause the multitude staid and went not forward: presently the Southfayer shewed him a bird which he diligently viewed, & told the Jew, that if that bird did stand still in the place, that then it was expedient for them to stand; and if the bird did mount vp and flie, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wisdom to retire. The Jew hereat was silent, yet drawing his bow, he shot an arrow and killed the bird, whereat the Southfayer & certaine other were offended, and cursed him. But hee taking the vnhappy bird in his hand, said vnto them: Are yee so mad, as to thinke that this bird nor hauing the foresight to preserue her selfe from this death, is able to direct vs in the successe of our iourney? Had this bird foreknowne future euents, shee would haue elchewed this place for dread, that Mosollamus a Jew should haue strooken her with an arrow. But we will now leaue the testimonie of Hecateus: for euery one that list may read his booke, and there vnderstand this more at large. I will not omit the testimonie of Agatarchides, a man of no euill in his owne opinion, yet indeed one who hath vsed detraction to our owne nation. This man speaking of Stratonice, how leauing her husband Demetrius, she came into Syria, and how Selenus would not marrie her as she hoped (who hauing an army at Babylon, warred against Antioch, and had taken the Citie) and that she fled into Seleucia, whereas she might haue made a more speedy escape by water, but that she was forewarned in a sleepe so to doe, and that she was there taken & died &c: Agatarchides hauing vsed this Preface, & inuighed against Stratonices superstition, he vseth an example of our nation in this maner; The people that are called Jewes, inhabite a most strong citie, which they call Ierusalem; these people are wont to rest vpon the seauenth day, and doe neither beare armes nor till their grounds, nor doe any other businesse vpon that day, but their custome is to remaine in their Temple, and there with stretched out armes continue in prayer till night. And so vpon a time they persevering in that foolerie, whilst they should haue defended their citie, Ptolomeus Lagus entered it with many people and a great armie: who greatly tyrannized ouer them; and so they found by experience, that the solemnitie appointed by their law, was preiudicial vnto them: such like Churches as this, did teach them and all nations else to flie vnto dreames, which their law teacheth, neuer considering that humane policie cannot preuaile against that which must necessarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reporteth of vs to be ridiculous: but they who weigh it with indifferencie, shall perceiue, that it is a great commendation to our nation, who rather suffer their country and our lastetie to be lost and endamaged, then to violate the lawes of God.

Agatarchides his testimonie of the Jewes.

The Jewes Sabaoth.

I thinke I am thus able to shew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our nation, not for that they knew vs not, but for enuie. For Ierome who writ a booke of succession, in the same time that Hecateus liued, who was a friend vnto King Antigonus, and beeing president of Syria, neuer mentioneth vs in all his Historie; notwithstanding, hee was brought vp almost in our country. But Hecateus writ a booke of vs; so different are the minds of men: for one of them thought our nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through malice was hindered from speaking the truth: yet the Histories of the Chaldies, Egyptians, and Phoenicians, may suffice to proue our antiquitie, together with the Greeke Writers: for besides those before mentioned, Theophrastus also, Theodorus, Manaseas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemeus, Conon, Zopyrion, and many others, no doubt (for I haue not perused all mens bookes) haue manifestly testified of vs. For many of the foresaid men were blinded with errors, as not hauing read our holy Scriptures, yet they all ioynly testified our antiquity, for which I now alleadge the. Truly Demetrius Phalerus, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reason it is that they should be borne withall: for they were not so skilful as to search our writings with with so much curiositie. Becing come thus farre, it resteth that I now present one point more, G whereof I made mention in the beginning of this booke: to wit, that I declare the detractions & slanderous reports of diuers, concerning our nation, to be false and void of truth; and I will vie the testimonie of those writers, who record, that the lying Historiographers, at such time as they committed to writing the foresaid detractions, did also euen against themselves, register such like flanders as they did against vs. And I doubt not, but that all those who are conuerfant in Histories can testifie, that the like hath bene done by most writers for certaine priuate hatred, or such like respects. For some of the Gentiles haue attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the most renowned Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Theopompus to Athens, and Polycrates to Lacedæmon; and the author that writ Tripoliticum (for it was not Theopompus as some suppose) vsed the citie of Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his histories of the foresaid places, doth many times detract both them & others. And this they do, calumniating the most excellent that are, in something or other, some for enuie & malice, others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and so indeed it dooth amongst fooles, that are knowne to haue no sound iudgement, but wise men will condemne their malice. To be short, this is the cause of so many slanderous reports forged against our nation: Some to gratifie the Egyptians haue attempted to deprauē the truth, and so haue neither reported the veritie concerning our ancestors comming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they haue had many causes of malice and enuie vrging them heereto. And chiefly for that our progenitors in their country waxed mightie, and so departing to their owne country, were made happy and fortunate. Secondly, the diuersitie of our two religions, made great discord and variance amongst vs, our religion so farre excelling theirs in pietie, as the diuine essence of GOD excelleth vnreasonable creatures, for they commonly worshippē such brute beasts for gods, and euery one worshippeth diuers kinds: vaine and foolish men vvhom from the beginning haue been accustomed to such sortish opinions, as would not permit them to imitate vs in our diuine religion and conformable to reason: and yet seeing many fauour and follow our religion, they were heereby incited to such hatred, that to derogate from vs, they feared not to falsifie their own ancient records, not considering that in so dooing, they were led through a blind passion, to write against themselves. Moreover, I wil proue all I haue now spoken, to be true by one mans words, whom a little before (beeing a famous Historiographer) wee haue produced as a witnesse of our antiquitie.

Manethon therefore, who confesseth himselfe to haue gathered the Egyptian Historie out of their holy writings, hauing by way of a Preface, recounted how our predecessors came into Egypt with many thousands, and there conquered the inhabitants, he afterwards confesseth that looting all their possessions in Egypt, they got that countrey which is now called Iewrie, and in it builded a citie named Ierusalem, and a Temple; and thus farre he imitateth ancient Writers. And then vsurping to himselfe authoritie to lie, protesting that hee will insert into his Historie, certaine reports divulged amongst the common people, he reporteth things of the Iewes altogether incredible, intending to mixe with our nation the Lepars of the Egyptians, and other sicke people of other countries, who (as he saith) beeing abominable to the Egyptians, made an escape from thence, affirming also that they had a king named Amenophis, which is a fained name, L and therefore he durst not presume to speake determinately of the time of his reigne: whereas he speaketh exactly of the reigne of all other kings. Hereupon also he addeth certaine fables, forgetting himselfe that he reported the shepherds departure out of Egypt to Ierusalem, to haue bene almost fūe hundredth and eighteen yeeres before his time: for king Themusis reigned when they departed out of Egypt, from whom the time that other kings did reigne, vntill the two brethren Setho and Thermus, accomplisheth the terme of three hundredth fourscore and thirteene yeeres. Hee also saith, that the eldest of the setwo, Sethon, was called Egyptus, and the other Thermus, was called Danaus, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward reigned fūtie nine yeeres; and after him Rampses his eldest sonne, reigned three score and fixe yeeres. Hauing therefore confessed our aunceltors to haue departed out of Egypt so many yeeres before, now lastlie hee M addeth that Amenophis was their King, who was a contemplator of the gods, as Orus their king before him was, and that one Amenophis a Priest the sonne of Papius, did in all things most excellently accomplish his desire, which priest seemed to participate of some diuine nature, for he excelled in wisdom, & could foretell things to come, and that he gaue the king his surname, that he might also see the gods, if so be he would endeavour to cleanse the countrey from Lepars, and

A and other vnclane people. Whereat the king reioicing, gathered together all the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of fourescore thousand, and sent them and other Egyptians appointed to this worke, into the East part of Nilus; there to heue and square stones. And that amongst them there were also certaine learned priests infected with leprosie, also that this diuine priest Amenophis greatly feared, lest the indignation of the gods would fall vpon the king and himselfe (who had perswaded and counselled the king to doe violence vnto the foresaid Lepars) likewise that he said, that because hee vied the helpe of vnclane persons, they should obtaine dominion ouer Egypt for thirteene yeeres; yet durst hee not presume to signifie this vnto the king, but he killed himselfe, leauing this written in a booke, where men might find it: & the king hauing notice hereof, fell into great sorrow and heauinesse. This done, hee speaketh as followeth: So the king being requested for their quietnesse and defence to assigne them a citie to inhabit in, he appointed vnto them a desolate place called Auaris, which had bene the Shepherds citie (this citie the ancient Diuines call Triphonis) but they hauing gotten the possession of this place fitte for rebellion, they made choice of one of the priests of Heliopolis to be their captain, whose name was Osarphis, and bound themselves with an oath to obey him in all things: and he presently made a law that they should neither worshippē the gods of the Egyptians, nor that they should abstaine from those beasts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they should marrie with none but such as they iudged to be their friends.

Osarphis
captaine of Auaris.

Hauing ordained this and many things elle contrarie to the Egyptians religion, hee commanded them with great labour to enuiron their citie with a wall, and to make preparation to warre against king Amenophis: and he himselfe making choice of some priests, and a few other vnclane persons, sent to Ierusalem to the shepherds which were driuen out of Egypt by king Themusis, decking vnto them their owne and their fellowes iniuries, and requesting them to leuie an armie to fight with them against Egypt, promising them free entrance into Auaris, the countrey where their forefathers inhabited, and that hee would furnish them with all necessities; telling them that they should now fight in so happy a time, as that without all doubt they might conquer the country. The shepherds hereat reioicing, all of them armed themselves to the number of two hundred thousand, and leauing their citie they came to Auaris. But Amenophis king of Egypt hearing of their inuasion, and remembering what Amenophis the sonne of the priest Papius had left in writing, was in great feare, & presently assembling together the people of Egypt, and consulting with the princes of his country, he sent all holy beasts, & all that the priests esteemed, before him, giuing the priests especiall charge to hide their Idols: and hee commended his sonne Sethones (who also by his father Rampses was called Rameffes) beeing but fūe yeeres old, vnto the custodie of a friend of his: and then accompanied with three hundred fighting men, he met his enemies, but would not fight with them, fearing lest hee should fight against the pleasure of the gods; and so he retired himselfe vnto Memphis, & taking Apis & the rest of the Egyptian gods, he with all his troupses of Egyptians, tooke shippe, and fledde into Ethiopia. For the king of Ethiopia vpon curtesie obeyed him, and for this cause hee entertained him & his followers, and provided all necessities for them, for that fatall thirteene yeeres banishment, & this was done in Ethiopia. In the meane time, the inhabitants of Ierusalem came down into the country with the vnclane Egyptians, and did so tyrannize ouer the inhabitants, that all their beholders iudged their victorie to be full of crueltie: for not contented to fire the cities & townes, & to commit all manner of sacrilege, and to destroy the Idols of the gods, they did also most cruellie teare in peeces the sacred Beasts, and forced the Priestes and Prophets to lay violent hands vpon them, and kill them: after which deed they draue them out of the country naked. It is therefore reported, that a Heliopolitan Priest, Osarphis by name, made lawes for them, and statutes to gouerne them. This Priest was called Osarphis, taking his name from the god of Heliopolis, called Osiris, who beeing now thus conuerfant with this people, changed his name, & called himselfe Moses.

Thus the Egyptians report of the Iewes & many things else, which for breuitie sake I omit. F Manethon furthermore writeth, that afterward Amenophis the king came with a great power out of Ethiopia, and his son Rampses with him, accompanied with a great army, & that ioyning battell with the shepherds and polluted persons, he gaue them an ouerthrow, and pursued them vnto the borders of Syria. And this is Manethons report: but for as much as he writeth old wives tales, dorages, and lies, I will by manifest reason conuince him; first distinguishing that whercof I am to speake hereafter. Hee of his owne accord granteth and confesseth, that our aunceltors at first first were not Egyptians, but strangers, that came thither from another place and conquered the Country, & againe departed from thence. I will now out of his owne writings endeavor to shew, that the weake people of Egypt were not mixed with vs, & that Moses, who indeed was our conductor out of Egypt, and liued many ages before, was no Lepar. Hee therefore first of all setteth downe a ridiculous cause of this fore-mentioned faction, which was, that king Amenophis was desirous to see the gods. Which gods trow yee? hee could already see the Oxe, the Goate, the Crocodile and the Munkey, but the God of heaven how could he see? And why had Amenophis this desire? Forsooth because a certaine king one of his predecessors had seene them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the sight of them, needed no new deuice to accomplish his desire: but perhaps the foresaid prophet was a man of great wisdom, by whom the king had confidence to attaine his desire: but if so he had bin, how chance it, that he was so vnwise hee could not perceiue, that it was an impossible thing to satisfie the kings desire? for that which he promised was not brought to passe. Or what reason moued him to thinke that the gods were inuisible, because of Lepars and weake people? The gods are offended with mens impieties, nor with the defects of their bodies. And how was it possible that at one instant so many thousand Lepars and infirme persons should be gathered together? or wherein did not the king obey the Prophet? He commaunded that the Lepars and infirme persons should be exiled the country, and the king did not banish them the country, but sent them to hewe stones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purposed to cleanse the country from Lepars. Lastly, he saith, that the Prophet foreseeing that Egypt was to suffer, and fearing the wrath of the gods, he killed himselfe and left his mind in a booke written vnto the king. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at first foresee his owne death, and so oppose himselfe vnto the kings desire to see the gods? or wherefore did he feare such calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great misery hanged ouer his head, which might worthily cause him to kill himselfe to preuent it? But let vs heare that which followeth, more sortly then all the rest.

Manethons words repeated.

The king (quoth he) hearing this, and strooken with feare, did not for all this expell those Lepars he ought to haue exiled, but at their request gaue them (as he saith) a Citie, wherein before time the Shepherds did inhabit, called Auaris; wherein: they being come, they made a priest of Heliopolis their Prince, who deuised lawes for them: commaunding them neither to adore the gods, nor to abstaine from offering violence to such beasts, as amongst the Egyptians are sacred, but that they should kill and spoile all things, that they should marie with none but such as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep those lawes, and that they fortified Auaris to fight against the king. Adding moreover, that he sent to Ierusalem for helpe, promising to yeeld Auaris vnto them, beeing a place sometime possessed by their ancestors, and that they from that place leading their forces, might easily subdue all Egypt: hee then saith that the Egyptian king Amenophis came against them with three hundred thousand, & yet for that he would not strue against the decree of the gods, he fledde into Ethiopia, and caried with him Apis and other holy beasts, and that the inhabitants of Ierusalem comming downe, invaded the land, fired the townes and cities, slew their nobles, vsed all sort of crueltie possible, and that the priests name who made lawes and statutes for them to liue vnder, was one of Heliopolis, Oarsiphis by name; deriuing the same from Osiris the god of Heliopolis: and that this man changing his name, was afterward called Moses.

Moreover, that Amenophis hauing liued in banishment thirtie yeeres, came with a strong power out of Ethiopia; and fighting with the shepherds and polluted, he slew many of them, & put the rest to flight, pursuing them vnto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that heere againe he telleth a very vnskillfull tale, for although the Lepars and impotent persons were offended with the king, for appointing them to hewe stones; yet is it to be thought, that they receiving their owne desire at the kings hands, to wit, a Citie to dwell in, that now they againe became the kings well-willers. Supposing also their hatred still continued towards him, they rather should haue attempted reuenge by treason against him, then towards all their nation, wherein they had many deere friends and alliance. And although they had purposed to war against these men, yet would they not haue been so impious as to haue rebelled against the gods, and to haue violated the lawes wherein they were brought vp.

A confutation of Manethons words alleged.

We haue therefore cause to thanke Manethon, in that he cleareth vs, and affirmeth his owne countremen (yea a priest) to be authors of this impiety, & that by oath they bound themselves so to doe. But is it not against all reason, that neither any of their countremen nor kinsmen rebelled

A led with them, but that the poore distressed people were glad to send to Ierusalem for succour? But what societie of friendship had they with the people of Ierusalem, of whom they came to demand help? Why? they were more their enemies then the rest of their countremen, and were all of quite different manners from vs. They of Ierusalem (as he saith) presently did as they were willed to doe, in hope that according as they were promised, they might subdue Egypt: were they ignorant of that countrey out of which they had beene driuen by force? Had they liued in pouertie or miserie, perhaps they might haue beene induced to haue done it: but seeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich citie, & possessed a goodly fertile soile farre better then Egypt, what might moue them thereto? What reason had they, at the request of their ancient enemies (and they also so diseased as they of Ierusalem could not abide their owne friends amongst them that had the like diseases) to thrust themselves into danger? they could not fore-know the kings intent to flie; for as Manethon himselfe saith, he met them at Pelusia with three hundred thousand men. And this they that went to warre well knew. But what reason had they to coniecture that the kings mind would change and he flie? Then hee saith the army of Ierusalem getting the Granaries of Egypt into their hands, did much harme: and this he vpbraideth them withall, as who should say they were not requested to come as enemies? or as though these matters be to be cast in souldiers teethes, that are strangers and sent for, from out of another countrey; when as the Egyptians themselves had before their comming done the like, and bound themselves by an oath to performe the same. But short time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victorie of them, and put them to flight, and pursued them vnto the borders of Syria. As though that Egypt were a countrey so easily to be wonne by any man, that at any place or part thereof invaded it? and that the souldiers of Ierusalem, hauing now by the lawes of armes possessed that, & knowing Amenophis to be yet aliue, would not haue fortified that part of the country, whereby he might haue invaded them, hauing all opportunity to doe it? or at least they would haue gotten more helpe from one place or another. Amenophis, as hee saith, pursued them euen vnto Syria, through the sandie and dry places: as though it were easie for an armie that had nothing else to doe, but to march on forward, to passe leisurly thorough them. To conclude therefore, our nation, neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confelleth, neither was it mingled with the disease of that country: for it is probable, that many of those sicke people perished in the stone works, many in the great fight and battaile, & the rest of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he speaketh of Moses.

The Epilogue that the Iewes canenet of the Egyptians.

D The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a diuine person, and one to be admired, but they commit great impietie in labouering to challenge him for their countremen, saying that hee was a Priest of Heliopolis, banished with the rest for leprosie. For hee is recorded to haue liued three hundred and eightene yeeres before this time, and to haue guided our ancestors out of Egypt, into that countrey wherein we now inhabit; and his owne words testifie his bodie to haue beene cleane from that disease of leprosie: for hee commaundeth all Lepars to be expelled out of the townes and villages, and to liue apart by themselves, also to be clothed in some torne garment, and that whoeuer toucheth them, or cometh vnder the same rooofe with them, is to be accounted an vnclane person. And if so be a Lepar happen to be cured of that disease, hee appointed certain purifications, cleansings, and bathes of fortunate waters, and all his haire should be shaued off; and that then after many and sundry sacrifices, hee should be admitted into the holie citie. But contrariwise, had he been vrged with that misfortune, and calamitie himselfe, he would surely haue been more prouident, and more mercifull to such as should haue been afflicted with that disease.

An answer vnto Manethons slanders touching Moses.

Moses was not a Lepar.

E He did not onely make these seuer lawes against Lepars, but hee also interdicted all that wanted any ioynt or parcell of the bodie from being priests, or exercising any office at the Altar, yea hee also appointed that if any priest should haue any of these defects betide him after hee was a priest, that then hee should be depriued of the dignitie. How can it then be probable, that to his owne prejudice and discredit he would haue enacted such lawes? Also the changing of his name is incredible: for he was called (as he saith) Oarsiphis, which nothing agreeth with the transmutation of his name, but his true name berokeneth that Moses was faued from the water. For, Moy in the Hebrew tongue signifieth Water. But I haue now sufficiently as I think, declared how Manethon whilst hee followed the ancient writers, did not much erre, but when hee fell to old wiues tales, he then either absurdly feined them of his own head, or else for hatred hee bare to our nation, belieued the. I now thinke it not amisse to examine a little the words of Charemon, who professing Moses tooke his name of Moy, which in the Egyptian tongue signifieth water.

confessing himselfe to write the Egyptian historie, maketh mention of the same king Amenophis his G sonne Rhameffes as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleep, checking him for that her temple was destroyed, and that Phiritiphantes a holy Scribe, told the king, that if he would expell all polluted and vnclane persons out of Egypt, that then he should not be any more terrified with these night visions. Moreouer, that heereupon making search for all sicke and diseased persons, he banished them out of his land, to the number of two hundredth and fiftie thousand, and that their captaines were called Moses and Ioseph, holy scribes, also that these Egyptian names were so that Moses was named Tisithes, and Ioseph Petsephus, and that they came vnto Pelusium where they found three hundredth and fourescore thousand left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt, also that they all entering into a league together sodainly inuaded Egypt, and Amenophis not biding the brunt fled into Ethiopia leauing his wife great with child, who hiding her selfe in caues and dens did bring forth a child whom they called Meffenes, who afterward draue the Iews into Syria, being in number 200000. and this done he recalled his father Amenophis out of Ethiopia. And thus Chæremon saith.

gether.

But I imagine, that which I haue already said, to be sufficient to declare the vanitie of both these two men. For if that which they report were true, it were vnpossible that they should so much differ: but they labour to deuise lies, and write not any thing agreeable to other mens writtings. For Manethon saith that the cause of the banishment of the lepers was the kings desire to see the Gods, and Chæremon saith that it was for that Isis after appeared vnto him in his sleepe.
Manethon also saith that Amenophis gaue the king that counsell so to cleanse the countrey, and Chæremon saith that he that counsellled the king was called Phiritiphantes: the number also of lepers hath very good consonance I warrant you. Manethon saith they were almost fourescore hundredth, Chæremon saith two hundredth and fiftie thousand. Moreouer Manethon writeth how that these lepers were first sent to a place to hew stones, and afterward came to Auaris to dwell, and that they hauing already begun wars in Egypt, that then they sent for helpe from Ierusalem. And Chæremon saith that they hauing left Egypt found at Pelusia two hundredth and fourescore thousand men, whom Amenophis had kept there, with whom they ioyning againe, returned and inuaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Ethiopia, and which is worth the noting, he setteth not downe what countreymen or to what purpose this great armie was, whether Egyptians or strangers, neither doth hee shew any reason why the king would not carie them into Egypt. Moreouer Chæremon seineth a dreame of the lepers and Isis, and reporteth that Ioseph K together with Moses was expelled, whereas Ioseph liued foure ages before Moses, euery age containing at least a hundredth and seuentie yeeres. Rhameffes also Amenophis sonne according to Ma-nethons historie, being a young man fled into Ethiopia, and was banished with his father, and afterward assisited him in the wars: whereas Chæremon reporteth that he was borne in a caue after his fathers departure, and that he getting the victorie did driue the Iewes into Syria who were in number two thousand. O felicitie in lying! for he neither told what nation those three hundredth and fourescore thousand was, nor yet how a hundredth and fourescore thousand of them perished, neither were they slaine in the fight, or fled vnto Rhameffes, and which is most to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Iewes, or whether he attribute this name vnto the two hundredth and fiftie thousand lepers, or vnto the three hundredth and fourescore thousand which were at Pelusium.

Lysimachus, the scabbed & leprous Iewes were to be co-ued into the wildernesse, & cast into the sea.

But it is folly to oppose my selfe against them who haue sufficiently contradicted themselves, for had other men controlled their writings they had been the more to be borne withall. I will adde Lysimachus vnto the two former, who hath the same lie that they haue, yet farre more absurd a fiction then theirs. For he saith that at such time as Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the people of the Iewes being scabbed and infected with leprosie, fled into the temples to beg maintenance, and that so many men were with this disease infected, that a dearth and scarcitie fell vpon Egypt. Likewise that king Bocchoris went vnto Ammon to know of the Oracle what caused the dearth, and that answer was made that if he would expell all lepers and vnclane persons from out of the temples into the desert, that then the famine would cease, and that he should drowne these lepers, as if the sunne disdained that they should liue, and that then he should purifie the M temples, and so the earth would againe yeeld fruit: also that Bocchoris hauing this answer from the Oracle, hee called together the Priestes and sacrificers, and hauing gathered lepers and vnclane people together, he deliuered them to souldiers to be conducted into the desert, and that then they should be lapt in lead and cast into the sea. Moreouer they being drowned

A drowned, other diseased people there gathered together, and were carried into the wildernesse to be destroyed, and that they taking counsell one of another what to doe, the night following they made great fires and lights, wherewith they terrified and draue away the souldiers that kept them, and that they fasted the day following, requesting God to bee mercifull vnto them, and that the next day, one Moses counsellled them to goe all one way, as thicke together as they could, till such time as they came to some place inhabited, and that he then commanded them neuer hereafter to bee friendly to any man, but alwayes rather to giue bad counsell then good, and to destroy all Temples, and Altars of the gods they came by: vnto which counsell they all agreeing, iourneyed together through the wildernesse, and after much sorrow came to places inhabited; vi-sing men by whom they past iniuriously, firing Temples and robbing them: at last in this manner, they came vnto that place which they now call Iudea and there building a Citie, they began to dwell, and of this fact called the Citie Hierosyla, and shortly after growing more potent, they for auoyding shame, chaunged the name thereof, and called it Ierusalem, and themselves the inhabitants of Ierusalem.

When the Iewes got Iudea and built Ierusalem

This fellow found not that king, which the two former speak of, but he ioyned a more new name, and leauing the dreame and the Prophet, hee goeth to Ammon, to know an answer of the old, touching the scabbed and lepers: for he saith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples: but hee leaueth it vnertaine, whether the Iewes onely were infected with this disease: for he saith the people of the Iewes: which people whether were they strangers or those that were born in that Countrey, why dost thou call the Iewes, when they were Aegyptians? If they were strangers, why dost thou not tell of whence they were: Or how came it to passe that the king hauing drowned so many of them in the Sea, and left the rest in the wildernesse, that still so manie should bee left? Or how did they passe the wildernesse, and get the Countrey wee now inhabite, and build a Citie and a Temple famous through all parts of the world? Thou shouldest not onely haue told the name of our law maker, but also what Countreymen he was, and of what parents, and what moued him in his iourne to make such lawes against the gods, and against men. For if they were Aegyptians, they would not so easily haue forgiven the religion wherein they were brought vp: or of what place else so euer they were, they had som lawes or other, which they had beene accustomed to keepe. If they had vowed to haue borne no good-will vnto them by whom they were driuen out of their Countrey, they had had some iust occasion so to doe. But to vnder-take warre against all the world, and deprive themselves from all friendship and helpe of mortall men, doth not shew their foolishnesse, but the foolishnes of him, who doth thus belie them. VVho most impudently affirmeth, that their Citie tooke the name of Church spoyle, and afterward changed it. For what cause forsooth did they change the name thereof? marrie for that the former name was ignominious to their posteritie. But the Gentleman vnderstood not, that Ierusalem signifieth others life in our language, then it doth in the Greeke. And therefore what should I stand to inueigh against a lie so impudently told?

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE ANTIQVITY OF THE IEWES, WRITTEN BY FLAVIVS IOSEPHVS AGAINST APION OF ALEXANDRIA, AND DEDICATED TO EPAPHRO- DITVS.

Hrice Honoured and beloued Epaphroditus, I haue in my former bookes so farre forth as I was warranted by truth, both protested & approued the Antiquitie of our natiō, out of the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldies & Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I haue produced the testimonie of diuers Greek Authors. Furthermore I haue opposed my selfe against Manethon and Cheremon, and diuers others. At this time likewise I will undertake to contradi& all the rest of those writers, that haue published anie thing against vs; for in respect of Apion, who pretendeth himselfe to bee learned, I grow halfe suspicious, whether it be a matter answerable to my discretion and iudgement, to vouchsafe him any replie at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it seemeth to be one and the same, with that which the rest haue written: and as touching the other, it is verie cold and barren. The greater part thereof is farced with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approuing him to bee a man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life. And for as much as diuers men are so disturnished of iudgement, that they rather suffer themselves to be wonne by these follies, then to bee wearied and wrought by that which is written with better consideration, vainly doating on detractions, and growing discontent to giue care to other mens well deterued prayles; I haue thought it necessarie to examine such a mans labours, the rather, for that he hath written against vs, as it hee intended to accuse vs before a Tribunal, & conuict vs by a publike triall. For I see that it is an ordinarie course for the most part of men, to hug & take heartie pleasure, when as hee that beginneth to blame an other man, is himselfe conuicted and found guiltie of those defaults, which he imputeth and obieð against another.

Truely it is no easie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtfull speeches which Apion useth, neither to vnderstand perfectly what hee intendeth to ex; resse. But like a man that is grievously distracted and confused in his foolish lying, hee groweth almost to that point, to recapitulate that, which hath bin heretofore set out, & searched for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Aegypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuse the Iewes that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly, he intermixeth his blamefull blasphemies, against the ceremonies accustomed in our temple, and depraueth our lawes and ordinances likewise. Now, that our predecessors haue not taken their originall out of Aegypt, neither haue heene driuen from thence for any infirmie or deformitie of their bodies, or for any wound, vicer, or pollution; I suppose that I haue not onely sufficiently approued the same, but also produced far more thē was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alleageth: For in the third booke of his Egyptian historie, he writ thus, Moses as I haue heard it spoken by the most auncient Egyptians was born at Heliopolis, who being instructed in the fashions of his Countie, conuered such prayers which were wont to be said in open places and abroad, and caused them to bee practised and accustomed, in priuate Cloysters such as were within the Citie, and ordained that in praying they should turne themselves towards the rising Sunne. For such is the situation of the Citie Heliopolis, and instead of Obeliskes or Pyramides, hee erected certaine pillars, vnder which there were certain images grauen Basens, on which the shadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they stood being discovered and in open ayre) they obserued the same course that the Sunne doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man vled.

Now as touching this lie of his, there need no words to refute the same, since it is clearly refelled by the effects. For when Moses first built that tabernacle in honour of God, he had no such intent, our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himselfe: for being borne at Oasie a towne in Aegypt this high vnreputed honour of the Aegyptians forswearth both his country and nation, and counterfeiting himselfe to be an Alexandrian, he ratifieth his nations wickednesse. No maruell then though he tearme them Aegyptians whom hee hateth and raileth against, for if hee had nor been perfwaded that the Aegyptians were wicked base people, hee would neuer haue denied himselfe to be their countiman: for such as proudly boast of their famous country, esteeme it a credit to beare the denomination thereof, & reprehend such as without iust cause make themselves of their nation. Wherefore the Aegyptians are one of these two waies affected towards vs Iewes, for either they claime vs to be their countimen as glorying of vs and their country, or else for that they and their country being infamous, they desire that we should be partakers of their ignominie. But indeede this worthy Apion seemeth so to inueigh against vs, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for bestowing their Ciues vpon him: and knowing them to bee at variance with the Iewes of Alexandria, hee as it were casteth a bone betwene them, and raileth not onely on the Iewes of that Citie, but on all wheresoeuer: but hee belicth both of them most impudently. But let vs examine thole hainous and enormous matters, and (as hee saith) such as are not to be suffered, of which hee accuseth the Alexandrian Iewes. Comming (quoth he) out of Syria, they seate themselves neere the sea coast, where there was no haueen neere vnto the furies of the water.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Iewes owne country was so also: yea herein Apion raileth against Alexandria, which hee maketh his owne country: for the sea coast is part of Alexandria, and as all men iudge the best place thereof to dwell in. Now if the Iewes by force of armes so vanquished this place that they could neuer since be driuen out of it: it is no discredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gaue them that place to inhabite, & the Macedonians did allot them as great priuiledges at the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would haue said, if the Iewes had dwelt about Nectopolis, and not about the kings seate: their tribes being euen at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion haue read the Epistles of king Alexander, and Ptolomeus Lagus, or others their successors kings of Egypt, or seene the pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priuiledges that Cesar the great granted vnto the Iewes; if I say knew of these, and yet did presume to write the contrarie, then hee was a bad fellow: but if he was ignorant hereof, hee was then an vnlearned person. The like ignorance also discourteth he, where he wonders that the Iewes that were in Alexandria were called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though verie different people, yet doe they all beare the name of their founder: and that I may shun prolixitie, the Iewes of Antioch are called Antiochians; for Seleucus the founder made them also Citizens, the like may also be said of the Iewes of Ephesus, and at the other Ionia, who by the kings gifts enioy the same priuiledges with the rest of the Citizens. The Romans also of their clemencie haue granted the name of their nation which is no small gift, nor only to priuate persons, but to great nations in generall. To be short, the auncient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, & Sabines, are called Romans; or if Apion will take away this denomination of the Citie wherein men inhabite, let him cease to call himselfe an Alexandrian: for hee being borne in the heart of Aegypt, can in no wise be an Alexandrian, if the priuiledge of the Citie be taken from him, as he would haue it from vs. And the Lords of the whole world the Romans, haue amongst all other nations onely prohibited the Aegyptians from hauing the priuiledges of any Citie: and so this gallant gentleman being himselfe incapable of dignitie, endeuoreth likewise to hinder them from it, who haue true right vnto it.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that Citie, did not make choice of vs for want of people to furnish the same withall; but for that he bestowed the libertie thereof vpon vs as a reward and testimonie of our vertue and fidelitie, endeououring indeede to honour and credit our nation thereby: for Hecataeus reporteth that Alexander for the Iewes good seruice and fidelitie, bestowed vpon them the countrey of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it. The same good affection towards the Iewes of Alexandria, Ptolomeus Lagus continued after him, for he deliuered into their hands the strong holds of Aegypt (for that hee iudged that their valour and fidelitie would keepe them) and intending to make himselfe Lord of Cyren and other places in Lybia, he sent certaine Iewes to inhabite the same. After him Ptolomeus Philadelphus did not onely release and set free all captiues of our nation in his countrey, but also did manie times remit their payments of money, and (which was the principall point of all) he desired to be instructed

A instructed in our lawes & holy scriptures, & for this cause sent vnto vs, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them vnto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalerius, Andreas & Arifseus, Demetrius being the onely mirror of learning in his age, the other two being Elquires of his owne bodie: neither would he haue euer desired to haue beene instructed in our lawes and customes, if hee had despised vs & had not rather admired vs. But Apion know that almost all the Macedonian kings his successors in order, did peculiarly affect our nation. For Ptolomeus the third which was also called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no sacrifice vnto the gods of Aegypt for his victorie, but came to Ierusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed many hostes vnto our God, & to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a victorie. Ptolomeus also furnamed Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the rule of his whole kingdome vnto the Iewes, and Onias and Dositheus both Iewes, were generals of his army, whole credit Apion detractes: whereas he rather ought to haue admired them, & haue thanked them for deliuering Alexandria whereof he maketh himselfe a citizen.

For when there was a rebellion in Cleopatras kingdome, and all was in perill to be destroyed, these two men deliuered Alexandria from ciuill warre: But Apion saith that after this, Onias came and brought a litle armie into the citie, at such time as Thermus, the Romane Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that fact of his was most iust. For Ptolomeus Physcon after the death of his father Ptolomeus Philometor, comming out of Cyrene, endeououred to expell the Queene Cleopatra, and the kings sons, to the ende that he (contrarie to all iustice) might possesse the kingdome: and this was the cause why Onias tooke armes against him in Cleopatras behalfe, not forsaking his fidelitie vnto kings in the time of necessitie: yet God himselfe did manifestly witnesse his iustice in this action. For when Ptolomeus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his armie, and took all the Iewes their wiues and children that were in the Citie (and bound them, and stripping them naked, cast them before Elephants to bee destroyed: and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread vpon them, made the said beasts drunken) all things fel out contrarie to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Iewes which were cast before them, did fall vpon Ptolomeus his friends that stood by, & slew many of the; which done, there appeared vnto Ptolomeus a most horrible vision forbidding him to harme the Iewes: & his chiefeest best beloued concubine also (whom som call Ithaca, other Herene) came vnto him & besought him to abstaine from such impietie. whereupon he being forrie, did penance for that he had alreadie committed, and that which hee thought to committe; so that the Iewes of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance that vpon it God did manifestly deliuer them; yet Apion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Iewes of impietie for bearing armes against Physcon, whereas indeede he ought rather to haue commended them for it: But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the last Queene of Alexandria, onely for that she was vnjust, and ingratefull vnto vs; when he rather ought to haue reproued her, in whom all impietie and wickednes raigned, both concerning her owne kinred, and her husbands who loued her, and also generally against all the Romans and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her owne sister Arifne in the temple who had not any wife offended her: shee also trecherously slew her owne brother, and destroyed her auncestors Gods, and sepulchers, and receiuing the kingdome from the first Cesars gift, shee ingratefully rebelled against his son and successor, and infecting Antonius with her poysoned drinks, and amorous inchantments, she made him rebell against his countrey, and to be vnconstant to his own friends, depriving some of kingly dignitie, and compelling others to be instruments of her impietie. And what else shal we say of her, who in the battaile by sea forced Antonius her owne husband (who also had manie children by her) to yeeld himselfe, the Empire, and armie vnto her, and become one of her followers? Lastly, when Alexandria was taken by Cesar, shee was so cruelly minded, that not remembering her owne estate, she accounted this her safetie, if with her owne hand shee might kill the Iewes, that she might be cruell and trothlesse to euerie bodie.

F Is it not a glorie thinke you to vs, that (as Apion reporteth) in the time of death and famine, wheat was so plentiful in Iury, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopatra was punished as she deserved. And we call great Cesar himselfe to witnesse of our fidelitie, and the seruice we did him against the Aegyptians, the Senate also and their decrees, and the writings of Augustus Cesar, wherein our deserts are testified. These letters Apion ought to haue read, and to haue examined all testimonies of vs, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomees, & what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mightie Emperours. And if so be Germanicus could not get corne to suffice al the inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of scarcitie and dearth, and not the Iewes fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Iewes it is manifest enough: for the Iewes want of corne was not onely left vn supplied, but also the want of other Alexandrians. But they haue alwaies kept that wherewith the auncient Princes did put them in trust, to wit, the keeping of the riuer, and whole country, as not being thought vnsit for their purposes. But Apion thus vrgeth vs; If (quoth he) the Iewes be citizens, how hap they worship not the same God, nor haue the same religion that the rest of the Alexandrians haue? To whom I thus answer; How hapneth that you Aegyptians do so contend and war against one another onely for diuersitie of religion? Shall we hereupon conclude that you are all Aegyptians, or not all men? because you worshippinge and with great diligence nourish beafts against nature? yet our nation seemeth one and the same. If therefore amongst you Aegyptians such difference of opinions be; why dost thou so maruell of this that we in a strange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do constantly perseuer in our first religion? But hee sayeth that wee are the cause of all sedition: which suppose he speake true of the Iewes of Alexandria, yet are not all Iewes in all places the cause of sedition, for we are knowne to be peaceable amongst our selues. But indeed as euerie one may perceiue, the people like Apion himselte are authours of sedition in Alexandria. For whilst the Greekes and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and wee liued peaceably together, and they permitted vs quietly to vse our owne solemnities: but when the number of Aegyptians encreased, by confusion of time, sedition also by their meanes encreased: but our nation remained vnpermixed. They therefore were authours of those troubles, not hauing the gouernment of the Macedonians, nor the wisdom of the Greekes; but vsing their Aegyptian manners, and renewing their olde hatred against vs. And that wherewith all they hit vs in the teeth befalleth them: for most of them not hauing the priuiledges of the citie themselves, call vs strangers that haue them. For none of the auncient kings bestowed the libertie of the citie vpon the Aegyptians, neither haue any of the Emperours of Rome bestowed the priuiledge. But Alexander himselte brought vs into the citie, the kings after him encreased more priuiledges, and it hath pleased the Roman Emperours to ratifie and confirme them. But Apion detracteth vs for not erecting statues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not heretofore, or that they needed Apion to speake for them: whereas hee should rather admire the Romanes magnanimitie, and modestie, who compell not their subiects to violate their auncient lawes and religion, but content themselves with such honours as the giuer may with pietie and equitie giue them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulsion.

The Greekes and diuers other thinke it not amisse to erect statues; for they delight to haue the pictures of their ancestors, wiues and children, and som of their beleued seruants also: what maruaile then if they accord to yeeld the like honour to Princes and Emperours? But our law maketh not as prophceying the Romanes power not to be reuerenced: but foreseeing that it was neither profitable to God nor man, forbade vs to make an Image of any liuing creature, much more of a not liuing God (as wee will proue hereafter.) But hee permitted vs to reuerence all good men, with any honour elsse not due to God, and all those we giue vnto the Emperours, and people of Rome, and make our continual sacrifice for them; and not onely vpon worky daies do this, at the proper cost of all the Iewes, but vpon such dayes as we offer no other sacrifice, no not for our own children, we then sacrifice for the Roman Emperour, yeelding that honour to the Roman Emperour which wee do to none elsse. And let this suffice to answer that which Apion alleageth against the Iewes of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gaue him this occasion, namely Possidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuse vs for not worshipping the same Gods that others do, although they lie all alike, flandering our temple most absurdly: and yet for all this they doe not beleue that they herein commit any impietie: whereas it is a most inominious thing for any free man to lie vpon any occasion: much more of a temple famous ouer all the world for sanctitie. For Apion affirmeth that the Iewes in that sacred temple placed the head of an Assie and worshipped it most religiously. And this (quoth hee) was manifestly knowne at such time as Antiochus Epiphanes spoyled that Temple, who found that Assies head being of masse gold, and great value. To this first slander I first answer, that were that true which he reporteth, yet an Aegyptian ought not to haue spoken against vs for it: seeing that an Assie is of no lesse worth then a Goate, and other brute beafts that they honour for gods. Was it possible that hee knew not the contrarie of his owne affirmations, by our deedes and Scriptures? For we vse the same lawes that at the first wee did, and remaine in them without change, and for all

An answer to the objection of the Assies head.

A all that our Citie (as others also haue) hath by the variable euent of warre, bene vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus surnamed the god, and Pompey the great, and Licinius Crassus, and now lastly Titus Caesar, haue all vanquished our Temple, yet did they neuer find in it any thing as Apion affirmeth, but sincere pietie, not law full for vs to disclose to strangers. And as touching Antiochus, manie writers of good credite report, that he neuer had any iust cause to spoyle our temple, but that hee was drawne vnto this fact for want of money; Not for that he was our enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellowes, hee sought supplie, and found nothing in that place that was worthe of derision: and thus doe Polybius Megapolitanus, Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damascene, Timagenes Castor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus avow, who all doe witness that Antiochus wanting money, brake the league hee had with the Iewes, and robbed and spoyled their Temple being full of gold and siluer. Apion ought to haue considered this, had hee not had an Asses heart, and a dogges impudencie, which hee and his Countymen worshippinge for gods. As for vs wee doe neither honour nor reuerence Asses, though the Aegyptians doe their Crocodiles and Alpes, esteeming them that are bitten by Alpes, and deuoured by Crocodiles, to be happie and fit for God.

B But wee esteeme those to be Asses which all our wisemen doe, to wit, them who beare burdens imposed vpon them: and if coming into a fildes they fall to eate, and doe not that which they ought to doe, we vse to beate them with many stripes, and force them to till the ground, and doe other drudgerie. But Apion was either the greatest Assie that euer was in telling alie; or elsse hauing begun to doe it, hee could not compasse his enterprises, in that hee found not any iust cause of

C detraction against vs. Hee addeth another fable of the Greekes detracting vs, to the which I will make only this reple, that it is more commendable and agreeing to pietie & lesse vnclannesse, to passe thorow the Temple, then for Priestes to come and seine impious words and speeches: which they not respecting, laboured rather to excule the sacrilegious Kings; then to write the truth of vs and our Temple: endeavouring to corie fauour with Antiochus, and to couer & hide his sacriledge, vsed against our nation, for that hee wanted money, beleeuing vs euen in things that are to come. And Apion as prophceying of the rest, saith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table set before him, furnished with all foules that vie either sea or land, and that the man was heretofore almightie: And that so soone as Antiochus came into the Temple, hee adored him as though hee hoped for great helpe from the King, falling downe at his feete, and with a stretched out arme, crauing licence to speake: which the King graunting, and willing him to declare what hee was, and why hee dwelt in the Temple, and the cause of his meates before him: the man with sighes and teares bewayled vnto Antiochus his calamitie saying, He was a Grecian: and that traouailing in the Countrie to get his liuing, he was suddenly seized vpon by certaine Outlandishmen, and brought vnto the Temple, and shut vp therein, and that no man might see him, and that he was there fed or fatted with ali dainties that could be provided: and that at first this daintie fare made him ioyfull, but after ward he began to suspect it, and lastly he was heretofore amazed; and then demanding of a Iewe that administrated vnto him, for what cause hee was there kept; hee vnderstood the Iewes purpose, and law not to be reuealed, for the fulfilling whereof hee was there nourished, and that the Iewes were wont to doe the like euerie yeere vpon a day appointed; and to take a Grecian stranger and feede him a yeere, and then to carrie him to a wood; and there to kill him, and sacrifice him according to their rites and ceremonies, and to taste and eate of his entrailles: and in the sacrificing of the Grecian, to sweare to bee enemies vnto the Greekes, and the residue of the murdered man they cast into a certaine pit. And that then this Greeke reported vnto Antiochus, that the time allotted vnto him by the Iewes to liue, was now almost expired, and therefore requested for the reuerence hee bare to the Grecian gods, to saue his bloud from being spilt by the Iewes, and to free him out of that imminent calamitie.

This fable is not only stuffed full of all tragical crueltie, but also mingled with cruel impudencie: Yet for all this the first deuisers hereof doe not scape Antiochus from sacriledge, as they hoped hereby to doe, who writ it purposely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greeke found in a bed, did not moue him to come and sacke our Temple, hee not knowing of it before he came and found it so (as they say.) Antiochus therefore was most impious, and not assisted by Gods fauour in that enterprise, (whatsoeuer these lyars mutter) as it is easie to learne of the fact of him committed. For wee doe not onely differ from the Greekes in religion, but a great deale more from the Aegyptians, & other nations: and what nation in the world is there, that sometime doth not trauaile through our Countrie? Is it then probable that we onely reue that conspiracie against the Greekes? Or how is it possible that so many thousand peoples are of our owne nation, should all eate of the entrails of one man as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man whoseuer he was? Or why did not the king carrie him with trumpets into his Countie? seeing that in so doing he might haue bin esteemed full of pietie, & a great fauor of the Greekes, and greatly strengthen himselfe against the hatred of the Iewes by their aide? But I omit to speake more of this: for vn sensible people void of all reason, must not bee reprehended in word, but by deedes: for all men that haue seene the building of the Temple, canne testifie what it was, and the vndefined puritie thereof. For it had foure porches about, and euerie one of them by our lawes had feuerall keepers: and into the outward porch all people, yea straungers might enter without breach of our lawes, (women onely excepted that haue their monethly course.) Into the second porch it was lawfull for onely Iewes to come: and all Iewes might goe into it, and their wiues also when they were free from pollution of their flowes. Into the third porch, they onely of our nation that were purified and sanctified might come. Into the fourth, might onely Priests enter, who were cloathed with priestly Stoles, and into the secret part of the Temple might onely the high Priest come, attired with a Stole proper to him onely: yea wee are in all things so carefull of pietie, that our Priests are appointed howers when to enter into the Temple.

Certain Historiographers endeavour to couer and hide Antiochus his sacrilegious and sacrilege.

That the Iewes ought once a yeere to sacrifice a Grecian.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Priests that were to sacrifice the hostes which were given them, entered into the Temple; and at noone againe when it was shut, yea it was not lawfull to carrie any vessell into the Temple: but there was onely there an Altar, a Table, a Censer, and a Candlestick, as is in our lawe mentioned, and there is no other secret or hidden mysteries done, neither is there in that place any eating, and all the people can testifie this which I haue here set downe, and our writings doe the like. For notwithstanding that there are foure rites of Priests, and euerie Priests tribe containeth about fise thousand men: yet euery one waiteth on certaine appointed dayes in their turne, and their time of waiting being expired, others succede them in sacrificing; and the day before they are to finish their waiting, they deliuer vp vnto their successors the keyes of the Temple, and all vessells belonging thereto, in the full number that they receiued them: and nothing is brought into our Temple, pertaining either to meate or drinke: yea, and are forbidden to bee offered at our Altar, those things onely excepted, whereof we make our sacrifice. What then shall we say of Apion, who examining nothing of all this, hath raised such incredible reports of vs? How ignominious a thing it is for a Gram-marian, not to bee able to deliuer the truth of a Historie? Well, hee knewe the pietie vsed in our Temple, but hee purposely omitted it: yet could hee remember to tell a fained tale of the sacrificing of the Greeke, his dainie faire and that hidden foode, that all men also that would, passed through our Temple, whereas the most noble amongst our whole nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be priests.

This therefore is great impietie, and a voluntarie forged lie, to seduce them that will not examine the truth. For they haue attempted to slander vs by those impieties before mentioned, not to bee spoken of. And againe, like one full of all pietie, he derideth the vanitie of these fables, and reporteth that at such time as the Iewes for a long time together, warred against the Idumæans, Zabidus departing out of a Citie of Idumæa where Apollo was worshipped, came vnto the Iewes, promising them to deliuer vnto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him vnto their Temple, if so bee that all of them would there assemble themselves together: and that afterwards Zabidus did make a most excellent kind of wooden instrument, and placed in it three rankes of candles, and put it vpon him, and so walked like a starre gliding on the ground (for that shape he resembled to them that were as farre off from him.) And that the Iewes hereat (seeing this straunge vision) admired and were astonished, and standing as farre off, they were all silent, and how by this shift Zabidus easily got into their Temple, and tooke away the golden Asses head (for so hee writeth plainly) and so to haue returned speedily to Dora. Wherefore we may say that Apion leadeth an Asse, to wit, himselfe with fooleries and lies, for he nameth places that are not, and setteth downe Cities to himselfe vnkowne: for Idumæa is a Province M neere vnto vs, and bordering vpon Gara, and there is no Citie in it called Dora: but in Phoenicia neere vnto the hill Carmelus, there is a Citie of that name, yet nothing consonant to Apions slanders, for it is foure dayes iourney from Iudæa.

Why therefore doth he so rashly accuse vs for not worshipping the same gods that other nations doe, seeing (as hee saith) our predecessors did so easily beleeue that Apollo would come vnto them,

A them, and that he walked vpon the earth, with starres vpon his backe? Perhaps indeed they had neuer before seene a candle or lampe, themselves hauing so many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our countrey, where so many thousand men are, no one of them almet him? Did he in time of warre finde the townes and villages, by which he past, without any watchmen? Well, I omit the rest. The gates of our temple were three score cubites high, twentie cubites broad, all couered with gold, yea almost all of cleane gold, and these gates euerie day were shut by two hundred men: & it was too impious a thing to leaue them open; is it then credible that this candlebearer could easily open them, who alone was iudged to haue the asses head? So that now it remaineth doubtfull whether Zabidus did bring backe againe the asses head, or else Apion tooke it of him and brought it againe to our temple, that there Antiochus might finde it, and so

B Apion might haue another occasion of lying. He also belieths concerning the oath which he saith wee Iewes doe take, swearing by the God of heauen and earth, and sea, neuer to fauour any stranger, and especially the Greekes. This liar might better haue said, not to fauour any stranger, and especially the Aegyptians, and so his former lies and these (should haue had better correspondence with the beginning, if our ancestors had bene expelled by their predecessors out of Aegypt, not for their wickednesse, but for their owne calamitie. But we are so farre from the Greekes, that we scarcely euer thinke of them: so that no man can say that there is any enmitie between vs and the Greekes. But contrariwise many of them haue embraced our religion, and some of them therein perserued: others againe haue forsaken it; yet none of them will say that he heard this oath spoken amongst vs: but it should seeme that onely Apion heard of it, in that he himselfe

C indeed forged it. Truly his great wisdom and prouidence is worthe to bee admired (as shall hereafter appeare) for he to proue these his lies to bee true, saith, that it is a certaine testimonie that the lawes we obserue are most iust, and that we worship not God as we ought to do in that we were subiect to diuers nations, and our Citie endured many calamities: Where-as touching themselves they are of a Citie that flourisheth in absolute authoritie, accustomed to gouerne from the foundation thereof, and not to serue the Romans. In effect who canne resist their valour? Truly no man but Apion would euer haue flattered vs herewith, seeing that few Cities so flourish and raigne ouer other, that they againe at no one time haue bene brought into subiection. For manie nations are subiect to others: onely the Aegyptians are freed from the captiuitie of such as rule Europe and Asia, for that (as they say) the gods flying into their countrey, were saved

D by entering into the bodies of beasts. Yet haue they not indeed had any one dayes libertie since the beginning of the world, neither vnder the gouernment of their owne princes, nor vnder strangers.

I will not stand to reckon how often the Persians haue wasted their Citie, destroyed their temples, and slaine their supposed gods. For it is not decent that I should imitate herein Apions foolishnesse: neither am I calling to memorie what befell the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, the last of which, are recorded to haue bene most valiant, and first to haue bene most deuout and religious: neither will I reckon vp those most godly kings, amongst whom Crasus was one, who notwithstanding fell into great calamities. Moreouer I will not recount how the Castle of

E Athens was set on fire, and the temples of Ephefus and Delphos likewise and many others. There is now one Apion a new accuser of the Iewes, who vpbraideth them with their calamities: forgetting quite all miserie that hath befallen his countymen the Aegyptians: but hee was blinded with the fable of Sesostris, whom (he saith) to haue bene king of Aegypt.) We could report and boast of our kings, Dauid, and Salomon, who subdued many nations vnto them: but it is not fite here to speake of them. But Apion was ignorant of that which all the world knoweth; to wit, that the Aegyptians haue serued first to the Persians, and afterwards to the Macedonians, and that as bond slaues: where wee remaining in free libertie raigned ouer all Cities round about vs 120. yeres, euen vnto the time of Pompey the great; and when all the other kings were subdued by the Romans, onely our kings for their fidelitie and friendship towards them were deare vnto

F them. Oh but this sticketh vpon Apions stomacke, that wee haue not had any famous men of our nation, who haue inuented artes and sciences, and bene excellent in wisdom, such as Socrates, Zeno, Cleantes and others, whom hee setteth downe were: & which is most to be admired Apion putteth himselfe in the number of these famous men: and saith that Alexandria is blessed and happy, that hath deserued to haue such a Citizen as he is: and great reason that hee himselfe should testifie that of himselfe, which all men else perceiue in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitfull fellow, both of corrupt life, and manners. So that any Alexandrian had iust cause cause to bee forie that they euer had any better opinion of him. But that our nation had men equal at least vnto those whom hee mentioneth, all men know that please to reade the booke of our Antiquitie. The rest that his accusation containeth, it is not amisse to let passe without answere, for that it rather impeacheth the Aegyptians his owne countymen, then vs: for he doth comaine of vs for sacrificing ordinarie beastes, and for abstaining to eat swines flesh, and greatly laughed at circumcision. Touching the sacrificing of these beastes, wee doe as all nations else doe: And Apion inueighing against our sacrificing, sheweth himselfe to bee an Aegyptian; for were hee either a Græcian, or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended; for both Greekes and Macedonians doe vow, to sacrifice Hecatombes to their gods, and vse priests in the banquetts; and yet for all this, the world is not desolate of liuing creatures, as Apion feareth.

But were all men so mad as the Aegyptians, it would indeede bee desolate of men, and filled with cruell beastes, which they (supposing them to bee gods) doe diligently nourish. If any man should aske Apion whom of all the Aegyptians he iudged to be a wise man and most religious towards their gods, no doubt hee would aunswere that the priests are. For they say that their first kings in the beginning gaue them these two commandements in charge: first to seek wisdomme, and next to worshipsse the gods: they also are all of them circumcised, and abstain from swines flesh, and no other Aegyptian sacrificeth with them vnto their gods. Apion therefore was surely blinde, when in steede of detracting vs, he speaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom, he tooke all this paines. For the Aegyptians doe not onely vse those customes which Apion in vs disalloweth, but also doe teach others to circumsise themselves, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verelie thinke, that Apion was iustly punished for blaspheming his countrie lawes and religion. For being forced to circumsise himselfe to auoide a great disease, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this his priuie member rotting, he in extreame grieue and miserie gaue vp the ghost. For wise men ought to perseuer in their countrey lawes in all pietie, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forsooke his owne religion, and slandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and here also should ende this booke, but that Apolonius, Melen, and Lysimachus and certaine others, partly for ignorance, partly for madnesse, haue most iniuriously belied our law-maker Moses, and the lawes hee made, detracting him as a deceitfull Magician, and then as the author of all malice and impietie amongst vs: and for such as teach no vertue nor goodnes at all. I will therefore as farre as in mee lieth declare both our conuersation in general, and in particular: for if my iudgement be any thing, our lawes are most forcible both to pietie, and to all humanitie in general, as also to iustice, paines taking, and contempt of death. I onely request this fauour of the Reader, that hee will not with a preiudicate or malicious opinion, peruse these writings: for I doe not write this as a prayse and vaine ostentation of our nation, but as a iust Apologie, refusing the slanderous reportes that some haue vsed against vs.

Apolonius doth not continually inueigh against vs as Apion doth, but onely here and there; sometime affirming vs to be somewhiles hated both of God and man, sometime to be cowards, other sometimes contrariwise complaining of our nations boldnesse. Saying moreover, that we are more fortith then any barbarous nation: and that therefore wee onely haue had none of our nation founders of artes or sciences, which are profitable for mans life: all which obiections are easily refuted, if we shew the contrarie to all these by him reported; both that wee haue obeyed our lawes, and liued in all integritie. If therefore I bee forced to shew that other nations haue made contrarie lawes, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other nations, affirme ours to be the worse: neither of which can charge vs, either that these laws which I will briefly set downe are not ours, or else that we haue not persisted in them as wee ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirme that they who haue framed themselves to liue together vnder certaine rules and ordinances, and kept them inuiolate, and were the first founders of them, were more to be commended for humanitie and vertue, then they who liue vnder no rule nor ordinance at all: and euery law-maker endeouureth so to challenge antiquitie for their own ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themselves the first authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens liues. Which being so, it is the dutie of a good law-maker to make choice of that which is best, and most conuenient for them, who are to obey their lawes, and to satisfie them as much as may be, in proouing their lawes to be good and right, and both in wealth and woe, calamitie and felicitie, to remaine in them neuer changing nor altering them.

A them. I therefore auerre that our lawmaker is more auncient then any lawmaker mentioned. For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleucus of Locris, and those the Greekes admire, are moderne, of late times in respect of him, as it is well knowne. For the Greekes themselves confesse, that in times past they wanted the name of law. This Homer can witness, who in his whole works neuer mentioneth this word, law, for the people of those times were not gouerned by lawes, but by indefinite sentences, and the princes pleasure, vsing customes but not written, and all tearing and chaunging them also as occasion serued.

Moses more auncient then all other law-makers.
Nouus C.
This word law is not in Homer.

B But our lawmaker being verie auncient (for this is euerie way manifest, euen by our aduersaries own confessions) shewed himself both a good prince and counsellor vnto his people: making lawes to direct and gouerne mens liues, hee perswaded them voluntarily to embrace them, and firmly to persist in them with all wisedome. And first of all let vs consider the workes of his greatnesse. For hee vndertaking the conduct of manie thousand of our forefathers out of Aegypt into our owne countrey, deliuered them from many calamities, almost impossible to be auoided: for they being to passe through a place wherein was no water, and a verie sandie ground, being also to warre and to keepe their wiues and children, and goods for the variable euent of wars, he in all these shewed himselfe a most wise and prudent counsellor, and a true patron and guide vnto them all: For he made all the multitude so to depend vpon him, that he might perswade them whatsoeuer he pleased, and yet in none of all these did hee vsurpe any authoritie ouer them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authoritie assume power vnto themselves, & vse tyrannie, at such time as the people do oftentimes offend and liue in all manner of impietie, he then being in authoritie did contrariwise vie all lenitie, and mildnesse, to the entent that he might bee a patterne of vertue and iustice to all the rest, giuing all those that willingly followed him most assured safetie, vsing in all accidents most straunge workes. And for this cause hee rightly deemed God to be his captain & counsellor: and first examining himselfe, and finding that all the lawes he had set downe were agreeable to the wil & pleasure of God, the chiefest care he now had was how to perswade his people the same, which he himselfe now knew, for they who direct their liues according to the will of God, auoid all sinne as our lawmaker did, being neither Magician nor deceiuer as his enemies iniuriously report, but such a one as the Greekes do boast Minos and others after him to haue bene: for some of them affirmed their lawes to be made by Iupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle, either so beleueing themselves, or else thinking that the people would be easily so perswaded. Now who of all the lawmakers made the best lawe, & who did most rightly thinke of God, hee that compareth all their lawes together may easily know: for now occasion is offered to speake of them: there are therefore an infinite companie of nations and lawes amongst men, and some nations are ruled by Monarches, other some by the common consent of the people. But our lawmaker doing neither of these, did as one should say therein declare his common wealth to be diuine, chietely assigning all power and principallitie ouer vs to God, causing all men to fixe their minds and cogitations on him, as the onely giuer and author of all goodnesse, giuing them to vnderstand, that whatsoeuer in their necessitie they entreate him for, hee heareth their prayers, and vnderstandeth what euery man doth in priuate, yea his verie cogitations; and that hee is one, vnbegotten, and in all times immutable and eternall, differing in a most excellent shape from all mortall creatures, and this wee knowe, but wee are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his substance and essence.

The life of Moses.

Moses maketh God his guide and counsellor.

The Origin of lawes amongst the Greekes.

And thus the wisest Greekes that euer were, iudged of God, who how learned they were (he giuing the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearse: & that these things afore rehearsed are best and most agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, manie do witness, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoickes, and almost all other Philosophers haue so thought of the diuine nature. But they deliuering this their Philosophie in short speech, durst not publish the truth of their doctrine among the people, already seized vpon by superstitious opinions. But our lawmakers workes and words so agreed, that he satisfied at large all his people, and they that euer were to be borne of them, and their successors, inspiring as it were a certain constancie into them to perseuer in the same, still referring the cause of his lawes to their profit and commoditie. For he did not affirme the worship of God onely to be part of vertue, but he assigned other parts thereof, to wit, fortitude, iustice, and mutuall concord of all his citizens. For all our actions, speeches, and what else soeuer, are all referred to diuine pietie. Which hee left not touched without any more discourse of it. For these two are the methods of all discipline and and moralitie, whereof one frameth and directeth the speech, the other the manners and actions; Q which being so, other lawmakers were indeed wise in aduice and counsaile, and yet they made choice of one of these methods, & left the other: For the Lacedemonians were instructed in manners, and not in words, as also they of Crete were: but the Athenians & almost all the Greeks were directed and trained vp by lawes in euerie thing, they were to doe, yet neuer could they put their written lawes in practise; but our lawmaker verie industriously did conioyne both these together, for he neither omitted the training them vp in manners and good exercises, neither did he surcease to leaue them written lawes. And first of all, making his entrance fro the verie meats, and prescribing to euerie one a conuenient diet, he left no man libertie amongst vs to direct himselfe in the least matter concerning his meat, but he by lawes defined, both from what meats we were to abstaine, and what to eate, and what ought to bee our ordinarie diet, as also when we ought to labour, and when to cease from worke, so that we as it were vnder the gouernment of a father or master, might neither sune willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not appoint punishment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a most necessarie and milde chastisement for the voluntarie offenders: and for this cause he did not onely will, that wee should once or twice or often heare the lawes, but that once euerie week we all omitting other busines, should come to heare the lawes, and so learne them perfectly, which things all other lawmakers as it is well knowne omitted: All which laudable customes all other lawmakers haue neglected, & the most part of men are so farre from liuing according to their owne lawes, that they are altogether ignorant of them: and hauing offended their lawes through ignorance, they then learn by other mens meanes, that they haue made breach of their lawes, yea the chiefe and most eminent men amongst them, doe professe herein that they are ignorant, causing those that are learned and skilfull in their lawes, to sit as it were in commission with them to direct them. Whereas euerie one of our nation being demanded of our lawes, canne answer as readily as hee can tell his owne name: for euerie one of vs learning them as it were so loone as wee come to the vse of reason, wee haue them as it were written and printed in our mindes, and by this meanes both wee offend more seldome, and when wee offend, wee are sure to bee punished.

of the lawes in religion.

And this especially is that which hath caused such an vnitie and concord amongst vs. For to worship one God all after the same manner, and nothing to differ in manner and conseruation one from another, is the onely way to establish amitie and concord in a commonwealth. For K onely amongst vs no man shal heare any different speeches and opinions concerning God, which thing amongst all nations else is most frequent and ordinarie: for amongst them not onely euerie one of the comon people doth speak his pleasure in this point, but diuers Philosophers also presume to do it, some of them with their blasphemous speeches altogether destroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudencie denying him to haue any care of men: neither is there any difference amongst vs of affaires appertaining to mans life, but all men with vs follow one comon expresse labour, and we all ioynly asseme the sonne of God, and that hee hath care of humane affaires, and all our actions and exercises: yea any one may learne of our women and children, that all things whatsoever, are to be reduced to pietie. Hence it groweth that some detract our nation, for that amongst vs were no men inuents of new matters & actes: to whom we will thus answer, that other nations account it a glory not to persist in anie thing that their forefathers vsed, and should them of most account amongst them, that can best transgresse their forefathers wisdom. But we contrariwise do account it the chiefe point of wisdom and vertue, neither to do, nor thinke any thing contrarie to that which our ancessors haue decreed, which is a token that our law was established by as good aduice as was possible. For those lawes that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faultie. But amongst vs who beleue that our law was first established by the will & pleasure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and vertuous which may any wise impugne the same. For who can take away any tittle thereof, or adde better in the stead? or who is hee that can transerre and carrie vs from the obseruance of them, and ordaine for vs better lawes to gouerne our common wealth? Or what law can be more iust M and better, then that which the wisdom of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath established? Hee first of all permitted the disposing of all principal affaires to the priests in general, and most wisely constituted a high priest as their head: neither were they chosen to this dignitie by our lawmaker, who either excelled in nobility of birth, or riches; but he appointed such to sacrifice vnto God, who were knowne to excell others in wisdom and sanctitie: and these do both

- A keepe our lawes, and obserue all other things belonging to their office with all integritie; for our priests are appointed ouer-seers of all things, and to iudge all strifes and controuersies, and to punish the offenders. What monarchie then or kingdom can be more holy then this? Or how can God bee better honoured then amongst vs, where all the people are prepared to pietie, and the priests commanded so to rule and gouerne the commonwealth, as if they were celebrating some festiuitie? And whereas other nations cannot celebrate their mysteries, which they tearme sacrifices, in a few daies; we with ioy and pleasure and immutable wils, do celebrate our sacrifice continually without intermission: It resteth now that I set downe our precepts & lawes, as arguments of that which I haue said. The first is of God: of whom our law saith, God hath all things, he is most perfect, most blessed, he is sufficient both for himselfe and all things else, he is the beginning, middest, and ending, famous amongst all things for his works & benefits, more manifest then any thing else, but his shape and greatnes is to vs vnspokeable, all matters (how precious so euer) being compared with his excellent beauty are nothing worth, and all Art compared with his inuention is vnartificiall, wee can neither see, conceiue, nor imagin any thing like him. He is holy, for we see his workes; the light, the heauen and the earth: the Sunne the moone, riuers, and sea, so many different shapes of liuing creatures, and increase of fruits: All these God himselfe made, not with hands or worke, nor as one needing any to help him, but he seeing them to be good, they were presently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worship him by the exercising of vertue; for this is the most holy way to please him. We haue one temple, as also one God, which Temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men.
- C For similitude alwaies pleasest him, hee doe all our Priests honour with sacrifice, and he amongst them hath the first place, who by birth is the chiefe: and he first sacrificeth to God, seeth the lawes obserued, iudgeth controuersies, and punisheth those that are conuicted by the law: who soeuer disobeyeth him, shall be punished as one that rebelleth against God himselfe; he offereth sacrifices not pertaining to gluttony or drunkennes, for God is not pleased with such sacrifices, but is rather iniured, and superfluous expences are thereby made.

- But God loueth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behauiour, and especially requireth in vs that sacrifice, an inuiolable chastitie. In our sacrifices offered for our common good, we first of all pray in common, and then euery one for himselfe, because wee are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more then in his own life, he is most acceptable to God.
- D We pray & vow vnto God, not requesting riches of him, for hee of his owne accord bestoweth them vpon euery one, and left them amongst vs, but we pray that wee may haue part of them, and hauing gotten them may keep them. Our law hath also appointed purifications both from our Chamber-bed and carnal copulation, & many other things, which are too long to rehearse. And this is our speech and opinion of God, who himselfe is our law. And what concerning marriage? Our law onely alloweth naturall copulation betweene man and wife, done to the intent to get children. But that men should abuse one another against nature, it altogether disalloweth and punisheth such offenders with death. It commandeth vs to marrie, not respecting the dowrie, neither must we take women violently & by force, nor allure them by deceitful persuasions, but that we rather obtaine his good will, who may graunt and vse ordinarie meanes to perswade. It also appointeth that a woman shall be in all things inferiour to the man, neither is she to obey in committing wickednes, but as one vnder gouernment. For it is God that gaue man this authoritie. VVith her the husband only may lawfully accompany, and it is abominacion for her to make triall of another man, & who so attempteth this, can no waies auoide death: the like penaltie attendeth him, if hee offer violence to a virgine depouled vnto another man, or if he by persuasions doe ouercome a married woman or other, that hath children vnder her, & all this our law commandeth: It hath also interdicted all women from concealing their children being borne, or otherwise to destroy them, for so she should be a child killer, destroy soules and mankind: Who so therefore vseth carnall copulation and corruption is vncleane by our lawes, and women after lawfull copulation must wash themselves, iudging that a part of their soule was by this act defiled, and shee beeing puffed vp was wounded in her body, and therefore our law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawfull for them to feast and banquet at their child-birth, whereby an occasion of drunkennes may grow, but that their beginning should be temperate, they are likewise commanded to traine vp their children in learning, that they may learne the law, and actions of their forefathers, and imitate them; that so beeing trained vp in the law, they may not sinne nor transgresse them by ignorance.

Our law hath also provided for the buriall of the dead, that our funerals should neither bee pompeous, nor our sepulchers gorgeous, commaunding euery household to performe all necessities touching the buriall of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to assemble themselves together, and bewaile the dead: It also commandeth euery one (yea euen the dead mans owne familie) to purifie themselves after the buriall, and to goe as farre off, as seeming to be vnclean. It also appointeth punishment for them that haue committed murder, either wilfully or against their will. It bindeth euery man to obey his parents next after God, & commandeth that those children that doe not shew themselves gratefull vnto them, or in any thing doe grieue them, that they should be stoned to death: It also commandeth all yong men to reuerence old men, because God is elder to vs all. It permitteth not friends to counsell any impietie; for God is not their friend who doth nor disclole them: and if friends fall out that doe know one anothers secrets, yet they are commanded not to bewray them. If any Iudge take a bribe, he is to be punished with death for omitting iustice, and assisting the guilty. No man must take any thing away that he himselfe placed nor, and no man must take that which is not his owne. No man for lending must take vsury; & many such like things our law commandeth, concerning cause of communion betwene vs and others.

It is also not amisse to recount how our lawmaker provided for the entertaining of strangers amongst vs: For he seemeth so to haue provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our owne lawes, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally that will come and liue vnder our lawes, iudging the communie of mans life, not so much to consist in the nation whereof we come, as in the vnitie of our minds & conseruation. He forbiddeth others that are strangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our solemnities; yet he commanded vs to exhibite vnto them, all other things necessarie: and that we should giue vnto all men, fire, water, meat, & bury them being dead. He hath also most mildly determined how we ought to deale with our enemies, that wee neither destroy their countie with fire, nor cut downe their fruit trees. Wee are also forbidden to rob and spoile those that are slaine in fight, & deale iniuriously with our captiues; & especially if they be women: yea he so endeaoured to teach vs humanitie & mildnes, that he provided, that we vsie euen vnreasonable beasts courteously, & onely employ them to serue our lawfull need and no further: for hee forbiddeth vs to kill any tame thing bred in houses, and that wee should not kill the old birds and their yong together, and although many wilde beasts enemies to mankind doe asist vs in our labours, yet he commanded vs to spare them also. And in euery point hee established humanitie and mildnes amongst vs, vsing (as is before said) lawes to direct vs therein, enacting also other, how they who infringe the foresaid lawes, may bee with all seueritie punished: for the punishment allotted to the violaters hereof, is for the most part death: as if any man commit adulterie, rauish a virgin, vsie the sinne against nature with another, or suffer himselfe to be so abused. Wee also haue lawes concerning our seruants, and our measures, and waights, and vnlawfull bargaines & sales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is an other mans, or which is not his own; all these are to be punished not as other nations punish them, but much more grieuouly. But whosoever either iniureth his parents, or committeth impietie against God, he shall presently be destroyed: but they that obserue this law are rewarded not with gold or siluer, nor with a crowne beset with precious stone: but euery one hauing his conscience to witnes, doth greatly profit & gaine eternitie, as both our lawmaker propheciet, & God himselfe doth most assuredly promise to them that obserue them. And if it chance that we be forced to suffer death for them, yet do we ioyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we shall so exchange this life for a better: I should be loath to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifest: for many of our forefathers, only for that they refused to speake against our lawes, or otherwise then our lawes permitted, haue most manfully and constantly indured all torments and death it selfe. If our nation were vnknowne to al the world, and that this our voluntary obseruation of our lawes, were not manifest to al people, if any man should report vnto the Greekes, that either he had read this which I haue declared, or else that he had found people in a strange land, such as we be, hauing so pious & honest opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages persecuted therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, considering the great mutabilitie amongst themselves. To bee short, there are some who sticke not to deride them who haue lately written of the gouernment of Commonwealths and lawes, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impossible. And that I speake nothing of other Philosophers that haue written of this argument, that diuine

A diuine Plato amongst the Greekes, a man who in honest life, vertuous speech, and sound Philosophie, excelled all others. This man is almost continually scoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are skillfull in ciuill affaires, and brought in as a Vice in a Comedie. Whereas whosoever considereth his writings with diligence, shall often and easily finde matter agreeable with most mens manners: yea this Plato himselfe confesseth, that hee dare not by reason of the common peoples ignorance set downe the true opinion of God. But many thinke Platoes words full of vanitie, and licentiousnesse, and admire Lycurgus, and euery one commendeth the citie of Sparta, for that it so long time persevered in his lawes. It is therefore an euident demonstration of vertue to remaine in their lawes. But if those who so admire the Lacedemonians doe compare them with vs, & the time during the which their lawes were in force, with the time of our common wealth: they shall finde that ours hath continued more then two thousand yeeres. They shall also finde that the Lacedemonians did only perfectly obserue their lawes, during such time as they were in prosperitie and libertie, and that when their fortune chaunged, they then became vnmindfull of their lawes.

But wee, who haue felt many thousand mishaps by reason of the often change of princes in Asia, haue not in these our last miseries and euils forsaken our lawe. Neither can any man say, that libertie and licentious life is the cause, why wee so diligently obserue them, seeing that whoso please may see sufficient prooffe, that they tie vs to more strict life and laborious, then those of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor vsed any handie-craft, but ceasing from all labours and paines taking, liued in their Citie fatte and faire-like, hauing both their meate and all other necessities provided and prepared for them by others, and esteemed that onely their felicitie to doe or endure any thing, so that they might preuaile against those against whome they enterprised warres: and that they failed also herein, I omit to rehearse. For not onely one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole companies of them, forgetting their owne lawes yeelded themselves to their enemies. And can any one tell of, I say not so many, but of one or two of vs that euer was treacherous to his own lawes, or that feared to die for them, I meane not a common death, such as souldiers are subiect vnto, but such a death as is effected by all torments & tortures that can be deuised. Which I thinke those that preuailed against vs imposed vpon vs, not for hatred, but that they desired to see so admirable a matter, and to see if we beeing but men, and such who esteemed it the greatest impietie possible to doe it, could be compelled by them to speake or doe any thing contrary to our lawes. Yet it is no wonder that we for our law doe die with such constancie, rather then any other nation: for other nations cannot abide to endure that which wee account a trifle, to wit, labour and simple fare, and that no man eate whatsoeuer, or what hee desireth, to lie with them whom he ought not, or to be idle (except he be of noble birth) or goe gallantly attired: and we are alwaies carefull that when we fight against our enemy, wee obserue our lawes concerning our meates. And thus wee take pleasure to obserue and keepe our lawes, and to exercise fortitude in obeying them.

Let now Lysimachus or Molonus passe, and such as they be, wicked, lying writers, and Sophisters, deceiuers of young men, and detractors of our owne nation: as though we were the wickedest people liuing. As for me, I will not examine the lawes of other nations: for it is our custome to keepe and obserue our owne, not to detract others, yea and our law-maker openly prohibited vs from blaspheming such, as other nations hold for gods, onely for the name of God attributed vnto them: yet may we not leaue the obiections of our accusers vnanswered, seeing that which wee are to speake against them, is not our owne deuice, but many before vs haue spoken it. Who then of all the wise Greekes will not condemne the most famous Poets, and especially the law-makers, who at first brought and settled such vain opinions of the gods amongst the common people? affirming the number of them to be so many as they thought good, and to be borne at diuers times one of another, allotting to euery one his proper place, as vnto other liuing creatures: some to be vnder the earth, others in the sea, and the ancientest amongst them in Hell, fettered and bound, & those whom they place in heaven, in words, they do tearme him a father, but in deeds they shew him to bee a tyrant, and for this cause they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirme to haue been borne of his braine, conspired against him to binde him, and hang him, as they report him also, to haue dealt by his father. Against these vanities all excellent and wise men doe worthily inueigh, who beside this already rehearsed, in derision adde, how some of the gods are young, and some old, and some infants, others are gods of artes and sciences, and one is a Smith, another a Weauer, another a Pilgrime, and is at variance with mortall men, others delight in musicke, others in shooting: moreouer that they are at variance one with another amongst themselves, and that they salout one with another in mens behalfe, and that not onely one of them laith violent hands vpon the other, but that also they are wounded by mortall men, & sorrow, & feeble griefe for the wounds; and that which is most abominable of all, do vse carnall copulation with mankind, & that most vndecently, that their vnbridled lust is extended both to men & women. Then that their chiefe God of all, whom they call father, contemned and drowned certaine women whom he himself had deceiued and gotten with childe, and that hee could not deliuer the children borne of these women from calamitie, for that destinie had obliged him, nor see their deaths without teares. This is all good stufte, as also is that which followeth, to wit. adulteries committed in heauen, H so openly, & impudently amongst the gods, that some professe themselves to enuy their fellow gods and goddes tied together in such filthines. And what should the rest of them doe, when as their king and the most ancientest amongst them, could not refraine his lustfull licentiousnes from the company of women? Moreouer, some of them became seruants vnto men, and some built houses for money, and others became shepheards, others like malefactors were chained in hell. What man then that euer was accounted wise, would not blush at these follies, and reprove the inuentors thereof, and the foolish beleeuers also? Others presumed to feigne both terror and feare, and madnes, and such simplicitie, as that they might be deceiued, and at other naughty passions to be found in the nature of their gods, & haue perswaded whole cities to offer sacrifices to the most noble amongst them. And they are in great perplexitie, thinking that some of the gods are the giuers of all good things, others againe to be their enemies, and so seeke to please them with gifts as they would doe wicked men; and they are verily perswaded, that they shall sustaine great damage by their meanes, except they doe daily pacifie their wrath by frequent gifts. What is the cause of this shamefull ignorance, and erroneous iniquitie concerning God? Truly I am perswaded, for that their first law-makers were themselves herein to seeke, and ignorant of the nature of God, & that they did not faithfully deliuer vnto their common wealth, so much as themselves knew concerning this point: but as though it had bin a thing of least moment, did wilfully let it passe, giuing licence to Poets, and permitting them to devise and make gods whom they pleased, and that the Orators should write of the common wealths affaires, and tell what them liked of strange gods. Moreouer, the painters and image-makers amongst the Greeks, had a great hand in making of gods, it being lawfull for them euerie one to frame what shape he list, and how he list, some of earth, others in colours: and the chiefe god-makers amongst them vse iuory and gold to make their gods of; a true argument of their mutable noueltie. And then the ancient gods whom they first so honoured and reuerenced as they could possibly deuise, being now withered with age, are out of credit, and other yongsters possesse their places & honours: their temples also some are desolate, others newly erected, as men pleased. Whereas contrariwise they ought most constantly to keepe their opinion of God, and his religion.

Appolonius Molon was one of these proud fooles: but those Grecians that followed true Philosophie, knew all that is already said, and the colde reasons of this allegorie, and therefore L did iustly despise them, and agreed with vs in the true & decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato well seeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a common wealth, and sendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and annointed, least that he with fables should destroy or depraue the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others especially imitated our law-maker, as he did herein also, commanding all his Citizens that all of them should perfectly learne his lawes, and that for no casualtie, any strange forraigne custome should be admitted into their citie, but that their common wealth should bee pure, and they persist in the obseruation of their lawes. But Appolonius Molon not respecting this, inueigheth against vs, for not receiuing into our societie men of strange opinions or religion, whereas not onely wee doe so, but commoly all Greekes, yea and the most prudent amongst them. The Lacedemonians did expell all strangers, and did not permit their citizens to trauell into other countries, fearing that by both these M waies their lawes might be corrupted. They therefore are to be spoken against rather than we, seeing they neither admit strangers to conuerse with them, nor to inhabite amongst them, nor impart their religion vnto them, but wee though not desirous to learne other nations religion, yet doe wee not deny to impart ours to strangers that desire to embrace it: which if I be not

THE SECOND BOOKE

A not deceiued is a token of magnanimitie, and clemencie in vs: but this shall suffice concerning the Lacedemonians. Apollonius was ignorant how matters stood with the Athenians, who boast that their citie is free from all nations: for they did most seuerely and without all mercy punish those that did but speake any worde against their God. For what was the cause of Socrates his death? he neither betrayed the citie to enemies, nor destroyed their temples, but only swore by a strange oath, which as he said (whether in iest or in earnest) a diuell taught him, and for this offence was he put to death, by drinking hemlocke: his accusers alleading, that hee corrupted yong men, and contemned the lawes, and religion of his country. And this Socrates sustained being a citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: & for that he affirmed the sunne which the Athenians worshipped for God, to be a fiery stone, he was by the sentence of some few condemned to dy. They also proclaimed, that whosoever would kill Diagoras of Melus should be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diagoras was said to deride their mysteries: Protagoras also had been by them taken and put to death, had he not made quick escape, onely for that they supposed him to haue written certaine doubts of the Athenian Gods. And what wonder is it that they to vict these famous men, who spared not to vse the like cruelty vpon women? For they killed a priest, for that some accused her to worship strange Gods; & their law appointed, that whoso did introduce strange Gods into their citie, should bee punished with death. It is therefore euident, that they who enacted such straight lawes, did not beleue the Gods of other nations to be Gods: for had they beleueed in them, they would not haue deprived themselves of the benefit

C of many Gods. The very Scythians (who delight in manslaughter, so that they very little differ from brute beasts) yet do they think themselves bound to maintaine their own lawes, as best, so that they slew Anatharsis a famous Greeke, that came vnto them, onely for that hee seemed to attribute too much vnto the Grecian Gods, yea thou maist finde many amongst the Persians, who for this cause haue been tortured: And it is euident that Appolonius approoued the Persian lawes: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I meane the fortitude they shewed in the burning of their temples, this Appolonius in all things imitated the Persians, violating other mens wives, and putting out their childrens eyes: whereas our lawes adiudge him to death that to vseth vnreasonable beasts: And neither the feare and terror of potentates, nor the fauour of them whom all men reuerence, could euer cause vs to forsake or abandon these lawes: neither do we exercise fortitude, to the end to deprime other men of their goods and fortunes by warre, but to keepe our owne lawes: and wee who patiently put vp all other iniurie, yet if any man do in our religion prouoke vs, we presently seeke reuenge, not respecting our own ability, yet though thereby we worke our owne vtter ruine, and calamitie. What therefore should moue vs to imitate the lawes of other nations, when they that made those lawes (yea euen the lawmakers themselves) did transgresse them? Or how can the Lacedemonians auoid reproach for their inhospitalitie, and neglecting marriage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men, contrary to the law of nature, which fast most shamefull, they deemed good and necessary. Yea not content to do so themselves, they also ascribed the like vnto their Gods to be done by them (which the Greeks also now of late haue done) and for this cause

D they refused to marrie with their own women, iudging their satisfaction to bee contrarie to the prescript of nature: But I will speake no more of punishment, neither how great malefactors those first lawmakers freed from punishment, being bribed with money, and how vniust they were in the lawes appertaining to wedlocke. It is long to examine how great occasions of impiety they gaue. For many haue already long ago forsake their lawes: which cannot be said of vs, who for our lawes haue suffered losse of our cities, fortunes and liues, we keeping & persisting in our lawes euen vnto death: and if any few be in a strange country where there is a tyrant king, yet doth not hee so feare him that hee would for his commaund in any iot transgresse our lawes. If therefore wee doe valourously endure thus much for our lawes, all men must needs grant our lawes to be very good, but if they say wee suffer all these calamities for to maintaine wicked or

E naughty lawes, what punishment are they not worthy of, who haue (as they say) better lawes then we, doe so easily forsake them, whereas we doe maintaine ours euen with our owne liues? But seeing antiquitie of lawes is the greatest argument to proue their goodnes, I will set downe of what antiquitie our lawes are, together with our lawmakers opinion of the Deitie; if therefore any one compare our lawes with the lawes of all nations, he shall find that ours are of more antiquitie then theirs by many ages. For our lawes established amongst vs haue beene imitated of all other nations: For though the first Greeks did colourably obserue lawes, yet all their Philosophers did imitate ours, and our opinions of God, and in humilitie taught others, communion of life, and conuersation: yea the common people did long since imitate our piety: neither is there any nation either Greeks or Barbarians, who haue not after some maner obserued a Sabbath as wee do, and fasting daies, and candlesticks with light, all which they learned of vs; yea many do also obserue our customes concerning their meates, and our vnitie and concord, wherein we excell all other nations, our communie also and industrie in arts and labours, and sufferance for our lawes. And which is most to be admired, our law, not hauing any to force vs to obserue it, hath so obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulsion, so are our lawes amongst vs all, wee not forced thereunto: And whosoever doth diligently consider his owne nation and family, shall find that which I haue reported, to be true: I will now generally reprehend the voluntary malice of all men: for either they meane that wee hauing these good lawes do yet little esteeme them, & follow worse, or if they doe not so mean, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumnation. For I doe not take vpon me the defence of this cause, for that I beare any hatred to any man, but for that I and all Iewes do honour and reuerence our lawmaker, and beleue that whatsoeuer he prophesied proceeded from God, yea although our selues did not know the goodnes of our lawes, yet the multitude of them that imitate them were a sufficient motive to induce vs thereunto. But I haue a large and with all sinceritie discoursed our lawes, and commonwealth in my bookes of our antiquitie.

Our aduersaries affirme vs to haue come of Egyptians: I haue shewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of some other place. They alleadge that we were expelled Egypt for their miserie, in that they were infected with disease; I haue proued that they came from thence to their owne country, by means of their owne prowesse and force, of their owne accord: Others labour to defame our lawmaker as a wicked person, whose vertue many of ancient times, and so long time as hath been since him, doe witness. It is not needfull to speake more largely of our lawes: for they by themselves appeare pious and good, and such as do not inuie or incite vs to the hatred of other nations, but rather to communion and friendship, being both enemies to iniquitie, and commanders of iustice, banishers of luxuriosities, and teachers of frugality and labour: forbidding all warres enterprised for auarice, and preparing the people to shew fortitude in them, and for them; inflicting enuitable punishment vpon their transgressors, not easily to be deceiued by gloasing speeches, and executing in action, all that they in word command: yea amongst vs the execution of them and obseruation is more readie then the words of them: I therefore confidently affirme that we doe teach more pious and vertuous maners then other nations doe. For what can be better then inuolate pietie? What more iust then to obey the law? what more profitable and commodious, then to bee at vnitie and peace amongst our selues, and neither to forsake one another in calamitie, nor inuie one another in prosperitie, to contemne and despise death in time of warre, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to vse other arts and workes, and alwaies to thinke and beleue, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and disposeth all things? If this be either written or referred by any one before this time, we are then to thanke them as being their schollers: but if they are knowne neuer before to haue been extant, then we are knowne to bee the first authors and inuolters of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molans goe, and all others that with them are conuicted of lying and flandering. And this booke is written to thee Epaphroditus who louest the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are desirous to know the same.

Have not grudged, vertuous Father, to dedicate vnto thee a daies labour; wherein I haue perused, and what in me lieth, amended the booke which Ioseph writ of the Ieuen Machabees, brethren: And would it had lien in my power more abundantly, to haue answered your expectation: I haue now (for that I counted the Greeke copy) by the Latine coniectured the Greeke, and altered some things, yet but very few. Ioseph doth not falsely boast himselfe to haue attained to the excellencie of the Greeke tongue, and this booke wil sufficiently witnesse the same; wherein hee shewed both great vanitie and Emphasis, in so much as hee esteemeth to haue handled that famous work with eloquent stile, & the ornament of discourse. Saint

D Jerome for this cause entitleth this booke Great eloquence, Suidas ἀνὰ τοῦτο τὸ ἔργον, that is of the rule of reason: for the scope of this booke tendeth all to prooue, that Reason is of no force in man, except it beare seuerallie ouer all inordinate appetites. This is most evidently proued by the bookes of the Machabees, in the Scripture; which bookes the Iewes doe not receiue as Canonically, yet doe they account it amongst their sacred writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledge (which though famous for many other things yet is more happy) for that it is so blessed, as to enioy so worthy and unspeakable a treasure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy & fortunate Citie; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her bosome shrine so many, so sacred, and excellent pledges of pietie: yet should it be more happy if it could expresse their vertues, whose sacred reliques it so religiously keepeth, and imitate their manners whose bodies it possesseth, to wit, if in sinceritie of religion it imitated the pietie of three Kings, and the sacred puritie of the eleuen Virgines, if it resembled the most valiant young men the Machabees, and the inuincible courage of that woman, whose valourous constancie no miserie could conquer. And this best portion and part of her felicitie, this worthy Citie might bestow vpon her selfe, yea and double the same. Doe thou goe forward in that which thou hast

OF THE RVLE OF REASON.

A MOST ELOQVENT BOOKE, CORRECTED BY DESIDERIVS ERASMVVS, MOST LIVELY setting downe the martyrdome of the Machabees.

LAm vpon the instant request of Polybius of Megalopolis, to comit to writing the constant suffering of the Machabees, woorthy all admiration, not in a Rhetoricall and pleasing stile, but rather after our owne Country fashion, thereby to exhort our nation to patience in their calamities. But first of all, it is necessary for vs to speake something of reason, and assigne vnto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For he who hath once fully determined to suffer all miserie for Gods sake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: it is therefore a great merite once to haue so determined, and therefore as is aboue said, reason beareth the rule of all inferiour passions, & then if destinie denie vs opportunitie to suffer, yet haue we suffered all, because we purposed to suffer all. Whoso therefore will renounce the world, and aspire onely to celestially things, hee must first exercise sobrietie, banish gluttonie, with his page lasciuiousnesse, and all other such like vices as may possesse & captiue the mind: he must likewise mount vp vnto the top of Vertues tower, that after he may from thence warre against the vices of this body, feare, and griefe; the first whereof assaileth vs when we beginne, and the last when we haue begunne. There are many examples of the valiant souldiers of G O D, which I would vse, but that the ornaments sprung from the wombe of one woman may suffice mee, which thee brought forth not at one birth, but with the same pietie and zeale. And first I will speake of Eleazar, the cause and example of their passion, & then I will relate what tortures & torments their mother indured: yet cannot man but onely God determine, who amongst them was first, and who last in this noble agonie. They therefore being all settled in one opinion, resembling one another more in mind then they did in bodie, duellie considered the frailtie of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the world, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They shewed themselves not to esteeme of torments, fetters, nor no other sort of tortures imposed vpon them: and to returne to our first saying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatsoever the Iudges crueltie could deuise. I wil therefore what I may, praise the fortitude of these brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearse the most worthy agonie of these holy men, which deserueth all commendations; and setting all adulation apart, prosecute with a bare historicall narration the manner of their martyrdome.

But before I begin to declare the death of nobilitie, I will a little intreat of reason, which as I haue affirmed is no small motiue to martyrdome. Reason it is, that maketh vs obserue fasts and vse abstinence, it is reason that maketh vs despise money, & by it we are taught not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aime at, yea reasons gift it is that we doe resist the heat of lustfull desires. Hence cometh it, that hauing once overcome such things as the flesh delighteth in, we find our selues a little able to resist, we also learne to despise paines & torments, & so

A so resolute to suffer all things that shall be imposed vpon vs. Which that it may more plainly appeare, let vs search out the cause of this order, and we shall find wisdom to be the cause heereof. For no man can determine and distinguish good from euill that is not endued with wisdom, this wisdom is alwaies accompanied with iustice, and iustice is still ioyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be separated; so that this wisdom consisteth vpon foure parts. Besides these, there are two things that either doe cause or hinder passion, to wit, paine and pleasure: one of the which we doe alwaies refuse, and the other we alwaies desire; yet where pleasure arieth, and is presently by reasons rule put away, the mind is there strengthened; & paine compared with glorie, is through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, our minde is ashamed not to suffer that which it was before resolute to doe. Reason therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it wee despise torments and detest vice, which like a skilful husbandman pruneth and cutteth away superfluous branches, and killeth the heate of all corrupt and hurtfull humors, onely leauing that to remaine in vie, which may some way be profitable vnto vs.

Griefe and paine cause or hinder passion.

Reason resembleth a skilfull gardener.

Thus reason purifieth vs by passion, encouraging to suffer, and in our suffering and agonie strengthening vs. Who is not desirous to eate of the flesh of wilde beasts and fishes? And vvhose lusteth not to eate of feathered fowles? nay, do not the daintie dishes gotten either in sea or land inuite vs to eate of them? What then caueth vs to abstaine from them? that all men desire the, yet no man eateth them? Euen in this thing the mind is taught to overcome it selfe in delightfull objects, and so to bridle all pleasure, that when occasion of martyrdome is offered, the mind setting aside all vanities, will not for a little pleasure forget his accustomed vertue.

C For this cause was Ioseph iustly praised in that he was not overcome by lust, which reigneth in a youthfull body: this reason so worketh with sound aduice and mature counsell, that it againe recouereth lost friendship and getteth new, and suffereth no crueltie to be committed. Of this we haue also the example of Moses, who had hee not iust occasion to bee angry against Dathan and Abiram, reason (no doubt) would haue caused him to haue smothered all griefe of mind. Did not our father Iacob with great vehemencie reprove his sonnes Simon and Leui, that without reason they had vsed such crueltie, saying, Cursed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs, had it been bridled with reason, neither had they beene cursed, nor the other had perished. For this cause God, the maker of mankind, when he fashioned vs and our manners, hauing finished all lineaments of the body, hee now placed the mind to be in it, and to rule it, leauing it certaine precepts to obserue and keepe, to wit, temperance, and to embrace & follow that which is good, and cleaue vnto iustice, and rule and bridle all passions in the body subiect vnto it, & obserue the precepts of God.

An instance of Iosephs chastitie.

D But some will aske me wherefore we offer to commit wickednesse, seeing that reason ruleth our passion? But it is a ridiculous thing to thinke that reason to ruleth, for reasons rule cannot hinder the appetite from desire, but onely correct desire, and so preuaile that it suffer with patience the losse or abstinence from such things as it desired. For example sake, reason cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can to worke that thou commit no impieie when thou art angry: in like manner it cannot hinder thee from desiring filthy pleasure, yet can it cause thee not to yeeld vnto it.

E Reason therefore cannot vriterly extinguish vice, but onely biddeth it. Witnesse in this the example of holy David, who fighting against strangers with great successe, and being at euening wearie and faine, he came vnto his princely tabernacle, that was guarded by his souldiers, where he found them all at meate: yet himselfe being thirstie, durst not drink, notwithstanding water was hard by, onely for that religion dissuaded him, for he had vowed not to drink before he had conquered his enemies. He also forbad his men to drinke, so that they might fight more courageously, if not for that they were valiant, at least for that they might so haue drinke. Whilist thus his thirst encreased, three young men of strong bodies armed themselves, and taking with them a vessell to put water in, they went vnto the enemies campe, and there assaulted the watchmen, who for feare of death fled, and so they past thorow the campe till such time as they came where the water was, and taking some from thence, they brought it to the king. But holy David so bridled his humane appetite, that by reason hee quenched his desire, and shewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the feare of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the water hee had much wished for, and which had been gotten with such danger, he presently poured it on the ground, as a sacrifice to G O D, chusing rather to die for thirst, then to offend offend the diuine maiesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due consideration to G repress the inordinate motions of the mind, and mitigate the griefe of the body. But it is now time to come to our historie, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that it is somewhat appertaining to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisdom and fidelitie of our forefathers, that Seleucus king of Asia enriched our Priests, and being a man of another religion, did ascribe all his actions and worthy deeds, to the religion and faith of our ancestors. But wicked mens madnesse could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon hating the high priest Onias, and finding no waies or meanes to be reuenged of him in his owne country, he went vnto Ap-polonius, Gouverneur of Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia, & before him in a publique assembly told him, that he could helpe the king to an infinite treasure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Ierusalem an infinite deale of gold and siluer, which by right belongeth vnto king Seleucus: Appolonius hearing this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the gold and siluer to the treasure-houle of Seleucus, and hauing authoritie from the king to get it, hee leuied an army, and so accompanied with Simon came vnto our country, purposing if any violence were offered, to vie the defence of his souldiers.

When the treasure-houle of our Temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heauy sight to them to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Appolonius, neither respecting the teares and entreaties of the old men, women, nor children, pressed into the temple, they all praying GOD to punish him and to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy temple, there appeared certaine Angels on horsebacke with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fierie flame I about them, & they daunted the courage of this Infidell Appolonius, who presently fell down flat vpon his face; and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himselfe, and rising vp, hee leaned vpon his shoulder who kept the temple, not being able to stand alone, hee was so terrified with the vision he had scene. When he came a little to himselfe, and was in some hope of recouerie, he stretched both his hands towards heauen, and himselfe despairing to obtaine pardon for his offence committed, hee besought the Hebrewes (to spoile whose temple hee came) to make intercession for him, himselfe with teares crauing pardon for his offence, and not onely acknowledging his fault, but also confessing himselfe to haue deserued death, and all punishment possible. Holy Onias seeing this, & fearing also that if Appolonius should then die, the Hebrewes would be suspected to haue made him away, he made prayers to God for him, and so obtained his enemies life. Appolonius presently hastied to Seleucus to let him vnderstand what had happened, but when he came hee found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus reigning in his steed, a man of tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high priest; and therefore made Iason his brother high priest in his steed; Iason promising Antiochus in lieu of this good turn, to pay him three thousand sixe hundred and threescore talents of siluer every yeere.

This Iason being now made high Priest and chiefe amongst all the nation of the Iewes, hee presently forced all the people to impietie, and to forsake religion; so that to build bathes, he hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our nation conspired with him in this iniquitie. But hereat God was presently wroth: who being displeased, it was not needful to seeke forraine enemies, for Antiochus himselfe was incited to rage against them. Who vvar-ring against Ptolomeus king of Egypt, hee heard it reported that the Iewes did deeme him to be dead, yet was he very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Ierusalem, and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that whoso amongst the Iewes refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, hee should presentlie die vpon the wheele. But the godly minded of our nation did little esteem this Edict, yea the women circumcising their infants (as our law requirerh) did afterward cast themselues downe headlong, to the end that they might so obtaine a present death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiuing that the severity of his Edict could not compell the Hebrewes to forsake their religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; hee sitting in an eminent place from whence all the Iewes might behold him, calling all of them together, he caused swines flesh to be sacrificed vpon the altar, and to be offered to euerie Hebrew to eate. A-M mongst this whole multitude assembled from all places, was one Elezazar a Priest, well instructed in learning, and the feare of God, a man of aged yeeres, and of a very reuerent countenance, one that was knowne to all men, & famous for his vertue. To this man Antiochus said thus: Be advised by me holy old man, to eschew those torments prepared for such as are obstinate, preferue thy reuerent age, and contemne not the benefit of this life, take the sacrifice and eate of the swines

A swines flesh: for it is contrarie to all wise mens aduice to credit the Iewes opinions, and to refuse that meate, which nature hath well ordained for mankind as any other. We shew our selues vngatefull for Gods benefits, who contemne his graces, and make difference where nature hath made none; or what reason is there to shew that this beast is more abominable then others? Either all beasts are to be eaten, or else all to be eschewed: it is superstition and idlenesse to barre our selues from any thing by a law, when we haue no other for it but our will. Set apart those vaine and sortish opinions, and at least in this venerable age, change thy opinion into better. Or suppose your lawes are forcible and to be obserued, yet will they excuse thee, seeing thou doost not sinne voluntarily, but by compulsion.

Elezazar being permitted to speake, thus replied to Antiochus, who both exhorted & forced Elezazar answer to Antiochus.
B him to breach of his lawes. Wee Antiochus doe not follow a vaine report, but wee obserue the veritie of religion which our fathers kept, and feare of torments cannot make vs embrace another religion, and forsake our owne: yea suppose our religion deliuered to vs by our fathers had no firme grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compelled by torments, forsake it. Doe not e-steeme it a small matter to eate impious meate, and to taste of that which is sacrificed to the Idols, for it is a profane thing to touch things that are profane. Our law condemneth your Philosophy, wherein he is most ignorant that thinketh himselfe most wise. We are taught to embrace sobrietie, to subdue in vs all inordinate appetite, to keepe our bodies chaste, & to suffer with patience whatsoever for Gods sake is inflicted vpon vs, and not to denie the truth, iustice or pietie, or God who alone is true: and therefore I refuse this profane meate, well knowing what I ought to eate, C as warranted therein by the precept of Almighty God, whose lawes I haue learned to obey, and eschew all meats sacrificed vnto Idols, & embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the soule: it is open tyrannie to compell any one to that which religion forbiddeth, and to commaund that which is contrarie to iustice. Doe what thou wilt, mocke at thy pleasure, yet shalt thou be more derided then thou thy selfe deridest. I will persist in the holy steppes of my forefathers; notwithstanding thou therefore with tyrannous hands plucke out mine eyes, and with a sharpe knife rip vp my entrails, thou shalt neuer conquer me. I will die chaste and sound, and patient in the loue of God; neither flatter thy selfe for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: if need be that I must be sacrificed for Gods sake, thou shalt find mee in these yeeres as lustie as a child, as constant as a young man, yea and most ioyfull in torments: and prepare an extra-D ordinary fire for me, or what else soeuer, thou shalt find me more constant amidst torments, then now I am before I come to them. O sacred religion! I will neuer violate thee the foundation of my saluation, the defence of the believer, the ground of faith; neuer will I lift vp my hands contrarie to thy precepts, neuer will I believe any thing to be iust, which is repugnant to that which thou hast taught me: I will not lose the merit of so many yeeres, nor relinquish the faith I haue hitherto embraced. The chaste, pure, and deuout company of fathers, that receiue me into their number, where I shall not feare (O impious king) thy threats. But thou hast changed the name of king to tyrant, yet thou shalt neuer alleadge against me my deed, my consent, my word.

Whilst Elezazar full of constancie and libertie spake thus, the souldiers that stood thereabout Elezazar cru-haled him to be tortured; and stripping him naked, they hanged him vp, and whipped him, & elly whipped.
E whilst on either side he was beaten, a crier with an impious voice still cried vnto him, Obey the kings pleasure and commaund. But worthy Elezazar was not overcome by torment, but suffered all tortures, as though he had been in rest and sleepe, and did manfully and without feare endure all torments: and fixing his venerable eyes vpon heauen, hee knew in whom he believed, and to whom he sacrificed his soule; and beholding the flesh on each side rent and torne from his body, and the blood issuing out in great abundance, he admired his owne patience, and thanked God the author thereof. At last, seeing in himselfe the frailtie of all flesh (which is scarcely able to endure so sharpe torments) he fell vpon his face, which with stripes was all rent and torne, still glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the souldiers to gratifie the king, did like a mad man spurne and tread vpon him, thereby to increase his torments more. But Elezazar, both strong F in body and mind, did like a right champion of the true GOD, neuer shrink at those paines, but this patient old man did by patience overcome the cruelty of his tormentors, so that euen the torturers themselves admired that hee endured so many torments. Then the kings officers coming vnto him, said, How long Elezazar wilt thou neglect to obey the king, & to free thy selfe of torments? eate of the flesh of swine, & redeem thy selfe from all thou endurest. Elezazar, although in this martyrdome hee had been silent, yet could hee not without answering endure to heare so profane

"prophane counsaile, but as tormented with this speech, he cried out; We sonnes of the Hebrews
 "are not so effeminate as to forsake the way of our saluation, wherein wee haue walked euen vntill
 "our old age, neither are we taught for the auoiding of contumelie which will not long continue,
 "to giue others example and occasion to sinne, it is but a while that this life is to continue: so that "we forsake but a small trifle, yet hope we for that which is of great moment. Wilt thou tyrant "seeme of vs if wee should yeeld vnto thee? nay thou mightest iustly reprocue our inconstancie.
 "We will therefore die, and resigne our soules (O venerable father Abraham) into thy bosome.

Elezars last words in the fire.

The souldiers seeing his constancie, did by the kings commaund cast him into the fire, and poured stinking & loathsome liquors into his nostrils. All which this reuerent old man did most willingly suffer, and so was consumed with the flame: yet when nature began to faile, hee spake after this manner, lifting vp his dazeld eyes to heauen: Thou art hee (O God) from whom life and saluation proceedeth: behold I die for obseruing thy lawes, be merciful vnto this thy nation, and doe not forsake them whom thou hast hitherto protected, euen in thy bosome, and vnder the shadow of the wings of thy clemencie, let my death end all miserie, & pacifie thy wrath bent against our whole nation for their offences, receiue mee for them all, and bestow them all vpon mee. And amidst these speeches he ioynfully yeelded vp the ghost.

Reasons vic-torie.

It is most true therefore which we at first affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of paines & torments is wrought by our reasons lore, which once determined and resolu'd, maketh a prosperous suffering of paines with all patience, which wisely aduising men to that which is best, doth settle and confirme our opinions to follow it. If therefore reason and the inferiour powers bear variance, we must subiect them to reason if we will make a perfect victorie. With this guide of reason our father Elezar was most safely directed, neither to be ouercome with paines, nor to giue place vnto vnlawfull enticements and allurements, he saued the shippe of his body, from all shipwracke that might arise by the tempestuous stormes of vanitie, and suffered himselfe with no contrarie wind to be driuen from the right course: yea though it was tossed vpon the waues of tyrannie, yet did it remaine sound and vnbroken, and keeping a direct course, arriued in the haven of saluation. Neuer any man did seeke so valiantly to defend his citie from an enemy, as this holy old man did his soule, who amongst stripes, crosses and flames, was still the same man hee was before. For as the toppe of a high rocke standeth safe, and resisteth the waue without any damage vnto it selfe; euen so did the rocke of reason in this man beat back the rage of those tempestuous waues that did beat against his bodie, not permitting them to breake in and pierce the celestiall and diuine power of the soule. O happy old man, more blessed then all of thy age, O priest more sacred then all other priests, who didst not pollute thy sacred lippes with profane ments; impietie found no entrance that way, from whence so many prayers to God had proceeded. The tyrants crueltie could not preuaile against thee, thou therefore art made an example for all Priests of God to imitate. Such a one behooued it a priest to bee, more strong then torments, more able to suffer then the torturers to inflict punishment, more forcible then Princes commaunds, yea and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didst perish: and finally thou wast ordained to be crowned with the lawrell of martyrdom for thy sufferance. Thou hast surpassed all antiquitie, thou shalt be an example to all posteritie. If then feeble old age wherein all strength and heat of bodie was extinguished, now vnfit to suffer torments (as beeing already broken with age) could by the aduice of reason endure so many torments, so many miseries, who dare denie reason to be the chiefe cause of our sufferance? We haue seene that all crueltie hath bene ouer-come by a determination to persist in the seruice and feare of God, yet many affirme that not all men who vse the aduice of reason are able to vndergoe such agonies; but their assertion is vaine, and of no force: for most euident it is, that hee cnely is ouercome by paine, whom wisdom hath not armed with patience. And no maruaile if he who rashly enterpriseth so weightie a matter, & without due consideration, do at last forsake and repent himselfe of that which he so vnadvisedly vndertooke. But if we with due aduice and deliberation arme our selues, it is not an easie matter to remooue vs by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that misfortune will betide vs, wee are not easily dismaied thereat when it doth betide, for that nothing befell vs that we expected not.

praise.

Therefore he that is wise and valiant is able to conquer his passions, for that hee doth well deliberate, and when he commeth to his agony can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wisdom of this old man so much to be admired, seeing children and as it were infants haue so deserued commendations in this point, that they did work astonishment in their tormentors; for

A for the courage and crueltie of Antiochus, being ouercome by the wisdom of olde age, was now the more increased, and by wicked counsell caused seuen worthy children of the Hebrews to be brought vnto Antioch, out of their Castle Solandrum, who being young in yeeres, and so as he thought weake and vnable to suffer torments, his hope was that eyther by persuasions or terror of tortures, he might force them to renounce their religion. He therefore commaunded these seuen, together with their mother Salomona who now grew well in yeeres, to be brought before him: so they according to his commaund were brought, being of excellent beautie and worthy children of so virtuous a mother; yea they resembled Angels, their faces shining like the cleare light of the Sunne, their eyes sparkled in most comely and decent maner, as testifying that they surpassed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. Shee was descended of most vertue and fortitude, wherein she passed all other things that could be said in her commendaticountenance, he thus craftily spake vnto the children. I wish your good (O admirable young-men) for so both your beuty of body and noble parentage perswade me: doe not therefore like mad men resist my commaund, auoide not only torments, but death also. For I desire not one-ly to exalt you vnto honour, but also to increase your riches and possessions; contemne the su-hookes, rakes, racks, caudrons, cages, gridirons, were brought forth; and engines to torment names which we find. For that which I term bellows, was a thin plate of yron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a fan, and far more horrible deuises of torments were shewed vnto them too long to rehearse: whereof they hauing had a sight, Antiochus said.

Consent vnto me, O prudent young men: for if that I commaund you to commit a sin; yet doe you not offend in doing it, seeing you commit it onely vpon compulsion. But the young youtnes inflamed with a diuine spirit and sense, contemned so manie kinds of torments, and despised the tyrants threats and flatteries; and most godly (for they gaue him no iust occasion) they did driue the tyrant into a greater rage. And by this it is euident how reason is maister ouer passion: for if any sloathfull man not before trained vp to it, should of a sodaine come to such a push, at the verie sight of such torments his mind would haue been troubled, and his countenance appalled, his legs vnder him would haue trembled, and he with feare cofounded: so that he would presently haue stepped back from such an agonie, and would forth-with haue alleaged himself vnable to beare so many and so grieuous torments, saying. My self being vnwise, what should I haue made choice of? Whether to indure those torments, or accept of the promised benefits?
 Whether should I haue been moued to pitie mine owne age, or to compassionate my mother?
 God would not haue denied pardon for this deede, I being forced therunto: and by dooing it stancy.

E though against my wil, I shal get the Kings fauour. But where reason and aduise taketh place, and hath well trained the mind to perfection, the other consequently followeth: As by the example of these brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eate of the sacrificed swines flesh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (said they) O tyrant dost thou persecute vs that are innocent? We both desire and wish to die, and will vntill such time as death ex-pellet life, firmly keepe that which God commaunded and Moses taught vs. And thou tyrant, do not seek to seduce vs by protesting feined loue toward vs: a thou louer of iniustice, master of cruelty, deuiler of iniquity, the pardon which thou doest offer is to vs more painefull then punishment: we are armed with contempt of death, and esteem not thy words, as being by our late master Elezar taught to despise them. Why then dost thou esteem such pusillanimity to be in vs F young me, seeing of late thou foundest such courage in an old man? Wee follow him: thou canst not trie and know our minds, except by tearing our bodyes, thou search them out: wee wil safely and securely suffer for our God any thing, and leauing this earth wee shall bee entertained into heauen; and thou for so tyrannizing most cruelly vpon innocent soules shalt be referred to eternall fire.

The seue bre-

The tyrant greatly moued, to see that hee could neither preuaile by faire promises nor by threat-threatnings, he caused them to be beaten with bulls peafels: & first of all he commanded Macchabeus the eldest of the seuen brethren to be stripped, and stretched out vpon a rack, and his hands to bee bound behind him, and then to be most cruelly beaten, who wearied his tormentors by suffering (so great the force of vertue is) so that they desired more to leaue bearing him, then he requested they should leaue. This done, he was put vpon a wheele, and a weight hanged at his feet, and so stretched round about it, thut his sinewes and entrailes brake, and so his paines increased: yet he being ouercome with pain, his mouth was not for all this stopped or hindred from calling vpon God, who beheld all; and reproving the tyrant who deuised those torments for the innocents, and taking strength, he is said to haue cried out after this manner. Bloody tyrant, who persecutest the maiesty of God, I whom thou thus tormentest, am no Witch, nor one who haue murdered and killed another man, but one who dies for iustice obseruing the law, and for charitie. Then when the torturers ouercome with compulsion, willed him to submit himselfe vnto the Kings pleasure, he answered: O ye wicked ministers of tyranny! your wheels are not so sharp and cruell, that I thereby will be forced to forsake heauen, whereon my mind is fixed: teare my flesh; yea if so you please, roste it at the fire: torture and torment each parcell of my body with fenerall cruelty; you shall for all this finde your selues vnable to force vs young men to impietie.

The death of the elder brother.

As hee thus spake a fire was kindled, and hee as bee was vpon the wheele racked, was so throwne into the fire: and thus hee was by flames and torments so burned, that his bowells appeared; his mind nothing moued when his flesh yeelded ouercome with paines, who amidst his pangs cried thus vnto his brethren: (O beloued brethren) learne of me an example of vertue, consider the strength of an inuincible courage, contemne and despise the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then the tyrant, who can if he please humble the proud and mightie, and exalt the lowly and dejected. As thus hee spake, he was taken out of the flame, and fleane aliae, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying panne, and so hee departed out of this life to the great admiration of all that behelde him, and the ioy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to heauen, there to prepare a kingdome for himselfe and them.

The second
brought.

After him the second brother called Aber was haled by the souldiers: and before the tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he caused all those torments to be shewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moued, and denying to ear of that foresaid sacrifice, his hands were bound with yron chaines, and he being hanged vp by them, the skinne of his bodie was fleane from the crowne of his head vnto his knees: so that the entrailes in his breast appeared naked; yet in such manner, as yet he might abide greater torments. For he was cast before a cruell Libarde thirsting most extreemly after blood, to the entent that he might deuoure with his teeth the rest of his bodie: but the beast smelling of him (no doubt by the great handie worke of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, he did no hurt to the Martyr.

But hereat the tyrants rage increased, and the Martyr by suffering such torments, was made more constant, crying aloud: O how pleasant is that death vnto me, which is caused by all sorts of torments for Gods sake; yea so much the more pleasant, for that I assuredly hope to finde reward for it in heauen. Let these torments inflicted vpon me (O tyrant) satisfie thy crueltie, for my pain is not by thy tortures encreased, but rather my pleasure, as thou shalt find by my patience in this agonie. More willing am I to suffer then thou to punish, yea my paine in suffering, is lesse then thine by inflicting the same vpon me. I am tormented for vertue and obseruing the law, and the iustice of God shall banish thee from thy regall seate: thou by tormenting art tormented and almost consumed, thy wrath and fury being almost spent vpon me in vaine, thou shalt not escape the day of iudgement: eternall paines are there prepared for thee, which neither thy profane mind is able to indure, nor thy cruelty of power to decline, thy sinfull soule being condemned to eternall punishments. Thus he remaining constantly in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, departed vnto heauen.

Machir the third brother is brought.

Then Machir the third son was brought, whom all men now pittied for the death of his two brethren, & many exhorted him by his brothers examples to desist from his opinion, & so avoid punishment: but he being hereat angry, thus replied. One father begot vs, one mother bore vs, one master instructed vs, we are all of one mind, and all alike affected, do therefore no longer prolong the time in vaine. I came hither for to suffer & not to speake, vse all your tyranny possible against this

A this body: for you haue no power at all ouer my soule. The tyrant hereat moued to see this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he deuised more cruelty then humane wit alone could inuēt. Wherefore hee commaunded a globe to be brought, and tyed the holy martyr about it in such sort, that all his bones were set out of ioynt, and displaced: whereat the holy martyr was nothing dismayd. The skin also of his head and face was pulled off, and then he was put vpon the wheel: but he could not be racked any worse; for that all his bones were displaced, and did hang one separated from another in most pittifull manner: and when blood issued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the vse of his hands, and feet; but perceiving his life to be spent, he spake thus and dyed. We O tyrant endure this torment for the loue God, and thou the author of such iniust cruelty shalt suffer euerlasting paine. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth he was put into a frying pan, and so amidst those torments yeelded vp the ghost.

Iudas the fourth brother is brought.

Next after followed Iudas the fourth brother, whom all the people perswaded and entreated to obey the King: but he contemning their prayers and exhortations, said thus with all constancie: Your fire shal neither separate nor seuer me from the law of God, nor from my brethren, who instead of this mortall life enioy life euerlasting. I denounce vnto thee, O tyrant, destruction and ouerthrow; but to such as beleeeue, saluation: make triall of me therefore thou cruel wretch, and see if God will forsake me, who hath with open and stretched out armes, receiued my three brethren that are gone before me, and whom the wombe of so holy a mother at severall times brought forth vnto glory. The cruel tyrant hearing this, was much moued, and leapt down from his chaire to torment this martyr himselfe, that so he might ouercome him, and in his fury commaunded his tongue to be cut forth: but he hereat not terrified said vnto Antiochus. This crueltie will nothing auail thee, neither shalt thou hereby tyrant, as thou supposest conquere mee. Our God needs not by voice to be awakened, but rather by secret cogitation to be praised vnto his helpe his seruants: he prouideth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of such as do call vpon him if they deserue to be heard, and only requireth purity of soule. For our God knoweth all things before we aske, and before we our selues enter into cogitation thereof, he vnderstandeth our necessitie: cut out my tongue, thou canst not cut out my mind while my life remaineth. Those prayers which by it I haue vttered to Almighty God, haue taught it to suffer: would God thou wouldest so sanctifie all parts of my body by punishing them, for thou therein inflictdest punishment vpon thy selfe & reward vpon me, & think not that thou shalt thus escape long unpunished. When he had thus spoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a stake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends: and he did patiently endure this, notwithstanding the colour of his face became dead and wanne. Being loosed from thence he was put vpon the wheele: and then praying for his countymen, hee by death went vnto the rest of his brethren.

The death of the fourth

Achas the fifth brother presented himselfe to torments before he was called.

Then Achas the fifth brother before hee was haled to torments spake in this manner. Behold (thou tyrant) I come to be punished before thou command me, hope not therefore any iot to alter his mind, who as thou seest desireth to be tormented. The blood of my foure innocent brethren which thou hast shed, hath condemned thee to hell fire: I am to make them vp the number of five, that by it thy paines may be encreased. Tell me (bloody wretch) for what offence by vs committed dost thou thus punish vs? for what impiety dost thou so persecute vs? what villany haue we committed? what wickednesse, what naughtinesse haue we attempted? This is all thou canst allege against vs, that we honor God our Creator, & liue iustly in obedience of his lawes, and therefore do not esteem thy punishments: but they are to vs honour and saluation, and not punishment: we shall be greatly rewarded by God if no part of vs bee left free from torment. Whilest thus he spake, his executioners by the kings commaund tooke him and cast him into a brasen pot, and was prest downe in it, his head to his feet: and afterward he suffered all other torments, which his brethren had endured; yet not amazed hereat, he sodainly started vp and thus bitterly inueighed against the tyrant: Cruel tyrant, how great benefits dost thou against thy will bestow vpon vs! yea the more thou art incensed against vs, the more acceptable to God shalt thou be vs life euerlasting; if this temporall death should not betide me, euerlasting life could not befall me. And thus he finished his agonie and died.

Then the tormentors laid hands vpon the sixth brother who was called Areth, whom the tyrant permitted either to chuse honour or else punishment: but he aggrieved at his offer, said, Al- though tyrant I be younger in yeers then my martyred brethren, yet my constancie of mind to theirs theirs is not inferiour: for we were all nourisht vp together, all together instructed, and we will al-die together in the feare of God. Hasten therefore to thy deuised torments, and that time which "thou wouldest spend in exhorting me, spend it in deuising tortures for me. Antiochus hereat confounded, commanded him to be bound to a pillar with his head hanging downe, in such wise as humours running into it might cause ache: & this done, he caused a fire to be made so far off him, that it could not burne him, but rost him. He also commanded him as he hung to be pricked with awles, that so the heat might pierce into the holes that they made in his flesh. Whilest thus hee was tormented, much bloud like froth gathered about his head and face, and hee then spake in this manner. O noble fight! O valiant war! O strife betweene pietie and impietie! These men haue past their agonies, whose crowne of Martyrdome is the punishment of their persecutors:

"I do most willingly follow my brethren, that as by bloud I am conioyned vnto them, so by death
"I may not be separated from them. Deuise, O tyrant, some new torment, for these which thou hast "alreadie deuised are alreadie ouercome. O maister of cruelty, enemy of pietie, persecutor of ius"tice! we fixe worthy young men haue conquered the kings power, & what his kingdome or the "whole world could afford. Thy fire is cold and heateth not, and the kings weapons are bended
"and blunted in our bodies; our God giueth vs more courage to suffer, then thou hast to punish:
"and so the precept of God remaineth firme in vs. And as hee thus spake, one tooke holde of his tongue with a hot paire of tongues: and suffering the same torments that his brethren had done, and fryed in a frying pan, he gaue vp the Ghost.

Jacob the se-

brought to torments.

Six of the brethren being now dead by diuersitie of torments, onely one of the seuen remained aliue with his mother, named Jacob, younger in yeeres (but not in constancie of minde) I then the rest of his brethren: hee presenting himselfe before the tyrant, moued him to compassion, both for that he was left alone, and the last of his brethren, and also that hee was to perishe wherefore hee called the child vnto him, and into a place where no instruments of torment were, and taking him by the hand he said thus vnto him, hoping to winne him by faire speeches.
By thy brethrens calamitie thou now well hast learned what is prepared for thee if thou disobey
"me, deliuer thy selfe therefore from these torments, & I will giue thee what honour my kingdom
"can afford: thou shalt bee a Magistrate and Generall of my armie, and one of my counsellors:
"But perceiuing himselfe not to preuaile, he caused the young mans mother to be called vnto him: who comming and standing neere her sonne, the tyrant said thus vnto her. Where are now O worthy woman all thy children? Behold, of such a number, if thou please, the deuenie affords "three one: aduise therefore thy child, and mollifie his obstinate minde by wholesome counsell.
"The mother hauing heard what the king said, she inclined her selfe vnto the king: which done, that the king might not vnderstand her, she spake in Hebrew to her child as followeth. Pities thy "mother O sonne, and comfort thy sorrowfull mother, who bare thee nine moneths in my womb, "and gaue thee sucke three yeeres; and with great industrie haue brought thee vp to this age. I "pray thee, deare sonne, consider the heauen and earth, and all that in them is, and know that God "created them all of nothing, who also of nothing made mankind. Feare not this Ethnicks

"I may receiue thee and thy brethren againe in heauen. As his mother thus admonished him, he
"in the Hebrew tongue requested to be vnbound, for that he had a secret to disclose vnto the king: I "who being vnfettered, he presently ran to the torments prepared: for there was a frying panne red hot, that was prepared for such as were to suffer: vnto the which the child comming, remembring his brethren, & beholding also the king, he said vnto him. Cruell tyrant, I now know thee "not onely to haue bene cruell against my brethren, but euen crueltie is selfe. Wretch that thou "art, who gaue thee this purple? and who exalted thee to this kingdome & dignitie? euen he whom "thou in vs dost persecute, whose seruants and worshippers thou killest and tormentest, for which "thy wickednes thy selfe shall suffer eternall fire and torments which shal haue no end. Thou art of "higher dignitie & authoritie in this world then other men, yet he that made other men made thee
"also of the same nature that they are of: all men are borne & must die alike. He that killeth another, "sheweth that himselfe may be killed: thou tearest and tormentest thy owne picture and image. M
"all in vaine: thou in thy furie killest him whom not long since God created like thy selfe, and ac"cording to the same lawe: thou thinkest all lawfull which thy kingly power can command:
"thou pullest out our tongues and tearest our bodies with flesh hookes, and consumest vs with "fire: but they who haue already suffered this, haue receiued euerlasting ioy for their reward; and thou shalt aunswere for all the punishments inflicted vpon them. Thinke not that I torment comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head; when with violence of the tortures bloud issued out of his mouth, nose and priue parts, the tormentors not ceasing till life in him was almost spent: but they (by Gods appointment) gaue ouer; and so he tooke strength againe to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at last his hands and armes being cut off, hee lifted vp his eyes to heauen, and cried; O Adonai; O Sabaor be mercifull vnto me, The death of and receiue me into the companie of my brethren, let thy wrath now cease and grant them mercie, who by vs doe make intercession to thee; hauing said thus his tongue being pulled out, he of his owne accorde went into the fiery frying-pan; and so to the great admiration of Antiochus B dyed.

The death of the youngest brother.

Beholde how euident it is; that reason can rule our affections, seeing that children heere-by shewed more constancie then the tyrant could shewe crueltie. For, it was reasons force that wrought in them that determination to suffer all torments, rather then to forsake the way of saluuation. These constant young men do fitly resemble inexpugnable towers, and them, who after a great tempest and shipwracke, doe safely enter the harbour of saluation, who guiding their course amidst the boisterous waues, at last obtaining the wished shore. For euery one of them strengthened the other by aduice and good counsaile, and none of them was like an effeminate person, loath to suffer martyrdom. None vsed delay herein, but one followed anothers example.
Let vs therefore die for our lawe, and imitate the three children, whom the Assyrians fury condemned to the fiery furnace, whole patience spread their fame euen vnto heauen. Whilest C thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to passe, that none of them offended, but each one resolute in his religion, rooke example of the vertue, courage, and constancie of their fore-father Isaac, who vnderstanding that it was Gods will he should be sacrificed, hee refused not to submit his body to his fathers sword. Let vs (quoth they) yeelde our soules to him, of whom we receiued both soule and body: It is a small matter for vs to suffer losse of these members, seeing that wee shall in lieu of them receiue euerlasting blisse. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob doe ioy-fully expect vs, as coheires of their kingdome: let vs glorifie that wombe wherein wee were for ten moneths space, let none of vs be more coward then the other, nor none of vs degenerate from the other. Wee that were all begotten of one father, and sucked of one milke, must in D all things resemble one another, wee had one teacher, and one lawe inuiolate. And in this golden bond of concord were these brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to see the other tormented, but all reioycied at the others death. O children whose dignitie farre sur-passeth the royaltie of Kings and Princes, whose glory and vertue is vnspokeable! None of you were terrified with feare, but you so hastened to your deaths, as though you had onely beene to go to blisse and felicitie: you were truly brethren, who euen by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our nation, and in you shewed vs all an example of fortitude: a whom therefore I think he caused to be so many in number, as were the daies wherein he created the world, so that these seauen brethren may resemble the seauen dayes, wherein all things were made. And why should we so admire this fortitude in these young men, when a woman ar-E med her selfe with contempt of death? Who indeede is not to be called a mother, but to bee honoured with a higher title then humane frailtie can afford, who bare into this world so many triumphs.

For the mother seeing her children dead, was with a kinde and godly zeale inflamed also to suffer: and no maruaile, seeing that the very brute beasts, if they perceiue violence offered to their young, do oppose themselves to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and talons: yea and euery one that is any way able to make resistance, opposeth her selfe to the enemy to defend her young. And not onely brute beasts doo this, but euen Bees doe defend not onely their young, but also their hony, threatening their stings to them that offer to taste ther-of, and more esteeming the good of their young then their owne liues. But this zealous mo-F ther directed by the spirit of God, and reasons lore, hastened that her children might dy before hir; who not being to liue deprived of her children, chose rather to see them die ioyfully then to perish in care and sorrow. Therefore when all her family had suffered, she then the last and glorie of them all, came to her agony, despising the tyrants threats, & offering hir motherly breast to those torments which her children had suffered. O blessed stocke and blessed increase of the selfe same wombe! Why should I not affirme that in all lineaments and feature of the bodie you are like your mother: and if this be a commendation in them, that beside the shape of bodie receiue nothing else of their mother, I will say more of you, that you are like your mother in fortitude, ver-tue, and religion, and that you so in all things resemble her; that you are every way equal vnto her, save onely herein, that she with her eies beheld the immahity of your torments, being also as constant in her owne martyr dome as you in yours. She therefore had excell'd you, that she suffered seven torments before she came to suffer in her owne person; and feared in every one of them least she should be overcome. But O thou example of all women I cannot tel, whether thou bare these children in thy wombe, or created them, who could with drie eies looke vpon them whilst they were torne in peeces: yea I say little, affirming that thou with patience didst behold these fights, for euen thou thy selfe didst exhort them thereto, thou reioycdest to see one of them torne in peeces with flesh hooks, the other to be racked vpon the wheel, and the third to be bound and beaten, thou ioyfully admiredst the others burning, and exhortest the rest not to be terrified herewith, and although whilst thou beheldest their torments, thy grief was greater then that which thou hadst in childbirth, yet didst thou frame a light some and merry countenance, as though it had bene one triumphing. While they were a killing thou didst laugh, and seeing only one of all thy children left, herat thou didst nothing relent. Can I describe how every one perished, seeing thou their mother didst laugh at their deaths, and when their sinewes were cut in two, their heads fleane, their tongues pulled forth by the rootes, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and cast vpon iron plates red hot, and vpon wheels, and their ribs pulled in sunder, & many other torments for the which we want names? Neuer was any swanne, which by (the report of antiquitie) sung so sweet a note before her death (sweeter then the most melodious harmonie, and the most pleasant voice) as were the funerall verses of those thy children that perished.

You children were not overcome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honour God doubted not to leaue your mother without children: And she, sprung of noble stock, chose rather to want you all for a short time, then to incurre eternall damnation, wishing rather that the bodies of her children should be tormented then their soules. Well shee knew, that nothing was more fraile & infirm then our bodies, which though persecutiō be wanting, are often killed with agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of shipwracke incident to sail-ers, hazard of life vnto them that trauaile, and sodaine death to those that lye in ease? Sodaine casualty by fire, and by the hands of theeues, and a thousand other waies to dispatch our liues? K Seeing then that our mortall bodies are subiect to so many miseries to bring vs to our end, who would not make choise of a quick dispatch, wherby we lose the goods of this world, and gaine life euermlasting? O thou most reuerent of all women, the credit of thy nation, and honour of our religion, who like the Arke of Noe didst persist inuiolate amongst such stormy waues: for as it withstood the force of the Deluge, and being built strongly with firme bords, did not suffer any thing within it to perish: so thou suffrest not the tyrant to overcome the holy Ghost which thou hadst receiued in thy heart.

A similitude from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacie reason is, which often times maketh vs men inferior to women. For neither was Daniel so terrified at the sight of the Lions, nor the 3. children with the fie-rie furnace, as this woman was grieved at the death of euery one of her children before she came to her owne agonie. What would another woman & mother haue done in this case, but wept & with pitifull lamentations haue cried: Ah wretch that I am, most vnhappy, & miserable of all that breath, who therefore bare so many children into this world, that their feuerall deaths might be so many feuerall occasions of my griefe & sorrow! she would haue iterated her frequent births, and her toyle in her ten moneths bearing them, shee would haue bewailed her haplesse fortune who brought forth so many deaths and dangers, she would haue recounted the milke wherewith she fed them, and their meat she had prepared for them, the paines she had taken with them, how she had caried them in her armes, and sung to them and taught them to speake, her cares, her watchings, her feare, least any mishap should betide them: and with weeping teares would haue said, shall I a grandmother embrace your children? who a while agoe was a too fruitfull mother, and am now deprived of you all? if this day I die, I haue none to bury me. But this handmaide of God forgot all these laments that another mother would haue had, and with an adamant sense stouter then the neuer yeelding rockes, did neither forsake her children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to perish, and neuer forroved thereat. For being apprehended together with her seven sonnes, she considering Eleazars martyr dome, did thus exhort

IMMORTALITY OF THE MACHABEES:

811

A exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. O my most deare and louing children, let vs hasten to that agonie herein we may bee a credit to our nation, and gaine of God an euermlasting reward: let vs without feare present our selues vnto those torments, which Eleazars aged body endured: call to mind our father Abraham of worthie memorie, who hauing but one onely sonne, did sacrifice him being willed by God so to doe, and feared not to bring him to the Altar, whome hee dearly in his age obtained. Isaac also was willing to bee sacrificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things, the like may bee said of Daniel and the three children: beleeue me we are rather tried then tormented. For whatsoeuer this world affordeth is mortall and like a shadowe.

Thus did this mother arme her childrens minds with fortitude, and shee a woman wrought in men manlike minds. Last of all, her children being all dead, shee a worthy mother of so manie champions, kneeling downe in the place of torment, besought of God an end of this life, protesting that shee had no forsake of life so long deferred to die, but onely for her childrens sake, and that now she had seene them all seuen triumphing. The furie of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the tyrant willed) stripped naked, and hanged vp by the hands, and most cruelly whipped; her dugges and paps were pulled off, and she put into the red hore frying pan, being most willing to follow her childrens steps in torment, and lifting vp her eyes and hands to heauen, shee prayed for all women with child, and so yeelded her chaire to God. But Antiochus was thicken with fire from heauen. O mistris of iustice, who followed thy triumphing children! O conquerour of tyrants, and a looking glasse for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not only to women but to all men, that shall bee after thee, reuerenced of them that now are, and to be worshipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not onely of our nation, but of all other people. Thy light ob'reureth the bright shining Moone, and though she fill the world with her brightnesse, yet is shee not comparable to thy shining light. Seuen lights are on thee about, dauling the brightnesse of the seuen planets: could any Painter expresse, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your passions, none could with drie eye read or behold them; all people would flocke about to see it, all people would praise and esteeme him to haue offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden stratageme. And if any skilfull workman should engraueth this Tragedy vpon a sepulchre or in his house, doubtlesse hee should be freed from all plague and misfortune.

1. Cor. 13.

D But where could a stone bee found able to containe so many torments? Therefore the olde man Eleazar, the mother and her seven sonnes, are for their nobilitie graced with a sepulchre, and great reuerence is done vnto them of all men, yea euen by men that are not of our religion: and there is a constellation of eight starrs ordained as an argument of their iustice, and Angels did execute their funeralls. The tyrant him selfe was astonished to see the constancie of such godlie minds. And thus haue they found such fauour in the sight of God, that they haue obtained remission of the finnes of our nation: for presently after, the tyrant was destroyed, and Israel there was freed from his tyrannie.

But Antiochus seeing the greatness of their faith and their contempt of death, gathered an armie of footmen out of the Hebrewes, by whose helpe he terrified his enemies, and got great renowne. O blessed seede of Abraham! behold what benefit the agonie of the mother, and her seven sonnes brought vnto vs their Countreymen: let vs persist in this pietie, that so wee may bee like our forefathers: behold, the death of a few, did end all the miseries and finnes of our whole nation, and you by your Countreymens hands, vanquished your persecutors enemies, and after that victorie our finnes were remitted, and last of all, Antiochus being mad and his entrailes deuoured with wormes, hee smelling most like carrion, gaue vp the ghost: and was euer after death punished for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Ierusalem to forsake their law, he made warre against the Persians, and there receiued that which hee deferred.

2. Ma. 9.

It now remaineth that we briefly repeate all that is before said. For in her agonie, this sacred mother said thus vnto the standers by. Whilst it was lawfull for me, I kept my selfe a virgin, and then I married and liued a chaste wife, and forsooke not my owne house, I brought forth such sonnes as I neede not be ashamed of, and though daunted with my husbands death, yet I did not forsake my faith: this, and many things else shee recounted. And what more? Shee set before her childrens eies the examples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was slain, Isaac to be offered insteade of a sacrifice, how Jacob was banished, Joseph kept in prison, Daniel cast before the Lyons, the three children into the fierie furnace: she rehearsed also vnto them the booke of Esaias, where it is said: Although thou doe goe through the fire, the flame shall not burne thee. That of David, The iust shall haue much tribulation, and Salomon, who propoeth the tree of life to such as doe the will of God, not omitting that of Ezechiel, These drie and withered bones shall liue againe: Also that of Moses Canticle, I will kill and restore to life, and the length of your daies is in my hand. Vnhappy tyrant what did thy caudrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what auailed it thee to cut away their eye-lids, and to pul out their tongues? thou thy selfe for so doing doest now endure farre worse then all these. And they whome thou killedst (belene mee) enioy euerslasting comfort, and are now secure of blisse and reuenge. For they who suffer for Gods sake shall haue happie successe, when God the Father of all things shall reward them with life euerslasting that follow him. Thus haue I consecrated these worthy memorials, which I find in the holy Scriptures of the sacred Machabees, to the reading of all men, that shall liue in any age heereafter.

IOSEPHVS, OF THE MARTYRDOME

The ioy of the blessed in euerslasting life.

The end of all Iosephus workes.
